That, with her level-headedness, makes for an unbeatable combination. She started work on Indra Kumar's Dil when she was a nobody. But by the time three-four reels were in the can, Tezaab came along to make her a star. Says director Indra Kumar: "We thought, it's such a big hit. She will have hang-ups But she proved to be a thorough professional."

And professionalism to Madhuri doesn't just mean reporting on the sets on time. It also means putting her heart and soul into her performance when the cameras finally begin rolling. Once, when the shooting of Kishen Kanhaiya was in progress at Lala Lajpat Rai College in Haji Ali, Madhuri arrived a couple of hours late. Very apologetic indeed, she all but crawled on all fours to let director Rakesh Roshan know how contrite she was about the delay. But the moment the shot was ready, the shamefaced Madhuri had disappeared. And in her place stood a boisterous teenager, exhorting the audience (she was supposedly watching a film) to beat the on-screen villains. The transformation was nothing short of miraculous.

But despite her undisputed flair for comedy, says Shekhar Kapur, Madhuri has "the expression of classic tragic passion". Says the director: "She has the ability to portray a woman completely and entirely in love. I think one of the reasons she has been so successful is because of her ability to underscore passion and personal tragedy She may not have the high energy pattern oomph which belongs to Sri but she has a classical dimension that Sridevi lacks."

KALYAN CHAKRAVORTY

DURGAPRASAD

If this means that Chawla has learnt her lesson, there could be hope for her yet.

AMRITA SINGH

But that's all in the past. Now, the film industry is watching—and wondering at—the new, improved Amrita. She's on a new diet (mainly lassi) and her waistline is beginning to feel, and show, the difference. If her two major forthcoming releases, Akela with Amitabh Bachchan and Karishma Kaali Ka, succeed at the box-office, she could give Dixit a run for her money.

MANISHA KOIRALA

• Her biggest advantage is not her innocent smile, or her peaches and cream complexion. In the film industry, there are pretty faces by the dozen.

What Koirala does have going for her is mentor Subhash Ghai. After complaining about the portly director's "advances" Manisha decided that he wasn't such a bad sort, after all, and, apparently, told close friends that she was in love with him.

Under the circumstances, it was the smartest move to have made. Now, Ghai is trying special interest in his protégé's career. Trade gossip has it that he'll turn her into another Madhuri Dixit before he's through.

And, where do you think that will leave the original?

But when you meet Madhuri face-to-face, she doesn't come across as a great actress, tragic or otherwise. Instead, she seems just another girl—though undeniably pretty—in her mid-twenties with a satisfying career. There aren't the nakhras usually associated with stars; in their place are myriad interests, ranging from classical dancing to sketching. For, as Madhuri discloses with pride, she doesn't come from a filmi background. Hers is a family of true culture and breeding, which never lets her get ideas above her station.

But they do insist on excellence. Says Dixit: "I was taught never to give up. I always competed in elocution and dance and song competitions. And when I never won a prize, I would get really upset. But my mother used to say, 'Keep competing and you will win'. And sure enough, I did."

That lesson in perseverence once learnt was never forgotten. Even today, Madhuri's routine is killing. The entire week is spent rushing from one studio to another, and on Sundays Dixit is up early to put in three hours of Kathak practice with Guru Hazari Lal Jaipurwala. Her face totally devoid of make-up, hair tied back in a pony tail, Madhuri goes through her paces, sticking her tongue out and glancing apologetically at her guru everytime she misses her step.

But call a photo session, and she is every inch a star. Casually dressed in trousers and a bright green shirt, she exudes self-confidence in front of the camera. Says photographer Gautam Rajadhyaksha: "She looks like Michaelangelo's Madonna, serene face, large eyes, chiselled lipline, aristocratic expression. Somewhere along the line she begins to enjoy her work; that's what makes her different."

Rajadhyaksha talks about the time Madhuri walked into his studio at 7.30 pm after a hard day's work: "She had to pose with a backdrop of ice with the air-conditioning on. When she got up after a couple of hours we realised that her jeans were soaking wet. But the next day she called me to say that she's had great fun at the shoot."

Dixit maintains it is her family that has shaped her attitude to work. "We have imbibed discipline so that it is not even possible for us to do something wrong. We were always told to take our careers very seriously. My siblings are all architects and engineers."

Initially, of course, her engineer father was dubious about letting his youngest child enter the big bad world of Hindi films. Says Mr Dixit: "We had heard that the industry was a bad place. But if you keep yourself above board nobody can touch you." And now that Madhuri has done just that, her parents, two sisters and her brother are in this with her. One of her parents always accompanies her to the sets, and though that has led to unkind cracks about her Sridevi-like Mummy-knows-best syndrome, Dixit would much rather have it this way.

Off the sets, she spends her time listening to music ("anything from pop to classical"), dancing (Kathak) and reading ("science fiction; I can't take heavy reading after a hard day's work"). Occasionally, when she watches a science programme on TV, she does feel a twinge of regret about having to give up a career in microbiology for films. But shakes it off in her usual no-nonsense manner.

But, obviously, the interest remains, for even her similies are related to the subject. The relation between the press and the stars, she says is like that between "the root nodules and bacteria. They both need each other". The relationship between Madhuri and the film industry is just as symbiotic. While the industry needs a heroine who can draw the crowds—as Dixit undoubtedly can—Madhuri is unlikely to excel in any other sphere as she has in films. Small wonder then, that the actress is all too willing to make the compromises asked of her. "Sometimes when I am dancing," she says, a trifle ruefully, "I have to strike suggestive poses, as in that Sailaab number. But instead of making the dance cheap by tossing my face and body aggressively, I deliberately brought innocence, laughter and sweetness into my eyes and face so that people would notice my facial expression more than my body. I try to make the best of every situation."

But the dissatisfaction remains. Says Madhuri: "Whenever I see my dances I feel there is something wrong there, something missing. Then again, sometimes at the end of the week I am so tired I feel like giving it all up. But then I think if I want to do well in any other profession, I would have to be just as dedicated."

And having come this far, it does seem stupid to give it up for a momentary whim.

For, Madhuri has come a long way. Only a couple of years back Anil Kapoor would turn up his nose at the mention of her name, admitting that he signed films with her only on Boney's say-so. "I thought," recounts the now-wiser Kapoor, "ek do films kar sakta hoon. Then at one point I got a lot of films so I did not want a big star who would have date problems. So I signed Parinda, Tezaab and Beta with Madhuri also."

When Hifazat flopped, everyone told Kapoor that Dixit was a flop actress, good only for "sister roles". He was mad, they said, for having signed

Milestones

The films that made Dixit a star

TEZAAB

• Madhuri's first major hit after a series of flops. The film revolved around Munna, the good-hearted ruffian (played by Anil Kapoor), but Dixit managed to steal the show with her foot-tapping dance number Ek do teen. As the entire nation swayed to her beat, Madhuri announced that she had arrived. So what if there was still a long way to go.

RAM LAKHAN

• Even though the film had such stars as Anil Kapoor (yes, again), Jackie Shroff, Dimple Kapadia and Raakhee, Madhuri's mentor Subhash Ghai ensured that she had plenty to do. And that her bits didn't get chopped off at the editing table either. For her part, Madhuri was properly grateful and put in a sterling performance. The strategy paid off: it was Dixit's pout that was remembered long after Kapoor's shenanigans as the spoilt younger brother had been forgotten.

KISHEN KANHAIYA

• Her comic flair came to the fore in this film about two movie buffs (Anil Kapoor being the other) who spend half their lives in darkened movie halls and the other half imitating their favourite stars. Madhuri's take-offs on such established greats as Raj Kapoor were quite stupendous and she managed to overshadow Anil with what looked like effortless ease. The one grouse that critics had against her—that she couldn't handle comedy the way Sridevi did—died a quiet death.

TRIDEV

• This Rajiv Rai-directed multi-starrer didn't have much use for the heroines except as decoration. On Madhuri's own admission, all she had to do was "dance and disappear". But despite these constraints, she didn't do too badly. While Tridev certainly wasn't her hit, her slithering and swerving in the Oye oye number undoubtedly contributed to the film's repeat value. And she managed to make Sonam and Sangeeta Bijlani look quite flat-footed by comparison.

DIL

• She portrays the entire gamut of emotions in this film: the ebullience of a college kid, the passion of a young woman in love and the anguish of a wife who is forced by circumstances to leave her husband. What's more, she portrays them well.

If Tezaab signalled Madhuri's arrival as a star, Dil established her as an actress.

And, if Dixit's professionalism and hard work doesn't flag—and nobody who knows her well thinks it will—she can only get better and better.

The Dancing Dixit

It's Madhuri's twinkle-toes that have got her where she is Success to Madhuri Dixit didn't come easily. And nor did the ability to pull of the lachak-matak numbers that pass off as dances in Hindi cinema. Trained in the classical mode, Madhuri found the unconventional (to say the least) movements of filmi dances near impossible to execute.

And then she found herself under the wing of Saroj Khan the rotund dance director of Tezaab. But despite the excess flesh, Khan could dance up a proverbial storm and Dixit couldn't have had anyone better to initiate her into the intricacies of the bump and grind routine, as executed in Ek do teen.

Says Madhuri: "I practised for a week continuously for that song. These kind of steps were strange and unfamiliar to me and I really had to work hard. You can say I learnt all the ropes in those seven days."

Concurs Saroj Khan: "She did not know anything about commercial dancing. I had to teach her everything, from camera angles to dancing, the frame, etc. But I must say she gave it all she had. At times I would ask her to go home, and tell her there was no need to come the next morning. But come next day she would be there, asking me to execute the steps just once more."

The hard work paid off, and the magic Ek do teen created on the silver screen has now become part of film lore. But not before Dixit had been pushed to the brink. Shooting for the dance sequence commenced one morning at nine and continued till ten the next day. Madhuri never once complained, only saying, towards the end: "I think I will faint if we don't pack up now."

They did pack up, and Madhuri lived to tell the tale.

And savour her success, which got even bigger with Ram Lakhan and the Bada dukh deena number. Says Saroj Khan: "I think she really improved in that film. The expressions she brought to her face in the Bada dukh deena song were really exquisite."

Then came Tridev and Oye oye, the song which captured the imagination of the entire nation. The number was originally supposed to be picturised on Naseeruddin Shah and Sonam, but once Rajiv Rai realised he had a hit on his hands, he decided to build the climax of his film around the song. This time, Sangeeta Bijlani and Madhuri Dixit were added to the list of performers. And Dixit danced circles around both Sonam and Sangeeta.

Says Madhuri: "By the time Tridev came along, I was more confident about my ability to dance to raunchy beats. Since the song was picturised in a particular situation I could create a particular atmosphere while I danced. This way I felt I was both acting and dancing."

It proved to be an explosive mixture.

The latest craze among cine audiences is her Sailaab number. This, according to choreographer Saroj Khan, is different in several ways. "First of all," she says, "Madhuri is brought on camera when she isn't singing so she can concentrate on her facial expression. I asked Bappida (Lahiri) to bring the rhythm down so that the pace became slower and she had more time to emote."

But it was the Thaanedaar song, Tama tama (better known as the Jumma chumma clone) that proved Dixit's dedication. Saroj Khan recounts: "She had to dance on a chair, get down and pick the chair up all in one move. The shot was only okayed on the 40th take. By the end of it she had bleeding knees, but not once did she protest or complain."

For, Madhuri Dixit means to be the best, even if she has to sweat blood for it.

as many as five films with her. "The jinxed star has come a long way," says Kapoor. "She is a lovely dancer, has a great screen presence and has been fortunate to be surrounded by all the right people."

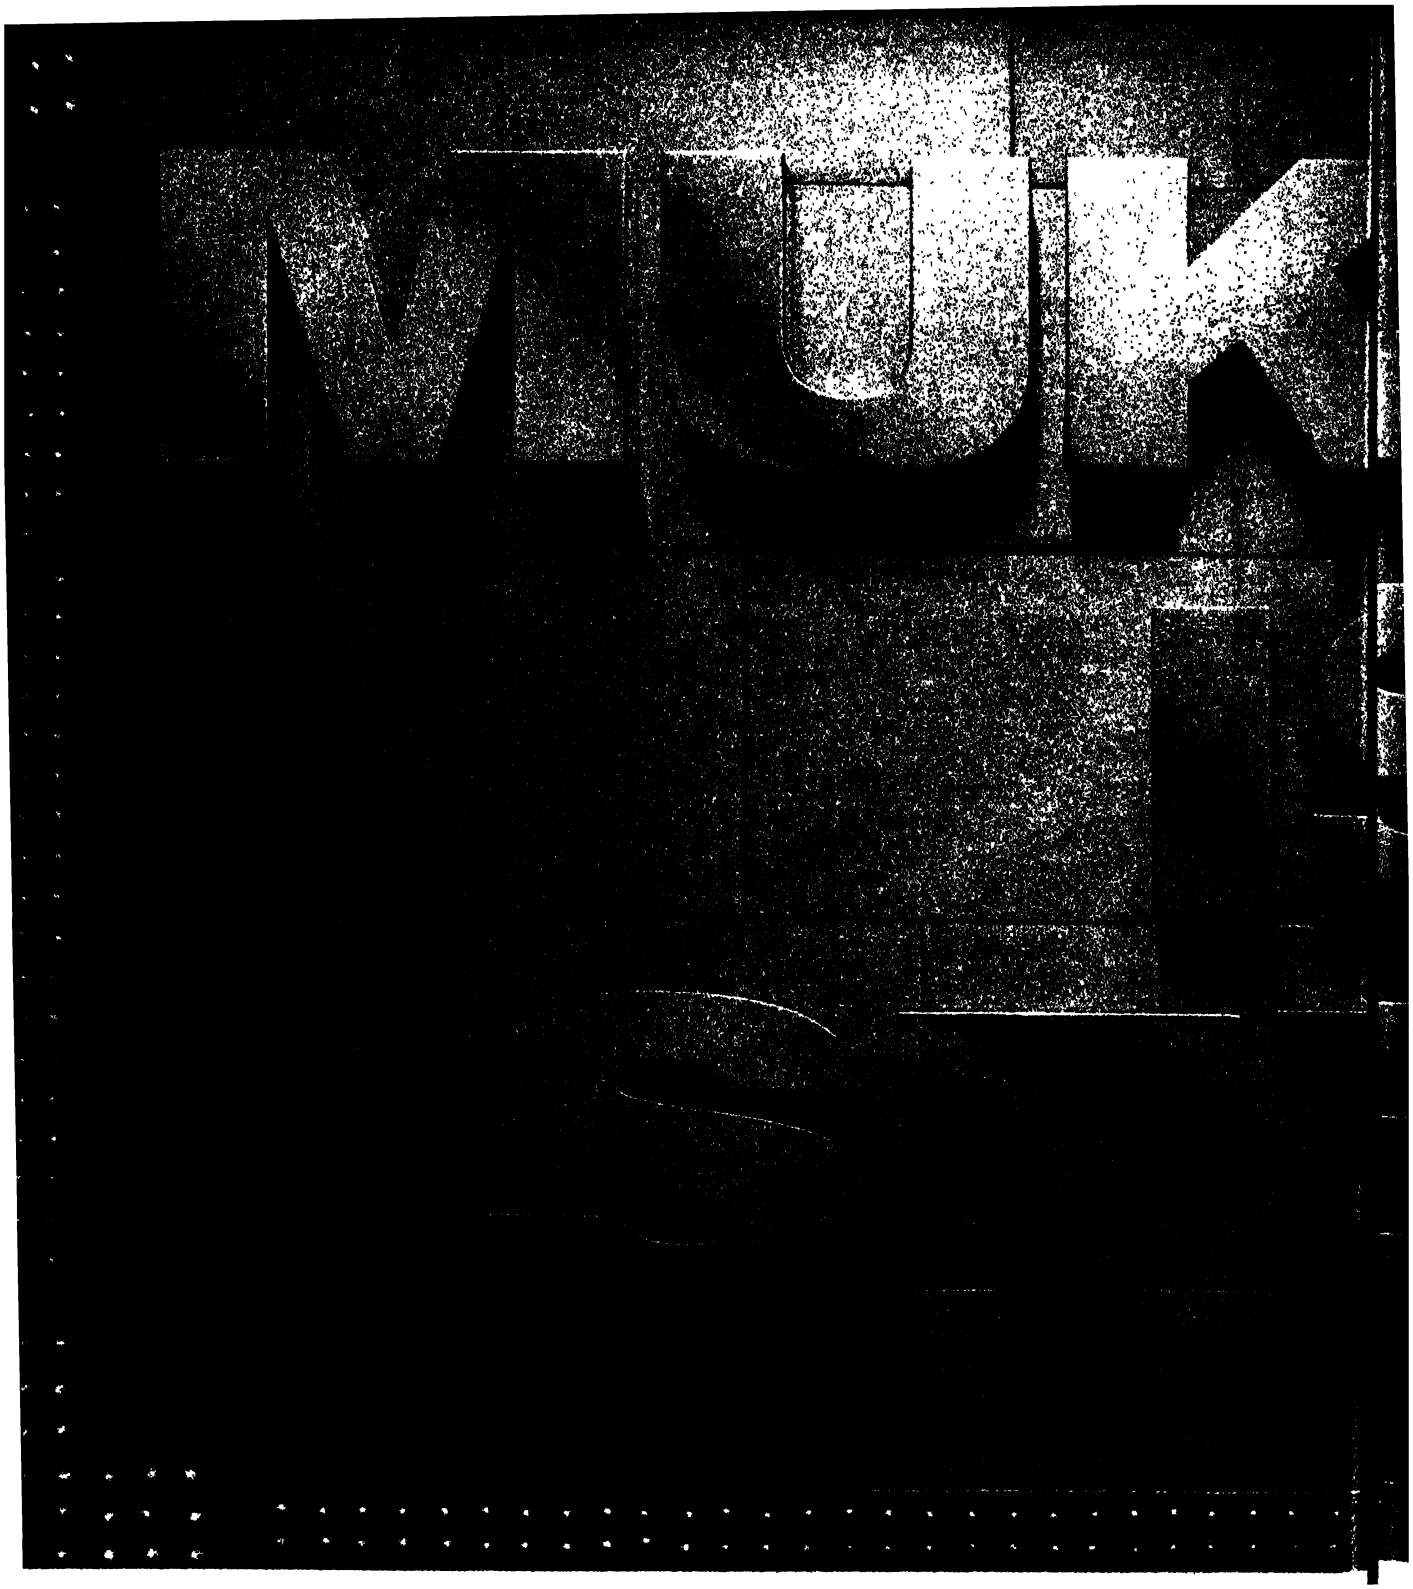
Rikku (Rakeshnath Sharma), her secretary, comes within this category without a doubt. The film industry may have its own view on him, labelling him anything from manipulative to devious, but he has handled her career extremely well, ensuring that at any time Madhuri has a requisite number of big banners in hand, with big co-stars and good roles. This way, even if one or two movies flop, the others do well in accordance with the law of averages and the damage to Dixit's career is minimised. When he joined her in 1984-85, on Subhash Ghai and Boney Kapoor's insistence, Madhuri was a B-grade actress. Today, she is in the top bracket.

But Rikku is far from complacent: "Why only Sridevi? Everyone is competition for her. But I am confident that she can handle it, being a sincere, non-interfering professional."

Her forthcoming releases feature her in a wide variety of roles. In Jamai Raja, she plays a daughter caught in the cross-fire between her mother (Hema Malini) and husband (Anil Kapoor). In Beta, she is the gutsy daughter-in-law who tries to break her mother-in-law's (Aruna Irani) hold on her husband (Anil Kapoor, again). In Subhash Ghai's next film she is cast opposite Jackie Shroff (so much, she says, for her being a Anil Kapoor campwalli). She stars with Jackie in the Hindi remake of The Eyes Of Laura Mars as well, while in the Gulshan Kumar-produced Sangeet, she plays a blind dancer. Sajan has her as the female lead in a romantic triangle with Sunjay Dutt and Salman Khan.

But, according to industry observers, it is Khel, in which Dixit plays a street-smart con girl who falls in love with a small-time crook, Anil Kapoor, which will catapult her "into the Sridevi league". The role gives her ample scope to display both her comic flair and histrionic skill and Madhuri has excelled at both.

It is, however, the explosive mixture of sensuality and innocence which Madhuri projects so effortlessly, that has set cinema screens on fire all over the country. And to the Indian male, with his obsession with baby-faced charmers, with the body of a sex symbol, she is just what the psychiatrist ordered.



And that is the best measure of Madhuri Dixit's success, and never mind box-office takings. ●

Devina Dutt/Bombay

Madhuri remains a trifle apologetic about her dancing. "Whenever I see my dances on screen," she says, "I feel there is something wrong, something missing"

ECONOMY/ TERRORISM

The living daylights

The ULFA is scaring business away from Assam—and destroying the state's economy

• Rajan Kejriwal, an engineering goods dealer, has become an infrequent visitor to his downtown Guwahati shop. And for the brief moments that he does come in, he sits alone in a corner and flips listlessly through his firm's order register. Sales have dropped alarmingly, and the young Marwari businessman—born and brought up in Assam—has no clue how long things will remain this way.

• Jagat Narain knows that he will never forget how to drive, but may well have to give it up. Narain, who drives his own truck, spends his days in front of the Dibrugarh Truck Owners' Association office, waiting, endlessly, for custom. Every morning, he climbs religiously onto the driver's seat of his TELCO carrier, starts the engine, and checks if the truck is ready for a long haul. Then, the waiting starts.

• For engineers of the Oil & Natural Gas Commission (ONGC) at Sibsagar, 70 kms south-west of Dibrugarh, it is a long spell of unscheduled holiday. ONGC's oil wells in the area are dry and production is non-existent, as young Assamese nationalists impose a blockade on the extraction of crude oil.

MANJIT MAHANTA

An ULFA militant His vision of a future Assam has wrecked the present

Good times have yielded to bad times—with the worst yet to come, but looming frighteningly close. Any businessman in Assam will testify to this, as would officials of public sector undertakings, and tea garden managers. If Kejriwal's plummeting sales charts and Narain's forced idleness are indications of a general apprehension clouding the state's business climate, the ONGC's stalled wells and panic in tea gardens are testimony to helplessness in the face of burgeoning belligerence.

Almost daily, there are reports of businessmen and executives being held at gunpoint, and money extorted. Often, just a letter signed by a 'militant' suffices. Tea companies—though they all deny it publicly—have paid ten of lakhs of rupees to the United Liberation Front of Assam (ULFA), the state's undisputed terror kings, to stave off trouble—and death—at tea gardens. Assam Frontier tea company chairman Surrendra Paul was gunned down by ULFA cadres in April, ostensibly for failing to pay up; this is too chilling a reminder for anyone wanting to fight back.

Roads are blocked regularly, train tracks and bridges are blown up, severing the crucial communication and transportation links that trade—anywhere—survives on.

Everytime the ULFA goes on the rampage, the ruling Asom Gana Parishad (AGP)—which stands accused of sympathising with the militants—stirs in mock concern. Despite its repeated assurances—"We have everyone's welfare at heart," "the ULFA is a menace", etc.—chief minister Prafulla Kumar Mahanta's government has done precious little to end the fear psychosis that has gripped the state's business community. And the Marwaris, in particular. For decades, they have monopolised trading activities from Tezpur in the far south of Assam to Tinsukia in north, but have come under special attention from the ULFA and assorted militant organisations which sprout in the North-East faster than profits.

Inevitably, the flight has begun. In May, union law minister Dinesh Goswami, a member of the AGP, declared publicly that Rs 1,200 crores have been moved out of the state by nervous entrepreneurs. Five months later, local businessmen say the figure could have easily trebled, and the trend, they say, is only getting more pronounced.

According to business circles in Guwahati, about 400 Marwari businessmen have closed shop. In Tinsukia, Assam's commercial hub, 35 prominent traders quit the township between August and September, two particularly treacherous months. ("I am not talking about floods, either," says a Calcutta-based trader with interests in Assam.) In Dibrugarh, the Diaspora is only beginning, but in a month, could turn into a flood

Credit transactions have virtually ceased, with all business conducted strictly on cash terms. The result: a drastic fall in the volume of godown stocks, especially of foodstuff. In Guwahati, wholesalers of consumer items say that business is not as brisk as it used to be even six months ago, as buyers from districts have stopped making regular buying trips to the city, too scared to move. "The wholesalers are keeping only a week's stock so as not to block up capital," says a manager, who declines to be identified, at the State Bank of India's Guwahati regional office. "Earlier, they used to have supplies for at least two months."

Banking sources in the state say that commercial and industrial deposits in the state have dropped by Rs 13.07 crores to Rs 187.93 crores between March 1989 and 1990. In SBI's Guwahati circle, institutional advances for foodstuffs have shrunk from Rs 15.78 crores to Rs 10.31 crores during the same period. And, according to the bank officials, the fall in deposits and advances since, could be even more precipitous.

Bankers say that the magnitude of the flight of finance capital from Assam has not been adequately reflected in the books. For instance, though two major public sector banks in Dibrugarh town, admit that their deposits have dropped alarmingly since tea baron Paul's death, the amounts seem like the tip of the iceberg. The explanation offered by bankers is that the major chunk of money being spirited away is 'black' or unaccounted for.

However, they add that the flight of capital from Assam in not really a new phenomenon. "Profits earned here were always remitted elsewhere," says a Dibrugarh banker, who declines to be identified. " The difference now is that even the base capital is being eroded."

The first assertion is precisely what gives the ULFA its justification, a twisted moral alibi to extort money from businessmen. It also serves to lend the militants a noble touch, modern day Robin Hoods who preach secession, operate clandestinely, and take money from the better off, non-ethnic Assamese traders to finance both their organisation and the numerous villages they run as virtual fiefdoms. The ULFA, the Assam Jatiya Yuba Chhatra Parishad (AJYCP), the Assam Jatiya Unnayan Parishad (AJUP), the AASU— all strong political groups, totally committed to Assamese chauvinism, economic independence, and aggression. These groups range from the doctrine-spouting varieties to those who will kill gladly for their vision of a future Assam. But money, always, comes first. Very simply: no money, no movement, no future.

"The traders seem to have enough black money to pay up," smirks a cynical AJYCP activist. "They had evaded taxes and fooled the government. Now, someone else is robbing them for the sake of the people." Not a bad thing, either, going by the militants' argument. They say that the profit margins in Assam are disproportionately high compared to the rest of India—a view that even bankers endorse. For example, the profit margin on industrial products in the state are five times more than the 15-20 per cent elsewhere in the country. Grain and pulses rake off a margin which is 20 per cent more than, say, in Calcutta. Traders offer the explanation that as the area is relatively inaccessible, transport costs are very high, and hence a higher mark up. What they do not talk about—and this is where the militant logic wins out—is the fact that the government subsidises transportation.

"The traders seem to have enough black money to pay up," smirks a AJYCP activist. "Now, someone else is robbing them for the sake of the people"

There is so much money to be made in Assam, say militants, that the non-Assamese business exodus will never take off. Look at the plywood industry, they say, where—despite the ULFA, a medium-sized business still clears a half crore profit a year by evading excise dues. "Those who are leaving," says Suresh Phukan, AJUP's Sibsagar district president, "have their personal reasons to feel scared."

The AJUP professes to be a voluntary organisation that aims at rejuvenating the state's lagging economy through development programmes at the village level. But despite its avowed goals, the organisation has been dubbed as a ULFA front by national media as well as the generally ULFA-struck local press. Phukan, a lecturer of English at the Sibsagar Girls College and a filmmaker, vehemently denies that his organisation has links with the ULFA, or that any businessmen—and their money—are leaving the state. Or, that business is ebbing at all. "This issue," he says, "is being blown out of proportion to give Assam a bad name."

That, however, is a difficult claim to substantiate, especially as it is happening. Assam imports most of its com-

DINESH GOSWAMI

Running scared, running dry

Agitators forcibly cut oil drilling and refining in Assam, and precipitate an instant crisis

In August, the All Assam Students Union (AASU) adopted a simple strategy: they would not allow Oil & Natural Gas Commission (ONGC) personnel to approach oil wells the agency runs in Assam. The state government looked the other way.

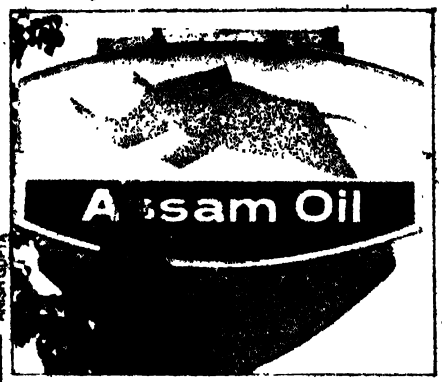
ONGC's oil fields in Sibsagar district went dry, as it was forced to stop pumping operations. Production of crude oil dropped from 9,000 tonnes per day to about 1,800 tonnes. The agitators shrewdly permitted only one well to stay open, so that natural gas supplies to Sibsagar town—the main domestic fuel stock—remained uninterrupted.

And, as if this was not enough, the Assam Jatiya Yuba Chhatra Parishad (AJYCP) began an indefinite blockade at the Bongaigaon pumping station, preventing oil flow to Indian Oil Corp.'s 3.3 million tonne refinery at Barauni, in north Bihar.

The Centre, expectedly, panicked. The twin shocks of rising international prices thanks to the Gulf crisis, and trouble with domestic production proved too much to handle. Union petroleum minister S. Gurupadaswamy made frantic requests to the agitators to lift the blockade. No response. And the ruling Asom Gana Parishad (AGP) washed its hands of the whole affair, after saying the movement was "politically motivated". Period.

The result: Indian Oil's Barauni refinery shut down on 14 September. The ONGC, for its part, lost Rs 1 crore a day, at Rs 1,700 per tonne. (One tonne is equivalent to about seven barrels of oil—a barrel is the internationally accepted unit for measuring both production and purchase.) And the Assam government, mums-the-word attitude and all, has lost Rs 10 crores in royalty payments in just one month. Besides, refinery equipment is lying idle, unserviced, the damage bill as yet uncalculated.

All for a cause, say the AASU and the AJYCP, the Assamese people have legitimate demands. Some examples:



- Eighty per cent of all Class I jobs are to be reserved for Assamese.
- All Class III and IV placements are to be set aside for locals.
- A three million tonne refinery is to be set up.
- The flaring of gas should be stopped.
- The ONGC should shell out more money to maintain roads in the area.

"Ours is an all-India service," says a top ONGC official who declines to be identified, "and the question of reservation does not arise." For Class III and IV jobs, say oil industry officials, good local recruits are not easy to come by. "Moreover," adds the official, "the AASU's concept of 'sons of the soil' includes only people from Sibsagar and the adjoining areas. This we find very confusing."

The ONGC is bound by an agreement with the state government to make funds available for development. But the Commission complains that the money it gives is not being properly utilised, perhaps a thinly-veiled reference to the usual fund scam that accompanies virtually every development effort in the country. ONGC chips in 60 per cent of the cost for maintaining roads in Sibsagar district, but the remaining 40 per cent which is the state public works department's responsibility, is usually not provided.

Last year, the ONGC provided a revolving fund of Rs 60 lakhs to a special committee comprising representatives of the government, local MLAs, the AASU and the Commission, for development work. But the committee spent only half that amount. So, when the ONGC topped up the fund with Rs 30 lakhs this year, the AASU promptly screamed murder.

As for flaring gas, the ONGC says that its clients—the state elec-

Paper Board, Hindustan Fertilizer Corp., Nagaon mgf. Nagaland Pulp & Paper Co., and ten gas-based units will take the quantity of gas they have contracted for. "We have to produce the quantity these companies together need," says the ONGC official. "And when they don't use the full amount, we have to burn it up." Rs 11.35 lakhs a day worth.

Realisation that hurting the ONGC and Indian Oil will hurt Assam, is slowly creeping in. While the AASU is still adamant about its stand, the AJYCP has backtracked, saying they never endorsed a blockade. "We don't intend to stop oil production," says Kamaleshwar Bharali, general secretary of the AJYCP's Dibrugarh unit, "but we are going to ensure that it is not taken out of Assam. Stopping production means a loss for the state."

But what if Maharashtrians were to say the same thing about the crude oil and gas from Bombay High? "Consider the number of industries that have mushroomed because of the Bombay High in that state, and see what we have got despite supplying 70 per cent of the country's on-shore oil," retorts Bharali. He has a point. But Assam cannot consume all that it produces. And, if there is no drilling, there is nothing to consume anyway. Scaring people, the agitators do not realise, means ruining the economy. Remember Kashmir?

modities from other states, and trucking is the usual way. But goods movements have slowed down drastically in the past four months. For example, the Dibrugarh Truck Owners Association operated 500 trucks a day. Now, if 50 of them are on the road, the Association is elated.

This is the crucial point that Assamese chauvinists miss. While they gun for the big traders, businessmen and various tea gardens, they do not realise that in effect, they are setting off a chain reaction that is percolating down to the lowermost levels of Assam's economy. It has to, by commercial logic: when the big fish are snared, small fry are swept along, anywhere.

Occupancy rates at hotels are down. In some of Guwahati's better hotels which cater mainly to the business crowd, occupancy is lower by as much as 20 per cent. Says M.K. Chakravarty, general manager of Guwahati's Nandan Hotel: "Business executives from Bombay, Delhi and Calcutta are not coming as frequently as they used to." The hotels' restaurants go empty as regulars—all local residents—hardly spend their evenings out. And some hotels, such as Kuber in central Guwahati, are up for sale. (The industry grapevine has it that a close relative of Union law minister Goswami is picking it up at a throwaway price.).

Businessmen may be able to run away, but one group that is well and truly stuck is the tea industry. With 760 tea gardens in Assam, they cannot simply up and move out. The ULFA knows this, has imposed levies as high as Rs 10 lakhs per garden, and expects to clean up more than Rs 75 crores once the exercise is completed. According to industry sources, most tea companies have paid up varying sums of money already, and are expected to comply whenever a demand is made. There is simply too much at stake for tea companies to get tough: insiders believe that if tea garden owners refuse to pay up, besides their lives being in danger, the ULFA might impose a tea blockade on the lines of the oil blockade (see box: Running scared, running dry) which is giving the Union finance ministry nightmares.

The surprising thing is, nobody seems to know precisely what the ULFA will do with all the money it is picking off. There are enough theories, however, and some are very disturbing.

One theory has it that the AGP government is raising funds through the ULFA to fight the forthcoming Assembly elections, scheduled for December this year. The other, obvious line is that the militants are buying up AK-47 automatic rifles (the scourge of security forces in both Punjab and Jammu & Kashmir) from Karen rebels in north Burma, stockpiling arms and ammunition for Fortress Assam, a near-future scenario that has been irrationally underplayed by India's internal security bosses.

Plus, for financing cadre operations—recruitment, training and propaganda, as well as villages which the ULFA have reportedly taken under its wing. Some of the ULFA's demands, such as the one which calls for employing more Assamese managers and labour at tea estates, make sense. Importing labour in a fractious country like India is a time-tested recipe for trouble, and supplanting say labour from Bihar with locals, would go a long way in assuaging sentiments. "We are going to insist," says AJUP's Phukan, "that the gardens employ more Assamese managers and that they share their profits with workers." But as the ULFA and other organisations mix sensibilities with extortionist tactics, their rationale falls a little flat.

Besides, there is absolutely no guarantee that paying off the militants would buy the tea industry—and in fact, all businesses—peace. For one thing, levies (keeping in tune with inflation, joke traders) might increase in the next couple of months. For another, other groups may already be lying in wait to extract their pound of flesh; with the precedent the ULFA has set it is very easy for like-minded people to cash in on the fear psychosis.

In Assam, it is very difficult to say whose writ will run next. Right now, the AGP is functioning like a dumb waiter, say political analysts, serving anything the ULFA orders. In fact, say Assam observers, it is very likely that the ULFA will field candidates for state elections, if not directly, then through front organisations such as the AJUP or even, AGP loyalists. Whatever the electoral outcome, one thing is certain: nothing in Assam will be smooth for a long time. And if current trends persist, perhaps never.

AIR TAXI

Cleared to taxi

But a legal point could wreck the government's plans to privatise India's skies

Indian policy makers are notoriously shy of calling a spade a spade, and this reluctance could easily lead to a problem. Take the move to end the nerve-wracking monopoly of the country's two government-run domestic carriers, Indian Airlines and Vayudoot. Instead of admitting that the civil aviation ministry's latest guidelines allow for the introduction of private airlines, the government continues to refer to the whole move as an 'air taxi' scheme. However, the guidelines, issued in end-May this year, suggest that private air operators will soon be running scheduled flights. By sometime next year, domestic air travellers will for the first time have the option of choosing which airline they want to travel on.

A total of 19 applications for private airlines have been filed with the civil aviation ministry, and many more are queueing up. Three operators have been given licences to operate. One of them, non-resident tycoon Vijay Mallya's UB Air is already in the skies with a 16-seater Dornier and the Bangalore-based airline has plans to introduce at least seven more aircraft. Air Asiatic Ltd. has got hold of a 130-seater Boeing 737 which will run on trunk routes connecting the metros, from this year, and is trying to lease three more 737s. The third company, India International Airways, is currently offering charters on its 8-seater Hawker Siddley executive jet and plans to pick up more aircraft in the near future for regular flights.

The term 'air taxis' is, in the circumstances, a complete misnomer. For, the private operations will be no different from that of Indian Airlines (IA). Originally, the air taxi concept entailed the hiring of an entire aircraft for a specific trip. In fact, the guidelines issued by the previous government also laid down that private operators could not use aircraft with more than 15 seats. On the whole, it was a modest scheme. There was no intention of opening up the Indian skies to a variety of private airlines. But that changed when, in April this year, civil aviation minister Arif Mohammad Khan told Parliament that virtually all restrictions on air taxi operations have been lifted. Henceforth, he said, private air operators could:

- Use all airports in the country after getting the requisite clearances.
- Operate aircraft of any capacity
- Operate flights at any time.

Arif Mohammad Khan: no homework

RAJIV BASU

Vijay Mallya: dreams to bust?

- Prepare flight schedules in advance.
- Decide on their own fare structures.

A month later, Khan's ministry issued detailed guidelines for 'air taxi' operations, which clearly laid down what companies or individuals had to do to start their own little airlines. No wonder there was a stampede to get clearances.

But there was a catch. The minister had jumped the gun. He had not read the laws. For, the Air Corporation Act, 1953, clearly bans the operation of any regular, private air services. Clause 18 of the Act states: "...It shall not be lawful for any person other than the corporations (public sector airlines) or their associates to operate any scheduled air transport service from, to, in or across India." The only air services permitted by the Act are:

- Air transport undertakings based outside India and operating under bilateral agreements.
- For flight training, air ambulance work, joy rides, aerial survey, fire fighting, crop dusting, locust control etc.
- Those that operate with the prior permission of the central government and do not compete with scheduled services provided by the corporations or their associates.

This means that Arif's assurances could add up to nothing as technically, the new scheme is in a sense illegal till Parliament amends the Air Corporation Act's relevant clauses.

On the other hand, 'air taxis' are inevitable and will ultimately end up competing with the public sector carriers. This is precisely why IA staff held a one-day strike against the move to introduce private airlines: they know that once private operators get into the act, their future will be threatened. UB Air, for instance, is running flights that are packed to capacity despite the fact that its fares are about 30 per cent higher than that of Indian Airlines.

Sensing a kill, non-resident Indians with money to spare are rushing to lease or buy big aircraft for operating in India even though they will not be able to repatriate earnings for the first five years of their operations. And despite the fact that they will not be able to service their loans on aircraft lease or purchase from their Indian earnings. What the private entrepreneurs are sure about is the vast, growing air travel market in India and how inadequate Indian Airlines or Vayudoot is to meet the challenge.

The only problem is that the civil aviation ministry's bold new scheme could get wrecked if the matter is taken to the courts. In that event, the worst hit would be the private operators who dream of an airline boom in India. If only Arif had done his homework.●

AVIATION/EVACUATION

Air India's reputation soars with its Gulf evacuation effort, but expenses could cripple the airline

Not since the great Berlin airlift after the Second World War has such a massive evacuation been organised. More than 50,000 Indian nationals—out of an estimated 1,70,000 stranded in the Gulf—have been flown back to India since 13 August, a week after Iraq invaded Kuwait. And the national carrier, which has recently tried to shed its desi Maharaja image for a swankier international one, is right in the middle of it, involved in a human airlift of a magnitude unprecedented in civil aviation history.

The operation has won for Air India (AI) both complimentary and adverse publicity. Bouquets, because the airline has pulled out all the stops to create additional capacity to airlift approximately 3,500 Indians per day. And has, by any standard, responded admirably to a human tragedy, brushing aside considerations such as profits.

And brickbats, because once again, the airline's image has taken a considerable battering, especially internationally, with weary victims of rescheduled and cancelled flights swearing never to trust the airline again. "Evacuation became our first priority," explains a harried AI official. "We had to divert capacity to the Gulf to help stem the panic there."

As the exodus from Kuwait to Jordan began, India's ministry of external affairs called upon AI to make special arrangements for the evacuation. Commencing the gargantuan task with one special flight per day (there were no operations from Amman, Jordan's capital, previously), the airline deputed staff from its offices in neighbouring Gulf nations to the trouble-stricken region. By 2 September, AI had increased its capacity in a phased manner to operate five, even six flights per day, corresponding to the increasing influx of refugees to Jordan. Two Airbus Industrie A310s, inducted only a month ago, were pressed into service, and domestic carrier Indian Airlines' aircraft were leased to cope with the burgeoning demand. AI also chartered wide-bodied IL-62 aircraft from the Soviet airline Aeroflot, and were also given two giant IL-76 transport aircraft by the Indian Air Force.

The mammoth operation was monitored from AI's Nariman Point headquarters in Bombay, where ticketing for Amman passengers was also undertaken, so that the staff in Amman could concentrate on the needs of the evacuees. With the increasing frequency of flights, AI posted a staff of about 50 in Amman to run three full eight-hour shifts, round the clock. The Dubai office pitched in, and helped evacuate nearly 10,000 Indians via this city "If it hadn't been for Air India's efforts, we would have been dying in the desert," exclaims Joe Mascarenhas, an electrician who managed to make it onto a flight after four days of uncertainty Sitting forlorn at Bombay airport, Amina Bi and her sister Razia—waiting to catch a connecting flight to their home near Trivandrum—testify that the airline staff were extremely cooperative, but were hardpressed to handle the rush. "Some of us who could not pay," says Amina "were taken on with the express understanding that we would repay the Indian government when we returned. Others, who had managed to run away with some money were busy cleaning out the airline's on-board duty-free stock and attacking the liquor. "It was a pathetic sight," says a stewardess who experienced the evacuation "first-hand." "Sometimes the passengers were so filthy there was a stink emanating from them." She adds: "But it's just not true that we treated them badly."

Subhash R. Gupte

"We will ultimately lose money," admits Gupte. "(But) we'll keep operating flights until the last Indian is safely home"

Air India has so far incurred an expenditure of almost Rs 80 crores on the evacuation. The ministry of external affairs, at whose behest the operations are being conducted, is meant to reimburse the airline on a no profit no loss basis, so the airline does not lose out badly on the evacuation. We don't have the commercial muscle to forego our costs, claims Subhash R. Gupte, who has recently taken over as AI's acting chairman, only to be confronted with an acid test. But there are certain situations when you don't look at the figures alone. The empty flights headed for the Gulf were loaded with foodgrains. Oil, blankets, and even a consignment of 12,000 bottles of Bisleri mineral water for Indian refugees, to help tide over the shortages in Jordan.

Notwithstanding the Good Samaritan act, AI is likely to be hit very hard financially, at a time when profits are the highest ever in its history. "We will ultimately lose money because of the Gulf situation," admits Gupte. Already, the rise in oil prices, insurance premia, and the suspension of flights on some Gulf routes has affected the airline; the oil hike alone would take a toll of Rs 140 crore. Besides, the Union government has slashed the bulk fuel discount rate from 30 per cent to half that amount, adding to the fuel cost burden substantially.

The airline's insurers in London have hiked insurance costs for airlines operating in a war zone, even though both AI and the General Insurance Company had assured them that the airline did not face the same risks as other carriers operating in the zone, citing India's friendly ties with Gulf countries, especially Iraq. Revenue will also suffer as a result of the cancellation of flights to certain West Asian destinations. The Kuwait services, for instance, yielded a profit of around Rs 25 crores a year, according to Gupte.

The Gulf evacuation has cost the government exchequer a staggering Rs 5000 crore so far, according to preliminary official estimates. This excludes the cost of rehabilitating them in India, and covers only their transportation (about Rs 20,000 per person), food, medical care, and airport or port charges. And efforts are on to evacuate another 65,000-odd Kuwait-based Indians, which will only add to the country's—and AI's—bill.

Right now, however, not many people are thinking about financial deterrents. "We'll keep operating our flights until the last Indian who wants to leave is safely home," says AI's Gupte. And the government, if not irate passengers, is backing the airline to the hilt. •

■ Stay cola

Getting into India was the easy part. Staying on shopshelves is considerably more difficult. Ask Pepsi Food Pvt. The purveyors of Lehar Pepsi and Lehar . Up, the Indianised versions of US consumer food giant PepsiCo Inc's top-selling brands, are facing a bit of a hitch. At least for its Calcutta launch, scheduled for August. Pepsi Foods plastered the city with wall-ads and hoardings in anticipation of the launch, but more than a month later, all one can see are the ads. The reason: a series of petitions in Calcutta courts which claim that the Pepsi name is already registered in the area—through unheard of companies which manufacture "Pepsi" drink sticks, most definitely not Pepsi products, and other bizarre variations. The perpetrator Parle Ltd chairman Ramesh Chauhan, maintain Pepsi officials, who is using fronts to get stay orders against the Pepsi drinks launch in the city. Parle, expectedly, denies it categorically. But whatever the case, the ploy is working. The moment Pepsi successfully argues a stay order, another petition slaps it back on. After splashy launches in the north and the south, failure at the eastern front must be especially galling for the international soft drink supremo.

■ G' bye, mate

The move was typical of a an age when corporate supremacy is what counts, and to hell with family ties. Satish Malhotra, chairman of the Empire Group of companies, staked a claim to in-law Keshub Mahindra's flagship company Mahindra & Mahindra (M&M) in July, saying he had an overwhelming 13.5 per cent shareholding clout to run the company. That brought out acrimonious scenes—private and public—with Keshub fighting back with everything he had, and finally managing to stall Satish's takeover plans in August. A bitter ending, considering the fact that Keshub invited Satish to join M&M's board, and even sold him shares of the company to prevent possible takeover attempts by some Bombay big fish (Satish's son is married to Keshub's eldest daughter). Then, friend turned foe, laid on the pressure, forcing Keshub to battle. Keshub won, and Satish, embittered and angry, has decided to sell off 4.2 per cent of his M&M holdings. Keshub couldn't be happier—or more satisifed. He has saved his company and his corporate existence. If there is love lost with a relative, no matter. So long, Satish, he might be saying. And thanks for the company.

POLITICIAN OF THE WEEK

K.P. Unnikrishnan

Union minister for surface transport

● Heard of him recently? Possibly not Unnikrishnan, ever since that momentous battle for the telecom turf with Sam Pitroda, is lying low, very low He lost his communications portfolio, and perhaps doesn't want to risk losing his surface transport seat, either. Not that he's doing much: Indian shipping is in its biggest mess ever, with dropping tonnage, dropping revenues and dropping morale. Ports are a mess; nobody even remembers Nhava Sheva much. But people do remember what the minister says, everytime, he drops in at a function and promises the sky for development. All in all, however, life is dull, very dull, unless you want to count the time he was almost beaten up by enraged Keralites in the Gulf. Unnikrishnan must be rueing the day he got off the telecom bus: the portfolio may have been acrimonious, but at least it was interesting.

Ayodhya revisited

When liberalism and ritualistic Hinduism clash

While the nation seems to be heading inexorably towards a conflagrationon30 October when the VHP and the BJP propose to execute their design of constructing a temple on the site of the Babri Masjid, in the face of Mulayam Singh Yadav's proclaimed determination to uphold "secularism and law and order", a liberal Hindu must find himself uncomfortably placed on the horns of a dilemma. To be sure, Hinduism has a different meaning for different people; but, there is much about the Ayodhya movement that is surely repugnant to the liberal Hindu's secular instincts.

Firstly, the movement is ritualistic in the extreme. While, therefore, it may have tremendous appeal among the masses, to whom Hinduism undoubtedly has significance predominantly through ritual, it can hardly arouse a Hindu mind cognisant of the great philosophical and metaphysical tradition of the Hindu religion. Secondly, the bellicose nature of the movement is bound to cause trepidation in educated Hindu minds whose knowledge of Hinduism is gleaned at least from the more latter-day expositions of Swami Vivekanand, Gandhi, and Dr Radhakrishnan, if not from original sources, such as the Vedas and the Upanishads. All these sources reveal that the essence of Hinduism is tolerance, which essence is itself based on the fact that Hinduism is not a revealed religion: there are no prescribed doctrines about how man should grapple with the external universe; on the contrary, religion is a private matter, the Absolute Truth, capable of being contemplated by the individual mind. Hence the adage: "That which exists is one; Sages called it by various names." A movement which threatens to demolish a religious shrine of another community surely cuts at the foundation of the catholicity and "secularism" of the Hindu religion, and hence, at its very essence.

Moreover, it is not just the secular foundations of the Hindu religion which the Ayodhya movement threatens; it threatens, in addition, the secular foundations of the Indian state, which the liberal Hindu spares no efforts to proclaim is only possible because of the secular nature of his religion. These secular foundations have been given expression to in the Indian Constitution and the ordinary laws of this land. A liberal Hindu cannot fail to notice that the movement threatens to violate the constitutional rights of the Muslim minority and also the violation of provisions of various statutes—including the Indian Penal Code—designed to preserve communal harmony and punish those seeking to spread communal hatred. The movement also has grave law and order, as well as, public order ramifications. Further, if the Allahabad High Court, which is seised of the matter,delivers judgement before 30 October, the threatened disobedience of that judgement by Hindus will not only constitute contempt of court but will surely undermine the dignity of the judiciary and the majesty of the law. Depending upon whom the land belongs to, there is also the trivial matter of minor offences concerned with property, such as trespass and mischief. In a word, it cannot but strike the liberal Hindu that apart from being at odds with the Hindu religion as he understands it, the Ayodhya movement constitutes a threat to the Indian social fabric and the cohesion of the Indian state.

Then, there is the ticklish matter of the legitimacy of the issues with which the movement is concerned. Several doubts, no doubt, arise in the liberal Hindu's mind. Was Lord Ram a mythological deity or a historical figure? Is the Ayodhya of Valmiki's Ramayan the very Ayodhya where the controversy rages today? Was the Babri Masjid built either by demolishing or converting a temple erected to commemorate the birth place of Lord Ram? And lastly, is there any evidence to suggest that the Babri Masjid is situated at the precise site of the birth place of Lord Ram?

The answer of those in the vanguard of the Ayodhya movement to the intellectual doubts and moral reluctance of the liberal Hindu is simple and compelling: Ram Janmabhoomi is an issue which affects the deepest religious sentiments of the Hindu population in the country; hence, the issue outweighs in importance all moral and legal questions. In other words, the religious sentiments of the Hindu majority must prevail over existing law and morality. On the evidentiary aspect regarding the fact of Lord Ram's birth at the very site where the Babri Masjid is presently situated, the answer of those spearheading the Ayodhya movement is that the question of evidence is irrelevant. What is more important is the belief of the majority of Hindus—that is to say, the fact that the majority of Hindus believe that the birth place of Lord Ram is the very site of the Babri Masjid is sufficient grounds for constructing a temple at that site even if it means the existing mosque is to be demolished.

It is impossible to join issue with the arguments advanced by the VHP and the BJP leaders. To do so would be to reject the significance of popular belief and popular religious sentiment. The morals of a society are ultimately sustained by a broad consensus in society that believes in those morals. Moreover, religious belief is hardly a matter which can be tested on the touchstone of quantum of evidence. The point, however, is that if the construction of the Ram Janmabhoomi temple and the demolition of Babri Masjid has to be justified in the final analysis on the basis of popular sentiment and popular belief, then surely, the liberal Hindu is entitled to raise two questions: why has the movement reached a crescendo in circa 1990? And secondly, if the long-standing belief of Hindus is simply an association of Ayodhya with Lord Ram, as it must be, then, why does a temple necessarily have to be built on the site of the Babri Masjid itself and not anywhere else in Ayodhya?

The answer is that the Ram Janmabhoomi movement has become inextricably inter-woven with the Chanakyan brand of politics. We are living in an era when the Indian polity is witnessing the rise of the Chanakyan tradition in politics and a corresponding decline in the Gandhian tradition. The two are almost inevitably competing traditions—the one emphasises the sanctity of means and envisages the honesty of politicians, the purity of the political process, and the superiority of ends over means; the other is concerned essentially with the attainment of power and its preservation. The Gandhian tradition attaches a higher value to morality than power; the central theme of the Chanakyan tradition is power at all costs. In India, as a rule, the Opposition parties have espoused the Gandhian tradition; the Congress since Mrs Gandhi's ascendency to power, the Chanakyan one. The concern of the Congress under the stewardship of both Mrs Gandhi and Rajiv has been the retention of power, and the tool for this end has been statecraft. On the other hand, on two occasions, the Opposition has employed the Gandhian tradition to good effect—in 1977, when it captured power by exposing the immorality and rigours of the political process during Emergency, and the last elections when Bofors and other corrupt deals of the Rajiv regime became successful moral tools in the hands of the Opposition.

In other words, the Hindu belief that Ram Janmabhoomi sthan is situated at the very site of the Babri Masjid has been promoted and fuelled by the rhetoric of religious and political leaders.

Does this mean that the Ayodhya movement is, in effect, no more than a cynical bid for power by the BJP on the basis of a highly emotive religious issue? Is Devi Lal correct when he suggests that Ram Janmabhoomi is, in effect, a cloak for Raj Janmabhoomi?

The answer is a resounding "yes". This, however, is not to suggest that the political strategy of the BJP deserves to be roundly condemned, or, is in any way immoral. On the contrary, the BJP, if anything, is merely responding to the new political milieu in India. Indeed, its strategy on Ram Janmabhoomi is symptomatic of the New Morality in the political domain in which the spirit of Chanakya is ubiquitous.

It was impossible for the BJP to capture the moral ground from V.P. Singh. Here was after all an individual who renounced power on patently moral grounds and thus became a symbol of the Gandhian tradition at its very highest. The only solution, therefore, was to seize upon an issue which provided a platform to bid for power. Rajiv's cynical volte-face on a uniform civil code, in spite of the Supreme Court judgement in the Shah Bano case, furnished the moral impetus. It is in this context that the BJP's role in the Ram Janmabhoomi issue must be appraised. Political survival for the BJP demanded a Chanakyan response; besides the strategy could be defended morally on the ground that if a majority of the people are in favour of an issue then it must be moral.

Contemporary developments merit explanation. The Gandhian tradition appealed to the Indian masses as an instrument for removing unwanted rulers—the British Raj, Mrs Indira Gandhi in 1977 and Rajiv in the last elections. Since neither the BJP nor V.P. Singh's Janata Dal is plagued by corruption, neither party is likely to avail of the Gandhian tradition against the other. So far as the Congress is concerned, a party whose leadership shudders at the very mention of Bofors, is obviously ill at ease with the Gandhian tradition. •

Post staffers go on hunger strike to demand resumption of publication

In the end, they resorted to that time-honoured Indian pressure tactic. Fed up with being handed out empty reassurances, the Indian Post Staff Welfare Association went on relay hunger strike in Bombay, demanding that the publication of the newspaper be resumed. The Bombay Union of Journalists joined them, and the case showed all symptoms of turning a cause celebre, with such protagonists as Sharad Pawar, Vijaypat Singhania and Shreyans Shah being the main players.

The trouble began ever since The Indian Post changed hands in 1986, when industrialist Vijaypat Singhania sold the paper to Shreyans Shah and Bahubali Shah of the Gujarat Samachar Group. With the change of management, some 180 of the employees found themselves without a job. Those who remained on the paper alleged that they were mistreated: no proper equipment was provided to them, there were no toilet facilities, while watchmen were given the right to browbeat members of the staff.

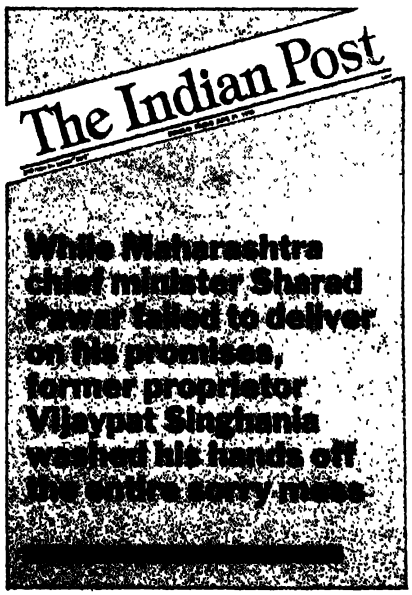
Relations between management and staff steadily worsened with 54 employees being arrested on charges of arson and looting. Members of the staff struck back by organising dharnas, processions and other agitations against the management. Such stalwarts as Justice Krishna Iyer, S.R. Kulkarni, Mrinal Gore and trade union leader Datta Samant were roped into the battle, on the side of the employees, and each in their own way tried to ensure that justice was meted out to them.

Even Union labour minister Ram Vilas Paswan was brought on but he pleaded off on the grounds that this was a matter which involved the Singhanias, so the decision lay with V.P. Singh.

What worked in the favour of the Post's staff was the Maharashtra government rule that any organisation employing more than 100 people requires state permission before it can close shop. Neither Singhania nor Shreyans Shah had applied for such approval. Instead, says one of the employees: "They relied on underhand tactics, and began browbeating the employees in an attempt to intimidate them."

The aggrieved employees, therefore, met Maharashtra chief minister Sharad Pawar to acquaint him with their grievances. And Pawar, evidently, made them certain promises of help. But nothing came of them, and The Indian Post staffers were back to square one.

Hence the relay hunger strike. And the threat of going on indefinite hunger strike if something wasn't done for them, and soon.



Says Sanjay Sindhayash, president of the union: "When we shifted out of the Post's premises to the Samachar office, we were provided a mere 750 square feet of area. The office didn't have PTI and UNI lines, no tables, chairs or proper ventilation."

Vijaypat Singhania

Sindhayash is convinced that Shah wanted to sell the paper but was unable to do so because Singhania has delayed the transfer of the company shares to him. Singhania's attitude, though, seems to be that with the sale of the paper he was absolved of all responsibility in this regard.

And it is this attitude that the Post's employees find offensive. Says Sindhayash: "This is not just a struggle to save jobs. It involves wider principles. Do industrialists have the right to start and close newspapers at their whims? Today the Post has been closed, tomorrow it may happen to other publications on political or other grounds. Where will it stop?

There's no easy answer to that one.

Or to the problems of the Post's staffers, either.●

The BJP high command cautions Sunderlal Patwa

While the media speculates about the imminent demise of the Raja's regime, it is the Sunderlal Patwa government which might actually be the first to go The Madhya Pradesh chief minister may pretend that all is well, but with most of his party MLAs joining the dissident camp, the going will be increasingly difficult for him in the coming months. True, the discipline the BJP imposes on all its members will ensure that nobody comes out openly against Patwa. But the patience of the party high command can't be expected to last forever. And once that gives out, it may well be all over for the hapless CM.

In a way, Patwa had brought this upon himself. The party high command's choice as chief minister—he was chosen over Kailash Joshi, who thereupon refused to join the government in a huff—Patwa had effectively left the task of government to BJP leader and close confidant of Vijayaraje Scindia, Sardar Angre, known as the proxy CM of Madhya Pradesh. If he had left it at that, it would have been fine. But Patwa managed to alienate everyone with his style of functioning. And soon things came to such a pass that as many as 20 BJP MPs from Madhya Pradesh out of 27, including Uma Bharti, Phool Chandra Verma, Pyarelal Khandelwal, Amrit Tarwaala and Sushil Verma, turned against him. The chief minister came to be known as "arrogant Patwa", and complaints against him were lodged with party president L.K. Advani.

The central leadership didn't ignore the allegations, and it was left to party elder Atal Behari Vajpayee to administer the much-needed snub to the chief minister. The occasion he chose was the meeting of the party national council in Bhopal. Patwa and his supporters insisted on referring to the state government's loan-waiving scheme as the "Patwa formula". Irritated beyond measure, Vajpayee snapped back: "What is this 'Patwa formula'? In our party everything is referred to as the BJP formula. No-

Patwa defends himself

SUNDAY: Among all the BJP chief ministers, you are being criticised the most. Why?
Sunderlal Patwa: Where there is more work, there is more criticism also. I am doing something, which is why I am being criticised.

Q: Has a section of the BJP launched a campaign against you?
A: Why should the members of the BJP criticise me? Such criticism will not harm me, but the party itself. I am sure they would not want to do that.

Q: Maybe they think your removal will strengthen the party.
A: I do not think so. The BJP is squarely behind me. My government is doing good work. We have got a very mature Opposition in the state, with as many as three former chief ministers in its ranks. But even then not a single charge of corruption could be levelled against me during the last two Assembly sessions.

Q: But some of your decisions have been criticised.
A: No decision of mine has been criticised so far on the floor of the House. Some members of the Bhopal press have written something. But I do not take that seriously.

Q: What about the criticisms of the BJP newspaper Sandesh?
A: I want to make it clear that there are no factions in the BJP. The party is united. Those who indulge in the politics of factionalism cannot survive in the BJP. Please do not compare the BJP with the other parties. Anyone who deviates even a single inch from the BJP line will be thrown out of the party.

Q: Does Kailash Joshi support you?
A: The question is ridiculous. Kailash Joshi is a committed supporter of mine. We have even addressed a press conference together. Just because he didn't join my government doesn't mean that he is not a supporter.

Q: The allegations against you are that Sardar Angre is running your government; the BJP high command is unhappy with your performance; and that you are carrying on a vendetta against Madhavrao Scindia.
A: Sardar Angre is very junior to me in the BJP. I have been in the party ever since its formation. How can he run my government?

I have heard that Madhavrao Scindia has been saying in Gwalior that Angre is the proxy chief minister. That he is an extra-constitutional authority. This is all wrong.

Q: What about the charges about your "understanding" with Arjun Singh?
A: You should ask Arjun Singh this question. My understanding is only with the BJP, with no one else. If Arjun Singh is not opposing me, that is his outlook. I have never asked him not to oppose me.

As far as relationships go, I believe that personal relations are more important than politics. Why should a political rival be an enemy? Nobody in the Congress is my enemy.

Q: There are also some allegations against the administration.

Sunderlal Patwa: are matters going out of hand?

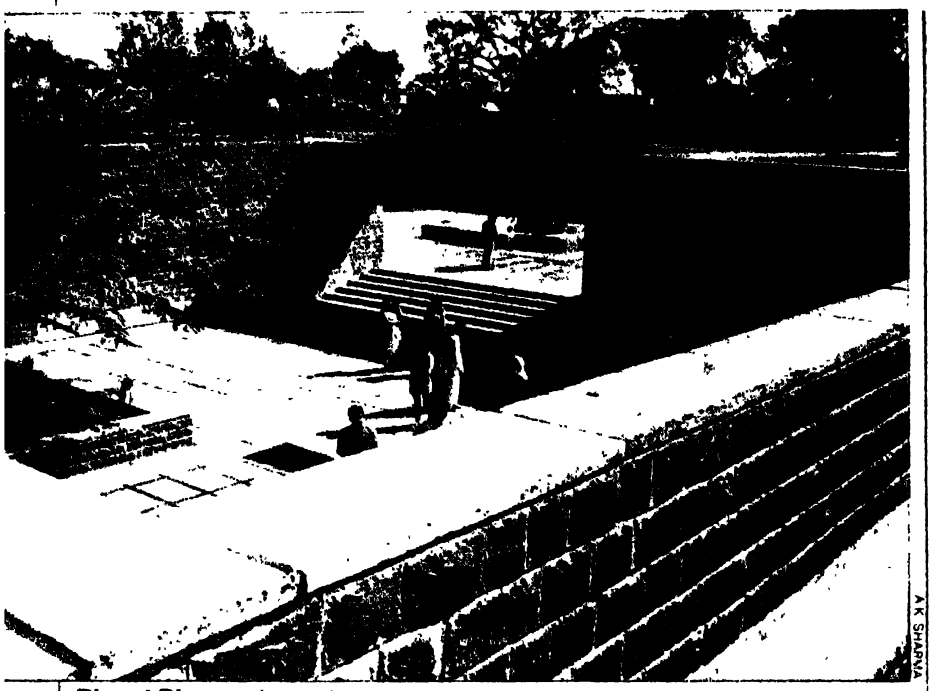
A: I have provided the cleanest government, ever. For the last 20 years all the regimes were corrupt. Everyone from the ministers to the peons used to take bribes. Briefcases full of money were used to influence the decisions of the government. Everybody was a saleable commodity; taking money for transfer and postings.

But today people are going around with money bags and nobody is accepting it. There is no corruption in my government.

Q: It is alleged that you allotted land to Dr J.K. Jain in the journalist quota by breaching the rules and regulations.

thing is the creation of any individual."



Patwa's decision to reverse all the decisions of the previous government also placed the party in an embarrassing position. The Congress regime had made a provision that local MPs would be made president of the district planning board in every district, and that the government would provide them with some money to carry out developmental work and a vehicle to visit their constituencies. Patwa discontinued this practice and all the beneficiaries—especially those belonging to the BJP—were livid. If he didn't restore status quo, they threatened the chief minister, he may well be forced to quit.

Even where the previous regime's tendu leaf policy was concerned, Patwa was criticised for failing to implement it. This provided that a higher dividend be paid to the labour, but Patwa, it was alleged, was not acting on this, because it would go against the interests of state party president Lakhi Ram Agarwal, who was one of the biggest tendu leaf contracters.

A: If the media is criticising its own people then what can I do? Dr Jain is a well-known media person. He has got every right to the plot. Several persons who are not even proper journalists have taken the land in some press complex or the other.

Q: Do you think he is a journalist?
A: He is an editor, a well-known journalist. I don't know why a reputed magazine like India Today has published a baseless and bogus report, and made this a scandal.

Q: Your nephew Hemant Patwa, it is said, is quite influential in the government and has managed to get several agencies.
A: I can only feel sorry for the media. They have got nothing better to do than talk about corruption and scandals. All this talk about Hemant Patwa is nonsense. My nephew has been educated in America. He has been doing his work for the last eight years. People should know their facts before asking me this question. All my nephews are very intelligent and competent. No member of my family has ever taken any advantage of my being chief minister. •

Bharat Bhavan: lost autonomy

But the controversies began with the mass transfer of state officials that the Patwa government resorted to. With around 50,000 government servants being shunted around in the course of a few days, the move took on the proportions of a major scandal. And what made matters worse was the fact that several of the officers served with transfer orders were long dead. At the Madras convention of the BJP, the Madhya Pradesh CM was reprimanded for making the party an object of ridicule by his actions.

The treatment meted out to the director-general of police, P.D. Malviya, also tarnished the image of the MP government. Malviya had suspended three police inspectors because their role in the Indore communal riots was considered suspect. When Patwa took over, these offenders, passing themselves off as RSS (Rashtria Swayamsevak Sangh) men, met the chief minister to ask for mercy. Patwa promptly asked Malviya to revoke their suspension. The director-general refused pointblank. At this he was summarily removed and Surendra Vikram Singh (an old RSS supporter, apparently) was appointed in his place. This, despite the fact that Singh was due for retirement, and giving him an extension went against the state government's regulations.

Then, Patwa began interfering in the affairs of Bhopal's Bharat Bhavan. The organisation has been run by Ashok Bajpai, its cultural secretary, for years now. And no chief minister from Shyama Charan Shukla to Motilal Vora ever managed to dislodge him from his position of preeminence. Nevertheless Patwa began meddling in the affairs of the Bharat Bhavan Trust and with his arrogant attitude, managed to put the backs up of the other members. All the life members of the trust, including former chief minister Arjun Singh and the eminent artist Swaminathan, resigned.

In an attempt to redeem himself somewhat—and establish an image as a man of action, in the bargain—Patwa launched a drive to prevent encroachment in urban areas. But he managed to bungle this as well. After a number of innocent people were evicted from their homes, while the real offenders continued to cling on to their illegally-acquired land, the party MLAs decided that enough was enough. They complained to the central leadership and Patwa was asked to give his scheme a quick and quiet burial.

Patwa erected a statue of his father. The PM was invited to unveil it. The state met all expenses

The chief minister's run of bad luck continued. He allotted 9,600 square feet of prime land in the Bhopal press complex to the BJP's video doctor J.K. Jain. The state media were against the fact that a non-journalist had been given land in the 'journalist quota', and much was made of the allotment in the local papers. When the protests gathered strength, Patwa promised that he would reconsider his decision. And then proceeded to forget all about his assurance, with the result that the land worth crores, which should by right have gone to some state government corporation, still belongs to Dr Jain. It seems that Patwa will get away with this, for such BJP higher-ups as Vijayaraje Scindia and Sardar Angre are also promoting Dr Jain in a big way.

But he certainly won't be allowed to get away with keeping all the important portfolios with himself. When he had first constituted his ministry, he had given the major portfolios to such ministers as Babulal Gaur, Lakshmi Narayan Sharma, Ramhit Gupta and Sheetal Sahai (he deliberately ignored the claims of those MLAs belonging to his rival Kailash Joshi's group). After three months, however, he reshuffled the ministry to take charge of all the important departments, with junior ministers to help him. Naturally, this move went down ill with his Cabinet, and they said as much to the BJP leadership. Predictably enough, L.K. Advani visited Bhopal to review the working of the state government and instructed Patwa to distribute portfolios more equitably.

Patwa's excessive love of family also landed him in trouble. Soon after taking over as chief minister, he decided to organise a function to honour the memory of his dead father in his village Kukadeshwar in Mandasore district. A statue of Patwa senior was erected and Prime Minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh was invited over to unveil it. All expenses were, of course, met by the Madhya Pradesh government.

Nobody would, perhaps, have made very much of it, if Patwa hadn't insisted on projecting his father as an eminent freedom fighter. As everyone knew, he'd only been a small-time businessman and had even been accused of illegally occupying land belonging to the Harijans of the village. His being described as a prominent member of the freedom movement provoked an immediate outcry, with the Raja coming in for his share of criticism for being party to such a fraud. The director-general of All India Radio (AIR) was made to apologise for the fact that Patwa's father had been described as a freedom fighter in the radio news bulletin.

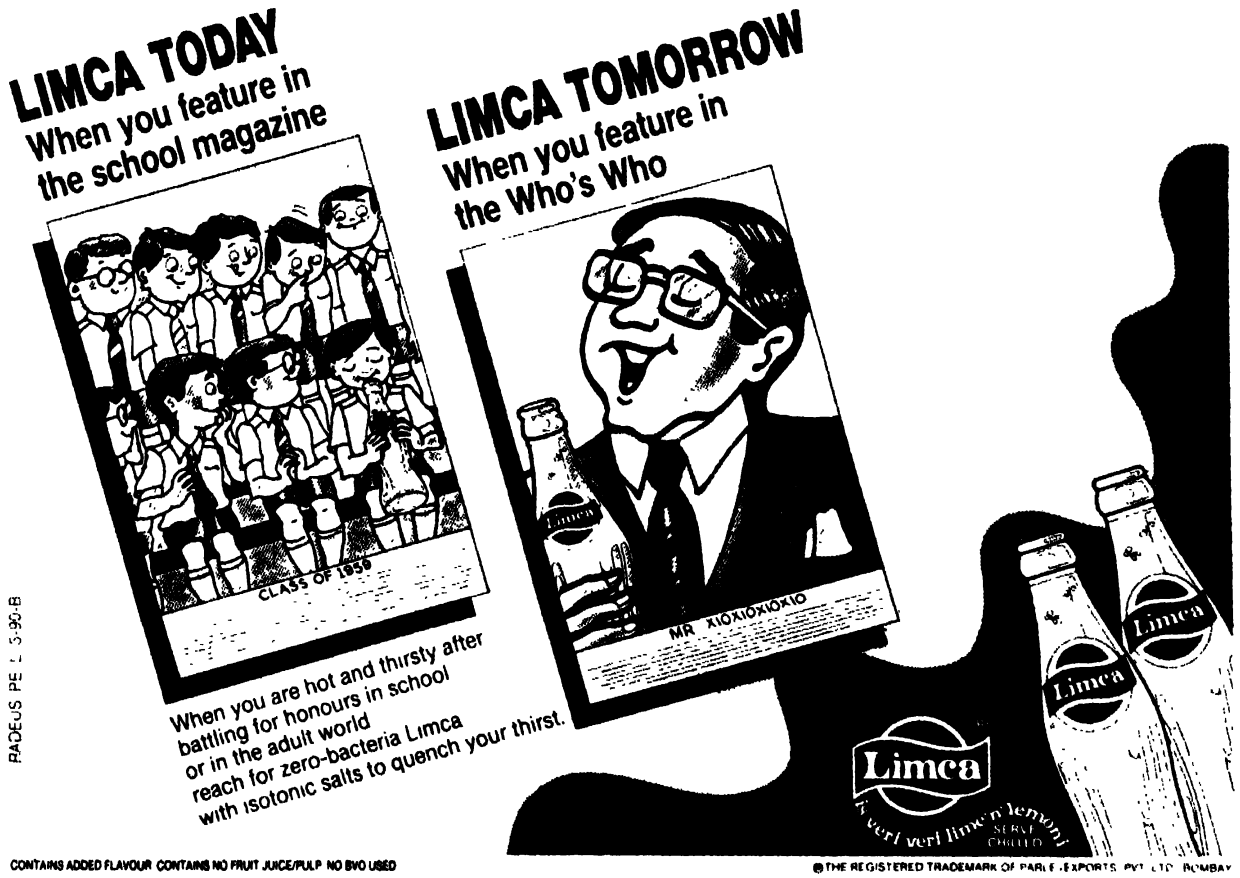
The BJP came out openly against Patwa on this one. While party MLAs berated him, the BJP newspaper Swadesh began a campaign against the chief minister on this issue.

Patwa's family problems continue. More recently, his nephew, Hemant Patwa, managed to become the agent of such companies as HMT Tractors, LML Vespa (among others), and allegations made the rounds that he had resorted to corrupt means to wangle them. A case is also pending against him for the alleged illegal occupation of a showroom. The chief minister's brother was accused of quarrying stones from near Mandasore and selling them without the necessary permission.



Party workers have complained against Patwa to party president Advani (left); Angre (middle) is known as the "proxy CM", and BJP elder Vajpayee (right) has reprimanded Patwa

The BJP, tired of the chief minister's shenanigans, has now decided to clip his wings. A high level committee has been constituted in the state comprising Kushabhau Thakare, Kailash Sarang, Pyarelal Khandelwal and Ramhit Gupta, which will take all the important policy decisions on behalf of the Madhya Pradesh government.

A strong faction within the party has already begun lobbying for his removal, with Pyarelal Khandelwal and Lakshmi Narayan Pandey being held out as attractive alternatives. Patwa, for his part, is clinging on to his chair for dear life, trying every conceivable trick to get back in favour with the party high command. Unfortunately for him, none of them seem to work.●

When the roles didn't materialise after her stunning performance in Pratighaat, Sujata Mehta, until then the archetypal sedate Gujjuben, turned glamorous with a vengeance. Photo-session after photo-session followed as Mehta pulled out all stops in an attempt to establish a new image.

But she seems to have gone totally overboard of late, if B.R. Chopra's Dharam Shakti is anything to go by. A la Mandakini, Mehta wears a sheer white sari and gets soaking wet for the benefit of the camera, which lingers lovingly around her bosom.

The only difference being that while Mandakini got drenched under a waterfall, Mehta makes do with the humble bathroom shower.

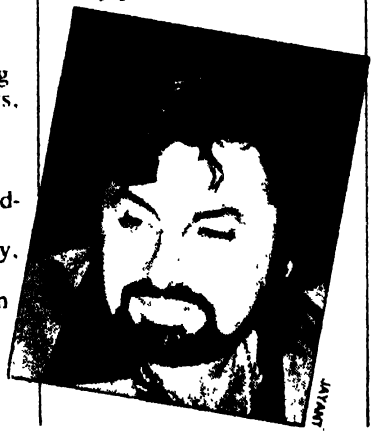
Trouble seems to be brewing on the Sangeeta Bijlani-Salman Khan front.

Or why would Bijli be spotted at the Piano Bar, night after night, boogeying away her boredom with her model friends (Lubna Adam among others)? This, while Salman spends his time throwing tantrums on the sets, and in more amenable moments flirting with his co-stars (such newcomers as Chandni, Nagma, and even the Randhir Kapoor discovery, Zeba).

So is it all over for Khan and his Bijli?

Success hasn't blunted Rajiv Rai's bitchy tongue one bit.

Recently the director was asked whether he was planning to make a film based on his love story with Sonam.



No, replied Rai, "That's Mahesh Bhatt's territory and I don't want to encroach on it."

This is how crowded it can get at Binsar during peak tourist season

Binsar. A tiny, half-forgotten, out-of-the-way place where hardly anyone goes. Where life moves on at an unhurried pace and people still have the time to stop and chat. Nestled in thick oak and rhododendron woods, Binsar is just 30 kms from Almora, which is about 9 hrs run from Delhi by road. The nearest rail-head is Kathgodam. From Almora you could take a bus or even trek up to Binsar and stay at the comfortable 40-bedded tourist bungalow, with a-la-carte restaurant service. Surrounded by the views of the snowy peaks, Binsar offers a feast for the eyes.

Close by is Kausani, a scenic spot eulogised by poets and philosophers — so close to the Trishul-Nanda Devi range that you feel you could touch the snows.

Jageshwar, one of the 12 Jyotir Lingas of Shiva; Baijnath, a picturesque town dotted with Shikhar style temples; Katarmal, a celebrated picnic spot with a unique sun temple and Bageshwar, famous for the Bagnath temple and old sculptures, are some of the places to visit during your stay at Binsar.

So for your next holiday, get off the beaten track -- head for Binsar. And discover the U.P. hardly anyone knows about.

NO BIDDERS

Publicity hype had it that the latest Husain auction, held on the occasion of the painter's 75th birthday, would be an event to remember.

Well, it certainly will be remembered for a long time to come. But not for quite the right reasons.

All seemed well when Pritish Nandy, editor of The Illustrated Weekly of India and The Independent, initiated proceedings. But for four embarrassing minutes there appeared to be no takers for the latest offering from the master, until Parmeshwar Godrej gamely put up a bid for Rs 6.50 lakhs. A few desultory bids followed, but despite Nandy's persuasive talk, the going price wasn't much higher by the end of it.

Perhaps, he should have waited. For Parmeshwar Godrej was coming to the rescue, bidding a steep Rs 12.5 lakhs and walking away with the canvas.

Explained the gallant Godrej after the event: "It was decided that the money would go for the Gulf refugees and that's why I decided to bid at the auction. Otherwise Husain is a close friend. Why should I have to buy his painting at an auction?"

He came, he talked and then, he went right back to England. And at the end of Dr Farooq Abdullah's month-long sojourn in India, with regular meetings with representatives of the Dal regime, the Kashmir problem was no nearer solution.

True, nobody expected the good doctor to come back and wave the Valley's troubles away with his magic wand. But, most people had thought that his involvement in the sorry mess that is Kashmir today, would lead to the evolution of some new initiatives.

Such optimists, however, had not reckoned with Mufti Mohammad Sayeed. For, the redoubtable home minister of India stymied all Abdullah's efforts to renew the political process in the Valley. Farooq's suggestion that the government redress some of the grievances of the state's people, in order to regain their confidence was shot down by the Mufti on the grounds that leniency would get them nowhere.

Instead, said Sayeed, the Prime Minister should follow his lead and address public meetings in the state to get the government's view across.

And, no doubt, Doordarshan should cover these jamborees and telecast its reports on prime time.

SLOWING DOWN PAES

The feud between AITA (All India Tennis Association) secretary R.K. Khanna and Vijay Amritraj now has a new focus. And it's called Leander Paes.

Recently, Khanna told the press that the current Wimbledon junior champion's career prospects were being damaged beyond repair by the Amritraj-run coaching organisation, BAT. According to Khanna, Vijay had decided that Paes was not to be fielded in any junior tournament. Instead, he would play the senior circuit, as befitted his superior talent.

This, said Khanna, was guaranteed to destroy Paes's chances, for he would find it difficult to keep up with the superior talent on the senior circuit. If, on the other hand, he played his level of tennis, not only would he register some morale-boosting wins, he could also garner much-needed experience.

The argument made sense.

But Vijay wasn't listening, leading to rumours that Leander may well terminate his contract with BAT prematurely.

Obviously, all this talk of reservations has got to the Assam chief minister. For, even when Indian Airlines announced free seating on IC 479, its flight from Guwahati to Delhi, Prafulla Mahanta decided he could "reserve" a seat for himself.

The securitymen were having none of that, and asked Ery to go elsewhere. Ery refused to see reason. And the men, said to be Assam home minister Brighu Phukan's bodyguards, beat him up soundly for his temerity.

This, while Phukan looked on from elsewhere in the craft.

The row would have taken an even more ugly turn if the pilot hadn't refused to take off while "violence" continued on the plane.

Phukan left the aircraft in a huff. And later claimed that his guards had only thrown their fists around because they couldn't bear to hear Ery abuse the CM.

Unfortunately, not too many people bought this story.

Today, the Nargis Dutt Foundation has chapters all over the world, which donate equipment and money to hospitals in India to help patients—and not just those suffering from cancer.

The US Congress was sufficiently impressed by Dutt's work to bestow on him a citation recognising his concern with humanitarian causes. The citation, presented by Congressman Mervyn Dymally, is to be entered into the congressional records, a rare honour.

THE ESSENCE OF LEADERSHIP IS OFTEN NOTHING BUT SHEER CUSSEDNESS.

Tell Kirloskar Electric a job can't be done and it's like showing a red rag to a bull. We can't resist it. But all the engineering genius in the world can come to nought without sheer staying power Once we take on a job, we never give up.

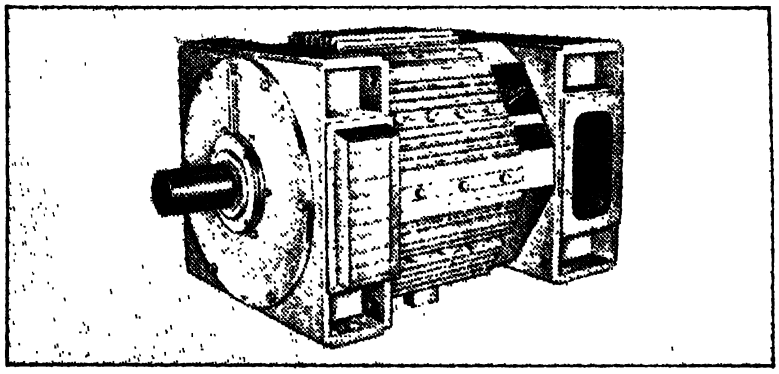
Take just one instance. The 125 KW DC roller table motors for the blooming and slabbing mill at the Bokaro Steel Plant. The original motors, imported from Russia over twenty years ago needed to be replaced. What made the job really difficult was the fact that the new replacements had to be interchangeable, both mechanically and electrically, with the originals. And yet perform better.

As they say in electrical circles, when everybody else shies away, get Kirloskar Electric. The Bokaro people called us. Picture the scene. 35 tonnes of red hot iron billets, each following on the heels of the previous one, at a temperature of 1000°C, crashing on rollers and then travelling at murderous speeds to be sprayed by jets of water.

We watched and studied the drives for weeks, then got back and made a detailed proposal with designs. Go back, they said. They had raised the ante. The motors had now to work for at least 8 hours at a time even if the supply of cooling air was stopped. We had to raise the output without changing the physical dimensions an iota. We re-designed the whole motor with a far superior insulation scheme and excellent heat transfer capability.

End of story? Hardly. Our prototype failed. One of the windings overheated by 30° Kelvin and the commutation ability of the machine was poor.

Throw in the towel, everyone told us. No way, we said. We went back to work with a vengeance. Now listen to this. In 10 days, yes 10 days flat, we re-designed the windings. We have after all, perhaps the finest electrical design engineers in the country.



Those motors are working just fine. And they saved a substantial amount of foreign exchange.

But Kirloskar Electric is more than the sum of all the firsts it has earned over the years. We are India's leading industrial electrics and electronics company in the private sector. We make some of the finest standard AC and DC drives, transformers, welding equipment and systems, motorised gear units, equipment for defence, electronic control equipment, CNCs etc. But the one single reason why we are the prime movers in our field is because the centre of gravity at Kirloskar Electric is the customer. Our hi-tech, engineering expertise, superior quality and reliability are all geared to anticipate and respond to his needs.

Delhi students attempt self-immolation to protest the Centre's reservation policy

DELHI

The police may have doused the flames, but the damage had already been done. Self-immolation attempts by students to protest against the Mandal report added to the anti-reservation frenzy sweeping Delhi. And the battle is still on.

It was madness. On 19 September two students of the Delhi University set themselves on fire in front of Deshbandhu College—in full view of the police, presspersons and a large crowd of hangers-on.

One of them was fortunate. He was rescued in time and escaped with minor injuries. The other, Rajeev Goswami, became the first 'martyr' of the cause, and lay battling for his life in Safdarjung Hospital, with 55 per cent burns.

What the students had originally planned may have been merely symbolic. Three wooden pyres had been neatly placed outside the college and 45 students were to "burn" themselves. And a large crowd waited for a ringside view. No one noticed a boy at the back, Rajeev, casually pick up a can of kerosene, douse himself with it and set himself aflame.

As the crowd, stunned by what it was witnessing, was slow to react, another student, Laxman, followed suit. While he was rescued in time by the police, Rajeev was not so fortunate, and was severely burnt on his right leg and abdomen. In the hysteric moments that followed, other students also tried to emulate Goswami. But, by this time, the police had cordoned off the pyres, effectively preventing further suicide bids.

And, even in that intensely tragic situation, Rajeev Goswami's grieving mother insisted that the cause for which her son fought was "correct and just". And she maintained her stand hours later, as she stood outside the burns ward, praying for her son's recovery.

A blistered and barely conscious Rajeev Goswami added fillip to the anti-reservation movement, egging the students to go right ahead and fight. Also inciting them were the instances of police brutality—the teargassing, the lathicharges and the manhandling of unarmed students, including women. Newspaper pictures, day after day, graphically portrayed the police "atrocities", sparking off public debates and exciting the students.

The fury, following the incidents on 19 September, raged through the city. Even the sympathetic BJP leaders, Madan Lal Khurana and L.K. Advani, who went to see Goswami in hospital two days later, felt the heat. Confronted by a mob of enraged students, who formed a human chain outside the hospital and demanded that the BJP withdraw its support to the National Front government, the two were forced to retreat. Khurana was chased by the crowd, pummelled and shoved around, and finally managed to escape with a broken tooth and a torn shirt by taking refuge in a police bus. Advani was luckier. He made his getaway in an Ambassador car, albeit with a caved-in ceiling.

Simultaneously, students of the ITI (Industrial Training Institute) at Nizamuddin blocked roads, deflated bus tyres and stopped traffic. And, at the Tis Hazari courts, hundreds of students gathered in the pouring rain, waiting to receive 86 others who had been arrested following a confrontation with the police and were to appear before the magistrate for bail. As tension mounted, a paranoid administration, eager to avoid fresh trouble, decided to take the easier way out by releasing the 86 students, including women, on personal bond at the police station itself.

That the agitation would snowball was apparent from the widespread support the students got from various quarters. Soon after the police lathicharged students outside Safdarjung Hospital on 20 September, doctors at the hospital went on a lightning strike till 9.00 am the next day. To further boost the movement, the Junior Doctors' Association, including doctors from Punjab, Haryana and Himachal Pradesh, decided to go on a day's token strike on 24 September. And, when the police had earlier barricaded the entrance at Tis Hazari, the lawyers sprang to the students' defence, arguing that everybody had a right to enter a court room. Later, all the Tis Hazari lawyers pitched in, buying fruits for the students on a day-long vigil outside the courts. And, notwithstanding the wrath it had faced, the BJP went all out to support the students. Addressing a crowd, outside Parliament House. Khurana made his stand clear, "We'll fight for the students of Delhi University. This decision to implement the Mandal Commission was taken without consulting us."

The final show of solidarity came from the Sarv Khap Panchayat, representing farmers of Delhi, Rajasthan, Haryana and UP. They declared that they would gherao the capital from 27 September onwards and stop all supply of milk, vegetables and other essential items. They also announced their decision to participate in "full strength" in the proposed 2 October rally at the Boat Club.

As the anti-reservation agitation rocked the city, its resources were badly strained. The DTC (Delhi Transport Corporation) registered a loss of a staggering Rs three crore in the one month of the agitation. And the Delhi police found itself busier than ever before, banking heavily on force from outside the city. In fact, the Delhi police was even compelled to recruit constables from its training school well before their passing out parade.

"My mother saw my photograph on the cover of a magazine and asked me what I was up to. I just wrote back that I was taking the risks associated with an agitation. And, I am prepared for anything that might happen," said a young Delhi University student with a fractured arm. And, with that grit, whether right or wrong, one thing is clear: the agitation will intensify. Classrooms and exams have obviously taken a back seat. ●

"A constitutional obligation"

The grandson of Dr Babasaheb Ambedkar, Prakash Ambedkar, 35, has just been nominated to the Rajya Sabha. He is a lawyer by profession and had formed the Bharatiya Republican Party in 1984. Although not represented in the state Assembly, the party is an important political force and for years Prakash has been wooed by both the Congress(I) and the Janata Dal. Recently, he has joined the latter. In the backdrop of the anti-Mandal movement, SUNDAY*'s* Olga Tellis spoke to him. Like his grandfather, the father of the Indian Constitution, this Ambedkar, too, gives top priority to the backward castes. Excerpts from the interview:

SUNDAY: Was your nomination to the Rajya Sabha, at this point of time, part of V.P. Singh's policy of winning over the Scheduled Castes and other backward classes?

Prakash Ambedkar: I do not think so, nor do I think it had anything to do with the anti-Mandal Commission agitations. Perhaps they require my services at the Centre. I had been restricting myself to the south, now they would like to use me for organisation work in the north, I suppose.

Q: Okay, but I am talking about the timing...

A: The Prime Minister talked to me about this several months ago. It was only now that there were vacancies and he suggested my name to the President.

Ambedkar: yes, Mandal

Q: Why do you think Maharashtra has been relatively free from the violent protests the Mandal Commission report gave rise to in northern India?

A: In Maharashtra, the dominant caste is that of the Marathas, who have always been in power. They are also well off. From 1920-47 they have been in the forefront of the anti-Brahmin movement, which was part of a social reform movement. So, they are aware of the problems of other castes. That is why the anti-reservation movement has not picked up here.

Q: Have you read the Mandal Commission report? Do you think it is flawed?

A: It is a Constitutional obligation that had to be fulfilled. When the Constitution was being drafted, there was no time to prepare a comprehensive list of backward castes and it was agreed that it would be completed later. But for 40 years of Congress rule nothing was done about it. In fact, the Punjab unrest is also part of this neglect. Most of the so-called extremists belong to the backward castes among the Sikhs.

The government will now have to make a provision in the Constitution for the castes common to the states and the Centre, which have been included in the Mandal report. While one can decide the percentage of reservation by administrative orders, the reservation can be provided for only by an amendment to the Constitution. For this, V.P. Singh will need a three-fourths majority. I see a vertical split in the BJP and the Congress parties on this issue. Already the southern Congressmen have sent a warning to Rajiv Gandhi, and the BJP in Maharashtra has been supporting the Mandal Commission report. Since V.P. Singh will have to introduce a Bill, perhaps he will go for a mid-term poll. ●

Matters private

The BJP government's privatisation efforts trigger off tribal unrest

MADHYA PRADESH

The moves are characteristic of the BJP. The Madhya Pradesh government, advertised as a model of sorts, is showing a lot of interest in privatisation. And the ever-vocal Congress(I) is mysteriously silent on the issue.

The state has decided to allow private companies to handle power houses, road transport and the liquor trade in tribal areas. The first step was the replacing of government outlets selling liquor in tribal belts with private shops. A major problem in this process is the retrenchment involved. Already, 900 government employees working in these liquor vends have been sacked. This utterly unexpected move has bewildered and shocked quite a few. Unable to cope, a young man in Raigarh recently committed suicide.

And the largest tribal district, Bastar, has come alive with protests. A few years ago, the Congress(I) had abolished private trade in liquor following vehement tribal protest against the activities of the liquor mafia. And with the new policy, the old evil is back. The district president of the BJP youth wing, the Bharatiya Janta Yuva Morcha, was hospitalised after a murderous attack on him by the liquor contractors, for demanding curbs on the latter. And although the street attack was carried out openly, the police did not arrest the culprits till thousands of locals gheraoed the police station and higher officials intervened.

Maybe the fact that the liquor lobby in Madhya Pradesh is rich and resourceful is relevant in this context. It is known to be a liberal donor, with no overt political bias. And once upon a time, these contractors were branded the biggest tax evaders in the state.

The government is also planning to privatise road transport in a big way. The transfer of some nationalised routes to the private sector, which is already under way, will undoubtedly leave thousands jobless. But then, the State Road Transport Corporation has been a pretty corrupt white elephant. It incurs a loss of about Rs 30 to 50 crores every year. And it also does not pay taxes. And private companies, which can be needled into paying up, might be an attractive alternative. The state has started issuing permits to private transport companies for distances up to 50 km, even on nationalised routes. And liberal deals for longer routes are being considered.

The state government's decision to encourage the private sector has been prompted by a shortage of funds, and one area where the businessman is needed most is the power sector

Another area where the state has decided to allow the private sector in as an experiment is power. Scarcity of funds led to this decision, admitted the chairman of the state electricity board. In fact, the government's privatisation plans speak of its financial problems. Strangely, the self-proclaimed saviour of the public sector, the Congress(I), has been silent all along. There hasn't been a murmur even from PCC(I) chief Arjun Singh and Opposition leader Shyama Charan Shukla. Incidentally, as chief minister in December 1989, Shukla had himself brought back the private liquor contractors in Durg district. This only shows how resourceful and wise the private businessmen are. And how similar the politicians, whether from the Congress or the BJP. •

Came, saw and captured

The PWG goes on an abduction spree in six districts

ANDHRA PRADESH

Kidnapping has become child's play for the Naxalites of Andhra Pradesh. The activists of the People's War Group (PWG) are taking hostages at will and the Congress(I) regime, like the previous Telugu Desam government, does not quite know how to tackle them.

On the 10th of last month, the PWG displayed its striking power by abducting 16 people from six districts where it holds sway. Among those whisked away were a former minister of the Telugu Desam Party, Rama Rao, and a Youth Congress leader. The Naxalites declared that the abductions were in protest against the detention of vehicles bringing PWG supporters to a massive rally in Hyderabad, organised by the Andhra Pradesh Rythu Coolie Sangham (APRCS) on 10 September.

Kannabiran: critical

The police say former minister and sitting MLA G. Rama Rao was on his way to Adilabad from his constituency, Boath, when his car was waylaid and he was taken hostage. Sarath Babu, the youth Congress leader, was kidnapped from his residence in Narkekal taluk in Nalagandan district. The PWG held a mandal revenue officer, an engineer, a college principal, a manager of the Andhra Bank and a school teacher.

Later, the Naxalites used one of the hostages to establish contact with the administration. The kidnapped man, a gram sevak, was released by them with a list of their demands. Among the things they pressed for were the release of the PWG supporters held on 10 September, the removal of all police camps from their areas of influence, and the "cessation of hostilities by the police".

The director general of police, Prabhakar Rao, however, denies that the police intended to foil the APRCS meeting by preventing the organisation's supporters from reaching Hyderabad. The police, he claims, had merely tried to stop use of force by the PWG, whose activists had, apparently, commandeered the trucks. The police also say that they had information that some of the PWG men were trying to smuggle arms into the public meeting.

Two days later, after having gained from a publicity hype, the Naxalites freed the hostages, as the police agreed to release the seized trucks. But what may have been a happy ending to a tense drama was marred by the assassination of N. Narsa Reddy, sarpanch of Mursa village, in a separate incident, in Nizamabad district. The PWG suspected him to be a police informer.

One of the released hostages, Koteswara Rao, a manager of the Andhra Bank, said that he was well looked after by the extremists while he was being held. The others, too, seemed to have little to complain about.

While the government watched helplessly with no control over the course of events, the Andhra Pradesh Civil Liberties Committee (APCLC) accused it of being insincere about solving the Naxalite problem. The APCLC's president, Kannabiran, and general secretary, Dr Balagopal, demanded the setting up of special courts to enquire into the excesses committed by the police.

The critics of chief minister Chenna Reddy say that his policies have emboldened the Naxalites, who are openly holding "peoples courts" in most villages. A senior minister in the state Cabinet, however, feels that the government allowed the PWG a long rope in the hope that the Naxalites would hang themselves. Chenna Reddy had, evidently, taken a calculated risk, hoping that the extremists would come overground and abjure violence.

His policy of "live and let live" has backfired. Instead of joining the mainstream, the Naxalites are now moving about more freely, collecting

But are there any covert reasons for the Congress(I) to pamper the Naxalites? Rumours doing the rounds in Hyderabad suggest that Kondapalli Sitharamaiah, the PWG chief, was in the state capital recently and spent a few days in a five-star hotel as a guest of one of the leading lights of the Chenna Reddy Cabinet.

Whether there is any grain of truth in that remains unknown. What is evident is that the Congress(I) government has been outplayed by the Naxalites. •

Tenants in government buildings feel threatened following an SC verdict

MAHARASHTRA

"All this is in danger" says Rajanjit Madhavji, the art collector, gliding his eyes over the rare paintings, photographs and curios. "Where will I keep these if I have to quit?" Madhavji is the owner of the world-renowned Hamilton Studios, which, he claims, hosts the largest private collection of paintings and photographs in India. And by a recent Supreme Court (SC) judgment, the collector can be evicted from the building the studio is located in, with just seven days' notice.

Hamilton Studios is in what is now the NTC House at Ballard Estate. When the Seasoons-owned Indu United Mills went sick and was nationalised, this building was taken over by the National Textile Corporation (NTC) and all the tenants of the building automatically became tenants of the NTC. The SC judgment takes away the protection offered by the Rent Act to tenants like Madhavji. That is to rent-paying tenants of government or semi-government institutions, including the railways, port trusts, banks and corporations like the LIC.

Upset by this development, Madhavji and other affected tenants have promoted the Public Premises Tenants Association (PPTA). The government is one of the largest property owners in the metros. In Bombay's business district—Fort Area—alone, about 99 per cent of the buildings are owned by the LIC (Life Insurance Corporation) and the banks. So, thousands of tenants, whether commercial companies or families, are panic-stricken. "Any state-controlled corporation could henceforth buy an apartment or commercial block, declare some occupants unauthorised and evict them," says Marizi Chinoy, lawyer and chairman of the PPTA.

An LIC spokesman, however, dismisses this as "imaginary fears". Investment policies are controlled by the government. "We can't just purchase encumbered property and evict people wholesale," he says. "Besides, it is not easy to start legal proceedings in the LIC. It is a long and cumbersome procedure." Another government spokesperson feels that the rich businessmen, who have enough money to buy new premises, seem to be making the most noise.

In the public sector, the railways alone have 68,000 tenements under litigation, of which 33,000 are in Bombay

The SC judgment was in answer to questions raised by three public sector organisations. In 1977 the Punjab National Bank, the Allahabad Bank and the LIC had asked three private sector companies to vacate the premises they occupied in Delhi. The latter filed writ petitions in the Bombay High Court. The judgment went in favour of the companies. So the public sector organisations questioned, in the SC, whether someone, inducted as a tenant in public premises and whose tenancy has expired, can be evicted as an unauthorised occupant under the Public Premises (Eviction of Unauthorised Occupants) Act (PPA), 1971. And, whether the person is protected by the Delhi Rent Control Act, 1958. This time the judgment went in favour of the public sector companies.

"I feel sorry not because of my personal loss, but because an institution like this will be closed down," says Madhavji. "I bought Hamilton Studios in 1958. Its collection is famous worldwide. The Sotheby's of London and the Rolls Royce people come over for pictures I have here. All this will be lost."

Of the public sector, says the distraught collector, the railways alone have 68,000 tenements under litigation, of which 33,000 are in Bombay. The Bombay Port Trust has 14,000. There are many more examples. And the panic is spreading. •

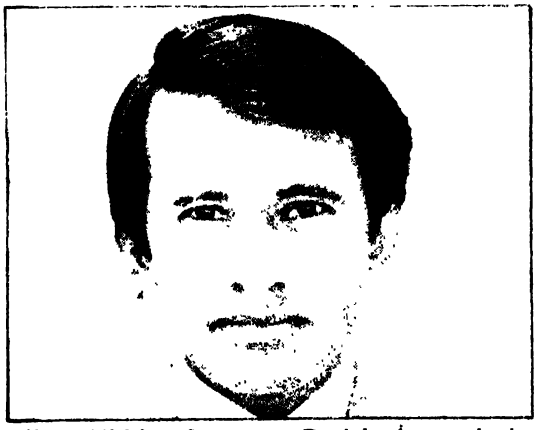
United tribes of Sikkim



The Limbus, Bhutias and the Lepchas join hands to press for their demands

SIKKIM

The Limbus of Sikkim are slowly emerging as a new political force in the state. The revival of their age-old ties with the minority Buddhist Bhutia-Lepcha tribals, coupled with their demand for a Scheduled Tribe status and reserved constituencies, indicates that the community is all set to become increasingly assertive.

The Akhil Sikkim Kirati Limbu Chumlung (All Sikkim Kirati Limbu Association) has demanded the status of a Scheduled Tribe for the Limbus, a Nepalese hill tribe, settled in west Sikkim. The Chumlung has the support of most Limbu leaders belonging to different political parties, including the ruling Sikkim Sangram Parishad (SSP). The party's Limbu MLAs were signatories to a memorandum submitted to President R. Venkataraman by the Chumlung in July this year, demanding a Scheduled Tribe status for the Limbus.

The tribals have described Bhandari's stand against the Mandal report as 'an act of high-handedness'

Moreover, the tribal-dominated political party, Denzong People's Chogpa, and the Denzong Tribal Yargay Chogsa, another vocal organisation of the tribals, have lent tacit support to the Limbus. The Bhutia-Lepchas, who were declared a Scheduled Tribe in 1978, three years after Sikkim's controversial merger with the Indian Union, also support the 'Lho-Mon-Tsong-Sum' movement for unity among the Bhutias, Lepchas, and Limbus, whom historians regard as the three main communities inhabiting the state prior to the largescale Nepalese immigration into Sikkim in the latter part of the 19th century.

"In keeping with the tribal traditions, this community (Limbus) upheld and honoured the 'Lho-Mon-Tsong-Sum' agreement fully and stayed with amity with Bhutias and Lepchas. It was the forces of these three communities which fought valiantly in the 1788 war against the Gorkha invasion of Sikkim", stated the Chumlung's memorandum to the President. And, expectedly, the reaction of the chief minister, N.B. Bhandari, who champions the interests of the Nepalese, was dramatic. He threatened to quit his post as the party chief, if his two MLAs, Bir Bal Subba and Sanchaman Limbu, failed to apologise for becoming a party to the Chumlung memorandum. "Either I will resign from the post of president or the two signatories will have to resign for violating party conduct," Bhandari warned at a public gathering.

The chief minister's threat, however, did not have much effect on the Limbus. This was evident from a subsequent memorandum submitted to the chief minister himself, demanding constitutional recognition of the 'Lho-Mon-Tsong-Sum languages', i.e. Bhutia, Lepcha and Limbu, which, along with Nepalese, are officially recognised in the state.

The timing of the demand irked Bhandari, as it came at a time when he was campaigning for the inclusion of Nepali in the 8th Schedule of the Constitution. Despite Bhandari's request to all that the campaign for Nepali should in no way be hindered, 51 persons representing the Bhutias, Lepchas and Limbus, urged the chief minister to raise the demand for the inclusion of their languages in the 8th Schedule of the Constitution also. This is being regarded as a major setback for Bhandari.

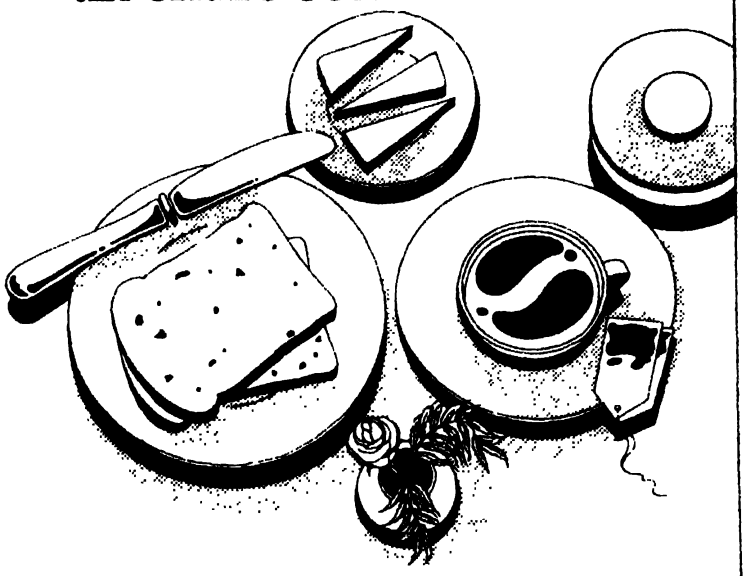
Another issue on which the Limbus have become vocal is regarding the Mandal Commission recommendations which list the Nepalese among the backward communities. Bhandari's refusal to implement the commission's recommendations in the state has made matters worse. In the autumn session of the Assembly Bhandari moved a resolution against the implementation of the Mandal report in Sikkim, which was unanimously passed by the House.

Bhandari feels that the report which includes a section of the Napalese in the list while excluding some others, is "discriminatory". Implementation of such recommendations, according to Bhandari, will cause disharmony among the ethnic communities in Sikkim.



The Chumlung lost no time in reacting against the state government's stand and demanded a "review" of the decision. A press statement issued by the chief general secretary of the Chumlung, K.B. Subba, termed the Bhandari government's stand on the Mandal report as "an act of high-handedness" aimed at appeasing "a very small" section of the Nepalese in the state. This was actually an indirect reference to the upper caste Nepali Hindus in Sikkim.

Reflecting the sentiments of the Limbus, Pritvi Raj Subha, founder-president of the Chumlung and vice-president of the Denzong People's Chogpa, told newsmen here recently that inclusion of the Limbus in the list of backward classes was an act of "injustice". According to him the community deserved the status of a Scheduled Tribe like the Bhutia-Lepchas.

With the revival of the feeling of brotherhood among the tribals and the Limbus, and the unifying influence of the Mandal Commission's recommendations among all the hill tribes, the stage is now set for a new trend in the politics of this strategic Himalayan state. •

The enemy within

Communist leader Satpal Dang on the terrorist movement in Punjab

In the earlier stages of terrorism in Punjab, the Left had to argue hard in support of its contention that behind the terrorists was the hand of imperialism operating from our own soil but mainly through the rulers of Pakistan which has a long border with Punjab as well as some neighbouring states. Today this external factor is recognized by one and all except those who deliberately do not want to see this or are interested in denying it. Evidence which has come to light already is indeed overwhelming and is too well known by now.

Imperialism does not like India's anti-imperialist role in the international arena and her refusal to go neo-colonial, notwithstanding all the concessions which are given to the multinationals by our government. Imperialism therefore wants to weaken, destabilise and even disintegrate and balkanise India. Towards that end it encourages, aids and abets such slogans as "Khalistan", and "Azad Kashmir" and also Hindu Raj in India. Not very long ago, a world conference of the Hindu Vishwa Parishad, which was held in the USA and which demanded Hindu Raj in India was patronised and attended by some from the ruling classes of that country.

Towards that end, US imperialism has been helping the Khalistani terrorists, mainly but not only through Pakistani rulers. Besides the fact that Zia was a US stooge, Pakistani rulers have their own axe to grind too. Their calculations are not difficult to see. If at a time of crisis, say another Indo-Pak war, they can occupy parts of Amritsar and Gurdaspur districts bordering Pakistan, Kashmir gets virtually cut off from India. This is their real practical objective, even when they encourage the slogan of Khalistan while carrying on an anti-Sikh campaign in their own country through publications in Urdu. This is one reason why the terrorists from the very start have concentrated on these two districts, while developing the capacity to strike in any part of Punjab and even outside Punjab.

The external factor alone cannot explain the serious situation. There are internal forces, too, behind Khalistani terrorists.

Bhajan Lal's (the then chief minister of Haryana) approach to teach Sikhs a lesson by humiliating and harassing a large number of Sikh passengers travelling to Delhi by buses, cars, etc. in the name of ensuring failure of the threat of disrupting the Asian Games, rendered immense help to Bhindranwale.

Economically Sikhs are perhaps the most well-off community of India. They have a share in services (defence as well as civil) far in excess of their proportion in the population. There are many more gurudwaras in India per 1 lakh of Sikhs now than in 1947. Allegations of discrimination therefore are false. However, a Hindu bias is there in the leadership of the country. For instance, just when the Akali demand for declaring Amritsar as a holy city was refused, Kurukshetra was declared one. This bias helps anti-national forces and must so.

The internal factor which has perhaps helped the terrorists most is opportunism of the bourgeois parties and not only the ruling one—indulged in for short term electoral or other political considerations. Many examples can be given but only a few will suffice.

As is universally known by now, Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale, a religious personality, was brought into politics by Congress with the aim of weakening the Akali party, its rival in the matter of power in the state of Punjab. The Akalis thought that they could play the Bhindranwale card better than the Congress. They first allowed him to stay in the Guru Nanak Niwas. Then they allowed him to stay in the holy Akal Takht, where even no Guru had ever stayed, and to convert the Golden Temple complex proper including the Akal Takht itself into an armed fortress and a big training camp for terrorists.

A very prominent general secretary of the Congress(I) certified that Bhindranwale was only a religious personality even when he had already become the leader of the terrorist killers and when he had already been calling for killings. Almost at the same time not one but three much respected opposition stalwarts visited the Golden Temple and issued certificates to the effect that they did not find any arms inside the Golden Temple complex when one even from outside could see many installed inside the complex and even on its outer walls.

Assassination of Prime Minister Indira Gandhi was the most despicable act masterminded by the terrorists and their patrons, imperialists. Those who celebrated the assassination deserved to be strongly criticised. Notwithstanding all this, the anti-Sikh riots resulting in killings of about 3,000 innocent Sikhs in the capital alone were totally unjustifiable. They constitute one of the blackest spots of India's fair name. They were not altogether spontaneous. Some VIPs played a big part in organising these even though in not a few places old Congressmen too like the communists and others helped save many Sikhs, even at the risk of their own lives. For narrow party considerations, there has been a persistent refusal to prosecute the guilty. This grave injustice has been fully exploited by the

The internal factor which has, perhaps, helped the terrorists most is the opportunism the bourgeois parties indulged in for short-term electoral or other considerations extremists in Punjab and has done them very great service indeed.

Again and again there have been attempts on the part of the Congress(I) high command to make a deal with a section of the terrorists sometimes with the help of Sunil Muni Jain and Darshan Singh Ragi, sometimes with the help of Badal (even though a novice in Punjab politics could tell that Badal would not oblige) and sometimes through Jasbir Singh Rode. Every such effort has proved counter-productive. It has only demoralised the security forces and has strengthened the terrorists.

And yet this is not being given up for the sake of electoral considerations. Not more than 50 in the Jodhpur Jail are terrorist killers or their organisers. Yet many more are still there to be used as a bargaining counter. Non-Left opposition parties too do not seem averse to making an unprincipled deal. Some top opposition leaders have been maintaining a strange silence on Punjab. Some have been saying that the Punjab problem would get resolved only when the Opposition comes to power in New Delhi. Some have started providing alibis for the terrorists by saying that all the killings are being done by the government agents.

The ordinance which the government issued to prevent places of worship from being used for storing weapons and from being used for political purposes was half-hearted. The Akalis opposed it. Other bourgeois opposition parties instead of demanding it being made more effective, at best expressed only lukewarm support for it.

The terrorists have made full use of this opportunism of bourgeois parties. Bhindranwale had even boasted that some thought that the Congress was using him, but actually it was he who was using the Congress (and also the Akalis).

The terrorists are not concerned with the territorial disputes and the dispute regarding surplus river waters. They have often said so. But they have not failed to exploit the fact that these disputes (given communal colourings by the Akalis) remain unresolved. One of the main reasons for the disputes not getting resolved is the opportunism of the bourgeois parties. While communists take one and the same stand and put forward the same in the concerned states, every bourgeois party takes one stand in the parliament while giving full freedom to its state units to take different and mutually contradictory stands. It is not necessary to give more examples. The fact that the type of employment avenues desired by the youth are not there, and coupled with lure of weapons and money, it has played a part in spread of terrorism, though this is only a secondary factor.

Main sources of fund collections by the Punjab terrorists have been as under:

i) Huge amounts have come from abroad from those who are sympathetic to the 'cause' including from millionaire non-Indian Sikhs. Collections in such gurudwaras in foreign countries as are controlled by extremists have also been utilised for the purpose.

ii) Big amounts have also come from cities like Bombay and Calcutta contributed and collected by supporters of the 'cause'.

iii) Collections of gurudwaras in Punjab when controlled by terrorists or their friends have also been used.

iv) Banks dacoities, robberies, etc. In some cases of robberies, the victims happened to be Sikhs. They pleaded for being spared. They were told that they might fulfil the demand out of sympathy or at the point of gun—the choice was theirs.

v) Extortions through threats. First, Hindu businessmen and professionals were the targets. Then the operation was extended to Sikh businessmen and professionals and thereafter also to comparatively well-off landowners.

An interesting aspect of this operation has been bargaining indulged in to decide the exact amount to be given with the help of mediators. In some cases terrorists known to be the targets have also helped to lower the demands. Of course at the time of the negotiations AK 47 Chinese Assault Rifles and other sophisticated weapons would be on display.

Groups like teachers of a particular school have been made to pay fixed monthly contributions.

vi) Ransom on the basis of kidnappings. This method has been adopted in a big way only recently in the sub-division Patti in Amritsar district. Main targets are shellac and brick kiln owners and their children, well-off shopkeepers, etc. Amounts demanded are quite big. In some cases the mediators would get the demand lowered. In some other cases hostages have been shot dead too. Targets are Hindus as well as Sikhs. On a smaller scale this has been happening since long and also in the districts of Gurdaspur and Ferozpur.

vii) Another method adopted from the days of Bhindranwale and which continues till today—though exact procedure has been varying at different times. On the basis of some complaint of someone, the complainant and the opposite party would be summoned. Decision would then be given and its implementation would be demanded under threat of liquidation. The beneficiary party or both would also be ordered to make handsome contributions.

viii) In the days of the so-called social reform movement, liquor vendors and others would be spared for considerations.

The above may not be an exhaustive list of the methods used.

It may be mentioned that not all the money goes to the 'cause'— for purchasing weapons, for paying to the recruits, etc. A number of terrorists, though not all, have used a part of the collections for themselves—for acquiring luxury items as well as for immovable properties.

A few words about the methods of recruitment.

There is the appeal of the religiosity. Also the promise of a Khalistan in which will flow rivers of milk and honey, in which nobody would be unemployed, there is also the pull of weapons and of money. Youths whose fathers do not have big landholdings get attracted easily. There are also many anti-social elements turned terrorists because that makes their job easier and also 'respectable'.

Despite all this, there is the significant fact that the number of terrorists from families of Sikh agricultural labourers, who are the poorest in the Sikh community has been negligible. Their reactions even to events like Bluestar Operation and killing of Bhindranwale were quite different from those of the landowning peasantry. I wonder where is the ground to speak of a common 'Sikh psyche'. In fact some who do, themselves make clear that by 'Sikh psyche' they mean "Jat Sikh psyche" which proposition itself can be debated.

There is also the fact that quite a number of terrorists have come from families of the rich and quite a few had even good decent jobs. The financiers and willing providers of shelter and stores for weapons and the members of the brain trust include big landlords and even some IAS, IPS, and other top officers coming from landlord families. Generally these officers are retired but the possibility of some serving ones being their comrades-in-arms cannot be ruled out. Some caught too badly

Pakistani rulers have their own axe to grind. If another Indo-Pak war takes place they can occupy parts of Amritsar and Gurdaspur districts bordering Pakistan. This way, Kashmir gets virtually cut off from India had to be dismissed.

When the terrorists are at the receiving end, recruitment goes down. When they are on top or when the security forces get orders to stay their hands, recruitment goes up. Such has been the experience at least in Amritsar district.

I know also of more than one case in which a youth got attracted, joined them, got disgusted and left them. He had to rejoin after he was told: "If you don't rejoin us, we will liquidate you as well as your family."

It is rightly said by some that one of the causes for the trouble in Punjab is the fact that at one time big majority of Punjabi Hindus flying in the face of truth denied that Punjabi was their mother tongue and instead recorded Hindi as such. This was the result of bad advice given by the then Jana Sangh as well as the Hindu Congress leaders. All this however is a part of the truth. The other part, equally wrong and damaging, is the fact that the Akali Party championed the cause of Punjabi language as if it was a part of Sikh religion and as if its development was linked with their original demand for a Sikh state and then for a Punjabi-speaking state in which Sikhs would be at least sixty per cent.

Indira Gandhi's funeral: her assassination was master-minded by the terrorists

Communalists of both hues have contributed a lot towards disruption of development of common Punjabi consciousness, of the Punjabi nationality within the great Indian nation. To reverse the process is a hard and long term job. It requires a prolonged fight not only for separation of religion and politics, or religion and state but also of religion and language, i.e. Punjabi language. Some intellectuals including a few who claim to be Left refuse to see the need of this fight or are not ready for it. They are putting forward the dangerous thesis that today Sikhs alone are true Punjabis, that Sikhs are fighting the battle of Punjabi nationality, etc.

Those who say that the Punjab problem is only a law and order problem are wrong. Equally wrong are those who consider it only as a political problem. It is both and must be tackled simultaneously at both the fronts.

Immediately following steps are needed:

1. An offensive against terrorists must be a continuous offensive without any let up till their backbone is broken. Excesses must be avoided.

2. All except the killers and their organisers out of the Jodhpur detenus must be released unconditionally.

3. Those responsible for organising anti-Sikh riots of November 1984 must be prosecuted.

4. All states including Punjab must be given more powers but no special status of any kind to it because the same will lead to a theocratic state.

5. An all party national level meeting to evolve the broadest possible consensus regarding territorial and river waters disputes. Prior to that or at the meeting all national parties must pledge that their state units will not be allowed to take contradictory stands and will be bound by the consensus. All must then go to the people of the concerned states and appeal to them to accept the same. Such a consensus will of course be arrived at keeping in view the national interests, in the spirit of give and take and without doing gross injustice to any state. This is the only way the spirit of Rajiv-Longowal Accord can be saved.

Secular and patriotic parties and groups must jointly as well as individually launch a new and powerful mass compaign at the grass root level to isolate separatist terrorists, against killings, against excesses, against the slogan of Khalistan and of Hindu Raj, for the above demands; against the misuse of religious places, against the slogan of revenge and retaliation, for separation of religion and politics, religion and state.

Of course, from joint platforms only jointly agreed issues must be taken up. There must be no attempt by anyone to exploit the joint platform against each other because that will make any joint campaign impossible.

The experience so far has shown that the organised working class, and the agricultural labourers have not only not fallen prey to separatism, extremism and even communalism. These two have actively intervened in a big way at various critical junctures and have saved the situation. Narration of that is being avoided for reasons of space. Lesson is that everything possible must be done to enhance the weight of these sections in the public and political life of the state. ●

Little wonder

■ At 58.15 cms, Gul Mohammad of Delhi is a world record holder. He has been recognised as the shortest man in the world by the Guinness Book Of World Records.

Thirty three-year-old Mohammad, who weighs only 17 kgs, will be listed in the 1991 edition of the book as the shortest living man on earth. However, for Gul, this recognition will be of little help if it does not solve his financial problems. He has recently sought financial assistance from the Government of India after trying to earn a living by selling biscuits and toffees in front of his house. The death of his father, within a few days of his birth and the subsequent remarriage of his mother, made life so difficult for Gul that he couldn't even afford to get himself educated.

Gul's tastes are simple, to say the least. He is fond of qawalis, particularly by Habid Painter and Ghulam Farid, and likes to watch cine star Amitabh Bachchan on screen.

The publishers of The Guinness Book Of World Records hope that the publicity will help to end Mohammad's monetary miseries. "We trust that his claim to fame will help in his financial dilemma and that the Indian government will help," they wrote.

■ Making robots for him is child's play. Ashish Panwar, a 16-year-old student of City Montessori School, Lucknow, has invented a multi-purpose electro-mechanical robot which gained him the honour of representing India at the Robot Olympics Competition held in Glasgow from 27 September

Young Panwar has been working on his pet project for the past one year. His dedication has paid off—his robot weighs just 60 kgs and can perform various functions such as radioactive experiments, drilling, welding and cleaning. It can also run a fast food restaurant, prepare horoscopes, solve quiz games and, what's more, is capable of listening.

For Ashish, the youngest participant in the competition, it is an achievement to be proud of.

BHOPAL: The Madhya Pradesh police have arrested a 50-year-old man who murdered a dozen persons without any reason. "I committed murders because I like killing people," Mangalia confessed to the police. His murders have never been pre-planned. A firm believer in God he doesn't remember how many murders were committed by him in Guna and Shivpuri districts in northern Madhya Pradesh. He however confessed to having committed a dozen murders since December last—The Hindustan Times, Janak Raj Laroiya, Noida (Uttar Pradesh)

BANGALORE: The Karnataka government, which has reserved seats for women in the zilla parishads and mandal panchayats might have to make arrangements for looking after their children, atleast on the days of the meetings, since the women members find it difficult to look after their families and discharge their responsibilities (as members of the decentralised bodies) at the same time. A woman member of the Bangalore rural zilla parishad, Mrs Kalpana, brought her four-year-old son to a meeting of the parishad. The child was playing and running about in the parishad hall even as the meeting was going on. However, the members seemed to enjoy the presence of the child—The Hindu, S. STAR PARTNERS: SCORPIO—AQUARIUS

Tense moments will be eased when the Scorpio woman realises that the Aquarius man regards her as a good friend as well as his lover. This will make their relationship stronger.

At your service, sir

You can't fault Chimanbhai Patel on his shrewd political sense. Well aware that his survival—and that of his government—depends on his coalition partner, the BJP, the Gujarat chief minister has decided on keeping the party in good humour.

Chimanbhai Patel: placating the BJP

So, it came as no surprise when the CM capitulated to the BJP in the small matter of the bandh it was threatening to call, if some party sympathisers held during communal rioting were not freed within 24 hours.

Well before the deadline expired, all the accused were let off.

That's not all. After the cars of a few BJP ministers were involved in road accidents, they asked Patel to ensure that their vehicles were fitted with wireless sets (though it isn't terribly clear how that would help).

The ever-obliging chief minister immediately complied with the request.

One good turn...?

Whatever else the Konkan Railway project may achieve, it has certainly brought Sharad Pawar and Abdul Rehman Antulay much closer.

Apparently, George Fernandes had omitted to invite Antulay to the function that marked the beginning of work on the project, on Madhu Dandavate's request. The finance minister, an MP from the Konkan like Antulay, had made it clear that he would not participate in any event, which the former Maharashtra chief minister was associated with.

But Antulay was not to be put off so easily. He approached chief minister Pawar to ask him a favour: could he please have him invited to the do?

A few quiet words with George Fernandes later, Pawar managed just that.

And a grateful Antulay took the mike at the function to inform the CM that he would work with him to strengthen Rajiv Gandhi's hands, while the Dal ministers, Dandavate (yes, he was persuaded to attend) and Fernandes looked on utterly bemused.

But the event set off rumours which had nothing to do with their pique.

Instead, the gossip mill had it that Pawar and Antulay had arrived at a quid pro quo arrangement. According to this, Antulay would withdraw his demand—now pending with the state Governor—for the prosecution of Pawar for his alleged involvement in the Vasai-Virar land scandal.

In turn, the CM would go slow on the corruption case the government had instituted against Antulay.

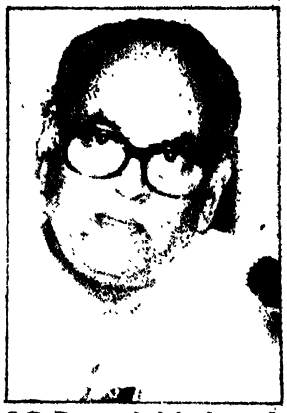
How they rate at the Tau's court in exile

Ranjit Singh: His stock has been rising steadily ever since the Chaudhary realised that Chautala had become a liability. Devi Lal even called up L.K. Advani to ask that the BJP support his second-born for election to the Rajya Sabha. And now that Singh is an MP, his rating has improved even further.

Om Prakash Chautala: His importance has declined at the same rate as Ranjit Singh's has increased. Though Devi Lal is still very fond of him on a personal level, he no longer relies on him as far asis party politics go.



Jagdeep Dhankad: He was the only minister to quit the government to protest the sacking of Lal. Of course, the Raja didn't accept his resignation, but his credentials in the Tau's camp were established. These days, he occupies himself by giving interviews abusing V.P. Singh and praising the Chaudhary, and Lal is properly grateful.

Nuksum Singh: His place in the Tau's camp is secure: he obeys all instructions (of Devi Lal, Om Prakash Chautala, Ranjit Singh and whoever else who sees fit to issue writs). Small wonder then that Lal went out of his way to ensure the survival of his government.

K.K. Deepak: Lost both the Rajya Sabha seat and the ambassador's post in Seychelles. Is now back to playing the loyal assistant of Devi Lal, his political ambitions having died a premature death.

Deputy PM? Why not!

Obviously, the brief spell of glory he enjoyed while the Janata Dal crisis was at its height, has gone to S.R. Bommai's head. For, the Dal president has begun entertaining

At a recent press conference in Bangalore, Bommai was asked, half in jest, whether he was slated to be the next deputy prime minister.

But, no, the party president didn't dismiss the suggestion out of hand.

Instead, he announced in his grandest manner: "That is for the Prime Minister to decide."

The hacks are still trying to work out that one. ●

Halt! Who goes there?

It's one thing when the hoi polloi is held up by the progress of the Prime Minister's cavalcade. And yet another when a minister is similarly inconvenienced.

Recently, minister of state for home affairs, Subodh Kant Sahay, left his North Block office to drive to an urgent meeting. But even before he had journeyed half a kilometre, his car was stopped by a traffic constable. An indignant Sahay popped his head out of the window to ask what the hell he thought he was doing.

The Prime Minister was to come this way in a short while, he was informed, and he would have to wait until VP had driven past.

A fuming Sahay had no alternative but to comply.

But he didn't let the matter be, lodging an official protest with senior police officers. The erring constable was summoned by the higher-ups, who berated him for holding up Sahay.

But what could I do, asked the unfortunate man. Given a choice between the Prime Minister and an ordinary minister, whom should I have given preference to?

The officers saw the point.

Tikait means trouble

Devi Lal may have been marginalised for the moment, but that does not mean that Ajit Singh can pass himself off as the new Jat messiah. For, the Bharatiya Kisan Union (BKU) leader, Mahendra Singh Tikait, has announced his intentions of competing for the post.

Tikait has taken to organising meetings in Ajit Singh's constituency, criticising the industry minister and asking that the Mandal recommendations be rejected out of hand by the Dal government.

If that is not done, Tikait threatens he will stop the supply of milk and vegetables to Delhi, and starve V.P. Singh into seeing sense.

But Ajit Singh is the immediate target. The BKU leader has announced that in the next parliamentary poll (which shouldn't be too far off) he intends to field Vishwendra Singh, the Janata Dal MP who resigned after the Mandal recommendations were implemented, against Singh in Baghpat.

If Tikait does pit his forces against Ajit Singh, the industry minister may well find the going tough.

The Ayodhya issue, and the BJP leadership

■ A.B. Vajpayee: Is keen to avoid a confrontation with the government on this issue, even though he is all for the construction of the temple. Hence, he adopted a soft line at the meeting of the Committee on Promotion of Communal Harmony. (See item : above.)

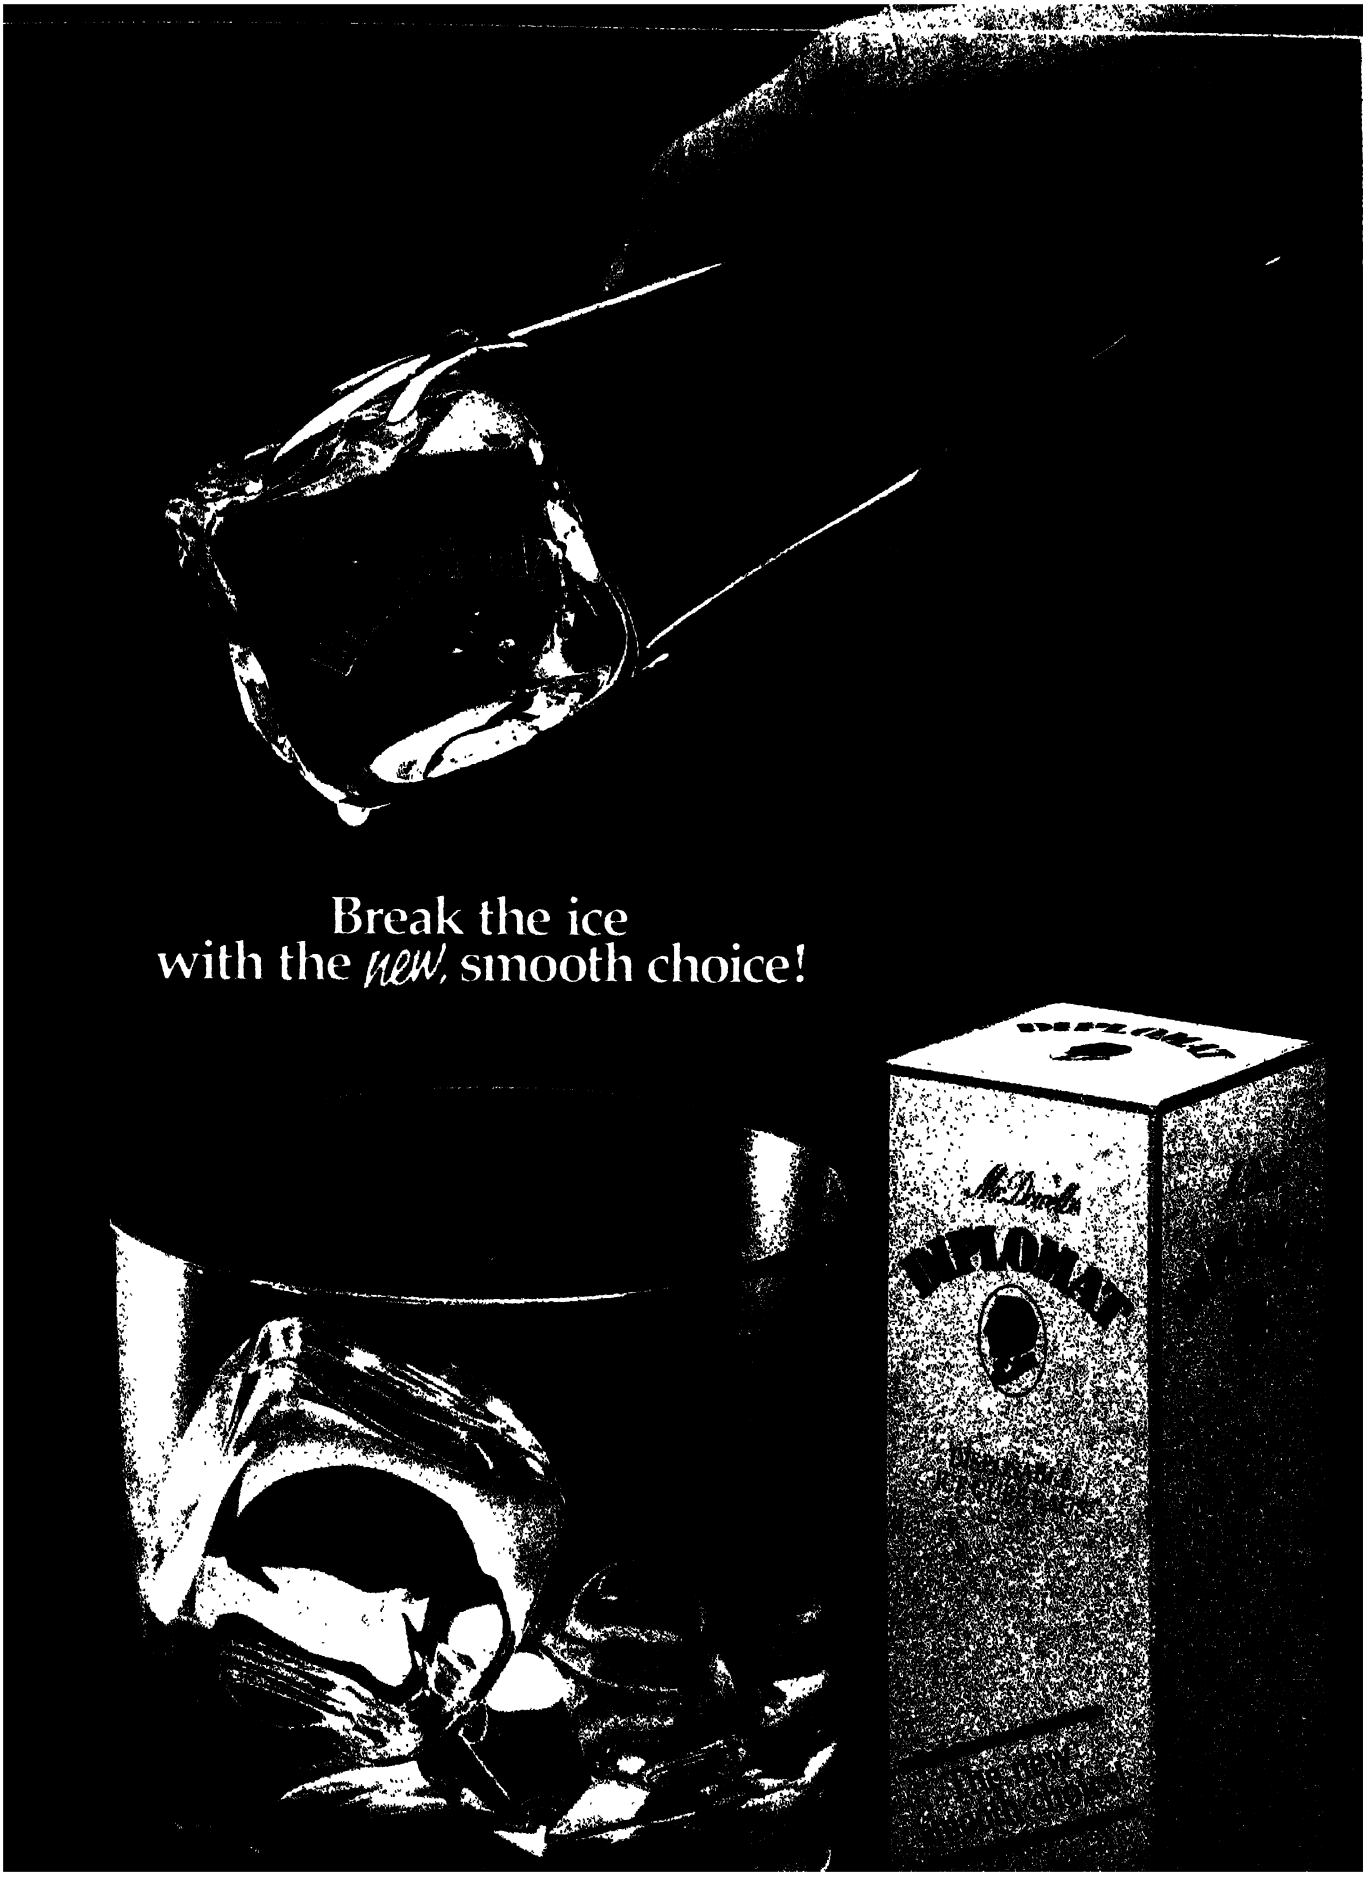
■ M.M. Joshi: Tipped as the next president of the BJP, Joshi is an old Allahabad crony of V.P. Singh (and had even taught him briefly), and is, therefore, loath to provoke the Raja on this issue—or any other, for that matter.

■ L.K. Advani: Leads the hardliner brigade. Has been insisting from the very beginning that no court decision can solve the dispute. The temple will be built on schedule, come what may.

■ Vijayaraje Scindia: Begins every meeting with a chaupal from the Ramayan, convinced as she is that everyone must, as a matter of course, be a Ram bhakt. Is one of the most voluble supporters of the Ayodhya temple, and even exhorts Muslims to join her cause. After all, wasn't Babar just another Mughal aggressor.

No harmony here



While the government has turned very coy about revealing the names of those who leaked the proceedings of the Committee on Promotion of Communal Harmony, and misrepresented the view of the Bharatiya Janata Party, leading to Atal Behari Vajpayee's resignation, the BJP is far from being equally circumspect.

A.B. Vajpayee: resigning in protest

According to the party the culprits are none other than Rafiq Zakaria, Kishore Kunal and Ram Mohan Rao.

And the BJP is not going to forgive them in a hurry.

Caste politics

The cover story (Caste war!, 16—22 September) was informative. It reflected on the unprecedented chaos following the release of the Mandal Commission Report. The caste hierarchy has been an impediment to the progress of Indian society from time immemorial. Dr Ambedkar advocated the liberty of the oppressed classes, unlike Mahatma Gandhi, who alienated them from the mainstream of the society by giving special facilities to them.

The political failure of the Prime Minister and his rift with his deputy has shaken the confidence of the former. It is very unfortunate that after 41 years of Independence, India has a Prime Minister who does not believe in a casteless society.

Harekrushna Mahanta, New Delhi

■ The write-up on the Mandal Commission Report is really commendable. The two Union ministers Sharad Yadav and Ram Vilas Paswan have unleashed a caste war in the country by their provocative statements. The government which has failed to solve the Punjab and Kashmir problems, is trying to refurbish its image by advocating reservation. But it is a proven fact that by providing reservation, the lot of the backwards cannot be improved. If the government is really sincere about its reservation policy, then they should implement it along economic lines.

And, this seems to be a desperate bid by the V.P. Singh government to stay in power at all costs. And his volte-face from clean, value-based politics to a caste-based one only spoils the entire social and moral fabric of the nation.

Rajiv Varshney, New Delhi

■ The Mandal Commission Report is full of contradictions. The issue has been dragged out of cold storage only for selfish political gains and not for the betterment of the society. The major problems plaguing the country such as Punjab, Kashmir and Assam tangles have been shelved while the issue of reservation has been given the topmost priority. As a result every section of the society is suffering and there seem to be no end in sight to the caste war which has been unleashed.

R.K. Gulati, Siliguri (West Bengal)

■ The article on the Mandal Commission was a bold appraisal of the National Front's policy. It is surprising that it should have taken a decision on such a crucial issue without consulting the other parties, especially when it is a minority government. And by deciding to implement the report, the government has managed to create a rift among different sections of the people. Sadly, apart from helping a few politicians, the recommendations will not be of much help to the backward classes. So, it is time the government changed its decision.

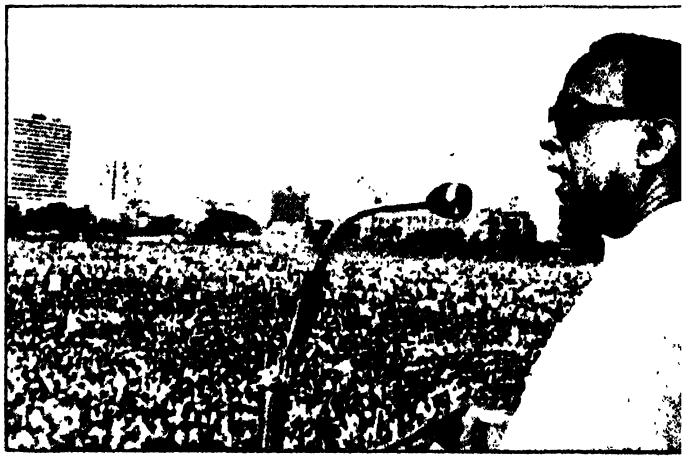
Sanjaya Kumar Sahoo, Sambalpur (Orissa)

Anti-reservationists in Delhi: against a caste-based society

The root cause

The write-up (The Mandal bungle, 16—22 September) has raised an important question. If it is the anti-reservationists today, then it will be the pro-reservationists tomorrow—and the problem will never be solved. The caste war cannot be stopped simply by criticising Mandal. The targets of attack should be ignorance, illiteracy, poverty, unemployment and the caste system.

A. Jacob Sahayam, Thiruvanathapuram (Kerala)



The fading red

The special report (Basu's Bengal, 16—22 September) was a timely assessment of the state of affairs in West Bengal. Never before since 1977, had the Congress(I) managed to mobilise such a show of strength against the Marxists as it did recently. The common man's anger against the chronic power crisis, non-availability of kerosene and cooking gas, and the sudden hike in transport fares turned the Congress' siege of the Writers' Buildings into a resounding success. Though chief minister Jyoti Basu does not attach much importance to these warning signals, it is becoming clear that the support base of the Marxists is being fast eroded.

Chiranjib Haldar, New Delhi

■ During the 13 years of Marxist rule, West Bengal has not progressed much. The crippling power crisis just doesn't seem to ease—and the government can do very little about it. The law and order situation in the state is fast deteriorating for the communists have become a law unto themselves. Besides, women are also being threatened. Instead of correcting the situation, the state government is carrying out its dictatorial policies and is showing little regard for those who do not see eye to eye. And unless the Marxists mend their ways, Jyoti Basu may have to vacate Writers' Buildings.

L. Rohini, Trichy (Tamil Nadu)

Back to the dark ages

The assault on Mamata Banerjee (A city stalled, 26 August—1 September) by CPI(M) cadres, clearly depicts the style of functioning of the West Bengal government. This shameful incident which had never happened in the past, makes women feel insecure. It is really surprising that the National Front government kept mum over the incident. The spontaneous response to the bandh called by the Congress(I) shows that the popularity of the Marxists is on the decline

B. Nithyananda Rao, Tezpur (Assam)

Wrong facts

In the article (Doordarshan Pvt. Ltd?, 2—8 September), it was mentioned that "even in far away Sikkim the ruling party uses the antenna to watch foreign shows". This is absolutely incorrect and baseless. Incidentally, the ruling party, Sikkim Sangram Parishad, has no antenna to watch foreign programmes. One hopes that the reporter concerned would check and cross-check facts before making such a statement.

K.N. Pulgar, secretary, Sikkim Sangram Parishad, Gangtok (Sikkim)

Censored!

The article (Manch ado about nothing, 2—8 September) seems to trivialise an issue of public importance. All educated and conscious citizens of this country can see for themselves how pre-election promises are being broken one after the other by the Dal. Now it seems ridiculous that the people used to criticise the Rajiv regime for giving no freedom to Doordarshan. The present government's track record is no better than the previous one's.

For instance, the Khula Manch programme, which featured George Fernandes was 'censored' and not 'edited' by Doordarshan as P. Upendra would have it. Fernandes, a seasoned campaigner, certainly knew the score and he wouldn't have said anything to embarrass the Prime Minister. People might, out of curiosity, ask questions which are technically not under the purview of his department, such as on reservation and the industrial policy. But there's no harm in that.

The fact is that though the government is raising a hue and cry over the proposed autonomy of Doordarshan, it still wields a whip over the electronic media.

Deepali Sinha, Patna (Bihar)

P. Upendra: under fire

■ The railway minister, George Fernandes, has reasons to feel upset over the attitude of his colleague P. Upendra, the minister for information, who recently censored parts of the former's interview in the Khula Manch programme of Doordarshan. As a Union minister Fernandes had the right to talk on subjects relating to other departments of the government as well.

K.V. Rajagopalan, Madras (Tamil Nadu)

■ The write-up on Doordarshan raises some vital questions. Khula Manch should retain basic parameters to make it more interesting and sharp. An open discussion with the concerned minister does give it an air of frankness. But once censorship is allowed under the camouflage of editing, the very purpose is defeated. The authorities should see to it that the name of the programme is vindicated through their actions.

Anjan Ray, Durgapur (West Bengal)

Beyond the border

It's high time India took note of Pakistan's statements on Kashmir

Our internal woes—Mandal, mandir, the mess in Kashmir, Punjab and Assam and so on—are doubtless great and growing. But surely that is no reason to ignore or neglect crucial problems of foreign policy and security which, unless handled with skill and sophistication, could explode into our faces. And yet so complete is the government's preoccupation with the burning consequences of the hasty and motivated decision to Mandalise India that no one in authority in New Delhi has any time for issues of diplomacy and defence.

On the contrary, the army is being called out in aid of civil authority to quell the mounting fury of the anti-Mandal agitation from one corner of north India to the other. Obviously, secessionists and terrorists in Kashmir and Punjab, to say nothing of their Pakistani mentors, are absolutely delighted. To drag the army into political disputes and rioting in the streets is wrong even at the best of times. To do so with alarming frequency, as has sometimes been the case, is madness. But to convert the pernicious practice into an almost daily routine, as seems to be happening now, is nothing short of suicidal folly.

In this context, it is all the more regrettable that even the speech at the UN by the Pakistani foreign minister, Sahibzada Yaqub Ali Khan, on Kashmir, which was vile, vicious, venomous and ominous, has not attracted the attention it deserved. In fact, this speech was reminiscent of the fulminations at the same forum four decades earlier by Zafarullah Khan just before he belatedly admitted that regular Pakistani troops were fighting in Kashmir and that the previous talk of only tribal raids was a facade.

The Sahibzada is a cultured man. Though he has given a demonstration of his capacity for rhetorical excesses in January, the virulence of his latest performance did cause a surprise as he descended fairly close to the verbal vulgarity of the former Pakistani foreign secretary, Tanvir Ahmed, who has earned the sobriquet "Tanvir the terrible".

The BBC reported from New York on the day of the exchanges between Indian and Pakistani spokesmen at Turtle Bay, that the Indian delegation had been "taken aback" by the vehemence of the Sahibzada's attack on India. If so, the delegation and its advisers, official and non-official, must be living in a paradise of their own making. Anyone with even a modicum of understanding of Pakistan must know that the Pakistani ruling establishment—dominated by the army of which the Sahibzada has never ceased to be a part despite his retirement, in the early Seventies, as a lieutenant-general—is convinced that it has got a golden opportunity to grab from India the Valley it has lusted for so long. All Pakistani words and deeds are going to be geared to this objective until the Pakistani dream either turns into a nightmare or is abandoned. Not to base Indian policy on this stark reality is dereliction of duty. This is not a plea for war. No one should have any illusion that the problem can be solved by war. But the message needs to be delivered to the Sahibzada and his cohorts that Pakistan cannot go on with what it is doing in Kashmir.

There are other linkages with Pakistan's bellicosity, both verbal and on the ground, which should not be lost sight of. Pakistan is going to earn more American gratitude by its readiness to provide military manpower to the US-sponsored security dispensation in the Gulf. There will be no Pakistani quid without an American quo. Those in this country who were drawing much comfort from reports from Washington that Americans were twisting Pakistan's arm over free and fair elections in that country and, more significantly, over the Pakistani nuclear activity must be rather disappointed. For, sources close to George Bush have made it clear that Pakistan would get from him the annual certificate of nuclear innocence even though the US administration knows that Pakistanis have all but built the bomb.

It is regrettable that even the vile and vicious speech of the Pak foreign minister, Sahibzada Yaqub Ali Khan, at the UN on Kashmir has not attracted the attention it deserved

Let there be no mistake about it. The Sahibzada would almost certainly have gone also to the Security Council if the world was not so preoccupied with the Gulf. Immediately after spouting poison at the General Assembly, he has raised Kashmir at the Organisation of Islamic Conference (OIC) group meeting in New York. At his persuasion, the foreign ministers of Turkey and Iran included the Kashmir issue in their speeches to the General Assembly. The Turkish minister confined himself to saying that the matter should be solved by India and Pakistan in accordance with the Shimla Agreement and the relevant UN resolution. •

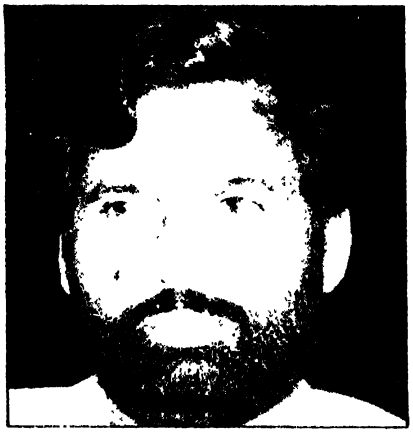
The Supreme Court stay on the Mandal report gives V.P. Singh a miraculous breather to begin a dialogue

"Never raise your voice," a seasoned cocktail party orator once told me, "it is the first sign that you are losing the argument." In the Mandal battle, voices have been raised to a feverish pitch and the debris of a debate that never saw the light of reasoned exchange is scattered all around.



To be fair, most of the sound, fury and thunder has come from the anti-reservationists. The hostility of a wise commentator like Girilal Jain, who compares V.P. Singh to M.A. Jinnah, was to be expected. And to a certain extent, the virulence of the campaign mounted by the Indian Express, given the background of its editor and the political inclinations of its proprietors, should not come as a surprise. However, when newspapers such as The Hindu and The Times of India, and 'balanced' magazines like India Today compete with the Express in printing expletives aimed at the Prime Minister, it is time to sit up and ponder over the course this controversy has taken.

We must be grateful to the pro-reservationists for having kept their powder dry. Mr Ram Vilas Paswan and Sharad Yadav did initially warn that they would give a 'fitting reply' if the agitators did not get off the streets, but wiser counsels seem to have prevailed. Despite huge provocations, the 'backward' leaders have not yet called out their battalions, nor has the rhetoric of Messrs Paswan and Yadav kept pace with that of M.S. Tikait and Bal Thackeray. Whatever we may think of reservations and its champions, we would be less than honest if we did not concede that those in favour have shown a maturity and restraint one did not suspect they possessed.

Is it possible, then, that amidst all this heat and dust we have lost sight of the original argument? V.P. Singh is not known to lose his temper—no instances of the Raja shouting and screaming in public are on record—but recently, aboard an Indian Air Force plane, he did flare up while talking to reporters, charging the press with deliberately and maliciously distorting his and the government's position on Mandal. The Prime Minister went to the extent of accusing his principal information officer of organising 'disasters' instead of press conference, but he soon recovered his poise and apologised to the journalist at the receiving end of his ire. Nevertheless, the uncharacteristic outburst did reveal V.P. Singh's frustration at not being able to get a debate on the specifics of Mandal off the ground. The whole issue has got so surcharged with emotion-filled hate about possible damage to the unity and integrity of the republic in the decades to come, that no one has bothered to ask if all the apprehensions are justified. Will the quotas inflict an irreparable body blow to Indian society?

Jobs and degrees obsess the youth of this country. So, in the context of Mandal let us look at the former first. There are no reliable figures from any authoritative institute, but government sources and pro-quota advocates claim that only 40,000 jobs are at stake and most of these are at the bottom of the scale. Is the figure reliable? Since the number has been bandied about for at least six weeks, and since none of the anti-Mandalites have disputed it, one must assume that it is roughly accurate. Alas, such is V.P. Singh's discomfiture over the whole Mandal business that he has been unable to focus the nation's attention on this salient statistic.

Neither has he had any success with capitalising on the significant concessions his government has made since 7 August. Sensitive and critical areas of national life—science and technology, space, atomic energy, the armed forces—have been excluded from the purview of the recommendations. Moreover, promotions will continue being decided on the basis of merit. Technically, therefore, anxieties in Malabar Hill and Golf Links about, "whose finger on the button?" should have been assuaged. They haven't, principally because this aspect of the new policy remains blurred and undiscussed, thanks largely to the antics of Ram Vilas Paswan and Sharad Yadav did initially warn that they would give a 'fitting reply' if the agitators did not get off the streets. But wiser counsel seems to have prevailed. Despite provocations, they have not yet called out their battalions goons from Haryana and western UP.

Perhaps the most crucial concession (the government prefers to call it a 'clarification') has been made in the area of admissions to educational institutions. As things stand today, the 27 per cent extra quota does not apply to admissions at all. So, why are students immolating themselves over an issue that has no direct bearing on their future? Of course, our youth are not so blinkered so as to have no vision beyond their monthly pay cheque, but their original and most pressing objection to Mandal revolved around entry into colleges and universities. I am not sure how many of those, now brandishing hockey sticks and burning buses, are aware that the new quotas play no role in their efforts to obtain a higher education.

Doubtless, it is not easy to concentrate people's minds on facts when apocalyptic visions of a divided and sick society in which caste is ranged against caste are being conjured up. The latest demand by over 60 Janata Dal MPs, including 15 ministers, pleading for the inclusion of Jats and seven other castes in the list of socially and educationally backward communities only adds fuel to fire and makes rational discussion of Mandal even more problematic. Arguably, at this rate, with the exception of the Brahmins, the whole of Hindu India will be declared backward. The Prime Minister is going to have a tough time resisting the demand as its prime mover is Ajit Singh—a minister whose support is vital for Vishwanath Pratap Singh's survival.

Fresh pressures to wriggle into the magic list notwithstanding, the Supreme Court stay on the Mandal report provides a heaven sent opportunity for all round cooling of tempers. Already, there are signs that the heat is being taken off the agitations in various states, and in a week the students should be back to their normal business. The time, therefore, to begin a dialogue is now. Quite frankly, I cannot see this, or any other, government reneging on the 27 per cent commitment. Having been offered once, it cannot be put back into cold storage. What can and should be done is to refine the recommendations so that inconsistencies are ironed out, doubts removed and ambiguities cleared.

Above all, the full, final and true facts on how implementation will affect those fortunate to be included and those unfortunate to have missed out must be presented to the nation. This task should be relatively easy since data is to be collected only in respect of direct recruitment to the central services, public sector undertakings and nationalised banks. Perhaps the government could bring out a White Paper on the rationale behind quotas for OBCs in general and their impact on the job market in particular. We might find the figure of 40,000 fraudulent, but at least ignorance on a vital aspect will have been removed and citizens can then fashion their response, reasonably certain that they are well-informed as they make up their minds.

How many students, now brandishing hockey sticks, are aware that the new quotas, passed by V.P. Singh, play no role in their efforts to obtain a higher education?

The Supreme Court will take at least until the end of the year before it pronounces on the proposed legislation. So, there is enough time to construct the framework of a debate that attracts the widest possible participation. V.P. Singh has only himself to blame for the horrible press he has received. The case for reservations was put together with all the skill of a novice apprentice. There have been so many clarifications/concessions since 7 August that only a handful understand exactly what the dispute is all about. A vague feeling persists on one side that reservations will destroy the nation's emotional integration. While on the other there is an equally vague feeling that 'centuries-old exploitation' will suddenly vanish. Both impressions are not only simplistic but dangerously overstated.

Instead of shouting from the rooftops that a constitutional amendment be passed in the next session of Parliament to prevent the judiciary from obstructing 'progressive legislation', V P. Singh and members of his Cabinet should concentrate on using the next three months doing what they should have done in the three months prior to the day of the momentous announcement. They must accept that the Supreme Court intervention gives the country a miraculous breather during which the government should set out to convince and agree to be convinced on the merits of the controversial proposals.

The received wisdom is that the Surpeme Court has let the PM 'off the hook'. Indeed, there are suggestions that the apex court has colluded with the executive to arrive at a verdict that saved a tottering regime. Whether the court's intervention was hasty or unwise or shameful is for the legal pundits to decide. The Prime Minister, meanwhile, should use the coming 90 days to shed the Ayatollah image he has recently acquired. The real V.P. Singh governed by consensus, not fiat. It is that V.P. Singh the nation needs.●

Anger and outrage

Did the Chief Justice receive proper medical attention?

At around 8 am on 20 September, the doctor on duty at London's Heathrow airport, Dr Jayshree Datta, received urgent summons from one of the terminals. The anxious caller informed Ms Datta that the Chief Justice of India, Sabyasachi Mukharji, who had just come in from Washington, had fallen ill. The doctor promptly reached Justice Mukharji near the VIP lounge, who by then had collapsed and was frothing at the mouth.

Dr Datta diagnosed the disease as diabetes and treated Mukharji with a couple of sugar cubes—the routine treatment given to diabetic patients. Justice Mukharji regained his vigour and left the airport with his London hosts, solicitor Anita Bose and her husband. But as it turned out later, the Heathrow doctor had made a serious mistake in detecting the illness. At the Bose's home in north-west London, Sabyasachi Mukharji collapsed once again. He was rushed to the nearby Royal Free Hospital, where the Chief Justice suffered two major heart attacks on 24 and 25 September. The second one proved to be fatal: Sabyasachi Mukharji died in the early hours of Tuesday, 25 September. Tragic though it may be, the death of a 63-year-old person from heart attack is not unusual. But what made the incident controversial was the circumstances in which the Chief Justice breathed his last, neglected by doctors, and more shockingly by the staff of the Indian High Commission. On her return from London, a grieving Ratna Mukharji, Sabyasachi Mukharji's wife, complained to Prime Minister V.P. Singh and President R. Venkataraman about the behaviour of an expatriate doctor attached to the Indian High Commission in London, who had reportedly refused to treat the Chief Justice.

The issue was also raised in Parliament, which met for a brief session in the beginning of October. Angry members of all the parties demanded that the high commissioner in London, Kuldip Nayar, be recalled and a proper enquiry into the matter ordered. Though the external affairs minister, I.K. Gujral, promptly ordered a judicial probe into the death of the Chief Justice, he turned down the proposal to sack Kuldip Nayar. The minister, also ruled out the possibility of the high commissioner being asked to go on leave while the enquiry was being conducted.

Sabyasachi Mukharji arrived in London on the morning of 20 September on his way back to India from a private lecture tour in Washington. He was received at the airport by his friends and Dhirendra Singh, a senior diplomat with the Indian High Commission. Mukharji slumped immediately after and was treated for diabetes by the airport doctor. But soon after Justice Mukharji reached his hosts' residence in Hampstead, he complained of chest pains and collapsed near the toilet

Sensing trouble, Anita Bose, a friend of the Chief Justice, immediately got in touch with Dr Amar Singh Rayan, a physician on the Indian High Commission's panel of doctors. Rayan, however, curtly told Bose that he was busy and could not attend Justice Mukharji. Bose then called her house doctor, Emma Mukherjee, who gave the ailing Chief Justice an insulin injection and advised immediate hospitalisation. Justice Mukharji was rushed to the nearby Royal Free Hospital. It was only then that the Indian high commissioner, Kuldip Nayar, and his deputy, Salman Haider, came to know of Sabyasachi Mukharji's illness from Dhirendra Singh. Nayar, incidentally, was himself recovering from a hernia operation in a London clinic.

At the casualty ward of the Royal Free Hospital Mukharji was subjected to routine checks: chest X-Ray, and blood and urine tests. By now, Haider and Singh had reached the hospital. The tests over, Justice Mukharji was made to wait in the "corridor" while the India House staff, according to the Chief Justice's friends, merely looked on helplessly. In fact, Sabyasachi Mukharji's wife had to perform the duties of a nurse during this period as there was no hospital staff to attend the Chief Justice of India. "If the Chief Justice of Britain would have fallen ill in India, all the best doctors in Delhi would have been by his side," an exasperated Mukharji told his wife and friends while lying in the hospital "corridor", patiently waiting for a proper room to move in to.

At around 8 pm, Sabyasachi Mukharji was finally shifted to a cubicle upstairs, and at 9.30 pm, Dr Amar Singh Rayan, the High Commission's doctor, arrived at the hospital—a full 11 hours after being called on an emergency. What happened next was even more shocking. When the Chief Justice told the doctor that he was late, Rayan blew up in a rage and shouted back. "I am not on the High Commission's payroll." And he stormed out of the ward saying that he would not treat "rude patients". Mukharji's friends, who were all present during the incident, said that Dr Rayan's behaviour shocked the English doctors of the hospital.

The next day, 21 September, Justice Mukharji was admitted to the intensive care unit and examined by two senior cardiologists. Both recommended an operation. But on 24 September, Mukharji suffered a second heart attack—the first one was at the Heathrow airport—and yet another one the next day. And the Chief Justice finally succumbed to the third attack on 25 September.

The Indian High Commission in London was quick to react. It promptly sacked Dr Amar Singh. Said Kuldip Nayar: "I have removed Dr Rayan from the High Commission's panel of doctors and pulled up the negligent officers." But what about the allegations that a person as important as the Chief Justice of India was shabbily treated by India House? Said Nayar: "There is no truth in the charges that there had been a delay in informing the hospital that the High Commission would bear his expenses. We told them who the patient was and they gave him a bed as soon as they could. It isn't true either that Justice Mukharji was lying in the 'corridor'. It was part of the casualty ward," Nayar argued.

Said Kuldip Nayar, the Indian high commissioner: "There is no truth in the charge that there had been a delay in informing the hospital that the High Commission would bear all the expenses"

But why wasn't Justice Sabyasachi Mukharji taken to a private hospital, where it would have been fairly easy to get beds? The high commissioner said that the decision to take the Chief Justice to the Royal Free Hospital was taken by his hosts in London. "Even in private clinics it is not as if there are doctors all the time in attendance. You have to wait there as well."

Sources at India House feel that timely and proper treatment could have been given to the Chief Justice had the airport doctor correctly diagnosed the illness. But as Dr Jayshree Datta argued, "At no stage did Sabyasachi Mukharji complain of chest pain. All he told me was that he was feeling a little dizzy. And since I came to know from his wife that Mukharji had diabetes, I thought it best to treat him for that disease."

The Royal Free Hospital authorities, too, dismissed charges of negligence. Director Andrew Dillon told SUNDAY that the hospital was ready to investigate the treatment given to the Indian Chief Justice only if his family complained to him in writing. "We do not investigate for the media. If Mrs Mukharji is unhappy about the treatment given to her husband, she should say so in writing and we will look into the matter. We will be in direct touch with the family and deal with them directly," Dillon said.

It remains with the authorities in Delhi to take it up from there. ●

TRYING TIMES

Nepal prepares a new democratic Constitution but differences within the government hold up its promulgation

When Prime Minister Krishna Prasad Bhattarai's interim government was sworn in a few months ago, it had essentially two main responsibilities. First, to oversee the preparation and promulgation of a new Constitution, which would convert Nepal from a monarchy into a multi-party democracy. And second, to hold free and fair elections under it.

But lately, it appears as if Bhattarai's coalition government—comprising the Nepali Congress and the seven communist party United Left Front (ULF)—may have its own problems in fulfilling its first duty. The preparation of the new Constitution is no longer a problem—the draft was readied after intensive deliberations and submitted for approval to King Birendra last month. But differences over (and opposition to) the draft Constitution have raised fears about its promulgation. Admits a communist party leader: "At best, these problems may cause a delay in its promulgation. At worst, they may threaten our quest for a full-fledged, multi-party democracy."

When the draft Constitution—which was prepared by the CRC, a committee comprised mainly of Nepali Congress and ULF members— was submitted to King Birendra on 10 September, there were some apprehensions that he would not approve it. Which monarch would accept a political order under which his powers are severely curtailed? the argument went In the end, Birendra neither okayed nor rejected the draft. He sent it to Prime Minister Bhattarai asking him to consult the various political parties in order to achieve a consensus on the draft's provisions.

The King's detractors believe that the move is a ploy to delay the Constitution's promulgation. Rumours that he is trying to buy time in order to unite the anti-democratic forces and stage a comeback are rife in Kathmandu. But possible opposition

MIN BAJRACHARYA

KRISHNA PRASAD BHATTARAI

"The army wants to be under the King"

SUNDAY: Is the promulgation of the new Constitution being delayed because of opposition from the army and police?

K.P. Bhattarai: Well, that is the reason...there are certain problems that have to be sorted out.

Q: Like what?

A: Like the control of the army. In the proposed Constitution,we have said that there will be a security council headed by the Prime Minister. The commander-in-chief of the army, a few defence personnel, a nominee of the King, the defence minister and the home minister will also be there. The committee will guide the operations of the army.

The army will have a lot of freedom as far as logistics and other things are concerned. But it will be under civilian control.

Q: And the army refuses to accept this?

A: Well, they have not exactly accepted or disapproved. It is not a question of non-acceptance or rejection. But they are murmuring that they do not want the security council. Rather, that they want to from pro-Birendra parties are not the only problem that must worry Bhattarai. For, there are differences even between the Nepali Congress and its junior coalition partner, the ULF, over the draft's provisions.

The major problem concerns foreign treaties. While the ULF (which is extremely sensitive about entering into agreements which concern Nepal's security) feels that all treaties should be ratified by a two-thirds parliamentary majority, the Nepali Congress believes this will pose enormous practical difficulties. Says the NC's supreme leader Ganesh Man Singh: "If such a clause exists, then no treaties will be signed. First, it will have to be introduced into Parliament. Then, discussions will be held which may cause unnecessary delays. Treaties should be passed by a simple majority."

The ULF also has reservations over the clause which renders the basic features of the Constitution unalterable. There is a suspicion that this objection relates mainly to one 'basic' or 'unalterable' feature—that is, the clause which deems Nepal a constitutional monarchy. Privately, the ULF has always made out that it is opposed to the concept of a constitutional monarchy. And that its willingness to settle for such an order stemmed from tactical and not from ideological reasons.

Publicly, the ULF argues that it is against any framework that is rigid and not open to revision. Says the Front's president Sahana Pradhan: "We have accepted the basic structure of the Constitution. But there are times when we have to make amendments. Our opinion is that nothing is unchangeable. The very word should not be mentioned."

Ganesh Man Singh,
NC supreme leader

Believes that once differences with the ULF are sorted out, the King will have no choice but to accept the Constitution

Sahana Pradhan,
ULF president

Accepts the basic structure of the Constitution but feels that it must not be rigid but open to revision

As Prime Minister Bhattarai points out, these differences are not insurmountable and can be ironed over with consultation and compromise. One solution to the 'treaties' problem that may emerge is an agreement that some treaties—that is, those which do not relate to contentious issues such as Nepal's sovereignty—are passed by a simple parliamentary majority. Says Ganesh Man Singh: "How can we blame the King? We have to come to an understanding with our leftist friends. Once we do that, the King has no choice but to accept the Constitution."

A bigger problem, however, is likely to be the attitude of the army which has traditionally been opposed to reform. Most of its senior officers remain loyal to the King and those who represented the old political order. When the draft Constitution was being prepared, the CRC received numerous unsolicited letters from various army units stating that the force did not want to act on the directive of the Cabinet but rather that of the King. As a possible compromise, the draft Constitution placed the army under the control of the National Defence Committee—headed by the Prime Minister and comprising the home minister, a few defence personnel and a nominee of the King.

Apparently, the army is opposed to this suggestion and, according to Bhattarai, its opposition is the main reason for the delay in the promulgation of the Constitution. Given that the force commands the support of very influential people in Nepal, the Prime Minister will have to find a way of winning it over if the new Constitution is to sail through.

Sandwiched as he is between right-wing forces opposed to reform and leftists who are demanding unacceptable changes, Bhattarai has his work cut out. The introduction of the new Constitution may be the last step in the democratic movement's long and painful march towards a multi-party system. But it may not be an easy one and nobody needs to be reminded of the difference between taking it and stumbling. • remain under the King. Hence the delay in the promulgation.

Q: What powers will the King enjoy?

A: He will enjoy certain powers no doubt. He will have every right to information. He will be apprised of all the developments in the country. He will also have certain emergency powers, which he can exercise only on the advice of the Prime Minister and Cabinet.

Q: Any special responsibilities?

A: Yes, of course. As the constitutional head of the country, he has to encourage the people and be informed.

Q: The new Constitution says that treaties can be entered into only if they are accepted by a two-thirds parliamentary majority. Your party (the Nepali Congress) is against this clause while the United Left Front wants it to stay. Has there been any agreement on this?

A: We are still working on it. We haven't reached any compromise yet.

Q: What is your stand on this issue?

A: I think that it is too harsh a clause. It should be either completely obliterated or, if mentioned, be restricted only to questions concerning the territorial sovereignty of the country.

If we go by what the ULF wants then for all kinds of treaties, however small, we will have to go to Parliament. It is absurd that even for, say, the construction of a bund costing a crore, we have to take permission from Parliament if the river flows through India.

But this is not a major problem. It can be sorted out.

MANI SHANKAR AIYAR

Fed up to the gills

The Mandal Commission consulted sociologists, not for real advice, but only to keep editorial writers and other busybodies quiet

I write this on the morrow of V.P. Singh's pathetic appeal on TV to the agitating students. Our Prime Minister wears bifocals, one discovers, because the top half of his spectacles gets so misted over with hypocrisy that the bottom half is needed to display the ineptitude. It took all of my parental authority to stop my teenagers from breaking the screen (I pleaded that our set was not an Onida: as their forward education largely consists of being steeped in Doordarshan ads, the argument worked!). There is a good chance, therefore, that by the time this column appears—close on a fortnight after it is penned—V P. Singh, like Shelley's Ozymandias, might well be an abandoned relic of a distant past. As it is the firm policy of this column never to kick a man when he is down, let me turn to another who, like Lazarus (risen, if not from the dead, at least from a relatively tranquil retirement) has been flailing his arms in the wind of late. I refer, of course, to Mr S.S. Gill, an IAS officer of considerable distinction, who served as secretary to the Mandal Commission.

Mr Gill has, in recent days, been speaking at several forums defending the methodology adopted by the Mandal Commission. As a frequent victim of misquotation by the press, I am generally reluctant to rely overmuch on quotes from reporters (who are, generally, too distracted by the apprehension that one of their colleagues will abstract the last samosa at the tea to follow to pay too strict an attention to the proceedings they have been sent to cover!). I was, therefore, delighted to find that Mr Gill has, in a signed article in the most recent issue of Current (22-28/9/90), vindicated most of what these reporters—between gulps of gulab jamun—have been recounting in these past few weeks as his true blue views.

Mr Gill's first contention is that in building up the data base to which "objective criteria" were applied to scientifically determine "classes" eligible to be described as "backward", the Mandal Commission began its labours by consulting two panels of experts - the first in June 1979 and the second in July 1979. There is no denying that the experts really were expert. They included not only the greatest sociologist that India has produced in the twentieth century—the redoubtable Prof. M.N. Srinivas, who has given us the key tools ("sanskritisation" and "westernisation") to measure social progress in our country--but also one of our most distinguished anthropologists, Prof. B.K. Roy Burman, and Prof. Yogendra Singh of the Jawaharlal Nehru University, not to mention a series of lesser luminaries.

Having sought them out—and co-opted them into the exercise - one would have thought Mr Gill would have persuaded Mandal (when that zamindar was taking time off from squeezing his sharecroppers dry) to at least ask these great social scientists what they thought of the data generated, the methodology adopted to study the data, the scientific exacti-

V.P. Singh: Does he have anything to say—or even mumble—every time a youth goes up in flames? Yes. "A bit of my heart falls off." Hanging on to the bits that remain—an intestine here, a kidney there—unmoved, he clings on to his chair

tude of the basis for drawing conclusions, and the scientific validity of the conclusions drawn. But, no, for reasons best known to S/Shri Mandal and Gill, the sociologists were given their allotted three to five days at the start of the exercise in the scorching summer of '79—and then totally ignored. It was, it seems, convenient to get them to lend to the study the respectability of their names, inconvenient to actually seek their scientific, expert opinion on the conclusions that were being put together. Why, in short, were they not summoned again, if not in the scorching summer of '80, then at least in the autumnal calm of the same year as Mandal/Gill were coming to the end of their endeavours?

The fact is—and, if you don't believe me, just check with Humphrey Appleby's technique in the Yes, Minister series—the civil service always views professional scientists as a useful sop to keep academic opinion, editorial writers and other busybodies quiet. But no IAS officer worth his salt would ever dream of turning to a mere scientist for real advice. The IAS believes unabashedly in the dictum that the only opinion that counts is an IAS opinion. Gill was merely being true to his tribe in asking the Srinivases and Roy Burmans to lend respectability to his party; then leaving it to his hierarchical inferiors in the civil service (the director general of the Central Statistical Organisation--incidentally, a statistician not a sociologist—and an army of minor babus, ranging in sociological expertise from section officers on deputation to patwaris on transfer) to collect and collate the information that would back up the conclusions that Mandal and his colleagues had arrived at aeons before they were even appointed to the Commission. And Mr Gill—on the well-known civil service principle of "What Bobo wants, Bobo gets"—fixed the parameters so that Mandal got what he wanted to get, scientific truth, in the true civil service tradition, being banished to the farther reaches of Madangir—or wherever it is that our supercomputers are installed!

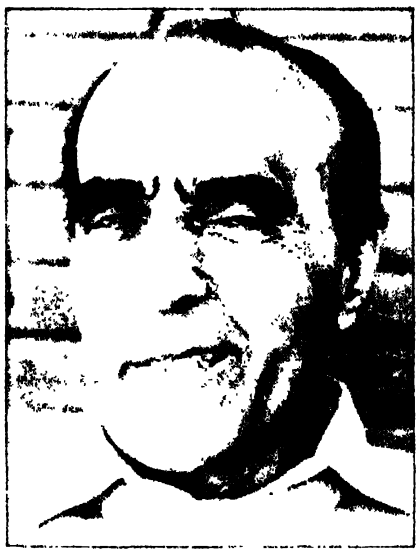
Mr Gill advised his political masters in the Commission to do the same with expert legal opinion. The Law Institute was requested to produce a comprehensive paper. The paper forms one of the bulkier appendices to the report and is completely summarised early on in the report (chapter VII). But, when it comes to conclusions, the Mandal Commission conveniently ignores all legal opinions adumbrated at such length elsewhere, to pick on three isolated quotations from Supreme Court judgments (para 12.3, Chapter XII) to lend legal verisimilitude to an otherwise bald and uninteresting narrative. The question one would wish to put to Mr Gill is this: after he drafted para 12.3, chapter XII of the report, did he go back to ask the Law Institute what it thought of it? You can bet your ninny, no. Because it is the inflexible code of the IAS that experts are to the IAS as buntings are to a procession, there to lend a touch of colour to the goings-on and generally swing about in the wind while all the actual glory is cornered by the marchers on the ground.

What, however, Mr Gill really has to answer is not snide remarks from the sidelines from uppity civil service juniors like myself, but the way the report itself damns the so-called scientific basis of the report

The report confirms (para 11.10, chapter XI) that the experts had recommended that a valid socio-educational field survey must cover at least 5,000 of our 5,00,000 villages. Without consulting any expert opinion, Mr Gill and his bureaucratic colleagues decided to cut out more than 80 per cent of the task recommended to them by the experts. Pure administrative convenience, they said. But before they took the decision, did they care to consult Srinivas, Yogendra Singh & Co.? Of course not. Because Srinivas, Yogendra Singh & Co. might then have said that a survey based on covering less than 0.20 per cent of India's villages would not be scientifically tenable. So, Mr Gill must have argued, why burden yourself with seeking a "scientific" opinion that can only stop you from getting on with what, in your bureaucratic wisdom, you are, in any case, going to do?

No wonder, then, that Mr Gill—in a fit of honesty that he must now repent—wrote in para 11.27, chapter XI of the report that his socio-educational field survey "has no pretensions (sic!) to being a piece of academic research", that it is simply "a rough and ready tool" and does not constitute "a technically sophisticated and academically satisfying operation".

The same questions of intellectual integrity arise over the "objective criteria" devised and the "weightage" given to the different sets of criteria. No social scientist was consulted, no expert opinion sought. Mandal or Gill—or, possibly, that composite creature called Mandgill—just pulled the criteria out of their respective hats/turbans (which may, therefore, be compositely called a turbo-hat!). It was again this duo that arbitrarily assigned a weightage of 3 to the "social" criteria, 2 to the "educational" criteria, and 1 to the "economic" criteria. Why 3:2:1? Why not 1:2:3?



Why not, indeed, 3.6:2.4:1.3?

Because, if you please, that's the way Mandgill wants it to be. No science. No academics. Just an arbitrary fiat by the IAS—which loves nothing better than a really arbitrary fiat to show the specialists exactly where they fit in the scheme of things backed up by the self-serving interests of a politician determined to ensure his own political upward mobility by establishing the total immobility of his pretended "social backwardness" (while, betimes, getting his "forward" munshi to account for every single sikka gouged out of his—socially inferior?—tenants).

And to what, pray, was this pseudo-scientific "weighted objective criteria" applied? To three sources of information, says the report. First information provided by state governments which the report describes as "rather disappointing" (para 9.4), "scrappy and inadequate" (para 9.9) and as "too sketchy and scrappy for any meaningful inference which may be valid for the country as a whole" (para 9.14). Second, to information provided by the central government which the report says (para 9.47) was simply unavailable with the central government. Not fazed, Mandgill imposed on the central government "rough and ready criteria" (para 9.47) to force the central government to yeild up its treasures. Third, information provided by the general public, which the report says largely "belonged to the OBCs" (para 10.46), was "conditioned by their own class interests" (para 10.47) and where "class bias was the most compelling logic behind their convictions" (para 10.47).

Why, after this confession of mea culpa, Mr Gill goes to so much trouble to establish Mandal's claim to a Nobel Prize for Objectivity, Truth and Scientific Probity is a bit beyond me. You only have to read the report to find Mr Gill's tongue firmly wedged in his cheek when he talks now in Current of "how meticulously the survey was prepared", how "the Commission earnestly tried to create as large and dependable a data base as possible and "tapped the highest available expertise for this purpose". Oh yeah!—as my teenagers would say.

S.S. Gill (right) and B.P. Mandal: At 52 per cent of the population—a figure given by B.P.S.S. Mandgill—how can we build a modern India without the participation of over half our population—the backward class?

The fact is that the backward claim to a quota of government jobs is not based so much on a claim to equity of opportunity as on the perception that they must have a fair share of "governance". Fair enough. At 52 per cent of the population—a figure given by our resident expert in sociological statistics, Shri B.P.S.S. Mandgill—how can we build a modern India without the participation of over half our population—the backward classes?

To which it is for V.P. Singh to answer two questions. First, since we are a democracy—so liberal that it can accommodate even the likes of Sharad Yadav and Ram Bilas Paswan!—should "participation in governance" be limited to Class I/II jobs? Should it not extend primarily to the political governance of India? If so, is not 52 per cent the decisive voice in the electorate's verdict? What is it, then, that stops V.P. Singh from saying that at least 52 per cent of all National Front MLAs/MPs shall be backwards? And that at least 52 per cent of all National Front governments—in the states and at the Centre—shall comprise backwards? And that at least 52 per cent of PMO officers and the staff of all National Front CMs shall be backwards? If only V.P. Singh and his cohorts had allowed the Panchayati Raj and Nagarpalika Bills to go through last year, constitutionally-guaranteed elective offices in India would, at one stroke, have increased from 5,000 today to upwards of 20,00,000! The vast majority of these 20,00,000 elective offices would, by rights, have been won by backwards in the very villages and mohallas where V.P. Singh now bleats on about his "revolutionary social engineering". The National Front vote against these Bills was the single biggest blow against increasing the "participation" of the backwards in the "governance" of the country.

The second giant step in opening educational opportunity to the backwards was the Navodaya Vidyalayas. V P. Singh has neither the conviction to close them down nor the courage to let them grow. His principled position has been to simply freeze their number at the existing number. In doing so, he has frozen the number of meritorious backward children securing access to first-class education, which is the only general route to reaching that heaven where backwards of merit succeed in worsting the forwards at their own game.

But does VP have anything at all to say—or even mumble—on these matters of substances? No. He contents himself with some rubbish about how every time a youth goes up in flames "a bit of my heart falls off." ("mere dil ke tukde hazar huelkoi idhar gire, koi udhar gire!") Hanging on to the bits that remain—an intestine here, a kidney there—V.P. Singh, unmoved, clings to his chair like...an imp? A wimp? A limp? No, got it, clings there—like a limpet! ●

Toppling the Raja

Chandra Shekhar sounds the battle-cry. But it won't be easy

In the end, it boils down to how you see morality. Chandra Shekhar, the veteran strongman of the Opposition, believes that he has right on his side. V.P. Singh cheated him during the election for the leader of the Janata Dal and has since sought to prolong his tenure by resorting to a series of immoral gimmicks of which the Mandal Commission is only the latest. Therefore, argues Chandra Shekhar, the Raja has to go.

But then, V. P. Singh has made a personal fetish of morality. As far as he is concerned, right resides in his corner. Not only has he never sought public office or used it for private gains, but the decision to implement the Mandal recommendations has little to do with expediency and everything to do with social justice. Thus, even though the elite and the media have been turned against him, the Raja will not be deflected from his sacred mission of helping the backwards.

As both interpretations of political morality were trotted out last week, nobody knew for certain quite what was right. V.P. Singh had won his chair through subterfuge: that much was indisputable. But now, nobody could say that he retained his position by Devi Lal's grace or because of the hysterical support of the media.

The Raja had the numbers on his side. Two weeks ago, after the urbane Yashwant Sinha, a key Chandra Shekhar lieutenant, raised the banner of revolt at a meeting of the National Front Parliamentary Party, V.P. Singh brushed the revolt aside with an impressive show of strength. The party was asked to pass a vote of confidence in the Prime Minister and as Sinha walked out in disgust, the motion was carried unanimously.

For the dissidents, it was a significant reverse. Afterwards, Sinha claimed that he had not moved a no-confidence motion, so there was no question of a vote. "What are you going to do?" he asked rhetorically. "Have a vote of confidence in the Prime Minister every time somebody criticises him?"

His point was well taken, but the vote had to be seen in the context of the kind of media build-up accorded to Sinha's little revolt. Two days before the meeting, several Chandra Shekhar and Devi Lal supporters met for dinner at Sinha's residence. Afterwards, some of those present told the press that large numbers of MPs (upto 40, according to one news agency report) were planning to demand the Prime Minister's resignation.

After such expectations had been built up, the meeting actually ended with a vote of confidence in V.P Singh. It was, by any standards, a reverse.

But Sinha was not done yet. Three days after the meeting, he joined up with Harmohan Dhawan, another Chandra Shekhar lieutenant, to draft a letter to the Prime Minister demanding his resignation. This time, the figures were more impressive. Twenty-nine Janata Dal MPs signed the letter (though seven were from the Rajya Sabha) and as the list did not include the heavyweights (Devi Lal and Chandra Shekhar) or the ministers (i.e. Jagdeep Dhankar) who were certain to endorse the call for the Raja's ouster, it seemed as though Sinha and Dhawan were coming near the original figure of 40 MPs.

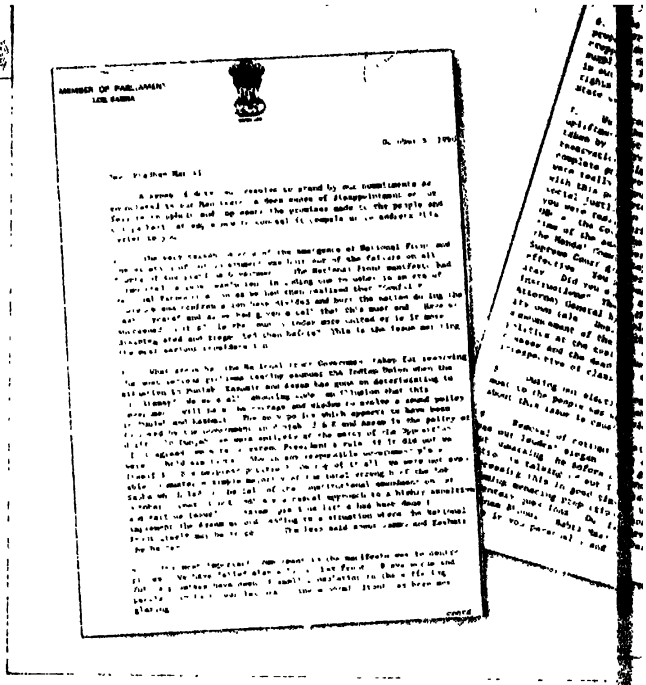
Of course, nothing is what it first seems in Janata Dal politics, and within hours of signing the letter, two MPs had second thoughts. Another four were paraded before the press by Sharad Yadav, the Union textiles minister. Somewhat implausibly, the MPs claimed that they had "forgotten" to read the memorandum before signing it.



At week's end, Yadav, who has emerged as the strongman of the regime in the post-Mandal Commission era, seemed confident that he would succeed in inducing more MPs to switch sides. Nobody was prepared to reveal exactly how Yadav was winning the dissidents over, but equally, nobody believed that he was managing this operation with hefty doses of love and fresh air alone.

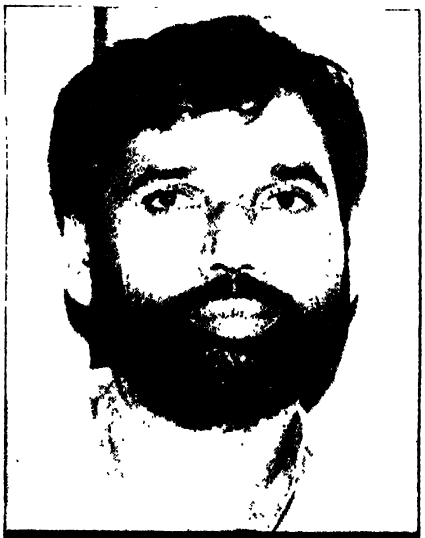
As the horse-trading proceeded briskly, Sinha and Dhawan fell back on that old stand-by: morality.

"We know we don't have numbers on our side," Sinha told the press as the controversies over who was on which side mounted. "We have never claimed that we are in the majority. Our claim is moral, not numerical. We believe that with the country heading for disaster under V.P. Singh's leadership, it is legitimate to ask for a change of leadership."

It was a valid position. But in Janata Dal politics, one man's morality is another man's intrigue.

Had the revolt failed? What were the dissidents up to? In Delhi's political circles, nobody was sure. The Raja's henchmen arranged for the submission of a petition by 40 Janata Dal MPs re-affirming their faith in V.P. Singh's leadership and claimed that as 40 was more than 29, the Prime Minister had more supporters than Devi Lal and Chandra Shekhar.

THE DISSIDENTS' LETTER: demanding the PM's resignation

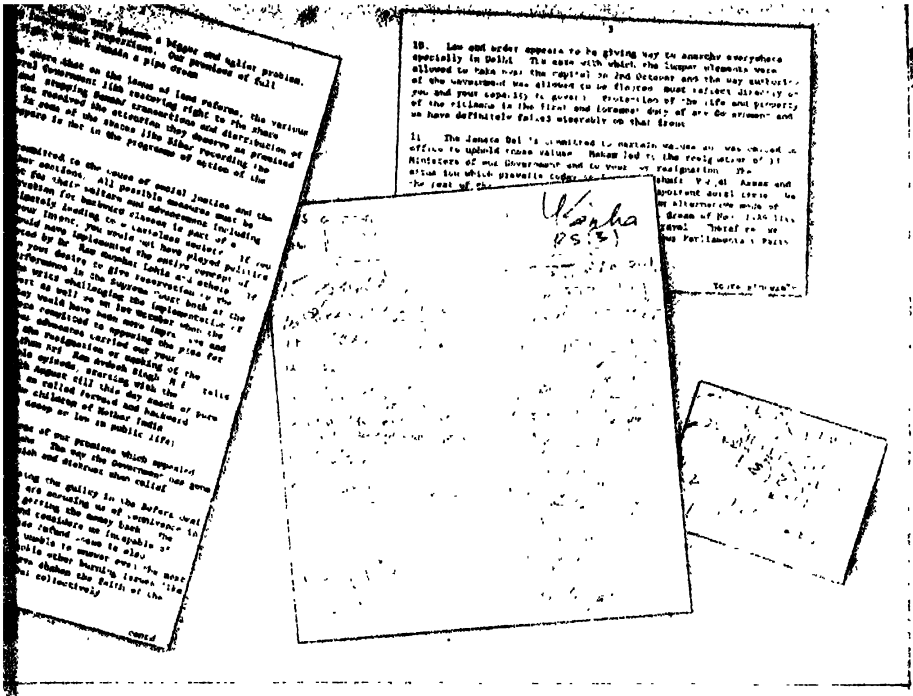


It was not a good idea. Though Santosh Bharatiya and Bhawani Shankar Hota insisted that the petition proved V.P. Singh's strength, in fact, all it showed was that of the 138 Janata Dal

ALL THE RAJA'S MEN

JAIPAL REDDY

He was cheated out of the party presidentship by the combined effort of Devi Lal and Chandra Shekhar, and Reddy will not forgive them in a hurry. And what better way of getting back at them than by allying with the Raja?

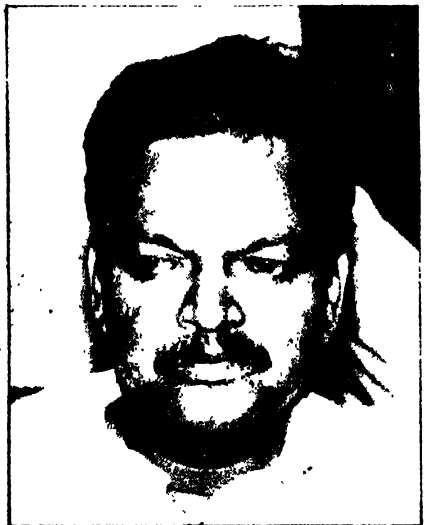


RAM VILAS PASWAN

Nothing is more important to him than his identity as a backward leader. And has thrown his lot in with V.P. Singh only because of the PM's initiative on the reservations issue. His vote-bank makes him a powerful ally

MADHU DANDAVATE

Has been reduced to a complete cipher in the finance ministry with Bimal Jalan (a Raja man) running the show. But for reasons that defy comprehension, the Professor insists on supporting VP, no matter how grave the damage to his image.



MPs, only 40 had faith in V.P. Singh.

But all the same, 40 is greater than 29, so did the dissidents have any hope of forcing V P. Singh out in the long run? There were three views. The first was the view advanced by V.P. Singh's supporters. They argued that Mandal had made the Raja's position unassailable No Janata Dal MP could now afford to side with the dissidents because voters in the cow belt would perceive this as an anti-backward stand

After all, they argued, V.P. Singh had turned the tables on Sinha at the meeting of the National Front Parliamentary Party by placing the Mandal report on the agenda. To have backed Sinha against Singh when Mandal was the issue would have seemed too much like letting down the backwards and so, the Raja won his vote of confidence with the utmost ease. All other attempts to unseat the Raja, predicted the Prime Minister's supporters, would meet the same fate.

The second view- favoured by most of the media—was that the dissidents had no hope of ever raising the required numbers. What they wanted to do was keep the pressure on the Raja. With the anti-Mandal agitation still raging and India's problems mounting, V.P. Singh was already being urged by the media to either recast his prime ministership or to let somebody else do the job.

All the dissidents could do was add their voices to the din and keep embarrassing the Raja Finally, they hoped, V.P. Singh's tendency to resign every time he was faced with a major crisis would assert itself and the

SUBODH KANT SAHAY

As far as the PM is concerned, Sahay is the de facto home minister of India, even though he is designated as minister of state. Sahay is properly grateful and has refrained from coming out openly against the Raja, even though he disagrees with his reservation policy.

LALOO PRASAD YADAV

The Bihar CM is to Sharad Yadav what the lamb was to Mary Not surprisingly then, he is a charter member of the V.P Singh camp And it does help that the Mandal report is most beneficial to his community, the Yadavs.

SHARAD YADAV

Started out as a Devi Lal protege, but switched sides soon after the election. Owes his political rise to backward support and is therefore an ardent supporter of the Mandal Commission Report And by extension, of the Raja.

Raja would willingly step down.

Both views had a certain plausibility, but they were also flawed. The Raja's supporters were overestimating the influence of the Mandal issue. Sinha was careful to state in each of his letters that he did not oppose Mandal, so it was wrong to assume that an attack on V.P. Singh would be confused with an assault on Mandal. Moreover, how long would Mandal remain the key issue? By the middle of next year, other issues will emerge. Will the Raja then still be able to count on Mandal to keep him in office?

The second view was based on a false assumption: that V.P. Singh would resign if pressure was applied. While the Raja has frequently resigned on ostensibly moral grounds, each resignation has been a carefully-worked Machiavellian move that has advanced his own prospects. Why on earth should he resign now simply to let Chandra Shekhar become Prime Minister?

The dissidents had their own explanation for their actions -a third view, as it were. Simply put, this amounted to: we can get the numbers.

NITIN RAI

The dissidents know that in Indian politics, fortune favours the numerous. At present, V.P. Singh has a hardcore support base of around 40 MPs. Some others have been won over with Cabinet posts; still others with the promise of berths in the next reshuffle; and the rest are aligned with local chieftains (Mulayam Singh Yadav, Biju Patnaik, Ajit Singh etc.) who are neutral in the battle. This gives the Raja a majority and the support of the uncommitted who will

THE ANTI-RAJA BRIGADE

CHANDRA SHEKHAR

A sworn enemy of V.P. Singh ever since the Raja ganged up with the Chaudhary to deny him a stab at the prime ministership. Chandra Shekhar will not rest until Singh is unseated. He doesn't really want the PM's post, but if the party insists...

DEVI LAL

The Chautala episode turned the Tau completely against the Raja. And then the Mandal report—with the Jat community excluded from the benefits—came along to further worsen relations, and provoke Lal into resigning from the Lok Sabha.

YASHWANT SINHA

His first walk-out came at the swearing-in ceremony, when he realised he was to be fobbed off with a minister of state's post. Since then, Sinha has been at it with a rare consistency, his latest such effort coming at the last National Front meeting.

CHIMANBHAI PATEL

Caste configurations being what they are, the Gujarat CM is convinced that the Janata Dal can't possibly win from Gujarat after the Mandal report. And, of course, he blames the Raja for the situation he finds himself in.

V.P. SINGH: master of cow-belt intrigue go with the winning side

So far, the dissidents have about 37 members: the 25 who signed the memorandum (and have not reneged) and another 12 (Raj Mangal Pandey, Hukumdeo Narayan Deo, Jagdeep Dhankar, Devi Lal, Hari Kewal Prasad, Maneka Gandhi, Chandra Shekhar, etc.) who will come out openly when the time is right. To be able to break away, the dissidents need another 20 members (or a third of the party's membership in the Lok Sabha).

The figure may seem daunting if you think in terms of individual MPs. But once you think of it in terms of block votes, then the picture changes dramatically. UP chief minister Mulayam Singh Yadav alone has 15 MPs. Ajit Singh has another 15. Biju Patnaik has at least 11. And so on. So, the exercise is not to convince individuals, but win over local chieftains.

Last week, Chandra Shekhar's men were busy pointing out that—in the long run—they could count on Mulayam Singh Yadav's support.

Shekhar supported Mulayam Singh's bid for the Uttar Pradesh chief ministership, when Yadav was facing a tough challenge from Ajit Singh, who was, at least initially, backed by the Raja. Of course, VP changed sides when he realised that Mulayam Singh was a better bet. But by then, Yadav had seen through the Raja and had also understood that Shekhar was a far more reliable ally. Hence the interviews that followed, with the UP chief minister proclaiming: "Chandra Shekharji is a saint."

Shekhar followed this up by holding

MULAYAM SINGH YADAV

Somebody who refers to Chandra Shekhar as a saint can't but be against the Raja. But the UP chief minister can't afford to come out openly against V.P. Singh after Mandal, for fear of losing backward support in his state.

HARMOHAN DHAWAN

He resigned from the party post only to devote all his energies to getting Janata Dal MPs to sign a memorandum against the Prime Minister. Has been either very successful in this endeavour or an abject failure, depending on whom you are talking to.

BIJU PATNAIK

The Orissa chief minister was one of the few courageous politicians who minced no words in trashing the Mandal recommendations. That may have lost him a few votes, but it has certainly put the fear of Biju into the Raja.

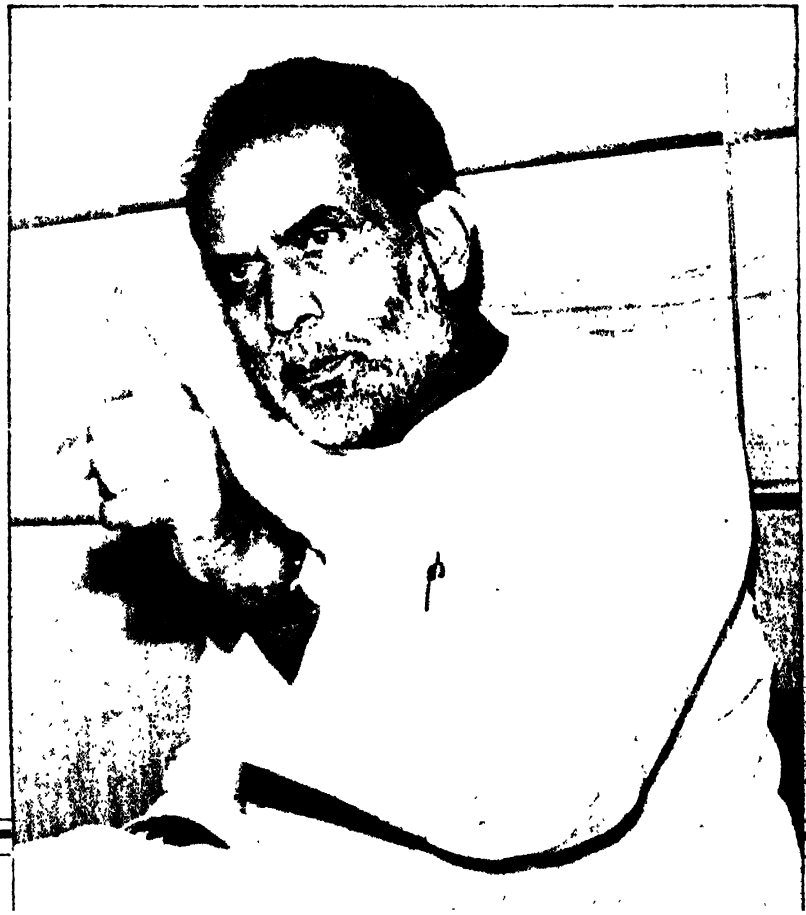
RAJ MANGAL PANDEY

Had accompanied V.P. Singh out of the Congress. But the two have fallen out since then. The Raja attempted to affect a reconciliation by inviting him over for tea, but was treated to a 20-minute diatribe on his sins, instead.

"The government has done nothing to its credit"

Cho S. Ramaswamy interviews Chandra Shekhar

SUNDAY: Do you think the Ram Janmabhoomi issue can be sorted out through negotiations after all that has happened?
Chandra Shekhar: I think there is very little option other than deciding this matter through negotiations. On such issues, one should not lose heart but have patience. Only patience can pay in these circumstances. I have every hope that with the proper approach and a spirit of accommodation, you can find a solution to the problem through negotiations.



Q: Will it be right to say that politicians allowed the crisis to deepen and are now seeking the help of religious leaders to bail them out of the mess?
A: I will not say that. It is true that politicians have not played their role effectively, which has led to the present crisis. It would be wrong to say that politicians now want the religious leaders to bail them out...Religious leaders are also part of society and there is nothing wrong in taking their help for restoring normalcy and peace because, if emotions can be aroused on religious grounds and fanaticism, passions can be subsided only by appeals from religious leaders. Long back, when there was the problem of communal riots, I had requested the then Prime Minister (Indira Gandhi) that she should take the help of religious leaders.

Q: Do you think anything tangible will emerge on Bofors? Before coming to office, the Prime Minister used to set a time-frame of 15 days to expose it all.
A: I don't know on what basis the time limit was set because, even according to him (V.P. Singh), everything was in the hands of foreigners in countries like Switzerland and Sweden. As you know, the Swiss economy operates in a particular manner and I don't think the Swiss government is going to jeopardise its economic interests in order to fulfil the poll promises of the Prime Minister of India. If that was the expectation, I see no basis for it. If they think they can manipulate them (the Swiss) to their side by using the so-called populist slogans, I have not much hope.

Q: Don't you think there is a lot of hypocrisy in this case on the part of the Prime Minister?
A: Anybody claiming to expose something that is not within his capacity is guilty of hypocrisy. But then, I tell you sometimes all this becomes very attractive. Populist slogans and hypocrisy serve politicians rather well.

Q: What is your stand on the Mandal Commission Report?
A: I admit that backward classes should be given reservation. ...When the Kaka Kalelkar Commission examined the question of reservations the first time, it suggested a periodical review to see how people have benefited. There should always be a revision on the basis of economic development of certain sections of the population. We should also take into account the pauperisation of another section of society that might have been very well off. The reservation policy in today's circumstances should have been a synthesis of social and economic considerations and all the pros and cons should have been worked out before launching on this adventure.

Q: Would you say that the Mandal Commission had listed the backward classes in a responsible manner?

A: I don't know how to say whether it was responsible or not, but then, the Commission in its report had admitted that there had not been any scientific analysis. Whatever he (Mandal) could gather from certain research scholars or presumptions or information gathered from the people, he had used for determining these castes to be backward. I don't think he had any pretensions about his scientific analysis for determining backwardness.

Q: What is your opinion about the way this government has been handling the Sri Lankan issue?
A: On the issue of Sri Lanka, to have hastily taken decisions without caring for consequences only for the sake of undoing whatever the previous government had done was wrong. It was not a wise decision in my opinion. You can slowly change, steadily change the apparatus that is already there, but if you take sudden decisions only to spite the previous regime, then you are bound to face certain difficulties and even put the nation in jeopardy.

Q: But what are you doing? After all, you are a part of the ruling party.
A: That is true. Whenever there is any complicated question, I give my opinion, but I cannot force my opinion on the rulers. I can just give suggestions, but if my suggestions are not accepted, in a parliamentary democracy, being a minority, you (I) will have to tolerate it.

Q: But you had fought for the removal of the previous government because it went wrong.
A: When things go beyond a point, one has to take hard decisions.

Q: Then you think things have not gone beyond that point as yet?
A: They might have gone, but whether the decision-making stage has come or not is a matter for consideration.

Q: What about reports that you are prepared to help the Congress to bring down this government?
A: What I have said already was that I was not trying to topple the V.P. Singh government with Rajiv Gandhi's help nor was I negotiating with him (Rajiv) by meeting him four times. You know my opinion about this government—I think the government has done nothing to its credit. And the way things are moving, we may soon be in great difficulty. It is for the Janata Dal and the other parties that are cooperating to seriously look into the functioning of this government.

Q: There are some people who think you could provide a change for the better. What have you to say?
A: I alone cannot provide a change. If the change comes about, I shall be happy.

Q: Have you had any occasion to regret any of your political decisions?
A: It will be very wrong of me if I say I have never regretted any of my decisions. But sometimes, I feel it is all part of the game. Life is so complicated that all the time, you cannot say all your decisions have been right.

But then, I have one consolation—that in taking political decisions, I have never contradicted myself nor have I betrayed anybody's trust. I have been betrayed many a time...

several meetings in the state in support of Mulayam Singh and effectively established the fact that Yadav belonged to his camp.

But V.P. Singh wasn't going to give up without a fight. And, as usual, he played dirty, threatening to topple the fledgling UP government by setting Ajit Singh's MLAs against Mulayam Singh. The Union industry minister commands the personal loyalty of at least 60 MLAs and he could well pull the plug on Yadav.

In the end, a compromise was worked out and Mulayam Singh survived. But the experience taught him a valuable lesson: to build up a vote-bank which was exclusively his and which the party couldn't do without. The Ram Janmabhoomi issue came in handy in this connection. Mulayam Singh adopted an extreme pro-Muslim stand, even arresting the Shankaracharya when he attempted shilanyas in Ayodhya.

The stratagem worked. Yadav came to be seen as the saviour of the Muslims. And this combined with the support he commanded among the backwards ensured that he emerged as the strongman of UP. Now the Raja could only tangle with him at the expense of losing both the backwards and the Muslims.

But V.P. Singh wasn't finished yet. He began working on Sharad Yadav and soon managed to win him over. Now the Yadav vote was effectively divided between Sharad Yadav and Mulayam Singh. Mulayam Singh, who earlier had the support of as many as 25 MPs, could now be sure of just over half that number: the rest had defected to Sharad Yadav's side.

With Sharad Yadav as an ally, the Raja was also sure of the support of Bihar chief minister Laloo Prasad Yadav - a camp follower of the Union textiles minister.

In the bargain, however, he lost Mulayam Singh without any hope of a reconciliation in the near, or even forseeable, future.

While Mulayam Singh remains Shekhar's best bet in the event of a revolt, he has begun to court other local chiefs, among them Biju Patnaik. While Patnaik has wasted no time in making it clear that he disapproves heartily of the Mandal Commission, he has not actually come out against V.P. Singh either. Moreover, there is some dispute as to how many of the Orissa MPs will actually back him. V.P. Singh has appointed four of them as ministers and one as Speaker of the Lok Sabha. Will they risk their jobs for Biju? Patnaik seems to think that they will and claims to count on the support of at least eight.

Shekhar will have less success with the other state chief ministers. Laloo Yadav, once regarded as Devi Lal's man, has now defected to Sharad Yadav and therefore to V.P. Singh. The dissidents are confident that Gujarat chief minister Chimanbhai Patel will back them, but so far, the Gujarat MPs have been reluctant to join the revolt.

That leaves two local chieftains. Of them, Ajit Singh is not regarded as a major problem. The general view is that he will go with the winning side and bring his 15 MPs with him. Anybody who has around 60 MPs can count on Ajit's men joining up.

"The OBCs will not gain much"

Textiles minister Sharad Yadav feels that much more has to be done for the backward castes

SUNDAY: Do you agree with the general perception that the V.P. Singh government is under threat?
Sharad Yadav: As I see it, the government has emerged much stronger. For the first time, the issue of social justice has been tackled and the Janata Dal has gained a much stronger base in the country because of that.

Q: But the campaign mounted by the dissidents will surely have some impact.
A: I don't wish to talk about the dissidents. This government will complete its full term—for, on the basic issues and programmes all the members are together. V.P. Singh has sought the vote of confidence twice and the majority has supported him. The people want this government to complete its full term and anybody who creates an obstacle in this path will be destroyed by them.

We have completed all the promises we made in our manifesto except the right to work. The Mandal Commission was among our promises. So I don't understand what people are getting so agitated about.

Q: Do you think the Mandal recommendations are perfect?
A: No, there are several shortcomings and it can be improved a lot. But at least it signals the beginning of an initiative to uplift the weaker sections. It is not the Bible, Gita or Koran. But all the parties, including the Congress, support reservations for weaker sections. This reservation policy was made by Mahatma Gandhi, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and Dr B.R. Ambedkar.

Q: There are several backward castes which will not benefit by this report.
A: That is true. Backward castes such as the Badhais, Kumhars and Lohars are not going to benefit, but we can initiate a debate on this issue.

Q: Do you agree with the concept of incorporating economic criteria as well? That way, Sharad Yadav's son doesn't benefit, but some other poor Yadav does.
A: No, I don't agree with this. Because there are very few Sharad Yadavs among the backwards. I am in favour of "one family, one job".

SHARAD YADAV at a pro-Mandal rally: new strongman

Arun Nehru, however, is an entirely different matter. Nehru threatened to leave V.P. Singh's Cabinet over Devi Lal—could he now join hands with a dissident band that has the Tau as one of its leaders?

Moreover, much of what Shekhar opposes—the industrial policy, for instance—is exactly the sort of thing that Nehru regards as crucial. So, could Nehru and Shekhar ever link up?

Nevertheless, the Shekhar camp's strategy is that with Yadav and Patnaik on board, they are certain to get Ajit. Then, Nehru and his three MPs will not really matter.

The Raja's supporters overestimate the influence of the Mandal issue. By the middle of next year, other issues will emerge. Will V.P. Singh then be still able to count on Mandal to keep him in office?

Q: One view is that the government has considerably diluted the Mandal recommendations.

A: True. Not even one-tenth of what was mentioned in the Mandal report has been granted. In this first phase, the government has given them nothing. No reservation has been provided in educational institutions, which is very necessary. If the backward classes are not educated, how will they be able to get jobs?

Also, the government has not implemented the recommendation of giving loans to backward youths to enable them to complete their education. Several other recommendations regarding bank facilities have also not been implemented.

The backwards are not going to gain very much from the recent announcement of the government. While Scheduled Castes and Tribes have got reservation in educational institutions, OBCs (Other Backward Castes) have not. Even though the Constitution clearly states that educationally backward people should be helped.

Reservation for the OBCs has not been made in such fields as defence, science, technology, atomic energy and space.

Q: Why have these fields been excluded? Does the government doubt the competence of the OBCs in this regard?

A: What can I say? It is not that. How can we doubt their competence...but we wanted to take all sections of society along with us.

Q: Do you think that the government has mishandled the students agitation?

A: No, I think it was handled properly.

Q: Dissidents allege that V.P. Singh has destroyed the unity of the country.

A: That is a completely baseless statement.

But where the question of national unity was concerned, I was totally impressed by one leader: Indira Gandhi. She was fully committed towards the unity and integrity of the nation. Her foreign policy was also great. She was a true statesman. She was the most secular politician, and under her leadership the Congress did a lot for the uplift of the weaker sections of society.

Nobody but she could make tall claims in this regard.

The consequence of all this has been a sudden jockeying for favour in the upper echelons of the Janata Dal. V.P. Singh began it by hoping to woo Ranjit Singh, Devi Lal's younger son away from his father. Ranjit was offered a Cabinet berth and told that as long as Om Prakash Chautala ruled the roost, there would be no place for him in the Tau's camp. But Shekhar tried a little of his own persuasion and succeeded in getting Ranjit to join Yashwant Sinha's dissident band.

Nevertheless, this cannot go on forever. At some stage, battle lines will be clearly drawn and this will depend on much more than a doling out of favours. V.P. Singh has pinned everything on the Mandal report. He reckons it will help in two ways. One: if an election is called then he will have a solid vote-bank. And two: it makes all dissidence against him seem directed at the Mandal proposals.

Of these two grounds, it is now clear that the first will not work. President R. Venkataraman is believed to have told the Raja that as head of a minority government he cannot ask for the dissolution of the Lok Sabha. Moreover, Janata Dal MPs are so apprehensive of facing the people that were an election to be called, the party would almost certainly split. That could hardly advance V.P. Singh's prospects.

It is on the second ground that the Mandal issue has helped the Raja. While the media and the urban elite are bitterly opposed to the recommendations, no major political party has dared attack the concept of increased reservations. Even Mulayam Singh is said to have told Chandra Shekhar that he cannot openly oppose V.P. Singh while Mandal is the issue.

But at best, this delays the denouement. To prolong the stay of execution, V.P. Singh will have to find a new gimmick—Mandal cannot last forever.

Chandra Shekhar will probably wait till the Mandal euphoria has died down. Then he will make his move. Till then, his men will keep up the pressure, hoping to portray V.P. Singh as a lame-duck Prime Minister. Once that image sticks, they will seek to cook his goose.

Unless Vishwanath Pratap Singh, that master of cow-belt intrigue, has another surprise up his sleeve. ●

The BJP's dilemma

Why the party cannot afford to bring down the V.P. Singh regime

If the BJP is to be believed, it was at one time on the verge of bringing down the National Front government. For over a month, senior BJP leaders had been hinting at withdrawing support to Prime Minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh's minority government. Disparaging BJP statements were hitting the frontpages and everything suggested that the party's honeymoon with V.P. Singh was well and truly over. For all the bluster, however, there was not a peep from the BJP when it came to the crunch. In Parliament and in closed-door meetings, the BJP leadership demonstrated its readiness to compromise and go along with the government. In short, the BJP might bark but it was clearly not prepared to bite.

In fact, looking back, the BJP has in one way or the other back-tracked from every extreme position. A few recent examples are telling:

Ram Janmabhoomi: The BJP leadership had sworn that nothing would deter it from going ahead with the destruction of the Babri Masjid and the building of a Ram Mandir at the disputed Ayodhya site. Party president L.K. Advani had gone a step further by declaring that the courts had no jurisdiction over the Ram Janmabhoomi issue and that his party would go ahead with its plans irrespective of any court judgement. Yet, when they came to the Committee on Communal Harmony meeting, BJP leaders, including Advani and Atal Behari Vajpayee, virtually ratified the committee's resolution that "the decision of the courts should be respected". Vajpayee even expressed the hope that an amicable settlement to the contentious issue could be found before the 30 October deadline (that is, the day the construction of the Ram Temple is to begin). When the government's Press Information Bureau issued a statement, detailing the BJP's stand at the meeting and all newspapers prominently carried the story, a red-faced BJP leadership was forced to issue a denial.

Advani offered a weak explanation the next day, denying that his party had softened its stance on the Temple issue. He said that the BJP at the meeting had merely stressed that the court proceedings should be expedited and that his party did not in any way mean to lower the dignity of the courts. Advani, however, added that he did not believe the judiciary could resolve the tangle. He said that the courts could only decide on issues relating to title and trespass but not on the historical dispute or on what should be done to redress the historical injustice. Subsequently, Vajpayee resigned from the National Integration Council (NIC) in protest against the government's breach of agreement. Announcing his resignation, Vajpayee said that the government had deliberately publicised the deliberations of the committee even though the tacit understanding was that it would not do so. In all, everything suggested that the BJP was prepared to relent on the Ram Mandir issue but it was not prepared to publicly shed its strident, pro-Hindu mantle.

Withdrawal of support: Ever since late August this year, several BJP leaders have been hinting that their disenchantment with the National Front government had got to a point of no return. On 21 September, for instance, several BJP leaders, includ-

THE GROWING CONFUSION

Ram Janmabhoomi: The BJP leadership had sworn that nothing could deter it from going ahead with the Ram Temple project in Ayodhya. But at the meeting of the Committee on Communal Harmony, the party virtually ratified the resolution that "the verdict of the courts would be respected"

Withdrawal of support: Since August this year, several BJP leaders have been hinting at the possibility of the party withdrawing support to the V.P. Singh regime. Yet in Parliament, BJP members continue to support the government ing Madan Lal Khurana, MP, warned that their party would be forced to consider withdrawing support to the government if it did not stop the repression of the anti-Mandal student agitation.

Earlier, at the BJP's Bhopal meet held in mid-September, Advani and others had issued highly critical statements against the V.P. Singh government and had warned that their support should not be taken for granted.

Yet, every time the BJP leadership has been specifically asked to comment on the question of withdrawing support to the government, it has demurred. In fact, the very next day after Sharma's disquieting announcements, Advani sidestepped the issue, saying that he would not like to comment on the party's poll strategy. More recently, the BJP leadership has taken pains to emphasise that it will not do anything to cause the collapse of the National Front government. In Parliament, BJP members continue to be the government's most vocal supporters on critical issues. When the Punjab Bill failed in Parliament on 1 October, the BJP virtually apologised to the government and issued a whip ordering all its MPs to be present when the Bill came up for a vote again on 4 October

Mandal Commission: Initial BJP statements on the National Front government's decision to implement the Mandal Commission report suggested that the BJP was fundamentally opposed to the idea. Several BJP leaders, including Advani, had spoken about how economic criteria and not caste should have been the basis for job reservations. Advani, in early September, had expressed scepticism over V.P. Singh's move to call an all-party meeting to discuss the reservation issue. He said the meeting would in no way end the nation-wide turmoil caused by the Mandal report since it was meant only for discussing ways to implement the report. Of late, however, the BJP is saying that its objections stem from the fact that the decision to implement the report was made in a hurry without consulting friendly parties and that the government had made no serious attempts to talk to the agitating students.

By deciding to implement the Mandal report, V.P. Singh has changed the rules of the game. It might cost him his job, but the BJP won't be the beneficiary either

All this speaks of a dilemma gripping the BJP leadership. The manifestation is the series of choleric press statements being issued almost daily by the party leadership. In the past, the BJP had tried its best to appear as a disciplined, responsible and sober political party. It spoke little, and that too mainly on matters of political principles, and tried to give the impression that it was a notch above the rest. That image today is fast crumbling. The BJP is snarling in annoyance. Something obviously has gone wrong.

The BJP's entire political strategy, in fact, is in shambles. Till a couple of months ago, the party was moving confidently ahead with its plans to emerge as the country's principal Opposition party. BJP leaders had argued that the National Front government was fast losing credibility and would ultimately be disgraced. The Congress(I) was still suspect but remained a major political force throughout the country. Hardliners like Advani were of the opinion that the BJP would at some point have to ditch the Janata Dal and fight for a prominent place in the Opposition.

Traditionally, the Congress(I) has secured between 35 and 45 per cent of the total votes and the remainder has usually gone to the Opposition The Opposition has defeated the Congress(I) on the two occasions it has come together—in 1977 and in 1989. The BJP felt that with the decline of the mainstream Opposition as represented by the Janata Dal and the Congress(I), it could corner a dominant share of the Opposition vote provided it succeeded in projecting itself as a principled pro-Hindu force. The scenario disappeared once V.P. Singh decided to implement the Mandal report. Politics henceforth would be determined not so much by the old electoral equations but by caste equations. The BJP suddenly found itself cornered, handicapped by its upper class identity. As one BJP leader commented: "We have the Hindus, but V.P. Singh has their wallets." The BJP today is left to compete with the Congress(I) for upper caste votes. Vishwanath Pratap Singh has changed the rules of the game. It might ultimately cost the Prime Minister his job but the BJP won't be the beneficiary either. In the circumstances, it can do little but bark. If it bites, it will be attacking its own political future. ●

FRENZY!

Communal clashes claim 36 lives in Uttar Pradesh

All the signs of the impending storm were there for everyone to see. Colonelganj, in the Gonda district of Uttar Pradesh, is only 50 kms from Ayodhya. The town and the surrounding villages has an equal mix of Hindu and Muslim population. And with 30 October—the day on which the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP) plans to start the construction of the Ram Temple in Ayodhya—fast approaching, tension had gripped Colonelganj and its adjoining areas. All it needed was a spark to ignite the volatile atmosphere. And Durga Puja provided just that occasion for the uneasy calm to be shattered. On 30 September, riots broke out in Colonelganj and its neighbouring villages, leaving at least 36 people dead. The unofficial count is much higher and the death toll could well cross the 50 mark as bodies are being recovered from the fields and ponds almost everyday.

Colonelganj doesn't have a single Bengali, yet Durga Puja is celebrated with much fanfare. "The festival is another pretext for the Hindus to demonstrate their strength," said a local Muslim doctor. "We protested vociferously in the beginning especially because on the day of the immersion, the processions usually wound its way through Muslim-dominated areas. But the Hinu leaders just wouldn't listen." Finally, of course, a compromise was reached: it was agreed that the Hindus would not shout slogans while passing through Muslim areas. They kept their word and until this year, the occasion passed off peacefully.

But Durga Puja generates tension every year and the town has been identified by the administration as "communally sensitive". According to Faizlul Bari, a former CPI legislator from Gonda, the small town of Colonelganj is full of socio-cultural outfits belonging to both the Hindus and Muslims. And these have only contributed to the prevailing atmosphere of mutual distrust between the two communities. Bari cited the example of the Shah Bano case, which rocked the nation in 1985. At that time the Bajrang Dal activists of Colonelganj promptly held a seminar on the need for a uniform civil code, where provocative speeches were made. Not to be outdone, the Muslims too held a public meeting to uphold the cause of the personal law. Clearly, the Ram Janmabhoomi/Babri Masjid issue was bound to sway the people of Gonda, especially at a time when Advani's chariot is fast approaching Ayodhya.

The early portents were manifest in the first week of September when a state BJP leader, Kalyan Singh, addressed a large gathering of some 5,000 people in Colonelganj, on the Ram Temple issue. Apart from the usual provocative statements, his speech reportedly implied that Hindus should arm themselves. Said a local Muslim leader who requested anonymity: "There was palpable tension after Singh's departure. Everyone was wondering when things would explode." Soon, defiant VHP slogans appeared on the walls. Both Hindus and Muslims accused each other of having made preparations for a showdown on the day of the immersion.

However, one telling incident, which ought to have made the administration sit up, occurred on 29 September, the day of Vijaya Dashami, when Ravana's effigy was burnt on the Ram Lila ground. Members of the Bajrang Dal went around collecting funds not only from established shops but from vendors and hawkers as well. A Muslim vegetable seller, who had refused to comply with their constant demands, was even assaulted. He rushed to the residence of a Janata Dal leader, Talukdar Khan, for help. Khan, who was subsequently arrested for abetting the riots and is presently in Gonda jail, said: "I turned him away because my intervention would have aggravated the tension." But by then, a mob of Bajrang Dal activists began heading towards Khan's house, as it was very close to the ground. They raised slogans against Khan and other well-known Muslim leaders from the area and threatened to "take their revenge the next day". Some Bajrang Dal members also reportedly climbed atop the elevated quadrangle of a mosque adjacent to the Ram Lila ground, and clashed with the Muslims guarding the place. Rattled by these happenings, the local Muslim leaders, including Khan,

KRISHAN SAITH

DEATH AND DESTRUCTION

(From far left) People rounded up by the police on charges of rioting; a house gutted by rioters; eight people of a family were butchered in one of the villages approached the sub-divisional magistrate and senior police officials, asking them to either ban the Durga Puja procession on the next day or at least requisition additional security forces to patrol the sensitive areas. On the strength of the officials' assurances that the latter request would be complied with, the Muslims, who could well have left the place temporarily and stayed with friends and relatives in nearby places, chose to remain in Colonelganj. The only preventive step they took was to close their shops on the day of the immersion.

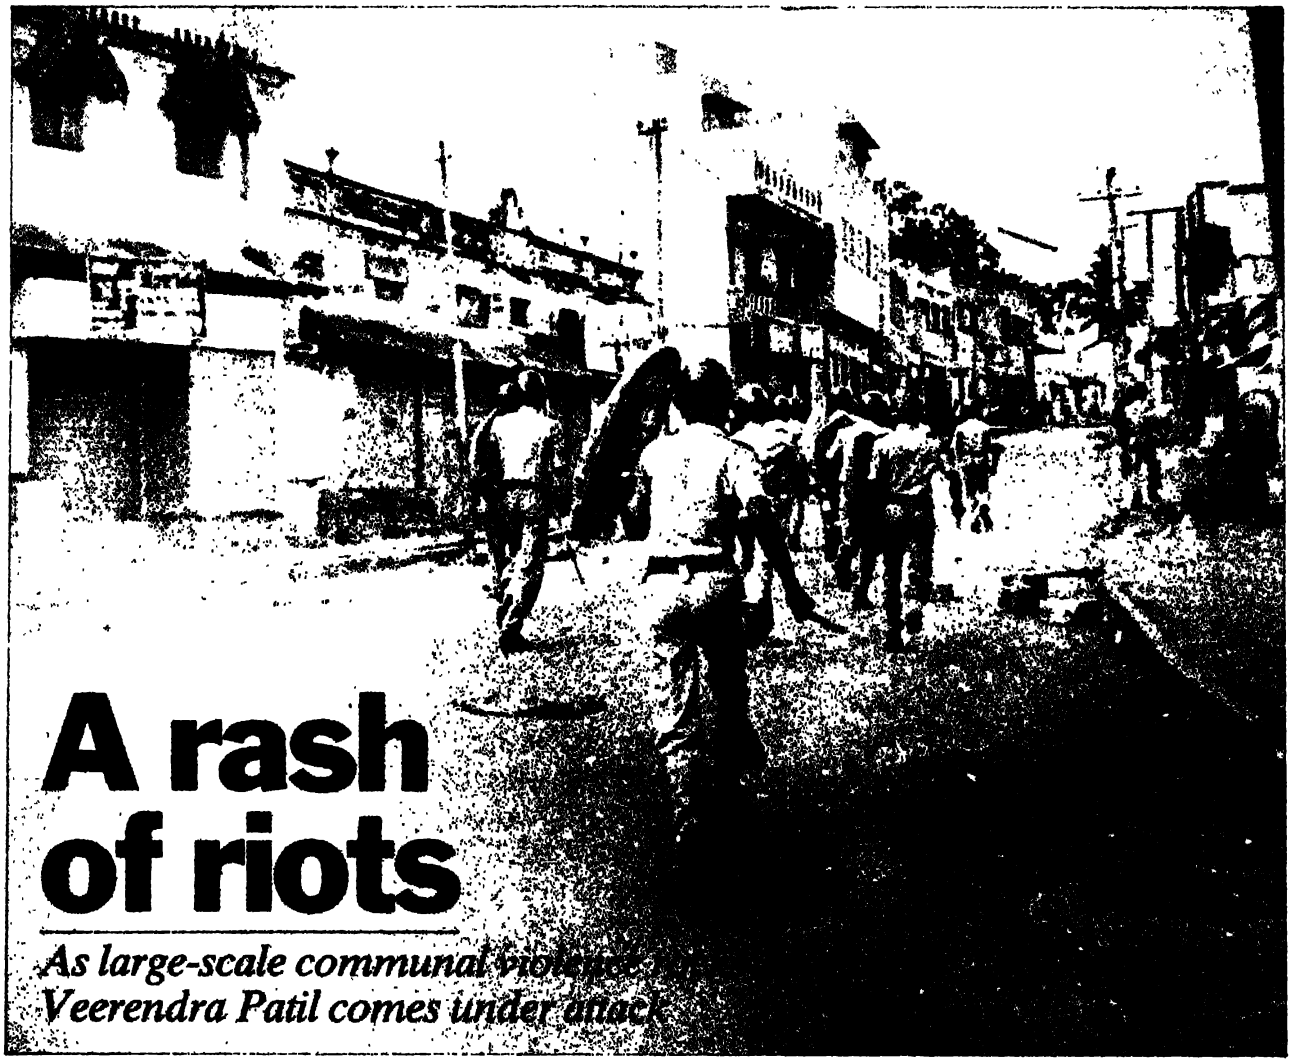
In the prevailing tense atmosphere, this was perceived by the Hindus as a "clever camouflage" for a well-planned attack by the Muslims. The procession, which had reportedly drawn some 5,000 people mostly from the surrounding villages, was led by senior political leaders from all parties. They included the local MLA, Ajay Pratap Singh, an Independent backed by the BJP, Khadesh Chand Singhania, chairman of the municipality and a Congress(I) member, and Shri Narain Bhatt, chairman of the local VHP unit. The young activists, particularly those from the Bajrang Dal, were armed with tridents, maces, lathis and spears. Some Muslim onlookers alleged that the tractors carrying the idols had bricks and country-made bombs concealed in them. When the procession entered the Muslim-dominated locality of Nayee Bazaar and reached a mosque, Bajrang Dal activists raised provocative slogans.

The trouble began at this point, though in the maze of allegations and counter-allegations it is impossible to pinpoint its source. According to the administration, two Hindu boys were engaged in a mock fight with their swords, during which one of them was injured on the leg. Soon, the rumour spread that a Muslim was assaulted by a Hindu. The Muslims began pelting bricks and stones from the rooftops of their houses on the procession. This version is contradicted by some Muslim spectators who maintained that the inflammatory slogans raised by the processionists provoked a mild protest from them, as a result of which they were attacked. The few policemen posted in and around the area began firing in the air. The cops even broke into houses and rounded up people indiscriminately.



If the first blunder that the administration had committed was not heeding the warning of the Muslim leaders, its second mistake was not ensuring the safe passage of those who had come in from the villages back home. It proved costly, because almost at once the villages were rife with rumours that those Hindus who had not returned home, were massacred by Muslims in Colonelganj. The action now shifted to the rural areas. Pande Choraha, about ten kms from Colonelganj, typifies the pattern. Mohammad Yunus, a small farmer who supplements his earnings by stitching clothes, was the first victim. He recalled, "I was returning from the field at dusk when three men from this village—Ram Sabha, Jagdamba Tiwari and Durga Singh—waylaid and assaulted me." That night a mob of about 500 led by these three men descended on the Muslim hamlets and set fire to some ten houses after looting them to the cries of, "Jai Durga Mata". Some villagers alerted the cops at Colonelganj around three am, but they were turned away with the assurance that the forces would be despatched the next morning. Nothing of the sort happened.

The Muslims of Colonelganj had warned the administration well in advance. But the forces moved in only after the damage was done Around noon, a replenished force of nearly 2,000 Hindus stormed the place and set fire to the remaining houses. They didn't stop at that. This time they killed some of the Muslims and raped four women, who were too scared to disclose their identities. Eight members of just one family—that of Jameel Ahmed, a tailor—were hacked to death and their bodies thrown into the well outside the house. The village mosque was demolished, and the Koran was torn to shreds. The police force strolled into the village only that evening, by which time the damage had already been done. This pattern of violence was repeated in the other six hamlets which were attacked. All that the villages now have by way of security are contingents of the infamous Provincial Armed Constabulary (PAC), whose anti-Muslim bias is well-known. "Remove the PAC at once and instead give us arms to defend ourselves", is the demand of most Muslims in the rural areas.

A judicial inquiry into the riots has been ordered, and the officials who were in charge earlier have either been suspended or transferred. But the polarisation of Hindus and Muslims is total, and with the youths of the area geared up to join the VHP in Ayodhya on 30 October, what lies in store for the Muslims is anybody's guess. ●

A rash of riots

As large-scale communal violence rages, Veerendra Patil comes under attack

It is a state that has prided itself on its record on communal harmony. Over the years, Karnataka may have witnessed the odd Hindu-Muslim clash. But in a country where large-scale communal riots occur periodically, it could still be held up as a model of peace and amity.

No longer. During the first week of October, a surprised government was caught off-guard when frenzied mobs went on the rampage in various parts of the state. The violence first erupted on 3 October in Chennapatna, some 70 kilometres from Bangalore and then spread like wildfire to far-flung places such as Kolar and Davangere. In just four days, the official death toll at all the three places was over 30.

At the end of last week, the unprecedented riots appeared likely to have a serious political fall-out. AICC president Rajiv Gandhi, who made an unscheduled visit to tour the communally-ravaged areas in the state, announced the sack of chief minister Veerendra Patil and promised that Karnataka would, from now on, have a government that "works". In response, a combative Patil—who is ailing from a paralytic stroke—announced from his sick bed that there was no question of his stepping down. He argued that the demand for his resignation was a prerogative only of the Congress legislature party and not that of the high command. At the time of writing, it is difficult to say how this political clash will resolve itself, but Rajiv and Patil may well be heading for a no-holds-barred showdown.

If chief minister Patil could be held directly responsible for failing to avert the mayhem, it was because he is also home minister. And although he has been laid up since 24 September, Patil, until recently, failed to transfer the portfolio to one of his colleagues.

Moreover, it was also possible to argue that the state should have anticipated—or at least been more prepared for—the large-scale violence. As early as 2 September, there was a communal clash in Ramanagaram, with neighbours Chennapatna. An altercation at a gambling den led to four people being beaten up, the burning of many huts and a number of stabbing incidents. Although curfew was imposed and the situation brought under control, the government—perhaps misled by the air of peacefulness—had not taken enough steps to soothe frayed nerves.

Clearly, the violence that shook Chennapatna a month later caught Patil and his government napping. The match for the ensuing conflagration was lit when a Hindu boy teased a Muslim girl. When rumourmongers managed to successfully portray the eve-teasing incident as a molestation bid, mobs belonging to both the communities took to the streets.

In the frenzy, 17 people were brutally killed - either clubbed to death or burnt alive. Concentrated attacks were carried out on Muslim-dominated areas of the town. The rampaging mobs gutted houses, resorted to looting, and destroyed vehicles and shops.

The incidents at Chennapatna were quickly followed by trouble in Kolar. The problem began when some miscreants attempted to destroy the decorative illuminations that were lit to mark Prophet Mohammed's birth anniversary. This led the Muslims to take to the streets and destroy a few vehicles but the police were able to bring the situation under control by imposing a curfew. The following day, however, Hindu communalists retaliated and by nightfall many people had been injured—two fatally stabbed.

As the violence cast a tense atmosphere all over the state, the ailing chief minister Patil, who had been virtually politically inactive—summoned an emergency meeting of the council of ministers. Curfew was declared in the riot-hit towns and surrounding areas and the police were armed with shoot-at-sight orders.

But even as the state government was preparing to send teams of ministers to the affected areas, there was more disturbing news. Communal violence had broken out over the Ram Shila Jyoti processions at Davangere in Chitradurga district.

The processionists bearing the Shila Jyoti had assured the police that they would not march through areas inhabited by the Muslims. But then for reasons best known to them—went back on their word. When warnings to keep the procession away from sensitive areas failed, the police resorted to tear-gas shelling and firing in the air. Instead of dispersing, the mob retaliated by pelting the police with stones. Finally, the police took what it says was its last option. It fired at the crowd killing one person.

Even as it was engaged in trying to control the mob, communal violence—which led to eight people being stabbed to death—broke out in other parts of Davangere. At the end of the day (7 October), a nervous state administration took large-scale preventive measures—a number of villages and towns were placed under curfew and, as a precaution, Section 144 was even imposed on the state capital, Bangalore.

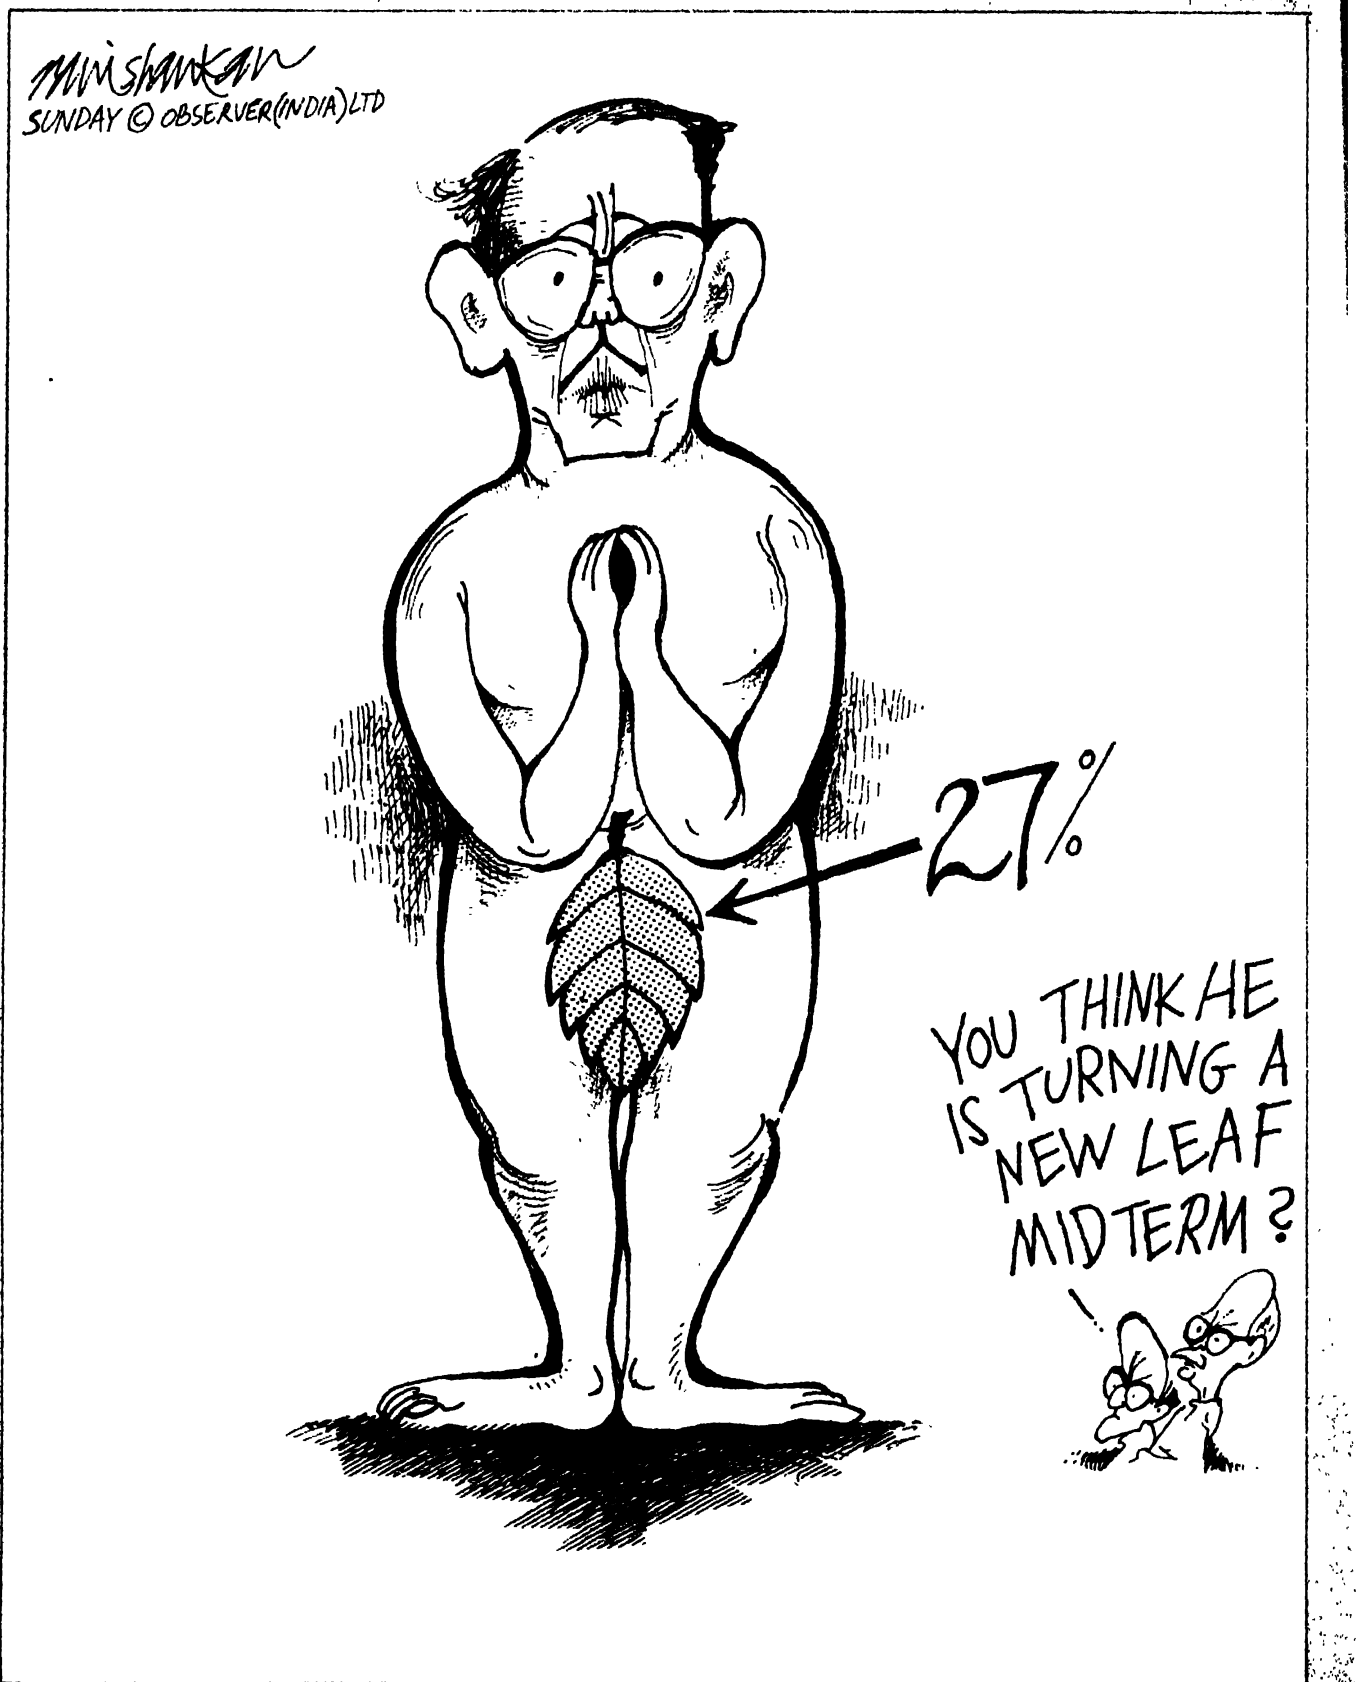
The rash of riots revealed that the state police is woefully ill-equipped to deal with large-scale disturbances of this kind. Says one high-ranking police officer: "For long, it has been a recognised fact that the police force in communally sensitive areas needs beefing up. But successive governments have done nothing about it."

For the moment, anyhow, the administration has deployed as many platoons as possible in all the affected areas. In Chennapatna, which saw the worst of the violence, large numbers of policemen keep watch over deserted streets while the people do not so much as dare peep out of their windows. Says a resident: "Everybody is surprised that this could have happened. Both Hindus and Muslims have lived amicably in this town for decades. The last riot that we had here was in 1946 and the peace has been undisturbed since."

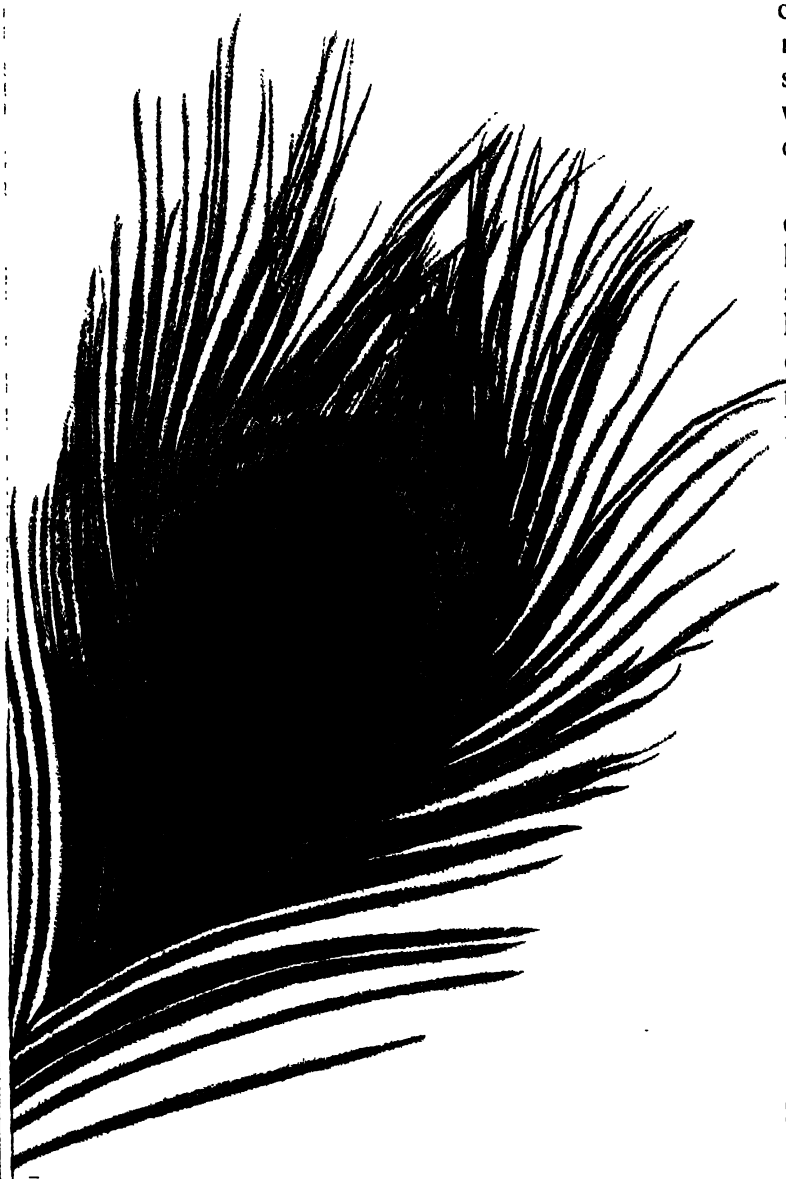
FLASHPOINTS

At least 60 people have been admitted with injuries—some serious—at the government hospital in Chennapatna. Says 40-year-old Riyaz Pasha, who is suffering from severe wounds at the hands of a rampaging mob: "They singled out my house as I am the only Muslim who lives in the locality. They spared my family but they left me only after they clubbed me repeatedly on the head and broke my arms in a number of places."



Even as the government was believed to have achieved a measure of control, there was even more violence—this time of a casteist nature. In northern Bidar, a clash broke out following an argument between two drunken youths which resulted in the death of seven people—four of them, including a girl, were roasted alive.

Chief minister Patil is going to have a hard time explaining the failure of his government to control the relentless spate of violence, which has left the state numb with shock. His more immediate problem, of course, is likely to be the Congress high command. Although Patil has given in to pressure and handed over the home portfolio to Cabinet colleague K. Ranganath, he appears adamant about not stepping down.



Whatever the outcome of Patil's wrangle with Rajiv Gandhi, there is no doubt that the chief minister's detractors within the state Congress will begin using his poor health and his failure to check the rioting to politically undermine him. There is a danger that, in the following weeks, the Patil-Rajiv squabble will draw attention away from the carnage that was perpetuated in Karnataka in the first few days of October. But if Karnataka wants to keep boasting about its hitherto enviable record on the communal front, then it will have to think hard and long about what went wrong in those terrible days.●

It's not on birds alone that feathers look good.

Many a time, it takes simple logic to manufacture what is required.

The Indian weaving industry, by inducting hi-tech looms, started producing world-class fabrics to meet the discerning tastes of the Indian public.

And Indo Rama set up a state-of-the-art 25,344 spindles plant to meet the requirement of the sophisticated weaving looms which would not work except with top-quality, zero-error yarn.

Which explains why the electronically-cleared, spliced, knot-less and contamination-free synthetic blended yarns from Indo Rama have become the first choice of all major textile manufacturers and exporters in India. In just one year.

And why over 50 percent of the company's production is exported to premium Europe – Germany, France, Italy, the UK, Belgium, the Netherlands, and Switzerland.

And also why the company is already on its way to doubling its capacity with a 100% export oriented Cotton and Polyester/ Cotton yarn project.

We have earned our feathers. The birds will be eating their hearts out.

You don't need the magic of a maestro's touch to be a Raymond's man

What paint and brush were to Picasso, the Santoor is to Pandit Shiv Kumar Sharma – an extension of a supremely creative will. In his inspired hands, the Santoor has transcended rhythm and melody and sings to the world in the inspired language of his beloved Kashmir.

On social occasions, when heads turn at his presence, it is certainly not because of his flawless sherwani which may just happen to be tailored from Raymond's sparkle polyester, wool and silk. A fabric with impeccable feel and fall, it never fails to sing the praises of its wearer.

THE FLOOR SHOW THAT FAILED

It was hardly the kind of reception she was expecting. Or reviews, for that matter.

For, things went downhill quite rapidly from the time the Indian high commissioner to London Kuldip Nayar inaugurated the Mamata Shankar show. The performance by Shankar's dance troupe was panned variously as: "mind-numbingly puerile", "a hybrid of East and West and perverting both stylistic sensibilities", "so-called experimental choreography" and even as a "night club-style floor show" for which the West had little use.

Wrote the dance critic of The Guardian: "We no longer need the kind of patronising and simplistic initiation to Indian dance which Mamata Shankar peddles."

As beginnings go, this was hardly fortuitous.

But Mamata intends to go through with the tour.

As they say in the business, the show must go on.

CHAL MERI LUNA

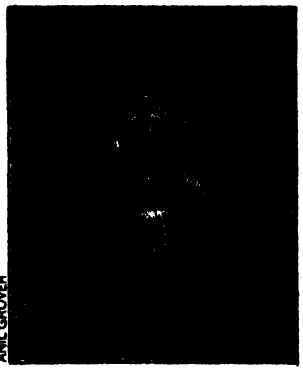
No, he doesn't qualify for a driving licence: he's under age.

But when you're Sachin Tendulkar, such minor details don't deter people from signing you up for "Conserve petrol" campaigns.

Though in this instance, the campaign is only a thinly-veiled advertisement for Kinetic Engineering Ltd, with Tendulkar asking everyone to plump for the fuel-efficient Luna moped to beat the current petrol crunch.

Of course, since Sachin's too much of a baby to carry things off on his own, there's Indian captain Mohammad Azharuddin join in with a vehement "Chal meri Luna".

But, without a doubt, Sachin steals the show with his baby-faced charm.



UTPAL SORKAR

CLOSE ENCOUNTER

It started off with a fairly routine complaint. Some neighbours of Yamini Krishnamurthy called the police to allege that the Bharatnatyam dancer's practice sessions were keeping them awake at night.

And soon enough, a policeman landed up at Krishnamurthy's house in Alwerpet to investigate. But he wasn't in uniform, and the man-friend who opened the door wasn't too convinced about his antecedents. An altercation followed, with Yamini, who tried to intervene, being assaulted by the officer of the law.

ANIL GROVER

Yamini Krishnamurthy: did her ghungroos make too much noise?

The dancer's friends were hauled off to the police station, with Krishnamurthy following in her car. More abuse followed with Yamini and her friends being arrested.

Of course, they were later released on bail. But by then the damage had been done.

And the PR exercise that followed didn't make things any better.

FEMINIST IRE

In popular perception, she is the prime candidate for canonisation. But noted feminist and author of the much-acclaimed The Female Eunuch, Germaine Greer, has her own views on Mother Teresa.

In a column for The Independent (London) colour magazine, titled Heroes and Villains, Greer wrote: "Mother Teresa is good; everyone agrees that she is good. To be considered so good is a fearful hazard for the immortal soul. Yet Mother Teresa does nothing to correct the popular tendency to canonise her by acclaim before she is dead."

That wasn't all. Questioning the piety of the newly re-elected head of the Missionaries of Charity, Greer continued: "Mother Teresa is a religious imperialist who believes that Hinduism and Islam are wrong and Catholicism is right. She is not ministering to the poor of Calcutta for their own sake but for the sake of their Catholic God ...Mother Teresa epitomises for me the blinkered charitableness upon which we pride ourselves and for which we expect reward in this world and the next.

Now, however, Bordes wants back into civilisation. And she has announced her arrival in the human world by donning her safari jacket and a baseball cap to cover a football match in England for a local Sunday paper. "It is my first football match," Pamella admitted coyly, before dashing up the soggy field to get a close-up of World Cup English star Paul Gascoigne.

THE GERMAN QUESTION

You can't fault his timing. On 3 October, when the two Germanys reunited, director Mrinal Sen began shooting his new film in the back streets of Calcutta.

And no, this wasn't going to be the usual story of middle-class angst, but would focus instead on German unification, with Sen examining the implications of this international event, through the persona of a Bengali youth who returns from East Berlin to come up against the chaotic situation in his own country.

Mrinal Sen: going international

The film, Sen's first in Bengali after Kharij (1982), will pay special attention to the reaction to the unification in the erstwhile state of East Germany, once the initial euphoria wears off.

Sen, who has spent the last few months researching his subject, is confident that his film will faithfully project "a very disturbing experience of changes at home and abroad". •

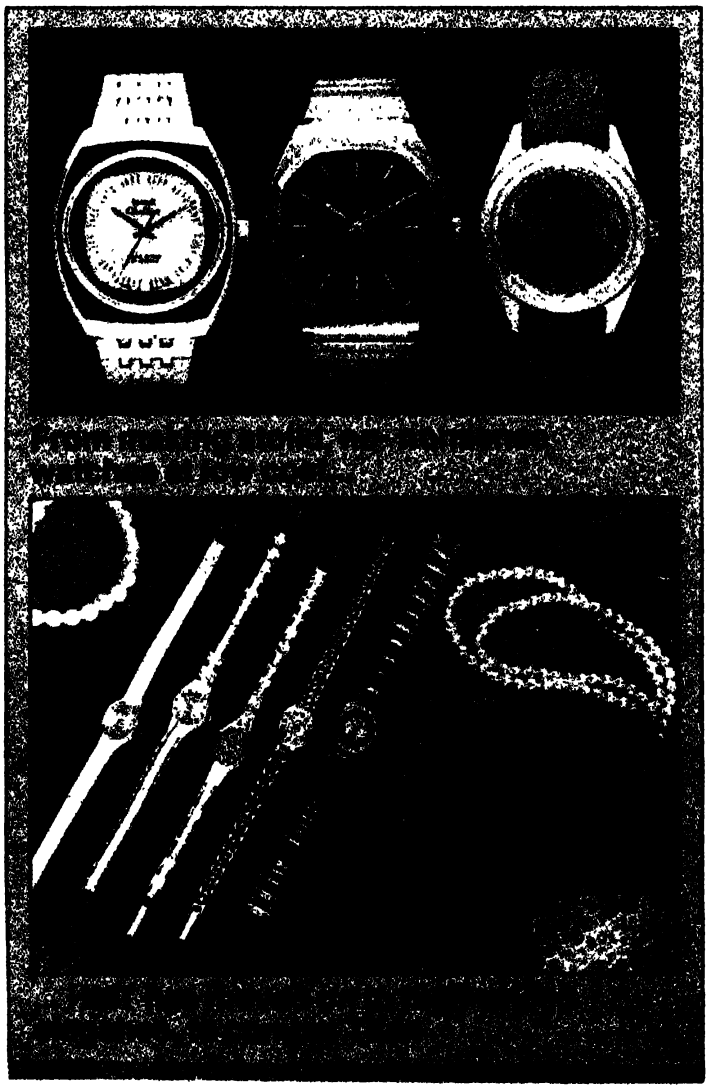
WATCH OUT!

Titan and HMT slug it out in a war to tell—and sell—time



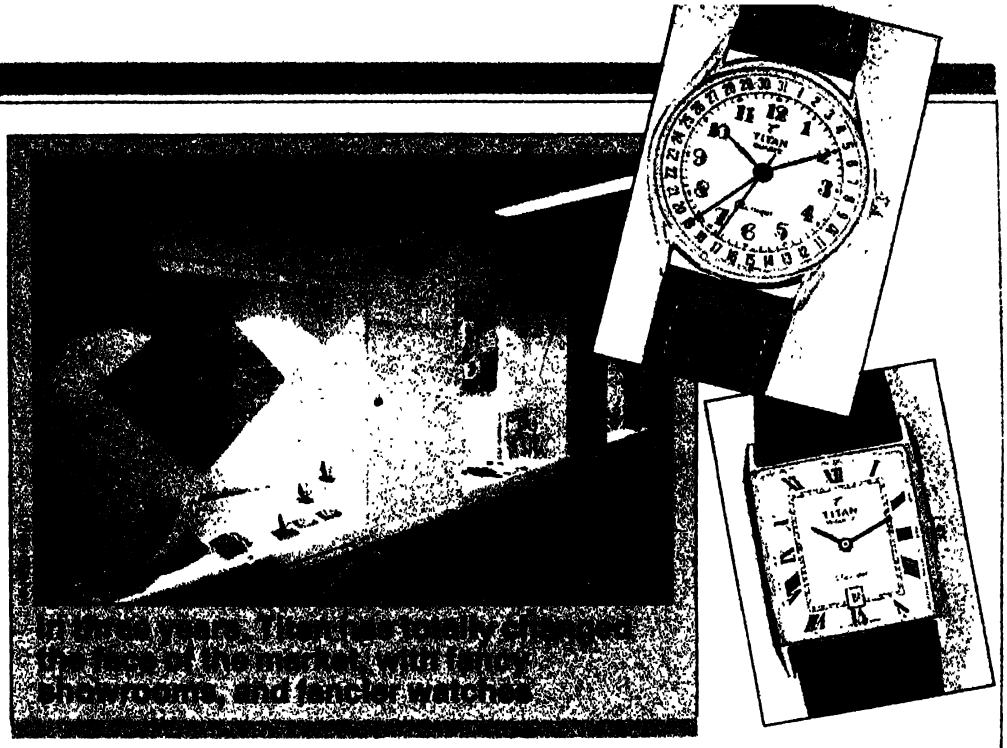
Very simply, it's a battle for time. .Quartz time. And the two key players are giving it all they have to go for a win: 30-year-old public sector giant HMT Ltd, and private company Titan Watches Ltd, three years old, and in a hurry to command India's Rs 600 crores a year-plus watch market.

The war has been on for a while. HMT threw its weight around till 1987, pushing a stolid line of moderately priced, no-nonsense, mostly mechanical watches. Then, Titan stepped in with its all-quartz range, both flashy and elegant, raising the stakes from HMT's Rs 300-700 line up to its own Rs 400-1,800 one. HMT introduced new designs, and in March this year, hit back with its Rs 3,000 a watch Elegance range, to outclass Titan's less expensive Classique models. Now Titan, not to be outdone, is planning to introduce a Rs 5,000 collection of watches by the year-end.

The game, accompanied by massive advertising hype—Titan's ad budget is close to Rs 3 crores, and HMT is not doing too badly, either—in print and television time, is as frenzied as it can get, with both dealers and urban consumers being wooed constantly.

Titan's tack is mainly on advertising. "Yeah," says Ravi Kant, Titan's vice-president for marketing and sales, "then at the time of purchase the product speaks for itself." And displays, for that final bit of hard-sell. "We have a team of architects," says Kant, "who undertake the designing of showrooms, and a group of people in the company who undertake the design of displays."

HMT has 35 exclusive showrooms and more than 5,000 dealers and retailers countrywide. By comparison, Titan has 21 exclusive showrooms—expected to increase to 50 by end-1990—and 300 dealers and retailers all over India. An increase will, inevitably, mean that some HMT outlets swing Titan's way.



So, HMT is fighting back, shedding its monopolistic stupor and going out of its way to convince sellers that HMT is where the buck stops. "Whenever there is a watch dealer who wants to sell HMT," says M.R. Naidu, the government-run organisation's managing director, expansively, "he shall have it (the dealership)."

There is a reason behind Naidu's generosity. For, this is not simply a battle between a public sector company and a pivately-run one—both Bangalore-based—it is a battle to get to the top.

In a way, Titan already has.

The background: in India, the annual demand for watches, at 17 million, far outstrips the supply of about ten million. Even adding on the three million or so smuggled watches that find their way into the country's Rs 600 crores a year-plus market hardly helps much. In this situation, whatever anyone makes is sold. No question. HMT is the king, lording over with a seven million watches a year production figure. Titan expects to sell two million this year, and number three, Allwyn Watches Ltd, estimates sales of 1.5 million.

There is a major difference, however. While HMT's and Allwyn's sales include mechanical watches, Titan only makes quartz, battery-operated ones. And here, in one of India's fastest growing—over 60 per cent annually—markets, which could soon swamp the hand-wound one, Titan is tops. For the year-ending March 1990, Titan sold 1.2 million quartz watches, HMT half that figure, and Allwyn was nowhere near "Look," protests Naidu, "HMT watches are still popular."

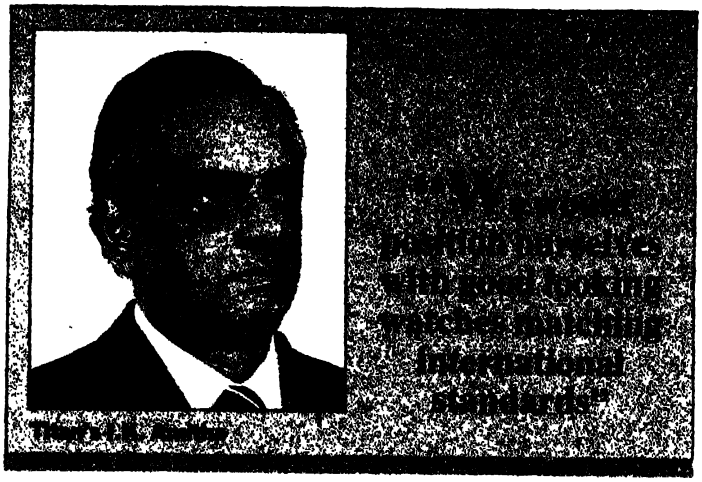
"We are not time keepers to the nation," says Titan executive vice-president A.K. Manchanda, smiling as he makes a dig at HMT's advertising catchline. "A two dollar (about Rs 36) watch can keep time as accurately as a Rolex. But today, people are more aware of their appearance, to the face they present to the world." The watch is an integral part of this attitude, says Manchanda, and "accuracy or time keeping is no longer what is in question". Adds Titan's senior vice-president for operations, I.K. Amitha: "HMT established worldwide that India can produce watches. But after that... nothing has been done to upgrade the product to international standards."

This is precisely where Titan came in, hinging its success on the hope that as quartz movement watches were the rage the world over, why not cash in on it in India? Titan did its homework, surveyed the market, found out why people still buy watches from abroad, and so on. And then, says Amitha, decided that "we would position ourselves with good-looking watches matching international standards". Playing on the assumption that as urban incomes in India were growing rapidly, and as people were using more and more of their discretionary income to buy shoes, clothes and see the world, why not turn part of that income to buying Titan watches? And, accordingly, unleashed glossy, saturated advertising to play on the age-old I-desire-therefore-I-want attitude of a consumer.

The ploy worked. Three hundred designs like nothing India had ever seen before, ranging from flashy, sedate to elegant. And in a price range India had never seen before, either, one that said good looks and quality do not cost the earth.("It's the product which changed the market," says a top Bangalore advertising executive, who declines to be identified. "The advertising merely placed it up front.")

In three years, Titan's turnover has zoomed from zero to Rs 74 crores for the year-ending March 1990. The company went public last year, declared a dividend this year, and the scrip is a hot buy at the stockmarkets. In comparison, HMT's watch division, which accounts for over 30 per cent of the machine tools, farm equipment and electrical goods manufacturing corporation's Rs 600 crore turnover, grew by Rs 50 crores to touch the Rs 200 crore mark. For both mechanical and quartz watches

This is not simply a battle between a public sector company and a privately-run one. It is a battle to get to the top



The irony of it all is that HMT introduced quartz watches way back in 1981, six years before Titan made its flashy entry. Says HMT managing director Naidu, a little ruefully: "It was HMT that identified quartz was here to stay. But, for a variety of reasons and constraints (the production) couldn't grow fast enough."

One was consumer resistance, say HMT executives, which was on the lines of "hamein battery ka ghari nahin chahiye"—an expected response in a country long used to mechanical, hand-wound watches. "When we decided to launch quartz watches in the country," says M. Jagannath, general manager of HMT's watch marketing division, "HMT had to embark on an educative campaign, make the people aware, had to assure them of the serviceability of quartz." The corporation, says Jagannath, started off with a annual quartz watch production of two lakhs a year—one-third its 1989 sales—and spent Rs 120 per watch (a total of Rs 2.4 crores) for the "educative" campaign.

Quartz sales picked up gradually, but was never in high gear. Because, say many industry insiders, while the campaign worked, HMT watches still continued to look dull, not very different from the mechanical incarnation. In effect, what HMT did was prime the market for something more appealing. "We provided the infrastructure," admits a top HMT official who declines to be identified. "We also created the competition."

The prime competition was the Tata business group, which received a go-ahead for the Rs 90 crore project in 1986. The Tatas hold 25 per cent of the shares, the Tamil Nadu Industrial Development Corp. 26 per cent, and the rest split between Unit Trust of India, Washington-based International Finance Corp. and the Indian public. Titan's technical associates are impressive. France Ebauches for watch movements, and Japan's Citizen Watch Co. for cases.

Citizen also provided HMT's initial knowhow, and a company official sneers at Titan's Ebauches link: "France Ebauches in fact offered the movements to us, but we declined." More angst, and this time, in a typically public sector vein. "Our objective was to bring the quartz technology to India," says C. Subba Rao, general manager of HMT's watch directorate. "We are not traders. The country's needs have to be met. We can't keep depending on imports."

This is where it cuts to the bone. As far as Titan is concerned, the import bogey is something it has to contend with: while HMT can claim what it offers entail a 10 per cent foreign exchange outflow, the Titan project, say industry observers accounts for 50 per cent. Quality for a price, say HMT executives, the country can hardly afford—even if consumers think otherwise. Titan imports and therefore, it scores over HMT, seems to be the implicit message.

Titan officials, expectedly, disagree. Says Amitha, the Titan vice-president: "In the first two years, yes, we imported various components because the government didn't allow us to manufacture (them). But now, the indigenised component is 80 per cent. In fact, next year we are aiming at 90 per cent." Little things point to Titan's "foreign" element. The date disc, for example. Many Titan watches display 'Sam' –the shortened form of Samedi.

Saturday in French—instead of the regulation 'Sat'. "In the first two years," says Amitha, "we were importing the day disc from France. Now we are manufacturing it ourselves. So, slowly, even that will be changed." He adds, hurriedly: "That doesn't mean the entire watch is imported, contrary to what people say."

HMT can go on bickering about imports, and Titan can go on defending its position, but both are very clear about what to do next. For Titan, the gameplan is simple: go for the quartz kill. For HMT, it is as simple, prevent the kill, and instead, turn hunter. "Remember," says HMT managing director Naidu, bringing up the point that HMT has been around far longer than Titan and is practically a household name, "marketing does not merely mean going and selling but at what cost I am selling. A man entering the market today has to spend more to deal with the existing competition. We don't."

As if to add some punch to the threat, HMT is going in for a massive ad campaign—executives decline to say exactly how much it will cost, but, it could well be over Rs 1 crore. Says a Rediffusion Advertising executive, whose agency is handling the blitz: "This campaign is going to give HMT the thrust it needs to fight back and recover lost ground." Maybe not, suggests Vijay Bhat, manager with rival ad agency Ogilvy & Mather in Bangalore, and handler of the Titan account. Because, says Bhat, "the difference between Titan and everybody else in the watch market, is that Titan doesn't underestimate the consumer."

Perhaps, it is only fitting that ad executives pick up where the watch company bosses leave off, in a marketing end-game that will decide the future time keeper of the Indian watch industry. It will definitely be a future clocked in quartz movements. And the winner? Nothwithstanding the cliche, only time will tell. ●

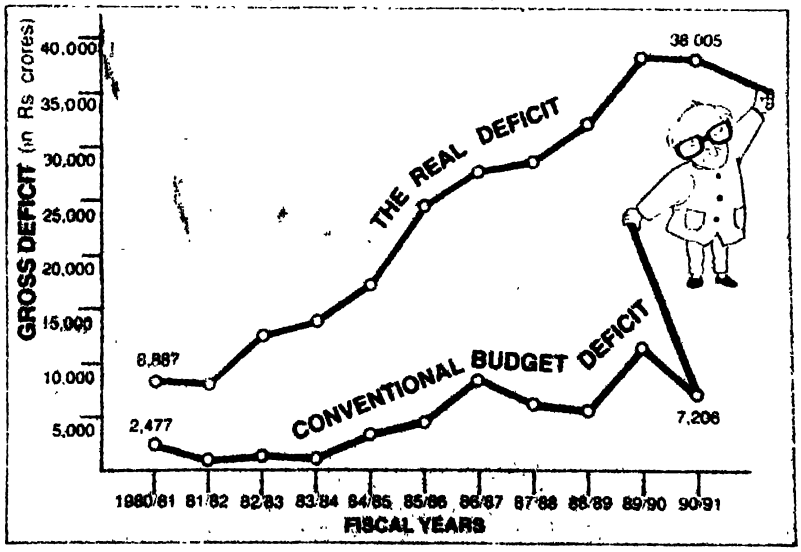
OUT OF CONTROL

It is a long road down to ruin, and the economy could head that way frighteningly soon

The Indian economy could go off the rails. Very soon. Not because it is moving too fast, but because the government is out of fiscal control. A series of recent studies, culminating in the Reserve Bank of India's latest annual report published last month, are flashing danger signals, all warning that the era of the government as the engine of economic growth might well be over. Runaway, unproductive expenditures, increasing difficulties in squeezing additional tax revenues and mounting investment requirements are making it virtually impossible for the government to stay on the fast growth track. Worse, if the government's fiscal structure derails, the rest of the economy will crash as well.

The problem essentially stems from the government's cast iron linkage with the economy. The government has over the past 40 years deliberately built itself up as the biggest player in the national economy and today, finds it can neither afford to slacken nor get out of the game. Gigantic public sector steel plants, power houses, shipyards and other government enterprises have come to dominate the Indian industrial skyline. How much they invest, produce, and at what cost, are crucial matters for the rest of the economy. The government, similarly, keeps much of the private economy going with massive subsidies, multi-crore rupee purchases of foodgrains, fertilisers, defence items and countless other commodities.

In the Nehruvian past, public enterprises were created to pull the economy up by its bootstraps. In the next phase, government investments continued to prime the economic pump. The years when government spending—specifically investment—slumped, so did the fortunes of the private sector. Through the 1980s, high industrial growth rates were maintained, among other things, by ever increasing government outlays. But by the end of that decade it was frighteningly clear that the government could in no way keep up the frenetic pace to raise more resources for investment. For, less was coming in—public investments were increasingly being financed by borrowings and through budget deficits.



The government as an institution has acquired an inordinately high propensity for profligacy. The result: a fundamental fiscal disequilibrium. The manifestations were not immediately felt, and the previous regime in particular was highly successful in suppressing them.

But now it is all out in the open.

The Chasm: Successive administrations, including the present one, have tried to make out that the gap between its revenue (from taxes and public sector profits, etc.) and expenses is relatively modest. This gap has traditionally been shown as a 'budget deficit'. However it now appears that the conventional budget deficit figure hides more than it reveals. The Reserve Bank has presented a far more frightening picture of the chasm in

The deficit looks set to get worse

● The official figures for budget deficits, touted by the government year after year, always hide more than they reveal. In its latest report, the Reserve Bank of India has disclosed the alarming state of government finances—by pointing out that the "real" or gross deficit is far higher than what is claimed by the Centre.

(The gross fiscal deficit is the total gap between the government's spending, and its own resources, and includes internal and external borrowings.)

In the current fiscal year (1990-91), the finance ministry has shown a smaller official deficit, but in real terms, deficit has not decreased. In fact, it will increase.

government finances by pointing out that the figure of 'gross fiscal deficit' (GFD) more accurately measures the real resources gap. The gross figure measures the full impact of total RBI lendings to the government which, in recent years, have been subsequently higher than the 'conventional' deficit. The GFD also includes government transfers to the state treasuries, and its borrowings. And this figure is many times the conventional deficit (see chart)

The present administration has promised to slash the conventional deficit from Rs 11,750 crores in 1989-90 to Rs 7,206 crores in the current financial year. But the dismaying fact is that the gross deficit, at over Rs 38,000 crores, remains roughly at the same level as last year. The Union finance ministry has been able to keep the conventional deficit figure down because it hopes to borrow more from the people, financial institutions and foreign banking consortiums, get marginally more foreign aid and perhaps, a couple of extra thousand crores of rupees from the RBI.

Indebtedness: The disquieting part is the government's acceptance of borrowings as a legitimate way to cover a fundamental resources gap. The only snag, as every householder knows only too well, is that borrowings which do not create greater earning capacity can ultimately have only one result: bankruptcy.

And that is precisely where the government is headed. The Central government's total liabilities were already at the staggering level of Rs 2,66,913 crores at the end of the last financial year, a figure which works out to about 60 per cent of Gross National Product (GNP). These cumulative liabilities are slated to

FALL GUY

Madhu Dandavate's impassioned plea for IMF aid barely makes the grade

"India Seeks Crisis Funds...Hat in Hand."

In a September Washington, with a nippy breeze and some of the best weather of the year, the news of sweating Indians made disturbing newspaper headlines. Especially this year, because India has never been quite as desperate for aid. Ever.

In the US capital for the International Monetary Fund-World Bank meet, finance minister Madhu Dandavate and finance secretary Bimal Jalan did all they could to convince the gathering of finance ministers and bank governors that India's fiscal predicament is only temporary. Dandavate insisted in meetings that India's foreign exchange problems are tied to the Gulf crisis and should be treated as such. Are they? "India might just be sitting back to see what comes along," says John Lewis, a professor of economics at Princeton University and an authority on India's relations with the IMF and World Bank. "And so," says Lewis, "be included in a class of countries (affected by the oil shock) rather than go out and press its own particular case."

The stance appears to have worked. Rather than having to approach the IMF for a politically damaging medium-term loan, or a rescheduling of foreign debt payments, India is now fairly confident about receiving emergency funds to assist it through the oil crisis. A crisis that is likely to cost India almost US $ 3 billion (Rs 5,400 crores at current exchange rates) in the next year.

"The crucial question," Dandavate told SUNDAY, "is what are the expectations from the multilateral financial organisations. The situation being special and extraordinary, the remedy has also to be special and extraordinary." Earlier, the minister, in his IMF address, warned that the "economic slowdown in the industrial countries would have an adverse effect on (India's) export prospects, and higher interest rates would increase the burden of debt servicing". To put it simply: you are in trouble, we are in trouble, but you have more money. So, help us out.

It may not be that simple even if Dandavate's plea has scraped through: the paperwork is yet to be done. Questions are sure to be raised about how India is going to cope with the ramifications of having the third largest foreign debt in the world, and the largest outside Latin America. According to the World Bank's 1990 report, only Brazil and Mexico have foreign debts bigger than India's US $ 57 billion (over Rs 100,000 crores).

Equally ominous, the share of concessional aid in India's foreign borrowings has fallen drastically since the 1970s, and 40 per cent of the country's borrowings today are from the international credit market at full rates. Lewis, who touch an incredible Rs 3,06,876 crores by end-March 1991.

Perhaps more alarming is that this gargantuan government debt is roughly doubling every five years. This year as much as Rs 20,850 crores will have to be paid to service the Central debt in 1990-91 alone. To put it mildly, this is a lot of money—it constitutes over 16 per cent of total government receipts. Put in another way, this year's interest payments is about Rs 3,000 crores less than the total money the public sector will be able to raise, to build power plants during the next four years. And two-fifths of the

INDEBTED TODAY, THERE TOMORROW?

India's debt spiral is hopelessly twisted—and terrifying

● The Central government is hopelessly in debt: today, its cumulative liabilities add up to a nerve-shattering Rs 3,06,876 crore, or 60.3 per cent of gross domestic product. (GDP is the value of goods and services produced in an economy.)

In March 1981, the Centre's total liabilities stood at about 44 per cent of GDP. Since, the government has borrowed recklessly to finance its profligacy. Debt service commitments as a percentage of total Central revenues has shot up from 10 per cent to 16 per cent in just four years, prompting the RBI to warn of a vicious circle. "The increased interest burden invariably leads to a squeeze on capital expenditure," says the RBI report, "thereby inhibiting investment and growth."

chaired a World Bank Task Force on Concessional Flows from 1982-86, says that the drop in concessional aid levels forced India to increase its reliance on non-concessional public lending and commercial loans. It is this "harder mix" of borrowing, says Lewis, which is of concern, because of the high interest rates and the severity of debt servicing. Even before the Gulf crisis, the cost of servicing India's debt as a percentage of exports had reached an all-time high of 30 per cent.

Emergency bail-out or not, the crunch on foreign debt is likely to be felt soon, as repayments of US $ 2 billion are due to the IMF this year, largely from India's last medium-term loan of US $ 5 billion in 1982. Dandavate declined to comment on long-term debt, beyond his usual socialist fence-sitting, manifesto-thumping attitude in the face of a fiscal storm. "I have come to the conclusion," he told SUNDAY, in a repeat of his December 1989 line in an interview to the magazine, "that our habit of relying upon the soft option of loans and borrowing has to be restrained."

The emphasis is obviously on concessional loans and aid, but how much of it will India get, notwithstanding the minister's posturing? And how much of the minister's pleading will international banking consortiums lap up? Because, India's ability to clear interest payments on a huge debt—though a notch up from Latin America's disastrous record—is somewhat scary: how much more, [illegible] will India be able to take on without breaking up?

Dandavate and his team countered this apprehension by talking about sacrifices the Indian people made during the 1965-66 austerity drive. Then, Indians willingly gave up a meal a day, Dandavate told the IMF. He implied that his countrymen were willing to do it again, make sacrifices to ease the debt burden, and the Gulf crisis. The world may fall for this line, and help stem India's panic. But the question is: will Indians?

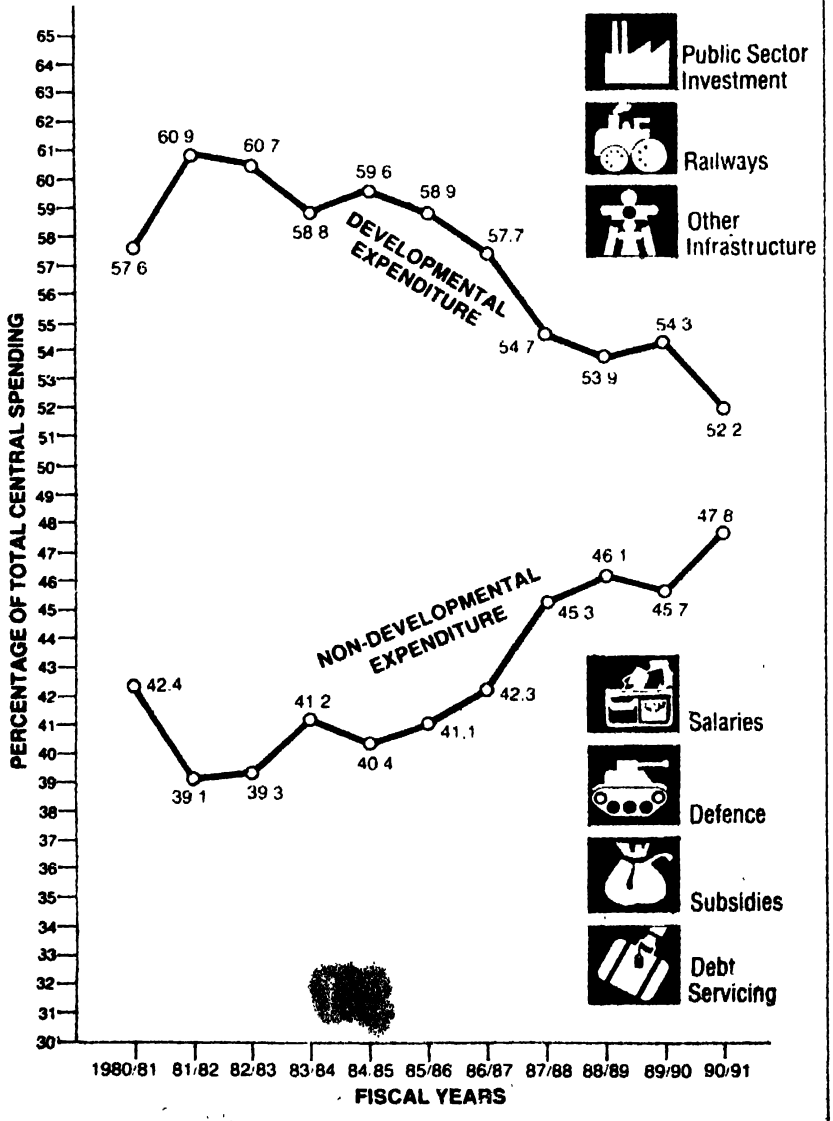
entire amount the private sector is expected to raise during the Eighth Plan period (1990-95) from the capital markets.



Improvidence: It would have been quite another matter if the government was borrowing desperately and printing notes to finance a mammoth programme to create productive assets. The fact is, it is not. Rather, the extra rupees being garnered are going towards meeting what is termed 'non-developmental' expenditure: salaries, ministers' trips abroad, Bofors guns, subsidies, interest payments, ad nauseum. Interestingly, the gross fiscal deficit figure has come to exceed the Centre's total annual plan expenditure. In other words, if the government had not resorted to deficit financing and borrowings, its investments would be zero. All the crores of precious taxpayers' rupees are being gobbled up to maintain the Central bureaucracies (the armed forces included) and their routine functions (including the payment of dole to favoured sectors such as farming.)

The situation was not half as bad even in the early part of this decade, when the gross fiscal deficit in any one year ruled at levels below that of annual Central plan expenditures.

The government turns around to stall the growth machine

● The government is supposed to be an engine of growth. But the danger of going off the rails is very real. Hundreds of crores of productive, investible funds are being diverted to pay for non-productive salaries, subsidies, interest obligations and the armed forces. The likely result: recession.

The villain was Rajiv Gandhi's administration. Rajiv came in with a promise to liberalise the economy but ended up by investing more money in the tottering public sector in just five years than his grandfather had in his entire lifetime. The Rajiv regime's spectacular ends were achieved through record levels of market borrowings and deficits. As a matter of fact, in the last year of his rule, Rajiv set the record for 'conventional' budget deficits- Rs 11,750 crores. If his regime achieved anything, it was to ensure that the government was permanently pushed into the red.

No ideas: The fiscal disequilibrium created during the Rajiv years was brought to the new government's notice immediately after the elections. In December 1989, the Economic Advisory Council (EAC) headed by the late economist, Sukhomoy Chakravarty, submitted its report on 'The Current Economic Situation and Priority Areas for Action'. The most telling portion of the report was on the state of government finances. Of particular concern was the fact that "a significant part of the borrowed resources goes towards covering the revenue gap and non-remunerative capital expenditures. Since the commercial activities (of the government) also do not generate a sufficient return flow, this means that interest payments are not counterbalanced by a return flow of income in the budget". In short, the EAC had warned of bankruptcy.

As a first fix, the report had suggested that the government should try to contain the growth in non-developmental expenditure, but without suggesting how the government could go about doing this. It had, moreover, stressed that without correcting the fiscal imbalance it would be impossible to ensure development without inflation and balance of payment (BOP) problems.

Inflation, according to the EAC, was bad because it hurt the poor and wiped out the real worth of hard-earned savings and a BOP crunch was bad because it curtailed imports required to keep the economy going. That was stating only part of the problem. At any rate, the finance ministry too had no new ideas on how to drastically cut down on non-productive expenditure.

The 1990 Budget was full of good intentions: employment guarantee schemes, debt relief for farmers, and a Rs 4,000 crore fertilizer subsidy, among other things. But there were no hard decisions. A close look at the latest budget figures shows that the bad old trends continue. For instance, developmental expenditure is slated to rise by just 3.8 per cent whereas non-developmental expenditure is up by 13.2 per cent from the last financial year's levels. Borrowings too will be much higher this year. Coupled with the oil price hike thanks to the Gulf crisis, the overall crunch in government finances could reach crisis proportions sooner than imagined.

The Crunch: If the impact of the government's fiscal imbalance was only on prices and the BOP position it would not have been so alarming. Sure, inflation is tough and a cut in imports debilitating, but the two do not add up to a catastrophe. The problem lies elsewhere.

Specifically, it is, as the latest RBI report has pointed out, the "vicious cycle of higher deficits, higher debt and higher interest burden" which invariably lead to "a squeeze on capital expenditures thereby inhibiting investment and growth". This is the crux of the issue—and a point which the Economic Advisory Council glossed over.

There can be no getting away from the fact that public sector investments and the creation of government assets, such as dams, canals, roads and railways, is the single major determinant of economic growth rate after the agricultural sector. Just how major a factor public investment is can be gauged from the amount of money annually invested in the public sector. During the first four years of the Seventh Five Year Plan (1985-89), total gross fixed capital formation (that is, investment in plant, machinery, etc.) was Rs 1,35,696 crores for the public sector as compared to Rs 1,27,543 crores in the private sector.

If the public sector is big, it is, as everyone knows by now, also colossally inefficient. During the Seventh Plan period it was supposed to finance 52 per cent of the total Central Plan but ended up providing just 37 per cent. This government knows only too well how badly it is weighed down by the public sector white elephant. In all, there are about 222 public enterprises with a total employed capital of more than Rs 70,000 crores, and earning post-tax profits of an average 3 per cent or less. Simply, the public sector makes for a high cost economy.

Cutting Corners: Faced with the public sector drag and the fiscal imbalance, the new government has chosen the easy way out. It has decided that it cannot invest ever-increasing crores of rupees in the public sector. Not necessarily because it does not want to, but because it just does not have the money. The 8th Plan outlay for a critical sector like power, for instance, has been slashed from Rs 48,000 crores to Rs 24,000 crores. The private sector has been asked to put up power plants to make up for the shortfall. But not surprisingly, the private sector is balking. It just does not have that much money.

The government has over the past 40 years deliberately built itself up as the biggest player in the national economy and today, finds it can neither afford to slacken or get out of the game

The bigger point, which the government seems to have conveniently missed, is that the private sector, presently, cannot take on the commanding role played by the public sector overnight.

Years of bureaucratic controls, government stranglehold over institutional finance and hothouse economic conditions have made for a relatively feeble private sector. The tens of thousands of crores required to keep industrial growth rates above the eight per cent level (as was achieved during the 7th Plan) simply cannot be achieved by the private sector alone. The government's hope that private companies will be able to raise a mammoth Rs 50,000 crores from the capital markets during this plan period might just be wishful thinking and at any rate, would not be sufficient to meet a major shortfall in public investments.

This means a downhill ride for the economy in the next few years.

And it could be a long, long way down •

INDUSTRY/ NEPOTISM

All in the family

Kerala industry don K.P.P. Nambiar faces charges of favouring his son's company in an export deal

Even a month ago, K.P.P Nambiar had no problems. The former secretary of the department of electronics had his hands full as a key policy man in Kerala, as the state's special advisor for industries.

Now, however, things are radically different. Nambiar faces allegations of corruption and nepotism. The former bureaucrat is also part-time chairman of state-run electronics outfit KELTRON, which is thinking of exporting digital control systems to the USSR. At a recent board meeting, the corporation suggested that Bangalore-based Namtech Exports Pvt. Ltd be appointed agents to pursue the export deal.

The thing is, Nambiar is Namtech's chairman. And his son Padman owns the company.

If the charges of favouritism prove to be true in this case, it could affect a key Kerala minister, K.R. Gowri, who holds the industry portfolio, and is widely believed to be one of Nambiar's mentors. More importantly, the same tag is applicable to chief minister E.K. Nayanar.

Trade unions, which have a free run of the state's business and politics, are baying for Nambiar's blood. The left-leaning Centre of Indian Trade Unions (CITU), in particular, is already upset about the way Nambiar is running KELTRON, and blames Gowri for it. The CITU and other unions insist that Nambiar, in a written statement issued them earlier this year, made it clear that the National Thermal Power Corp. will handle all control system procurement for shipping to the USSR.

Namtech came into the picture, suddenly, two months ago. KELTRON switched mid-stream and proposed that Namtech be paid 7.5 per cent of the f.o.b. (free on board, or when a contract says the seller will incur all costs of putting buyer's consignment on board a vessel) value of export orders. A percentage of f o b. is considerably higher than a percentage of the total cost of goods.

Nambiar flatly denies any wrongdoing. Says he: "A gang of four, including two disgruntled elements from KELTRON who have connections with the Marxist party are on a smear campaign against me and the industry minister, Gowri amma." Nambiar admits that Namtech belongs to his son "who is a highly qualified engineer." He adds: "I had made it clear to the government of Kerala when it sought my services that I will continue to work as consultant and as chairman of my own companies. The posts of KELTRON chairman and special advisor to the Kerala government were part-time and honorary, without executive powers."

In fact, Nambiar goes a step further to say that till Namtech came on the scene, KELTRON did not have a single export enquiry about control systems in its books. It was in July 1989, he says, that Namtech received information about Soviet queries through a Moscow associate. Nambiar took over as KELTRON chairman on 1 December the same year, but critics, such as the CITU, are quick to point out that as he was already special advisor to the state government, he was in a position to influence KELTRON decisions.

Nambiar: nepotism could nail him

Perhaps some of Nambiar's confidence stems from the fact that chief minister Nayanar is backing him—at least for now—to the hilt. Nayanar has made it clear that Nambiar will not be investigated, and publicly denied that anything was wrong about KELTRON's proposed move to appoint Namtech as agents. The allegations are totally baseless, maintains Nayanar—turning down his party-affiliated trade union's views—as there is no formal agreement.

Ironically, at about the same time that Namtech moved in, Nambiar was involved in an enquiry which aimed at censuring another person accused of nepotism: Satyen "Sam" Pitroda. Nambiar headed the 13-member investigating panel which was looking into Pitroda's allegedly favouring two of his family-run hi-tech firms in the US with plum orders from his brainchild, the Centre for the Development of Telematics.

"The two cases are totally different," says Nambiar. "I am not a government employee. I am a private citizen doing private work. Only, I am spending more than half my time for the industrial progress of Kerala." A noble pursuit. The point is, Pitroda is as much a "private" citizen as Nambiar. And, like Nambiar, devotes considerably more than half his time to run India's telecom operations—as secretary of the department of telecommunications. All for an honorarium of one rupee.

Chief minister Nayanar may find—even if he sticks to his assertion that the Nambiar–Namtech-KELTRON link is clean—that jettisoning Nambiar may be a way to stall growing political instability. ●

■ The last Tang(o)

Hope it swings this time around. Kothari General Foods (KGF) chairman D.C. Kothari went public with a merger announcement last week, a move to foist his chronically sick processed food and drink unit onto Brooke Bond India Ltd. KGF has toted up losses of almost Rs 20 crores as of end-March 1990, and a merger means Brooke Bond—now in the Hindustan Lever fold—will have to pick up all the liabilities. Perhaps what makes the move worth it is the KGF stable of brands, leading with Tang, the concentrated orange-lemon breakfast drink, plus cereals, none of which took off. Brooke Bond can capitalise on the brands. What can also help are tax benefits for picking up KGF losses.

The Kotharis hold 33 per cent equity in the ailing Madras-based company, Kraft General Foods of the US another 33 per cent, the rest being split between the public and financial institutions. Brooke Bond says it prefers to pay cash for equity, instead of offering its own shares in exchange to KGF shareholders. Wise move. Now all that remains—and this is crucial—is approval for the deal from the increasingly quirky Board for Industrial and Financial Reconstruction.

Kothari has his fingers crossed: he can't afford to muff up this number.

■ Farewell

Pure Drinks chairman Charanjit Singh died last week. A tragic event, for no entrepreneur would like his life to be cut short when he is trying to claw back to prominence. This is the essence of a businessman, always keen on high notes.

Singh's legacy is disturbing. Flagship company Pure Drinks, the makers of Campa Cola and Campa Orange, has been steadily losing out market share to Parle Ltd's Thums Up and Limca. And with the advent of Pepsi, the trend is set to become still more pronounced.

The Meridien hotel in New Delhi, which Singh opened with much fanfare five years after the 1982 Asiad deadline, is another problem. It is in the middle of a legal tangle, with accusations that Singh got the land illegally, constructed the hotel without proper clearances, and besides, was totally overextended on loans. In addition, the New Delhi Municipal Corp. is shouting its head off about the Rs 25 crores or so Singh owes them in taxes.

As of now, nobody knows where Pure Drinks is headed.

POLITICIAN OF THE WEEK

Arif Mohammad Khan

Union minister for energy and civil aviation

● In the thick of it, that's Arif. The minister—one of the few that people still believe in—is caught in the middle of two completely different developments. One is privatisation of power, which the minister plans to push through with. The other is his bugbear, the Airbus A320. On the first count, the private sector is suddenly having some doubts, saying that liasing with the bureaucracy and the state electricity boards for sale and distribution of power may not be worth it, and returns on investment could take as long as 10 years. About the A320, the less said the better. Even after ferrying thousands of evacuees from the Gulf, the planes remain grounded in India. There is talk that A320s may be reinducted, but Arif, for one, and passengers, for another, won't believe it till it happens. The credibility factor strikes again.

■ Who needs poverty?

Not the World Bank, at any rate. And officials are livid that one of the Bank's former members have suggested that officials should quit on extravagance. Michael Irwin, a top UK civil servant who resigned from the Bank, told the Washington Post that "poverty reduction is the last thing on most World Bank bureaucrats' minds". Irwin also suggested Bank officials should travel Business Class instead of First.

Sacrilege, screamed the Bank. An Asia regional office adviser, Grant Sinclair, wrote in the Bank's in-house magazine that Irwin's suggestions are pointless, and would achieve nothing "but a lot of dissatisfaction". Sure, who wants to give up on paid holiday perks? Irwin's former boss Bislel Alisbah, went one up. "Mr Irwin must either be terribly ill-informed or frighteningly insensitive," he said. "My family and I will not feel safe again until Mr Irwin is replaced by someone who really cares." He was.

Poverty, according to the Bank, has to be handled in style. First Class is one of the ways to handle starvation. Sure, and add on some caviar. ●

ANIL DHARKER

A conspiracy of silence

There is an acute absence of real information on the implications of the Mandal report

"I have been on the national political scene from the time of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. If I had wanted to be Prime Minister, I would have succeeded Panditji. The point is, I don't want to be PM."
—Biju Patnaik, Orissa chief minister

"I would like very much."
—Chandra Shekhar, Janata Dal leader, on being asked if he would like to become Prime Minister

These gentlemen were speaking in Delhi about their concern for self-immolating students. Did the students, busy making human torches of themselves to make V.P. Singh see the light over the Mandal Commission recommendations, realise what strange torch-bearers Messrs Patnaik and Chandra Shekhar made? But they weren't the only ones. Another torch-bearer was Devi Lal, whose conscience was so bruised over what was happening to the students that he resigned his parliamentary seat. "I am writing," his resignation letter began, "with deep distress and heartfelt anguish over the way our young boys and girls, even in their early teens, are sacrificing their dear lives by self-immolation, consuming poison or otherwise."

How did Devi Lal further express solidarity with the agitating students? He sent in goons hired by his favourite son, Om Prakash Chautala, to Delhi. According to a report in The Independent, the Bombay paper I work for, "Young men armed to the teeth with pitchforks, spears, lathis, acid bulbs and country-made rifles went on a rampage...They had come from the outlying areas of Delhi and Haryana."

The Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) of L.K. Advani expressed its concern too. Mr Advani said, "The government is displaying insensitivity to the extreme and terrifying phenomenon of self-immolation by several students," and went on a rath yatra from Somnath to Ayodhya. He wasn't bothered that violence followed in his wake. Not anti-Mandal violence, but the communal kind. In a country going up in flames, he was adding his own little fires.

Rajiv Gandhi's party didn't say much, preferring action to words. A report by The Independent's Delhi special correspondents, Smita Gupta and Vidya Subramaniam, quoted intelligence reports pointing to "the direct involvement of senior Congressmen in the agitation...The reports have identified Congress(I) MPs P.R. Kumaramangalam and Harish Rawat as the chief forces behind the students' Equality Front, and east Delhi's strongman H.K.L. Bhagat and ex-MPs Sajjan Kumar and Jagdish Tytler as the financiers of the agitation." Most of these characters have been mentioned in connection with the 1984 anti-Sikh riots in Delhi. They have,

V.P. Singh's portrait is now being garlanded by deprived people as their first real champion after Babasaheb Ambedkar. There wouldn't be too many garlands if it were known that only 40,000 jobs were being reserved you could say, the requisite experience.

What about the man in the eye of the storm himself? V.P. Singh was maintaining an obstinate silence. Talk to me, he was saying to the students, but my mind is made up.

There is a certain piece of information he could have given out to them. Had he used this in his address to the nation on television, it is certain to have reached all the agitating students all over the country. The relevant information was this: the Mandal Commission's far-reaching recommendations have been considerably diluted by the government. It has been announced that these will not apply to states which don't want to implement them, to science and defence establishments, nor to educational institutions. After all the watering-down, the reservations now apply to only about 40,000 jobs in the central government. Is that small number worth all the agitations, all the violence and all those immolations?

So why did V.P. Singh keep mum? Because to announce that his pro-Mandal reforms were so feeble would have been certain to thwart his main purpose, which was to get votes of the Other Backward Classes and the Scheduled Castes and Tribes. People tell you that V.P. Singh's portrait is now being garlanded by these deprived people as their first real champion after Babasaheb Ambedkar. There wouldn't be too many garlands if it were known that there were only 40,000 jobs being reserved.

Devi Lal's conscience was so bruised over what was happening to the students that he resigned his parliamentary seat. He further expressed solidarity with the agitating students by sending in goons hired by his favourite son, Om Prakash Chautala, to Delhi

The other political parties knew V.P. Singh was trapped into silence. So they were going to do their best to exploit the situation for their own political ends: for Devi Lal, Chandra Shekhar and Co. of the National Front to serve their personal ambitions; for the BJP and the Congress(I) for their political ones.

The absence of real information to the students was total. Take another example. Akhilesh Pandey is a 17-year-old student currently battling for his life in Bombay's Jaslok Hospital. Some days ago, he tried to immolate himself in Gwalior, depressed over the job quotas and depressed, especially, about the fate of Rajeev Goswami. "When he heard about the death of Rajeev Goswami," his father said, "things went out of control." As it happens, Rajeev Goswami of Delhi, the first student to have immolated himself, isn't dead, at least when this is being written. He certainly wasn't dead when Pandey tried to kill himself "depressed over Goswami's death".

That says something about our television and radio, and says even more about our press. The conspiracy of silence on this question, so vital to the self-interest of politicians and their political parties, envelops the press too. With one or at most two honourable exceptions, no newspaper has bothered to tell the facts of the diluted job quotas. It wouldn't serve their purpose. After all, the press too has been agitating against Mandal. Didn't the Indian Express editorially exhort students to take to the streets well before they actually did so? Of course, it added a rider: agitate peacefully. That's so much wishful thinking. Even Mahatma Gandhi, in a largely non-violent climate, couldn't control the crowds. The Times of India has written its longest editorials on this one subject, not once but three times. Some papers have even doctored the news to suit their purpose. And ultimately, not one paper has asked the students to call off their agitation.

Why the torrent of opinion and the silence on facts? I have no figures, but the viciousness of the anti-Mandal campaign in the press makes me wonder: are all journalists upper caste? And is there a—perhaps subconscious—caste bias at work?

It's not often that politicians of all hues and the media of all colours are on one side of the fence. When that has finally happened, you see the frightening results. And the victim is truth, and the victim is our country. ●

Running amok

Tihar Jail prisoners make an abortive attempt to escape

DELHI

Even as the anti-reservation agitation raged in the capital, another kind of rioting claimed nine lives in Delhi's Tihar Jail last week. Three convicts and six undertrials were shot dead and over a hundred prisoners and staff injured in what was the high-security prison's worst-ever jail-break attempt.

The prisoners, who tore down several walls and broke through iron gates by blasting them with gas cylinders, reached the outer wall of the heavily-guarded prison before being overpowered by the Tamil Nadu Special Police battalion and the prison guards. Over a thousand rampaging prisoners came threateningly close to entering the high security area, where JKLF militants, including Yasin Malik, are being held. Said a jail officer, who escaped with a couple of lathi blows on his back: "Not in all my ten years in Tihar have we witnessed anything like this. For a while, it was as if the prisoners had taken over, and they would soon be free in the streets." Eye-witnesses reveal that even those prisoners who had not engineered the jail-break attempt suddenly felt that freedom was close at hand, and joined the rioting.

It all began with a feeble excuse. Investigations reveal that the escape attempt had been planned in advance and the schemers had waited for the right moment. The opportunity came in the early hours of Friday, 5 October, when Hari Singh, a convict serving a life term, died in one of the jail's barracks. As the news spread through Central Jail number one, belligerent prisoners started shouting that the authorities had deliberately neglected the prisoner, and that the attending doctor had allowed him to die. The police point out that Hari Singh was a smack addict, who frequently suffered severe bouts of asthma, and that the prison doctor rushed to his side minutes after the prisoner complained of uneasiness. Thirty minutes later, Singh, who had been convicted for armed dacoity, was declared dead.

According to H P. Kumar, inspector-general, prisons, the trouble that followed had nothing to do with Singh's death. After the dead body was placed on the jail's chakkar (roundabout) for inspection by a sub-divisional magistrate, two convicts of the notorious Babbu Tyagi gang, Rajan Mehta and Balbir, instigated their fellow-inmates at the breakfast table to take the prison authorities to task. Before the prison guards realised what was happening, the convicts, serving in the langar (dining area), were sprinkling vegetable oil on a pile of blankets and setting them ablaze. Entering the kitchen, they grabbed cylinders, hurled them against the iron gates and threw the burning blankets on them to cause a series of explosions. The prisoners ran amok, with more and more of them joining in as four successive prison walls were breached with iron pipes, uprooted from the cells. The iron gate near the kitchen area, which seemed impregnable till a while ago, was reduced to a mass of mangled metal when a gas cylinder exploded next to it.

An entire battalion of the Tamil Nadu Special Police force and the prison guards rushed in as the alarm was sounded. But it was impossible to curb the swelling mob, which had broken through four cells, one short of the special security area where the JKLF militants were lodged. The police said that the women's cell (number three) had also been stormed, and several women molested, before the battalion could swing into action. But, despite using teargas shells and lathis, the police were unable to control the bedlam, which lasted some five hours.

Besides keeping the security forces at bay, warring factions of prisoners attacked each other, causing an unprecedented bloodbath. Police say they were forced to fire 26 rounds, mostly at inmates on top of the barracks, before the situation could be brought under control around 12.30 pm. But not before nine people had been killed and over a hundred others injured.

Throughout the day, cars and ambulances were used to evacuate the wounded. Many of them had been hurt by bricks and pieces of glass that were being hurled about to ward off the prison staff and policemen. Police say that 76 of the injured belonged to the jail staff and the security forces. Defending the battalion's decision to open fire, inspector general, Kumar says: "They (the prisoners) just had to break the last wall to come out of the jail and on to the main Hari Nagar road. Only then did the special force open fire."

Sources in the home ministry admit that the rioting would not have taken on such devastating proportions had the prison not been overcrowded. Originally, the high-security jail was built to house 1,000 prisoners—on the day of the jailbreak, there were 2,035 inmates, 185 of them women, in Central Jail number one alone.

"Every jail has its own history of jail-breaks, but this would have been something of a record, had it worked," says a Tihar staffer. Unfortunately, the government is just not giving the jail's expansion as much priority as it should." The jail manual stipulates that hardened criminals and convicts should be housed separately from the undertrials. "But that is not possible due to the tremendous pressure on space," he adds.

In recent years, there was only one major jail-break attempt at Tihar before this. Charles Sobhraj, the notorious international criminal, had escaped his high-security cell after conniving with corrupt jail staff. The jail's security was considerably beefed up after the Sobhraj incident, and it was further tightened during the Indira Gandhi murder trial, when Sikh militants were brought here. "It is only because the prison is to some extent water-tight that the plans of the prisoners were foiled," says a home ministry official.

An inquiry into the jail riot, headed by Ashok Kumar Banerjee, a retired IPS officer, will go into the details of the incident and suggest preventive measures. Meanwhile, to make up for the gaping holes in the walls, three additional CRPF battalions are guarding Tihar jail, and the inmates will not be allowed out of their cells until full security is restored. "Our main suspect, Rajan Mehta, is dead, and his accomplice, Balbir, is seriously injured," says a jail official. "We are hoping that the inquiry will mean that more attention is paid to making Tihar the high-security fortress it is reputed to be." ●

Tikait addressing the Boat Club rally: promising violence

The BKU bluster

Kisans upstage students in the anti-reservation agitation

DELHI

The belligerence continued. And so did the firings, the lathicharges and the attempted self-immolations, as the anti-reservation stir rocked the capital for the sixth consecutive week.

But as time wore on, political parties, especially the Congress(I), and hoodlums took over what was predominantly a students' movement. This became clear from incidents of mass lootings in Palam Vihar and Shakarpur, both strongholds of Congress(I) stalwarts Sajjan Kumar and H.K.L. Bhagat respectively. Police officers say that the violence in the two areas had been sparked off by known Congress supporters.

More pronounced was the newfound prosperity of the movement, which was ostensibly being flooded with funds from different quarters. Stickers screaming, "Don't blame me. I didn't vote VP", were being offered to car drivers free of cost by the students at every crossing, printed shirts and kurtas proclaiming, "The gods must be crazy. They made VP", and "VP Singh is injurious to the nation's health" were being sported by every other agitator. And, during the six-day blockade at the crossing adjacent to the All India Institute of Medical Sciences, a full-fledged kitchen had come up to feed the students. "A lot of money is being pumped into the agitation, obviously by political parties capitalising on the situation. It is no longer in the students' hands" said a Delhi administration official.

That the students had been pushed to the back seat in their own movement, was evident from the much-touted anti-reservation rally on 2 October. Though conceived as a joint rally of students, farmers and urban intellectuals, the gathering turned out to be nothing more than an aggressive show of strength by Mahendra Singh Tikait, the leader of the Bharatiya Kishan Union (BKU). Weeks had gone into contacting student leaders all over the country for the rally. On the final day, however, students were hardly to be seen. Dominating the scene were an estimated 35,000 farmers who had come from neighbouring Haryana and the rest from Uttar Pradesh. As a senior Delhi police officer put it, "Tikait could have hardly managed to get the crowd himself. Obviously somebody of Devi Lal's stature has pulled strings to get 35,000 people from Haryana."

Armed to the teeth with spears, pitch-forks and lathis, the volatile crowd was spoiling for a fight. As nervous police personnel watched from the sidelines, the city intellectuals —former ambassador to the US Dr Karan Singh, former foreign secretary S.K. Singh, the eminent lawyer, L.M. Singhvi, and the litterateur, Amrita Pritam—were persistently booed and shouted down Amrita Pritam, the last of the group to speak bore the brunt of the crowd's ire. Tired of the 'sane' speeches on how the Mandal Commission was fragmenting the country, the volatile crowd snatched the mike away from her and shouted for the BKU supremo, Mahendra Singh Tikait.

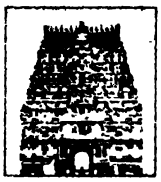
And, Tikait didn't disappoint them. In keeping with the mood of the crowd which jeered everytime Mahatma Gandhi was mentioned, Tikait exhorted them to burn every MP and MLA. 'What is the point in setting yourself on fire. If you have to die this way then first immolate all MPs and MLAs," the farmer leader thundered and his followers listened with attention "Give us the run of the country for only one month and all problems will be solved," he shouted, and the crowd cheered lustily.

As was to be expected, the rally ended with two water tankers being burnt, shops being looted and three people, including a policeman, being killed in firing. "We have had enough. Anti-social elements have taken over the city. We are not going to allow anymore of this," said the police commissioner of Delhi, Vijay Karan, addressing an impromptu press conference after the violence.

With the agitation slipping out of their hands, the Anti-Mandal Commission Forum, which had been spearheading the movement, immediately distanced itself from the farmers' lobby. "The trouble with the BKU is that they talk more about themselves and less about the Mandal Commission," said a student leader. The students—some of whom were literally in tears at the way the demonstration went—fear that public sympathy might wear thin.



Besides blockades all over the city and no DTC services for days on end, the hapless Delhite had to face acute water shortage as the anti-reservation frenzy spread to the adjacent states. Many parts of Delhi went without water for two days as the agitationists in Haryana diverted water from the western Yamuna canal, which contributes 20 per cent of the city's water supply.

In the still hazy scenario with students, politicians and aggressive farmers jumping onto the anti-Mandal bandwagon, one thing is clear: the anti-reservation stir is going haywire. And the toll is rising and the suicides becoming more bizarre. •

Cheers for V.P.

The DMK holds a massive rally in support of the Centre's quota policy

TAMIL NADU

The north is north and the south is south While India, north of the Vindhyas, is burning in protest against the Union government's reservation policy, Tamil Nadu, down south, is rejoicing over the Centre's decision to implement the Mandal Commission's recommendations

Last month, Madras hosted a massive rally, attended by a galaxy of National Front leaders and thousands of DMK followers in support of Prime Minister V.P. Singh's quota policy. And the meeting, personally addressed by Singh and N.T. Rama Rao, the former chief minister of Andhra Pradesh and the chairman of the National Front, boosted the beleaguered PM's morale, who has come under relentless fire from the anti-reservationists in northern India.

The rally—held on 16 September—was timed to coincide with a number of important dates associated with the DMK, the birth anniversaries of the late C.N. Annadurai, founder of the DMK (15 September), and Ramaswamy Pariyar, a rationalist reformer and founder of the Dravidar Kazhagam, a precursor to the DMK (16 September), and the DMK's foundation day (17 September). And V.P. Singh gratefully accepted Karunanidhi's invitation to be the star attraction at the rally, though he was due in Madras again on 22 September to attend a meeting of the National Integration Council. "I am grateful to Mr Karunanidhi that in this struggle he came forward to lend support," remarked the PM.

Touching a Dravidian chord, Singh announced: "The dreams of the great Anna, Periyar and Ambedkar have all come true with the implementation of the Mandal Commission report ." The leaders on the podium and the crowd lustily cheered Singh's statement.

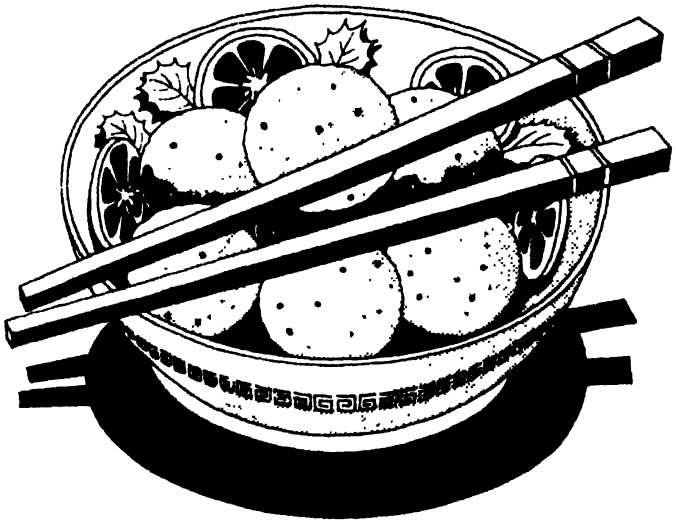
In fact, there could be no better platform for Singh than the one offered by Karunanidhi to declare with a fair measure of assertion that his government was not going to budge an inch from its 7 August declaration which brought alive the Mandal issue and plunged the country into a crisis. "It is a decision impelled by our conscience; it is a fulfilment of our commitment to our people," said the Prime Minister.

Karunanidhi presented V.P. Singh a silver replica of the Tiruvaur temple and went on to explain the symbolism behind the gesture. Karunanidhi told the gathering that soon after coming to power last year, he renovated the famous Tiruvaur temple car that had been lying immobile for about a decade. In a similar manner, explained Karunanidhi, it was V.P. Singh who bought the Mandal recommendations that had been kept frozen for 10 years.



The National Front and DMK leaders utilised this opportunity to launch a tirade against the Congress(I), and especially against its president, Rajiv Gandhi. V.P. Singh said that Rajiv had lost his right to continue as the leader of the Opposition in the Lok Sabha, as most of his party MLAs and MPs from the south were supporting the Centre's move while he was campaigning against it.

But organising a pro-reservation rally in Madras was no great achievement. Tamil Nadu had pioneered the pro-reservation movement in the early part of this century when the Justice Party came into being. The party vociferously campaigned against 'Brahmin domination' in education and administration and the first 'communal government order' was issued in this state (then known as the Madras Presidency). It provided for a compartmental reservation to ensure 42 per cent of the jobs for non-Brahmin Hindus and 17 per cent for the Brahmins. Muslims and Anglo-Indians too got 17 per cent each, and the backward classes (now known as the Scheduled Castes) were given eight per cent.

Since then, Brahmins in the state have always been at a disadvantage and the backward castes have ruled the roost. So Tamil Nadu would remain V.P. Singh's strong bastion in the quota controversy, even if every other part were to go up in flames. •

Fatal attraction

What drove Mukesh Aggarwal to commit suicide?

In the best traditions of Hindi cinema, it began with a telephonic romance. Rekha, the dusky sex symbol of the Bombay film industry wanted to be married. And designer-friend Bina Ramani was obliging enough to provide the number of a Delhi-based eligible bachelor. The fact that the portly figure at the other end was the star-struck owner of Hotline, Mukesh Aggarwal, ensured that it was strictly no contest. The couple married after a whirlwind courtship, and the air of the farcical that surrounded the entire episode was compounded when Rekha spent her entire wedding night to quiz friends and acquaintances: "Do you know who's calling? It's Rekha Aggarwal."

But less than seven months later, farce had turned into high tragedy as Mukesh Aggarwal hanged himself to death with Rekha's duppatta in his Mehrauli farmhouse (on the outskirts of Delhi). The suicide note dated 13 August (though Mukesh put an end to his life on 2 October) said that nobody was to blame for his death. But as far as friends, family and the general public was concerned, there was no doubt where the responsibility lay. With the wife, who had refused to see him over the last few months and had even served divorce papers on him a week or so before his death.

The star had her defenders. Those who insisted that Aggarwal had had massive financial problems and couldn't take the pressure any more; and yet others who maintained that he had been manic-depressive anyway, having already attempted suicide about six to seven times. But this was strictly a minority view. The conventional wisdom had it that Rekha had taken up with Aggarwal to satisfy a momentary whim and then dropped him when she discovered he was "too boring". The high-strung businessman, who was madly in love—even besotted—with his star-wife, couldn't take the rejection and preferred to die rather than face the humiliation of being projected as a loser.

The family seemed to go along with this version, crying out at the cremation (at Nigambodh Ghat, Delhi), "Rekha gai chulhe mein. Hamare bete ko kha gayee. (Don't talk about Rekha. She has destroyed our son.)" A wreath which didn't have the name of the sender was thrown away on the suspicion that it might have been sent by Rekha. Friends of Mukesh, including film star Deepti Naval who had flown down from Bombay for the funeral, chose not to speak to the press. But the animus against the wife was clear to even the most cursory observer.

While this drama was being played out in Delhi, Rekha was in New York, where she was supposed to stage a show. News reached her soon enough through her lawyer, and the star cancelled her programme in the face of her bereavement. Delhi gossip had it that she had taken the next flight back to India and would come to the Aggarwals' Civil Lines residence to the with them in this hour of loss. But the star never arrived and reports that she was in hiding in Bombay went uncorroborated as well. The Aggarwals maintain that she is still in New York, and has not bothered to even condole them over the phone. Says Anil Gupta, Mukesh's elder brother: "All we want is a sorry from her." But even that was not forthcoming.

But in the massive anti-Rekha campaign that followed the suicide, everyone seemed to lose sight of the fact that by all accounts Mukesh Aggarwal had been emotionally unstable even before his wife allegedly drove him to the brink. As far as business acumen goes there was no doubting his ability. Starting off with a small cycle repair shop, Mukesh graduated to making cycle lights which he supplied to Bhagirath Place. He walked to the market everyday for fear that the bus ticket would cut into his profits. His luck changed when he landed a contract from the New Delhi Municipal Corporation (NDMC). And Aggarwal celebrated by having his first big meal in a restaurant and riding back home in a taxi.

From then on, he just got bigger and bigger, setting up a company called Fusebase, which manufactured gas stoves and then diversified into television manufacture with Hotline. Around the time he married (at 37 years) the turnover of his companies stood at Rs 35-40 crores, and he submitted personal income tax worth Rs 10 lakhs every year.

But while his business career unfolded without event, the same couldn't be said about his love-life. In his mid-twenties, Mukesh met and fell in love with a Delhi society girl Kitty Malhan. Malhan seemed to reciprocate his feelings initially, but something went wrong somewhere along the line. Nobody is quite sure what the matter was, but insiders have it that she ditched him for a film career. She didn't make it—though her younger sister Jyotsna is now making her debut in Rajiv Rai's forthcoming release Vishwatma—but her betrayal proved too much for Mukesh and he tried to kill himself.

That's one version. Mukesh's elder brother, however, insists that the story about the suicide bid are completely untrue. Says Anil Gupta: "He just broke the TV screen one day in frustration. And a piece of glass flew at him and cut his wrist. So everyone thought he had tried to kill himself. But it just wasn't true."

Whatever the truth of the matter, it was around this time that Aggarwal met the one steadying influence in his life: Akash Bajaj. A divorcee with two daughters, Akash was nearly a decade older than Mukesh, but the two soon became the best of friends. Current gossip had it that she was his psychiatrist and that's how the so-called affair began, but Bajaj strenuously denies these rumours. She met SUNDAY a few days after the funeral to set the record straight: "I was never his analyst. Just because I have a doctor for a friend does not mean that I am ill. But I was very fond of him and with reason. He was one of the most generous caring and loving persons I have ever met."

Shattered after the event, Akash denies that Mukesh was suicidal. Yes, he did attempt suicide several times, she admits, but that was only during recent months.

But Bajaj has more to contend with than canards about the state of Aggarwal's mental health. A section of the press had it that she was the other woman in the Rekha-Mukesh marriage. The rumours began with the discovery of the note Mukesh left for his brother asking him to take care of Akash when he was gone. And once the gossip mill got going, there was no stopping it.

One story had it that Rekha and her husband had arrived at an agreement when they got married. Rekha, apparently, accepted the fact that Akash was a dear friend and would continue to see Mukesh. But she insisted that Bajaj keep away from the Mehrauli farmhouse, she could meet Aggarwal at the Civil Lines family residence. On two separate occasions, however, when the star called her husband late at night, Bajaj picked up the phone. Incensed at this, Rekha filed for divorce.

This version of events is somewhat suspect when one examines the evidence at hand. Akash, like the Aggarwal family, was completely thrown when news of the Rekha-Mukesh marriage broke. But like the dignified lady that she is, Bajaj gracefully withdrew from the scene. She recounts: "I didn't meet him after he got married. I wanted him to concentrate on his marriage and try and make it work. I just wanted things to work out with him."

"I was very fond of him and with reason. He was one of the most generous, caring and loving persons I have ever met"—Akash Bajaj (centre) with Deepti Naval

The friends met only a month later when Akash's mother died and Aggarwal came to the funeral. "I made my peace with him then," she says, "and then met him once more to sort out some business problems." Akash's company Opus supplied gas stoves to Aggarwal's outfit and she wanted to work out an arrangement until an alternate source of supply could be arranged. But that was the last Bajaj saw of Mukesh.

Until August, when a distraught Anil Gupta (Mukesh's elder brother) called her up to say that Mukesh had attempted suicide by taking an overdose of sleeping pills.

Relations between Mr and Mrs Aggarwal had been deteriorating for a while. Soon things got to such a pass that Rekha refused to take her husband's calls when he phoned her in Bombay. Mukesh was convinced that it was Farzana, Rekha's secretary, who was keeping them apart, and that if he met his wife things would soon be back to normal.

Therefore, he decided to fly to Bombay, accompanied by his sister-in-law who was deputed to keep an eye on him so that he didn't do anything stupid in an emotional fit. Once there, the Aggarwals went straight to Rekha's house, only to be kept waiting for several hours, without the actress making an appearance. Close friends of the family have it that Mukesh took the overdose in Rekha's house itself and had to be rushed to a nursing home. As soon as he had recovered he insisted on going back to his wife's house in a last-ditch effort to effect a reconciliation. This time, however, the securitymen would not even let him in, on instructions from their mistress. Mukesh sat down outside her gate and cried like a baby, but to no avail. He was forced to come back to Delhi, where he went even further into depression. The family maintains that the suicide bid took place in Delhi. But it was around this time that Akash entered the picture again. According to her, "His brother came to me totally shattered, and asked me to help them get Mukesh back to normal. My initial reaction was 'this is a matter between husband and wife, how am I involved?' But they insisted, so I went there and helped him by talking things over. He just wanted his wife back, and the family was trying to get to her."

They never succeeded in that attempt but Mukesh seemed to be getting better. He started working again, and even got his factory—which had been burned down—repaired in 90 days time. Normal life seemed to have been resumed with his signing cheques, giving instructions to his workers and getting back in control of his life. "Even the day before he died," discloses brother Anil Gupta, "he had signed 50 cheques."

On the morning of 2 October, therefore, when Aggarwal insisted that he be allowed to go to Mehrauli alone (he was never left alone because everyone was afraid he would harm himself), nobody thought very much of it. "I'll be back for lunch," he called out to his brother and drove off.

And a couple of hours later was found hanging from the ceiling with Rekha's duppatta, with her photograph in his pocket, and two notes by his side. The one addressed to his brother created some misunderstanding as it spoke of Akash Bajaj. But Akash maintains that there was nothing more to their relationship than friendship. "He knew I was alone in the world. I am divorced, my mother died some months ago, both my brothers are dead and I have two nieces and two daughters to look after. He just wanted to ensure that I would have someone to count upon as family."

Mukesh with Rekha: what happened to their love?

But in the spate of rumours which have been doing the rounds, truth is the first casualty. One version has it that Rekha tired of her husband when she discovered that he didn't have as much money as she thought he would. Another story is that the star wanted her husband to open a joint account with her to help her with income tax problems. He balked at that and the lady opted out. Yet another version is that Mukesh Aggarwal commited suicide because of money problems.

The last version is debunked by both family and friends. Even if he did have money problems, they say, it was no reason for him to kill himself. He had built up a business empire from scratch and there was no reason why he couldn't attempt a repeat. Also, no matter how grave the financial crisis, he certainly wasn't on the verge of bankruptcy.

The family also discounts the notion that Rekha married him for his money. Says Anil Gupta: "She has so much of money and property of her own. Why should she marry Mukesh for money? That is being unfair to her." And what lends credence to the denial is the fact that Aggarwal to the last believed that his wife loved him and it was only other people who were creating misunderstandings between them. Says Akash Bajaj: "He was convinced that she loved him as much as he loved her and that once he met her face to face all their problems would be over."

Once the initial bitterness wore off, however, a new villain of the piece emerged: Rekha's secretary Farzana. "It was Farzana who created all the trouble. She wouldn't even let her attend her husband's phone calls," alleges Anil Gupta.

But why did Rekha let her secretary call the shots?

"She has no friends, no company," explains Gupta. "So, obviously when somebody is so close as to stay with her and even sleep with her, she is not an ordinary person."

Farzana, apparently, refused to let the husband-wife relationship develop for fear that her importance would be reduced in the scheme of things. "She'd keep telling Rekha, 'you are Rekha, you are not an ordinary person, how can you keep going to Delhi to see your husband'. She would always be trying to create trouble between the two by insisting that Mukesh had been rude to her," says Anil Gupta.

Gupta, however, refuses to blame the actress for his brother's fate: "I blame my brother for marrying her," he says. "But I must add that there is no humanity in that woman. Until now she hasn't even bothered to call and say that she is sorry. Surely this proves that she is guilty."

But in the end, Rekha may well be the worst loser. If family sources are to be believed, Mukesh had made a will which excluded the actress completely. But the monetary loss, though much is being made of it, is the least of her problems. Whatever the extent of her culpability, it'll be a long time before the actress comes anywhere near being a public favourite again. ●

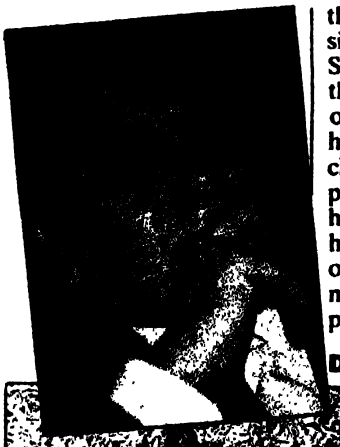
Seema Goswami/New Delhi

Of the three legends Raj Kapoor, Dev Anand and Dilip Kumar only two took to film-making. And now it is the turn of Dilip Kumar to join the gang. The lucky producer who managed to convince Dilip to direct a film is none other than Sudhakar Bokade of Izzatdar fame in which Dilip played a central character.

Nothing has been finalised though, and even the obviously-excited producer is maintaining a tight-lipped silence on the matter. People close to the camp, however, insist that this is just another ploy to generate curiosity.

There's nobody quite like Sattee Shourie—no not even in the big bad film industry.

After calling director Anil Sharma her beta and saying she was like a mother to him, the lady went a bit overboard. While having a heated argument with Anil over something regarding Farishtay, she lost her temper and slapped him hard.



She then proceeded to borrow a page from Nirupa Roy and started crying, profusely apologising all the while for her behaviour.

While Anil himself was too stunned to react, unit members of the film remained unimpressed with her histrionics and insisted that while her slap was all too real, her tears were definitely of the crocodile variety.

B. Subhash, the man who discovered Kimi Katkar and in the process won the gratitude of the entire male population in town, has signed another Kimi Katkar lookalike for his latest film Naachnewale Gaanewale.

The girl is none other than Sunil Dutt's discovery Sheeba who will be seen first in Dutt's Yeh Aag Kab Bujhegi. Possessing the same cat eyes, sensuous mouth and oomph as Kimi Katkar, Sheeba is well on her way to becoming the next sex symbol.

And now that the Farhas and Sonams are out of the reckoning, there's no stopping Sheeba.

Dilip Kumar: a new role

Kimi Katkar: easily replaced

With a mother as avaricious as Babita, Karishma Kapoor should have no problems adjusting to the ways of the film world. For even though Karishma has just signed one film opposite Salman Khan, Babita, in the manner of numerous other star mamas before her, has already started chalking out grandiose plans for her career. And has, in the process, showed herself to be quite adept at old industry games like manipulating dates and prices for her star daughter.

But isn't Babita being a trifle hasty, doing too much too soon?

Surely she wouldn't like to see her prize hen back home with a bad case of burnout.

Shakti Kapoor, celebrated loudmouth, seems to be going through a bad patch. And his complexes are showing up a bit too often. At the Salman-Naghma starrer Baaghi's cassette release function, the compere had left the stage to call someone with the mike in his hand, so, producer Nitin Manmohan loudly yelled across to Shakti asking him to come on stage.

Shakti Kapoor: too many problems

And Shakti just refused to budge. He folded his arms and dug his heels in and insisted that his name should be announced over the mike. And he went up on stage only after that was done.

You can't blame him really. It can't be much fun being on the wrong side of despair. No films, no girls and no liquor either. Right Shakti? •

A STILL FROM AJOOBA

MUCH ADO ABOUT AJOOBA

Shashi Kapoor defends his multi-crore venture

"They are all getting ready to attend my funeral," he chuckles. "But, I'm not ready to die as yet." So, why does everyone think that Shashi Kapoor is on the verge of bankruptcy, has mortgaged his house and has become an alcoholic? Simple. The release of Ajooba, Kapoor's much-talked about film (co-produced with the Russians), is taking time. And an industry that revels in making prophecies of doom was quick to suggest that the end was in sight for the portly actor-producer.

SHASHI KAPOOR

Explains an amused Kapoor: "It makes for good copy, doesn't it? Suppose Shashi Kapoor made a multi-crore film well within its budget and time-frame, what would be left to write about? Who would be bothered with this fat, 50-year-old, ugly man, otherwise?" Well, actually Kapoor is 52, but despite the fact that the once-famous drawl is today almost as thick as the waistline, there are still plenty of female fans to swear undying love for him. And even, in the case of one smitten creature in faraway London, send him a parcel of underwear from Marks and Spencer every six months, keeping unerring track of that ever-expanding girth.

But Kapoor's past caring about his weight; what is uppermost in his mind these days is Ajooba. And, one presumes, the almost one-year delay in its release. Kapoor attributes it to a variety of reasons: "Yeh to film industry hain, yahan sood pe sood hota hain. (This is the film industry. Here we pay interest upon interest.) Then there are date problems, star dates, studio dates."

Whatever the reasons, Ajooba, slated to be in production for 18 months, was 30 months in the making. And Kapoor now hopes to sell the film, made at a cost of Rs 8-10 crores, at Rs 85 lakhs per territory—a price guaranteed to make every distributor break out in a rash. Shashi, for his part, is confident about the chances of his film: "Ajooba will gross more than a crore-and-a-half per territory. After all, it has special effects, magic, fantasy, colour, a parrot, a cockroach, even Amitabh Bachchan." What's more, an Amitabh Bachchan who seems to have recovered his box-office magic if Aaj Ka Arjun is anything to go by.

But the box-office has its own logic. And if Ajooba fails to draw in the crowds, Shashi Kapoor could be in big, big trouble. For, the film is a deficit release: trade jargon for a movie which depends on box-office profits—not just territory sales alone—to break even. Kapoor doesn't seem to be suffering from nerves, though. Or, if he is, he certainly doesn't show it. "I am a great fatalist," he says. "Agar film ko chalna hai, to chalegi." And if it doesn't? "Well then," comes the wry response, "no more China Garden for me."

Right now, however, he can afford to play magnanimous. A lady enters the restaurant—yes, China Garden, where this interview is being conducted—with a group of friends, and makes her way straight to Kapoor's table to touch his feet. She is a distant relative and Shashi booms in his Prithviraj Kapoor voice: "Khush raho, khush raho (Be happy, be happy)." It is the lady's birthday and she has brought her friends out for lunch. Kapoor summons the maitre d' as soon as his relative departs. "Bill their amount to my account," he instructs. "Tell her it's a birthday treat from an old uncle."

While the industry has all but written off Ajooba, Kapoor is busy preparing for the film's (it is slated for a Diwali release) charity premieres, the first of which will be for cancer relief—the disease Jennifer Kendell-Kapoor, Shashi's wife, died of. He's aware that the industry has dubbed Ajooba his "death wish", but as he says: "They said the same thing when I made Junoon in '79, Kalyug in '81, 36 Chowringhee Lane in '82, Vijeta in '83 and Utsav in '85. And this makes it Death Wish VI, right?"

Death wish or not, Kapoor hasn't had it terribly easy during the making of the film. True, all the artistes—Amitabh Bachchan, Rishi Kapoor, Shammi Kapoor, Dara Singh, Tej Sapru, Dimple Kapadia and Sonam (after some initial problems)—worked without payment. (Though, says Shashi, Bachchan now has the rights of the Delhi-UP territory.) But there were other problems. First, with the Russian co-director Gennady Vasiliev, "arising largely out of the language barrier". Then, there were three storms while shooting was on in Russia, and special effects cameraman Peter Perreira preferred to do other work when 'trick' scenes were being shot. "I feel cheated," says Kapoor, "but maybe Peter felt he had not been paid enough."

Meanwhile Amitabh Bachchan postponed his dubbing for Ajooba because he wanted Aaj Ka Arjun to be released first. And then, there was the Hum shooting in Mauritius to concentrate on. "Amitji must also have had his own reasons," Kapoor concedes charitably, "but whenever he was on my sets, he was always yawning."

Amrish Puri, too, couldn't give dubbing dates. "Funny guy," muses Shashi, "when I hadn't paid him, he was working for me. Now it's vice versa." Then the afterthought: "Look, I don't want you to think that I'm cribbing; it's just that the film could have been released much faster."

A film trade magazine, however, had it—much to Kapoor's horror—that Ajooba had already been released in Russia and had turned out to be a dismal flop. "Absolutely not," protests Shashi. "First of all, the film wasn't even completely shot when this report came up. I was still shooting the crab scene, Vanraj Bhatia hadn't recorded the background music." What was shown in Russia were only a few scenes, and pleads Kapoor: "Aww, don't give a dog a bad name and hang him. See the complete picture, all six songs, three hours of it."

Of course, the ensuing "Mahabharat with the distributors" could well ensure that Kapoor cuts down the film to a more manageable length. But three hours, or two and a half, Ajooba will be on show soon enough.

And then, as Kapoor puts it, "the audience will decide its fate". And Shashi Kapoor's, for that matter. ●

The leak that creaks

Especially when the regime seeks to distort the truth

'It was the best of leaks, it was the worst of leaks'. I am referring to the controversy over the official briefing of the meeting of a sub-committee of the National Integration Council (NIC) held recently in Delhi.

BJP leaders, L.K Advani and A.B. Vajpayee contend that decisions or resolutions adopted at the sub-committee meeting were not to be released to the press. There was a definite understanding among all participants on this issue, they added.

Yet, details of the deliberations appeared in the press the very next morning. The 'leak' was, however, very visible. Official spokesman I.Ram Mohan Rao said that all that was done by him was the distribution of the copies of the meeting's recommendations. He had not done any "briefing".

According to 'reliable sources', some enthusiastic 'quarters' in the home ministry were responsible for preparing the note and making arrangements for its distribution. They were made available to the press and copies were kept in the duty room of the Press Information Bureau for reporters on their last round.

One cannot blame the government for this 'open' policy. After all, everyone is interested in the meetings of the NIC in view of the ongoing controversies over the Mandal report and the Ram Janmabhoomi issue. What is highly objectionable, however, is the obvious distortion of the actual proceedings which had been done to embarrass the Bharatiya Janata Party.

Initially it was reassuring to learn that the BJP would abide by the court ruling on the Ram Janmabhoomi-Babri Masjid issue. Mr L.K. Advani reportedly told the meeting that his rath yatra was meant to diffuse communal tension. Most of the newspapers interpreted this as a 'climbdown' on the part of the BJP.

Obviously egged on by the hotheads within its ranks, the BJP acted swiftly, contradicted the official version of the proceedings and decided to boycott the NIC meeting in Madras. Vajpayee also resigned from the NIC Harmony Council.

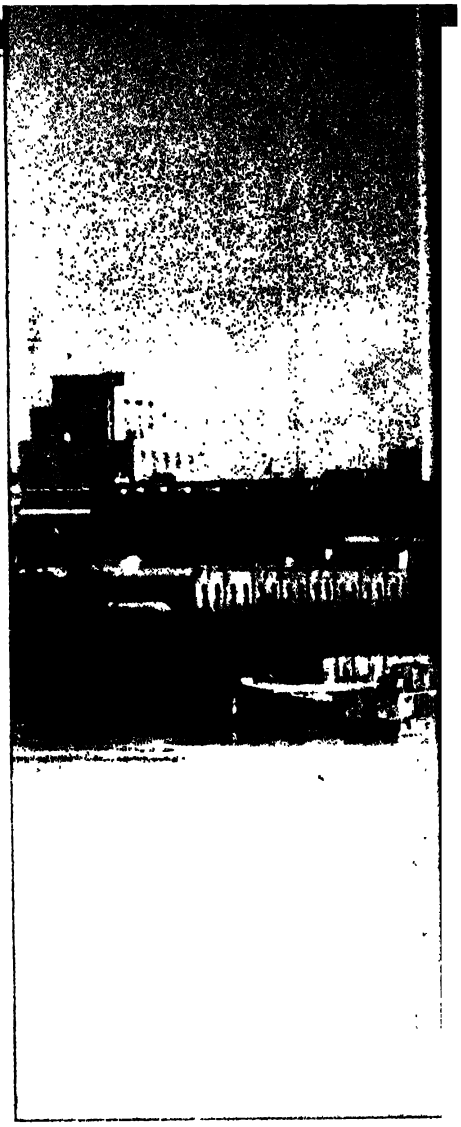
Someone, clearly, had doctored the official press release. According to M.J. Akbar, "the principal information officer, who takes his orders straight from the Prime Minister, deliberately leaked the story". Said Chandra Shekhar, "Small minds cannot be expected to do big things."

'Leaks' are part and parcel of modern politics but distorted leaks?

A.B. Vajpayee (left) and L.K. Advani contend that decisions or resolutions adopted at the sub-committee meeting of the National Integration Council were not to be released to the press. Yet, it leaked and appeared in the press the very next morning

Caught and bowled

The news was tucked away in a corner of the sports page. Former union railway minister and senior vice president of the Board of Control for Cricket in India (BCCI), Madhavrao Scindia defeated B.N. Dutt by 16 votes to 15 in the elections for the post of the BCCI president.



Didn't the papers report earlier that Scindia would be contesting against another vice president, I.S. Bindra? What prompted Dutt, the incumbent, to contest again? Though it is Asiad time, one wished that the press had devoted more space to the startling developments at India's richest and most important sports body.

Some papers did well, though. Calcutta's The Telegraph took the lead, recapturing the drama and the politics behind the elections. The services' and the railways' representatives, obviously, had been instructed to vote for Scindia, and this had tilted the issue in favour of the Gwalior prince.

The new selection committee under Bombay's Naren Tamhane, appears to have more than one 'joker'. The earlier committee had Raj Singh Dungarpur as the only non-Test cricketer. The present one has Akash Lal, another somebody called Jeejebhoy and a nobody called Anand Shukla! G.R. Vishwanath is the only genuine Test player. May God help Indian cricket! ●

THE BOXWALLAH'S TALES

Three stories from a Calcutta executive as told to V.S. Naipaul

Ashok worked for an old British boxwallah company. The company itself had now been bought over by one of the new generation of super-rich Indian financiers and industrialists, much of whose business activity lay outside India

Ashok's first story—he told me three stories in all—was of his attempt to get into marketing.

"I made a number of false starts. The first was when I did commerce at the university. That was what my parents wanted me to do. I knew commerce wasn't for me, but I gritted my teeth and went ahead with it. I just scraped through the final exams, and that dented my self-confidence. Then I applied to join a management institute. I did that because everybody else was doing it. Inevitably, I didn't get in.

"At that stage my father fixed me up with a chamber of commerce in Delhi. I was there for a year and a half. I came into contact with a number of the industry barons for whom the chamber had been set up; but you also had a number of rustic individuals. It gave me a fair idea of the half-and-half way things were in India. I was drawing a pittance, 300 rupees a month, £15, but I was living in the house of an uncle, and didn't have many expenses

"One day, at a middle-class party in Delhi, in Defence Colony, I met a Dr Malhotra. He was a portly man of middle height, in a dark-brown suit. I asked him what he did, and he said in an offhand way that he was the director of Imba. I asked him what Imba was, and he said it was the Institute of Management and Business Administration. It sounded familiar, but that was because many of these places have names that sound like that. Anyway, I was terribly impressed. He was a man in his mid-forties. I was in my early twenties. He looked very prosperous, and talked that way too. He was indifferent to me initially, no doubt seeing me as just another young man working somewhere.

"But then the conversation led to the fact that my father was an influential businessman in Calcutta, and Dr Malhotra's attitude to me changed. He became quite interested in what I did, how much I earned, and then he gave his opinion that I was made for much better things. My own gullibility took me along on the wave of his interest. His approval of me was total.

"It was beyond him why someone of my obvious talent should be wasting his time drawing 300 rupees in a nondescript chamber of commerce, when I could have the world at my feet. I said, 'Have you anything better to suggest?' He said, 'Boy, do I!' He described his Imba institute. From the way he told it, Imba was set up to propagate the discipline of marketing to as many people as possible in the country. And he now had plans to expand from Delhi to the other metropolitan centres.

"The way he told it, his own marketing acumen was sought by the large corporations of India, and he had had something to do with the success of quite a few well-known brands. Just listening to him excited me, opening my eyes to the wonderful world of marketing, of which I had heard so much

"I thought I wanted to go into marketing. Partly this was because lots of my friends and colleagues were applying to these institutes of management, in which marketing was an important discipline, or they were joining large corporations as management trainees in the marketing division. I didn't understand what the thing was about, but it seemed to me the thing to do. It had a certain glamour, a certain aura.

"I agreed with Dr Malhotra that I was wasting my time where I was He invited me over to his office the following day, where, as he implied, I might learn something to my advantage. I trotted off the next morning Before I knew it, Dr Malhotra was offering me a job, at double the salary I was getting at the chamber, and with the enticing prospect of going back and working in Calcutta.

"When I asked him why an obviously successful marketing man like him was interested in a raw beginner like me, someone who had failed to get into the management institutes, he said the way he saw professional qualifications was like this: B.S., M.S, and Ph. D.—Bullshit, More shit, and

We put in a lot of effort. We draw a monthly pay cheque. And for people like us, who are not businessmen, we feel that the city in which we live must offer us something in return

Piled High and Deep. Which again made a deep impression on me. Even in my school reports they used to say: 'His marks are not a true indication of his ability.' So I was ready to fall in with what Dr Malhotra said.

" 'It's work experience that counts,' he said. And he said he preferred, having the views he had, to pick up raw people like me and make them blossom.

"He asked me to look after the Calcutta branch or, as he called it, the 'Calcutta Bureau' of Imba—I think he liked the modern sound of the word 'bureau'. The job, as he described it, would mean setting up courses, and enrolling corporate and individual members at fairly high fees.

"I had the presence of mind to ask him how this was going to help me learn about marketing. I saw that the job meant selling Imba rather than learning the marketing skills for which Imba was apparently famous. He said this would be only one aspect of my work. Imba itself would be deeply involved in marketing research and counselling for clients. This impressed me. I saw myself developing into a marketing whizz-kid.

"I overrode my father's doubts, and I accepted Dr Malhotra's offer. The day I joined Imba he gave me a box of visiting cards with my name and my grandiose designation as Bureau Executive. I had never had a visiting card before. I was very pleased.

"I was hoping to spend a week or so in Delhi, learning about the workings of Imba, but it was apparent that Dr Malhotra was in a bit of a hurry to see me off to Calcutta. He wanted me to go there and start enrolling the big corporations as members. He said I was to get the help of my father. This gave me a little pause: I began to feel that he was interested in my father, and that something was amiss.

"He packed me off to Calcutta. He paid the train fare. He had indicated to me that he had an office in Calcutta, and that a friend was looking after the office. Shortly after I arrived, this friend telephoned and invited me over. The office was in a congested part of North Calcutta, and when I went I found a dingy little place in an old, ill-kept multi-storeyed block.

"When I asked this gentleman, Dr Malhotra's friend, where my Imba office would be, he pointed to a broken small table in one corner of the room, and he said I could work from here. He went on to add that while in an absolute emergency he could consider some typing work, he would prefer it if I used a carbon and wrote my own letters and reports by hand. He said I could also use the telephone—the only one in the office that worked. But every time I made a call I should make a note of it, and these costs would be debited to Imba.

"And from that desk I actually attempted to run my first marketing training course. Dr Malhotra told me I should negotiate with a hotel for a conference hall, and lunch and dinner and so on for the participants. I was to try to get a good price - he was particular about that - and I actually did so.

"He told me more than once that he was getting a reputed American professor down to Calcutta for the training course. That was the point I had to push. The American idea was important. The management scene in the country was heavily influenced by the management boom that was taking place in America, and Dr Malhotra was certainly sensitive to that.

"I did as he said, and was quite successful in enrolling the 25 candidates or so he wanted for the course. I did this primarily because I met a number of senior corporation people who were family friends. That gave me an entry point, and I found that the rest was quite easy. I went to see them, and they were happy to nominate someone in their firm to attend the course for 2000 rupees a head. I should say that a lot of these senior people expressed surprise and dismay that I was associated with such an outfit—of which they hadn't heard.

"The course itself passed off without incident—expect one. The American professor and his wife did come down. He wasn't really well known. He came from some obscure university, and in fact he was running a somewhat similar outfit somewhere in the vast North American continent. He was a cartoon American tourist, paunchy, late forties.

"This professor and his wife were put up in the hotel Dr Malhotra had made me negotiate with, for the conference hall and so on. It wasn't the best hotel in town. It was a couple of rungs below. The professor and his wife didn't like what they saw, but Dr Malhotra told them that this was India, a very poor country, that standards were lower, and that service in these less pretentious hotels was often better than in the five-star hotels, which could sometimes be all show.

"Just when it seemed that the Americans were getting reconciled to their quarters, a rat appeared and scurried across the room. The lady screamed and said, "I can't stand slithery things." And, to the chagrin of Dr Malhotra, the Americans insisted on being taken to the very best hotel in Calcutta. This was the Grand Hotel. It was infinitely more expensive. I myself had to make the arrangements.

"The course was seen as a feather in my cap. But then, as soon as it was over, Dr Malhotra said I should start preparing for another -- going through the whole thing again. And I myself wasn't happy about the course I had just arranged, because it seemed to me on reflection that it hadn't done anything for me in the marketing way.

"I also wasn't being successful in enrolling members in Imba. Dr Malhotra was greatly interested in this, since each corporate member would bring in some 7000 or 8000 rupees, and an individual member about 1000 rupees. Most people simply didn't know about Imba. Dr Malhotra thought I should be able to enrol them simply because I belonged to an influential family. But didn't feel I had anything to offer the big corporations. It's hard enough to sell a good product without being pushy. To sell a dud product was well nigh impossible to me at that time, when I was young and shy. And my father's friends were becoming a little more vocal in their protests about my requests to them for 8000 rupees for corporate membership of Imba.

Apart from visiting one of Calcutta's clubs, one has little choice of places to go. He cannot go out walking because the pavements and roads don't allow it

"My weekly, carbon-copied, ballpoint-penned Imba reports to Dr Malhotra made less and less impressive reading. And Dr Malhotra was becoming more and more impatient. He also began to feel that there was some danger that I might leave Imba.

"He flew down to Calcutta and wanted to know why I wasn't producing results. I put it to him that I had joined Imba to develop knowledge and skills in the discipline of marketing, in the classical sense. And what I had been doing in the last couple of months was selling or marketing Imba itself, which had helped neither my knowledge nor my reputation. I suggested to him that what Imba needed in Calcutta was some indigent retired army officer with organisational ability, and not an idealistic 23-year-old man on the threshold of a career. It came to me to say at that point that I hoped we could part amicably.

"We didn't part amicably. he became angry. He said he had invested a lot of money and time in me. I ignored that. I thought he was going to ask for some kind of money back. He became very angry, and said he was going to remove my name from life membership of Imba. It was news to me that I was a life member of Imba, but apparently branch executives or "bureau executives" became that automatically."

Ashok's first story had been about his attempt to get into marketing, and his entanglement with Imba, the Institute of Management and Business Administration, run by Dr Malhotra of Delhi. His second story was about his marriage, his break with the past.

He said, "I eventually went into an advertising agency, and was immediately happy. My career righted itself from here. I grew in my job; I learned a lot about the real world of marketing; it was the most productive five years of my career.

"But this went with an upheaval in another aspect of my life. I came from a traditional South Indian Brahmin household. My father had travelled on various postings all over the world and had settled in Calcutta. And I had a public-school upbringing in India. Yet so ingrained was the traditional outlook of the family that I had never thought of dating girls, although I was popular, and sang pop songs and Indian classical songs. In this Indian classical side I had been trained at home by a private tutor; it was part of one's traditional upbringing.

"A number of my friends were leading an active social life, but I myself didn't see this as either necessary or indeed desirable. Other people did it, had girl friends, but I felt that wasn't for me. I suppose it was deeply in my subconscious that I would get married in the traditional arranged way—until I actually went to participate in a ceremony of 'viewing' a girl with the object of marriage.

"My family had arranged it in the standard way, through the exchange of horoscopes. The girl lived in Bangalore, and I went all the way down there to see her. There were hordes of my relatives there, and her relatives. We were told to arrive at the appointed place, which was of the girl's parents' choosing, at a certain time.

"It was in the evening. The occasion itself involved everybody sitting round in a circle. I was introduced only to the girl's father, and we sat round in a circle in the hall. Savouries and sweets were passed around. And everyone was dressed for the occasion. So peculiar were the arrangements, I wasn't sure who the girl was. There were other girls from her side, and I hadn't been introduced to the girl herself, and the girl's father kept up a constant chatter, asking me a whole host of questions about what I did, and what I liked, and what I disliked, and so on.

"I told my father I wasn't saying no because I didn't like the girl's face—that would have been unfair: I hadn't had a chance to talk to the girl. I was saying no to the process, not to the girl. And I didn't want to talk about it any more.

"My elders thought that time would heal things, that this was my first time, and that the next time round would be different.

"I became less and less communicative. It's in the situation that parents and children don't talk openly about these things. Nobody ever asks you what your views on marriage are. It just happens that one fine day somebody presents you with a proposal.

"And it was at this time that, spurred on by the thought that I would have to go through with that viewing process once more or many times more, my mind gradually turned towards the principle of making up my own mind who I wanted to marry.

"There was someone I had known, a marketing executive. Marketing—it's always been marketing for me. But this girl I knew came from another community. I declared myself to her. We agreed that it could be a workable proposition. We knew each other socially. We spoke the same language. But she was of a different community. And when I finally broached the subject to my parents, they were as opposed as I thought they would be. They went into a shell, withdrew—as I had withdrawn after the viewing ceremony at Bangalore. It was difficult to communicate with them, because in a situation like this they had a certain crude logic on their side: in a matter like this there could be no half-way compromise. For them I was about to break the family link with history, tradition, and they could have no vision of the future. For them everything appeared to become black.

"I was on test, too, because the person I wanted to marry wanted to see how I would react to pressure. So it was important to me to stand up. I told my parents I wasn't going to change my mind, but I wasn't in a hurry. They could take their time. It was very hard for them, but slowly they came round. They were counselled by some people in the family and by friends. Our wedding was held in the traditional grand manner.

"Among the younger generation of the family, I became a hero. Quite a few members of the family have done what I have done. And it's not now quite the shock that it had been. But one also has to accept—what my parents felt but couldn't express, what made them go into their shell—that something indefinable has snapped. We've been Brahmins for untold generations."

Ashok's first story had been about his attempt to get into marketing. His second story had been about his marriage, his break with the past. His last story was about his life in advertising, and his sighting of the Calcutta boxwallah world, just when that world was about to disappear, giving way to the cruder, richer business world of post-independence India.

Ashok said, "My first experience of the Calcutta boxwallah was when as a trainee account executive in an advertising firm I was taken to my first client meeting, and was introduced to this very senior executive in the marketing division of the company. The man was portly and appeared to be quite jovial. He was smoking an imported brand of cigarette, and—this was the middle of May, which is something in Calcutta—he was wearing a suit. His office was air-conditioned. The general atmosphere was of a man in a plush office with a leisurely approach to life.

"He appeared to be in no great hurry to discuss the business in hand. We were going into all kinds of trivia about life in general, the cricket series, a little office politics. All kinds of things were being talked about from 11 or so until 12 or 12.15. And then there was this long pause, and it seemed almost a pity that we had to set aside the general discussion.

"My boss broached the subject of business, and this was gone through with great dispatch. I was just observing; I was only a trainee. The business side of things was finished in a quarter of an hour. It was now about 12.30. Lunch was looming. The client asked my boss if he had a luncheon engagement. My boss said no. The client said, 'Perhaps we ought to discuss a little more business over lunch.'

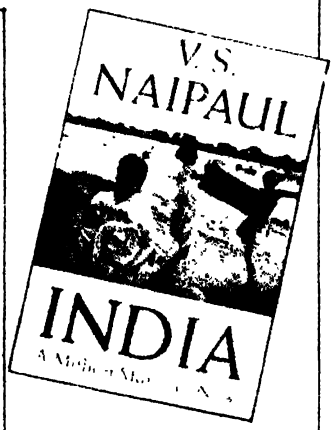
"My boss instructed me to run to the office and take out an IOU for 500 rupees, and join them at a five-star hotel. The client wasn't inviting us—it wasn't known for clients to invite advertising agency personnel to lunch. The lunch was to be on us. I suppose I was quite excited at that moment. I had heard a great deal about client entertainment, but I hadn't done any, or been part of it, at that time. The lunch that day started at 12.45 and finished at 3.30. Everybody was happy at the end.

"This way of doing things went on till the early 70s. The big companies had more or less a monopoly in their respective fields. They didn't have to sell. They merely allocated. There was never enough to meet the demand.

"That's changed now. There are a lot more companies making the products, and companies are having to battle it out—to meet production volumes, to place them in the market, to persuade the customer. So all of a sudden companies had no room for people who merely dressed well, could talk to the boss's wife, could play a round of golf, and hold their drink. The country itself had started setting up business schools. To a large extent they tended to be textbook American models, and this created problems for companies. But these institutes enabled companies to get a shortlist of candidates. It became a status symbol to recruit an MBA.

"Life is hard now for the executive, and the city of Calcutta adds to this pressure, by offering so little in return to a person who's putting in so much effort. After a hard day's work you can find yourself stranded in a car for hours on end, and when you return home there is no power. There are generators, but they make a dreadful din, and are limited. Apart from visiting one of Calcutta's clubs, if he's fortunate enough to be a member, an executive has little choice of places to go. He cannot go out walking because the pavements and the roads don't allow it. The parks are over crowded. Most of these parks are infested with rich young men and women who take their cars and turn up their car stereos and eat all evening—junk food from hawkers—and throw the litter around.

"The infrastructure of the city is crumbling. The drainage system is perhaps the worst in the world. In the monsoon, major areas of the city are waterlogged for anything up to 72 hours at a time. One year the water never drained away. Carcases of animals appeared, and we were afraid of an epidemic.



"The only section of people here who seem to be thriving in Calcutta are the Marwaris. They came from parts of Rajasthan a couple of hundred years ago. They thrive by being middlemen, buying and selling. This is what they were good at, and they continue to be. They were never known for cultural or technical skills. And they just grew as a community. They have been the only ones, in the last 15 or 20 years, who are able to buy properties in the posh areas where previously only the rich Bengalis or expatriate executives lived. They have participated in the property boom. Today in these areas you have multistorey buildings coming up—one more nail in the coffin of the city: more cars, more sanitation problems, etc.—with the Marwaris themselves occupying most of the apartments.

"The other aspect is that some of the very rich Marwaris keep buying up companies after buying just enough shares to gain control. And so a number of old firms are now in the hands of Marwaris. Most of them do not nurture or invest in these companies. They strip the assets. They are quite happy to let the company become more and more sick. It is also true that in the earlier era the British didn't bother very much about growth. Their main concern was repatriation of a certain amount of profits in foreign exchange to the parent company, and most British managing directors came here for a short-term period of three or five years.

"We put in a great deal of effort. We draw a monthly pay cheque. And for people like us, who are not businessmen, we feel that the city in which we live must offer us something in return. We must at the end of the working day have more than the prospect of just coming back home. You can't go to any cinema house, because most of them have poor sound systems and virtually non-functioning air-conditioning systems—they don't renovate them. I haven't been to a cinema hall in Calcutta for five or six years.

"The fact is that the problems of Calcutta are of a magnitude that cannot be endured. My wife and I feel now that we won't see improvements in our lifetime. We feel we should be trying our luck somewhere else, and saying goodbye to Calcutta." ●

Rarely have things been so bad at airport customs. Harassment and corruption are now commonplace

Sahar International Airport, Bombay: A little after sunrise, passengers off a Dubai flight enter from the immigration lounge and move to claim their baggage, a prelude to the customs check. There is palpable tension in the air. And customs officials are fully alert.

A young woman wheels her baggage through the Green channel. "Get back into the line," barks an official, "and get your baggage X-rayed." The woman is perplexed, and argues that she has absolutely nothing to declare. "Get back in the line," growls the customs officer, grabbing her bag with a swarthy hand When her turn at the X-ray machine comes forty minutes later, the officer insists that she open all her bags. "You were trying to escape," he tells her. "You're in trouble now." Not intimidated, the lady complains to the supervisor, and explains that the tape recorder and the camera that show up in the X-ray are in fact the same items she took along for her trip. She is let off, finally, almost with a touch of regret that there were no irregularities to pin on her.

Hasmukh Shah, a young executive, is not so lucky. He had decided to bring in a video cassette player from Singapore, thinking that Bombay Customs would not penalise him as he had no other dutiable goods. Six hours later and seven thousand rupees poorer, he groans that it would have been cheaper to simply buy a Akai machine from a Bombay smuggler. Behind him in the customs queue, there is a banker who fails to understand why there is any difference at all in the Green and Red channels.

Indira Gandhi International Airport, New Delhi: Here, the Green channel actually permits walk-through passengers. It is not that Delhi Customs trustspassengers more—all baggage is X-rayed. But it is not easy for everyone.

"I had already cleared customs in Bombay," says Leela Dhar, a non-resident Indian from Hong Kong. "And they harassed me at customs two days later when I took a connecting Air India flight from Bombay to Delhi." Dhar was wearing gold bangles that Delhi Customs focussed on. It took her close to three hours of desperate pleading to convince the officials that the bangles were from Bombay, not Hong Kong. A gift from her mother who lives in Bombay. "You feel so completely helpless as they cross-question and grill you," complains Dhar. "It is enough to ruin any holiday."

Yes, there is no difference between Green and Red channels anv longer. And yes, the customs attitude is enough to ruin more than just a holiday—composure, calm and contentment. When the Green channel was introduced in the 1970s—in keeping with trends at international airports worldwide—it was meant for passengers without dutiable items to walk through. It was a facility that Delhi is now India's most corrupt airport. Customs officials routinely harass and shakedown hapless passengers. Even senior officials refuse to intervene.

RED CHANNEL

NITIN RAI

Don't walk: The idea behind the Red channel was that if you had something to declare you told a customs officer, paid your duty and left. Now, it is an invitation to rummage through your luggage could be easily misused, but chances were that few people with anything substantial to hide would dare use the Green channel. While finance ministry officials insist that the customs service is not intended to harass passengers, and is basically a preventive force, passengers' experiences show that while the bonafide ones get stuck, the big fish—smugglers—get away.

While officials gloat over their catch.

After hours of chaos, there is a lull in Bombay's Customs area. The early morning rush of international flights over, customs officers wander across to an assortment of goods scattered on the floor.

Some dolls. A dusty set of golf clubs. A pair of Yonnex badminton racquets. A Dunlop tennis racquet. A chessboard. Fancy kitchen scales, Samsonite carry-alls. And bottles of Scotch whisky.

Curious officials scrutinise the pile, desultorily swing a golf club, grip a racquet, and move on. The dolls, whisky bottles and suitcases are snapped up at throwaway prices, such as Rs 50 for a bottle of Scotch. The rest of the stuff is dumped in a gloomy godown, where shelves are lined with confiscated baggage—foam mattresses, two-in-ones, TV sets, video recorders—a surfeit of shattered dreams surrendered at the customs counter.

Following a diktat from the finance ministry earlier this year, which ordered that customs operations should be intensified to increase revenue, the barrier has become more of a nightmare than it ever was. Now, ministry officials and customs collectorates in Bombay and New Delhi are ecstatic about the growing revenue that new, stringent measures have ensured. "We are breaking all records this year," boasts K.P. Singh, collector of customs at Sahar airport, about the take on his turf. The total value of seizures at the airport have shot up: from Rs 85 crores in 1989 to Rs 83.9 crores till August this year alone. And revenue collection till August is at a massive Rs 1,378 crores, bigger than previous annual totals.

In New Delhi, in the five-month period from April to August 1989, 4.29 lakh passengers showed up and shelled out Rs 18.87 crores in duty, or Rs 4,412 per passenger. For the same period this year Rs 19.12 crores was collected from 4.16 lakh passengers, or Rs 5,058 per passenger. "These increases are partly due to luck," says A.K. Pande, customs collector at the airport, "and partly due to the hard work put in."

And, though Messers Singh and Pande would like to play it down, very much due to the harassment of passengers as well.

Take this scene at Sahar, just two weeks ago. Passengers on a packed Lufthansa flight from Frankfurt are resigned to milling about the customs hall—travellers on a flight from Dubai have a headstart on them, and the wait could be as long as two hours.

For the Dubai passengers, clearance is slow and painful. The three X-ray machines are simply not enough to deal with thousands of passengers in the area (on Sahar's busy days, 30-40 flights arrive in the space of just two hours). Everybody's baggage—and to hell with the Green channel—is scrupulously checked. And the suitcases that are opened spew out audio tapes, razors, bottles of shampoo, soap, and countless other items—from hair dryers and hi-tech goods to Drambuie and Dunhills.

A man is asked how much he paid for each of the eight new shirts—they are still in the original packing—he has in his suitcase. Silence. "This is much above your Rs 2,000 free baggage allowance," pronounces the presiding customs deity, and proceeds to charge the passenger duty for the shirts.

"This is sheer harassment," grumbles Lakshmi Das, an executive from a multi-national company, while waiting his turn. Das says that there is a way out. He often leaves behind—casually—a bottle of Black Label Scotch whisky at the customs barrier.

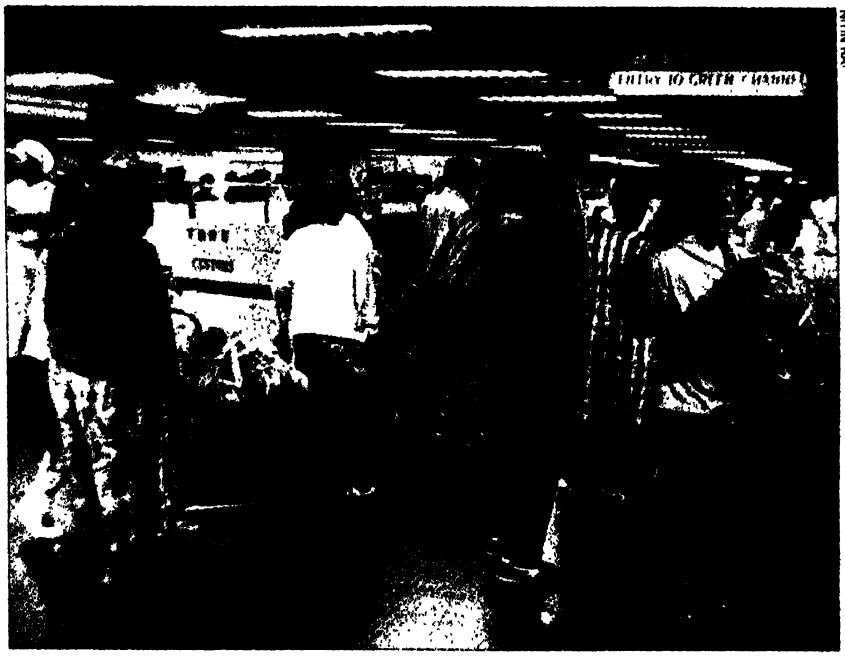
And here lies the key, the often mentioned but never eradicated reason behind passenger harassment at international airports. "It is not for nothing that a job with the customs service is more coveted than the IAS (Indian Administrative Service) or even an IFS (Indian Foreign Service) job," says a top New Delhi bureaucrat. "The customs is a more glamorous version of an income tax officer's job. Besides, there is obvious cash to be made. Then, there are the perks of foreign goods."

The problem for the passengers is two-fold. The first has to do with out and out corruption—New Delhi tops the list, followed by Bombay and other metros. Calcutta is supposed to be the cleanest, a relative term, but true, say observers

The second has to do with baggage rules. These stipulate that anyone above 12 years of age can bring in, besides personal effects, duty free articles upto a value of Rs 2,000. Above this limit, every item draws a flat 250 per cent duty (there are some exceptions, such as computers and TV sets, on which the duty is higher).



"It's a little over a hundred (US) dollars," says one passenger in at New Delhi's airport. "Two pairs of shoes cost more than that." Adds Dr. Ashwini Chopra, a frequent traveller: "I bring in two pairs of keds and more than one after shave (lotion) and customs officials invariably stop me. They're all ready to pounce."

Customs officials admit that the Rs 2,000 limit is farcical. "Which is why," says one, "we don't insist on that kind of limit." The official is talking about a tacit agreement between the authorities and passengers which says that as long as one does not bring in electronic items and gallons of liquor, it is okay.

GREEN CHANNEL

Stop here: The Green channel was a 'walk-through' with surprise checks on suspicious passengers. Now, nearly all luggage is X-rayed at Delhi, India's most inefficient airport—this can take 30 minutes—and passengers are bullied and threatened

Or, it was okay. With the finance ministry riding shotgun on the customs herd, in an attempt to bring in more money to replenish India's depleted coffers, even this little arrangement has been discarded. The big time hauls of gold, watch parts and drugs are still lucrative (gold hauls, for example, fetch the concerned customs official 20 per cent of the catch's value as reward), government pressure ensures than even the small try are netted. "The officials are so charged with enthusiasm to make money through the solid incentives we offer," says Pande, the Delhi customs officer, "that they sometimes get too harsh with passengers." A classic understatement.

Not harsh with everyone, though. The luckiest of the lot, of course, are VIPs. And here, Delhi again tops the list. At the plush Indira Gandhi airport, a major political leader—yes, from the ruling party—arrives with his family to receive a niece. And walks straight into the customs enclosure. As customs officials ply the politician with coffee and PR talk, one of their ilk is despatched to whisk the niece through immigration. When she arrives, laden with bags and packages, there are no questions asked. "She could have carried in a bourse of diamonds," says an official, who also admits that much of his service is corrupt, "and we would have had to turn a blind eye." He adds: "Instructions from above."

Ordinary travellers could do with a measure of this benevolence. At every other international airport in the country—increasing numbers of confiscated goods clutter sheds and godowns. In Bombay, for example, there is an overwhelming stink of fermenting raisins and nuts at an airport room where hundreds of kilos of confiscated perishables are kept. Yet, when Lisa Vaz tries to "escape" with a pack of pistachio nuts and some cans of processed cheese, customs officials are quick to snap them up. They let go of the chocolates, however, when Lisa pleads they are for her grandson.

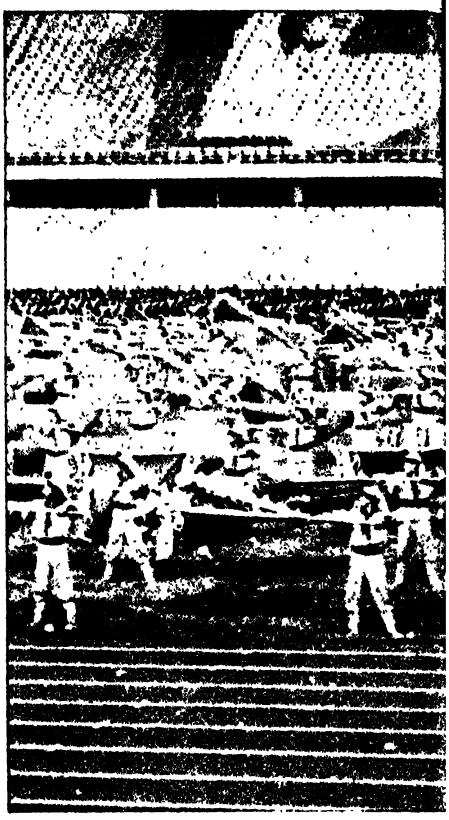
India is humbled at the '90 Asiad

It was the Chinese Games in more senses than one. Easily the most striking fact about the recently-concluded Asian Games at Beijing was the performance of the home team. The Chinese did not more than just dominate the four-yearly event—they simply swept the competition aside. A few simple statistics: China won 175 gold medals; its nearest rival, South Korea, could manage only a sorry 52. Compare this with the '86 Games at Seoul, where the competition was far more keen. The tally: China—94; South Korea—93; and Japan—58.

If China had every reason to delight in how it fared, then India had just as much cause to hang its sporting head in shame. The nation's performance was worse than pathetic. On the medal's table, India was placed eleventh, a few places behind neighbouring Pakistan. For a country which had boasted of having an improved athletic and sporting side, the results were humiliating. At the end of the Games, India had cornered only 23 medals; worse, only one of them was a gold (won at kabbadi). Clearly, it was a showing far sorrier than that at Seoul, where India managed to win 37 medals (five golds). The tally also compares unfavourably with that in the previous two competitions. At Bangkok in 1978, India had 28 medals (not many more but significantly there were 11 golds). And at the '82 Games at New Delhi, India won as many as 57 (13 of them golds).



Clearly, there are a couple of things that can be inferred from the performance. One, that the Indian sporting establishment has entertained an exaggerated view about both our talent and potential. The truth is that we have a long way to go before we can make an impact on the Games. Two, that the so-called haphazard showing indicates that we haven't correctly assessed our strengths and our weaknesses. We did poorly in certain sports that we expected to do well, such as athletics and wrestling. And conversely, we exceeded our expectations in events that we didn't expect much from such as rowing and weightlifting. But, even so, there is no denying the fact that given the amount of money India has pumped into sport in the last few years, the overall showing was a disgrace.

If the overall performance in athletics was disappointing, it was partly because there were great expectations that P.T. Usha would grab a few gold medals. Given that there were more than enough hints that the 26-year-old sprint queen was on the decline (that age and wear had reduced the "Payyoli Express" to the "Malayali Mail" was evident when Ashwini Nachappa beat her in the 200m a couple of months ago), it was somewhat unrealistic to pin India's hopes on her.

She came a poor fourth in the 200m but ran a good race to win a silver in the 400m. If she failed to come first, it was just that the Chinese gold medallist was far too good. Usha was also the mainstay for the 4×100 and 4×400m relays—both teams won silver.

It was perhaps a sad way for who is probably India's greatest woman athlete to retire. She deserved a better exit, a kinder swan song. But the attention and adulation she received at Beijing must have been some compensation. She was hunted by autograph seekers wherever she went and print and television journalists vied with each other for interviews. She was the subject of intense curiosity and the Chinese revered her as a great Asian champion. It is time that Indians regarded her likewise.

The other big disappointment in athletics was the talented and hard-working Bahadur Prasad, who was touted in some quarters as one of India's brightest medal prospects. But he came only fifth in the 1500m with a time of 3:46.29—a reflection perhaps of the woeful lack of international experience that he was allowed to be exposed to and a lack of strategic planning.

Among those who did well were Dina Ram (silver) in the 3000m steeplechase; an inspired Rosa Kutty (bronze) in the 800m; and the quiet self-effacing S.D. Eshan (bronze) in the shotput. But Eshan with a best of 17.32 m was way behind the Chinese gold medallist Shabo Cheng (18.89m) and has a long way to go before he can think of winning gold.

In the other events, however, there were surprises galore. The women weightlifters, who left India unsung and without fanfare, stole the limelight at Beijing. While N. Kunjarani, Bharti Singh, Jyotsna Dutta were among the medals, the more fancied men's team failed to win a single one. In rowing too, India exceeded its expectations. In the coxwainless pair oars, R.S. Bhanawala and S. Surinder, cruised to bronze. There were bronzes also in the single sculls (D. Dalbir), double sculls (D. Dalbir and R. Ramanjit) and the coxwainless four oars. The Indian team were helped considerably by the government's decision to allow them to bring their own boats along. India performed creditably also in yachting: Pushpendra Garg and Homi Motiwala in the international enterprise class and Farokh Tarapore and Cyrus Cama in the men's international 470m class won bronzes.

The solitary bronze for tennis must be regarded as a disappointment. Coach Balram Singh caused a surprise when he dropped Leander Paes from the team singles event on the ground that Rohit Rajpal was ahead of Paes on the ATP computer rankings. This was a questionable choice as Rajpal lacks both the verve and aggression of Paes.

In the team doubles, India beat North Korea for a place in the semi-finals but came a cropper against China losing 0-2. There was another debatable change made in this event: S. Vasudevan who nursed a stiff back was called in to replace Rajpal. In the individual events, both Zeeshan Ali and Rajpal (singles) and Ali and Paes (doubles) succumbed in the early rounds.

The Games at Beijing proved that India's sporting establishment entertains an exaggerated view of our talent and potential Swimmer Sebastian Xavier recorded his best ever timing in the 50m freestyle event (24.18). Although this bettered the national record, he came only seventh. As for Khazan Singh, another of India's medal hopefuls, he failed miserably in his favourite event—the 100m butterfly. Both the swimmers complained about the temperature of the water in the Yingdong pool. At 19 degrees centigrade, it was far colder than that of the Talkatora swimming pool (34 degrees) where they had been training the past several months.

In boxing, India was clearly outclassed. Although the team lacked both technique and guts, there were suspicions of biased refereeing. The person to suffer the most from this was Gopal Dewang in the 67-71 kg category. He clearly outdid China's Wang Ye Wei in the bout for a silver medal, but the judges ruled that the latter won on points. Dewang, who appeared horrified by the decisions, had to settle for bronze.

There were also poor performances in shooting and wrestling (in which we are supposedly strong) but the biggest hoax was played by the cyclists. There

THE FINAL TALLY

	Gold	Silver	Bronze	Total
CHINA	175	103	48	326
S. KOREA	52	49	71	172
JAPAN	38	58	73	169
INDIA	1	8	14	23

were 17 of them in the team but their performance was shoddy and immensely forgettable.

As for hockey, India did exactly as many predicted— winning five easy matches before going down to Pakistan. If there were those who believed that India was gold medal material this time round, it was largely because that we had beaten Pakistan in the BMW tournament at Amstelveen this June.

Although the Asiad result suggested that the match was close and evenly fought, Pakistan outclassed India in virtually every department. For India Pargat Singh and Jagbir Singh performed well, but it was Pakistan's captain Shabaz Ahmed who was the pick of the players. His dribbles and advances confirmed the received view that he is the world's finest hockey player today.

Finally, to the only gold medal of the Games; men's kabbadi. This was perhaps the only event which India could be absolutely sure of winning and—predictably—we did. The team led by Hardeep Singh and coached by E. Prasad Rao did as well as it was expected to. The technique was flawless, the strategy sound and the superiority over the competition showed up distinctly. After beating China, Pakistan, Japan and Nepal, the team finally blanked out Bangladesh (52-17) for the first place.

Clearly, India's showing at Beijing holds out some lessons for sport administrators in the country. Apart from the need to impart systematic training, sportsmen must be exposed to international meets far more than they are allowed to now. It is no accident that Qatar's Mohammad Sulaiman, who won the 1500m, had run at over 40 internatioal races before he came to Beijing. How can one expect Bahadur Singh – talented though he is—to perform at the same level with the kind of exposure he has received?

There is also a need to improve and change selection standards. At the moment, a third place at one Games is a ticket to the next, but this procedure fails to take into account that the meets are a long four years apart and that timings keep improving every year. It would be far better if selection was linked to performance, which may be judged against the international standard.

All this needs to be done without delay and quickly. It is only then that India can hope to enjoy what is becoming an increasingly uncommon sight: the tricolour aloft in the breeze during a medal ceremony. ●

Save the frogs

■ Frogs may be a delicacy in the West but to Indian nature lovers they are an endangered species whose increased export can cause serious ecological imbalance. According to G.M. Oza, secretary of the Baroda-based International Society of Naturalists (INSONAL), some 4,000 tonnes of frozen frog legs are exported every year apart from the 70 million frogs that are exported illegally.

If the well-known botanist from Maharaja Sayajirao University is to be believed, this insensitive killing for the sake of foreign exchange may well cause severe chemical pollution in India. Frogs eat agricultural pests and reduce the need to use pesticides—and their wanton killing could play havoc with the environment. So, recently, Oza has written a letter to the Government of India warning it of the ecological problems that would result if frog exports are not slashed immediately.

It remains to be seen what steps the government takes to tackle the problem.

What's in a name?

■ The ancient city of Ahmedabad will soon have a new name, at least if the BJP has its way. And until it does, the councillors of the city's municipal corporation will have to make do without letter-heads.

Municipal commissioner P. Basu forwarded a resolution to the state government two months ago suggesting a new name for the city that is named after Ahmed Shah—Karnavati. Backed by the BJP-dominated municipal body, the resolution is still awaiting approval.

Meanwhile, the Opposition (i.e. the Congress-I and the Janata Dal) has swung into action, accusing the BJP of trying to get political mileage from this move. The new name, claim the dissidents, has a decidedly Hindu flavour and will obviously go down well with the BJP's supporters. Be that as it may, the councillors of Ahmedabad continue to use blank sheets of paper—till the state government takes a decision on the issue.

Dinner diplomacy

Why is it that the Raja's "natural allies" haven't deserted him, at a time when he has become the universal hate object?

Simple. The PM keeps the communist leaders, Inderjit Gupta and Somnath Chatterjee, happy by inviting them for fancy lunches and dinners every week. And the MPs, for their part, reciprocate the good deed by keeping their party members off V.P. Singh's back.

The arrangement suits everybody except the CPI and the CPI(M). The communists are appalled at the fact that they are not allowed to lay into the Prime Minister even when the government's actions and policies are indefensible.

Party discipline ensures that the members toe the line set out for them. But their unhappiness is bound to find expression in the coming months. In one form or the other.

Exit, Vajpayee

The BJP may well insist that it will not withdraw support to the National Front government. But party leader Atal Behari Vajpayee has had his fill of the Raja, and is not going to forgive him the leaking of the proceedings of the Committee for the Promotion of Communal Harmony in a hurry.

At a recent social event (BJP MP Arif Beg's daughter's wedding) Vajpayee made no secret of his animus against the PM. As soon as the Prime Minister's entourage entered, the BJP leader made a rapid exit.

The Raja, of course, pretended not to notice.

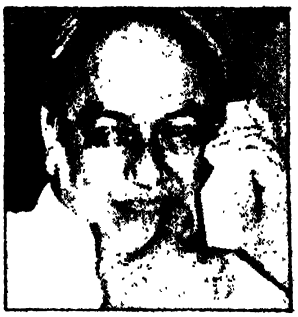
BAROMETER

How they rate in Jat politics

M.S. Tikait: His militant stand on the Mandal Commission issue and his performance at the 2 October rally, with much talk of setting MPs and MLAs aflame, have resulted in his raising his stock in the community. If the plan to arrest him does go through, he will be anointed a martyr as well.

Devi Lal: His initial ambiguous stand on reservations had cost him a fair amount of support among the Jats. But by resigning from the Lok Sabha, the Chaudhary has improved his situation somewhat.

Ajit Singh: Started off with a statement supporting the implementation of the Mandal recommendations. Realised his folly soon enough and began a signature campaign to include the Jats among the other backward castes. But by then it was too late. And his anti-Tikait stand only made matters worse.



Satyapal Malik: Though the minister of state has not come out openly against the Mandal Report, he has made the appropriate noises about Jat inclusion. His rating, therefore, while not spectacular by any means, is moderately good.

Vishwendra Singh: He made the best move of his political life when he resigned from Parliament on the reservation issue, getting the Jat youth of Rajasthan, Haryana and Uttar Pradesh on his side at one stroke. As measure of his increasing importance, he has become a permanent fixture at all meetings of Tikait and Devi Lal.

Punjab is better than PR

During the Rajiv raj, the Prime Minister's Office (PMO) had taken on such tasks as were out of its mandate, with varying degrees of success. Thus, we had G.Parthasarathyassuming the role of principal advisor on Sri Lanka while Mani Shankar Aiyar became the PR (Panchayati Raj not public relations) expert.

Now the Raja's PMO seems to be going the same way. At least, if press advisor to the Prime Minister,

Prem Shankar Jha: package deals are best

Prem Shankar Jha's performance is anything to go by.

Jha, during his innings as The Hindustan Times editor, had been obsessed with the idea that an economic package would solve all of Punjab's problems. And now Jha has been handed the task of evolving just that package.

Never mind the PM's relations with the press, which stand at an all-time low. ●

Teething problems

He had been best-known for his forcible entry into the Delhi Gymkhana. Apparently Har Kewal Prasad, Janata Dal member of the Lok Sabha, had broken the lock on the main gate to effect entry, to protest the club's dress restrictions

Well, now, Prasad has a further claim to fame. In a recent debate on the Mandal issue, the vociferous MP was holding forth in his usual fiery style when he suddenly stopped in mid-sentence, and sat down in his chair, clutching his mouth.

The hon'ble member had lost his dentures.

All business came to a standstill as everyone went down on their knees to locate Prasad's teeth. But, strangely enough, they were nowhere to be found.

The distraught member retired to mourn the loss.

And latest reports have it that he has been fitted out with a new pair.

Off with their heads

The Prasar Bharati Bill notwithstanding, the Janata Dal government seems to have no intentions of going through with its electoral promise of granting autonomy to the electronic media.

At a recent Cabinet meeting, for instance, ministers Sharad Yadav, Ram Vilas Paswan and Mufti Mohammad Sayeed tore into Doordarshan for its temerity in giving generous coverage to the anti-reservation agitation. Why had Mandi House, they asked, dared to telecast shots of police firing and of students running riot? This had only escalated the stir, they maintained.

Their tirade didn't go in vain. Sure enough, heads began to roll at Doordarshan. Additional director-general (news) P.C. Arya has been denied the extension promised him earlier. And informed sources have it that director-general Shiv Sharma may soon be removed, with Shashi Kapoor assuming temporary charge.

And the next casualty may well be information and broadcasting minister, P. Upendra.

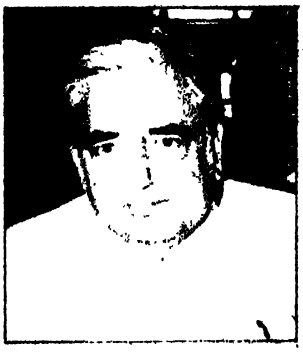
CHECK-LIST



Prominent OBCs (other backward castes), according to the Mandal Report

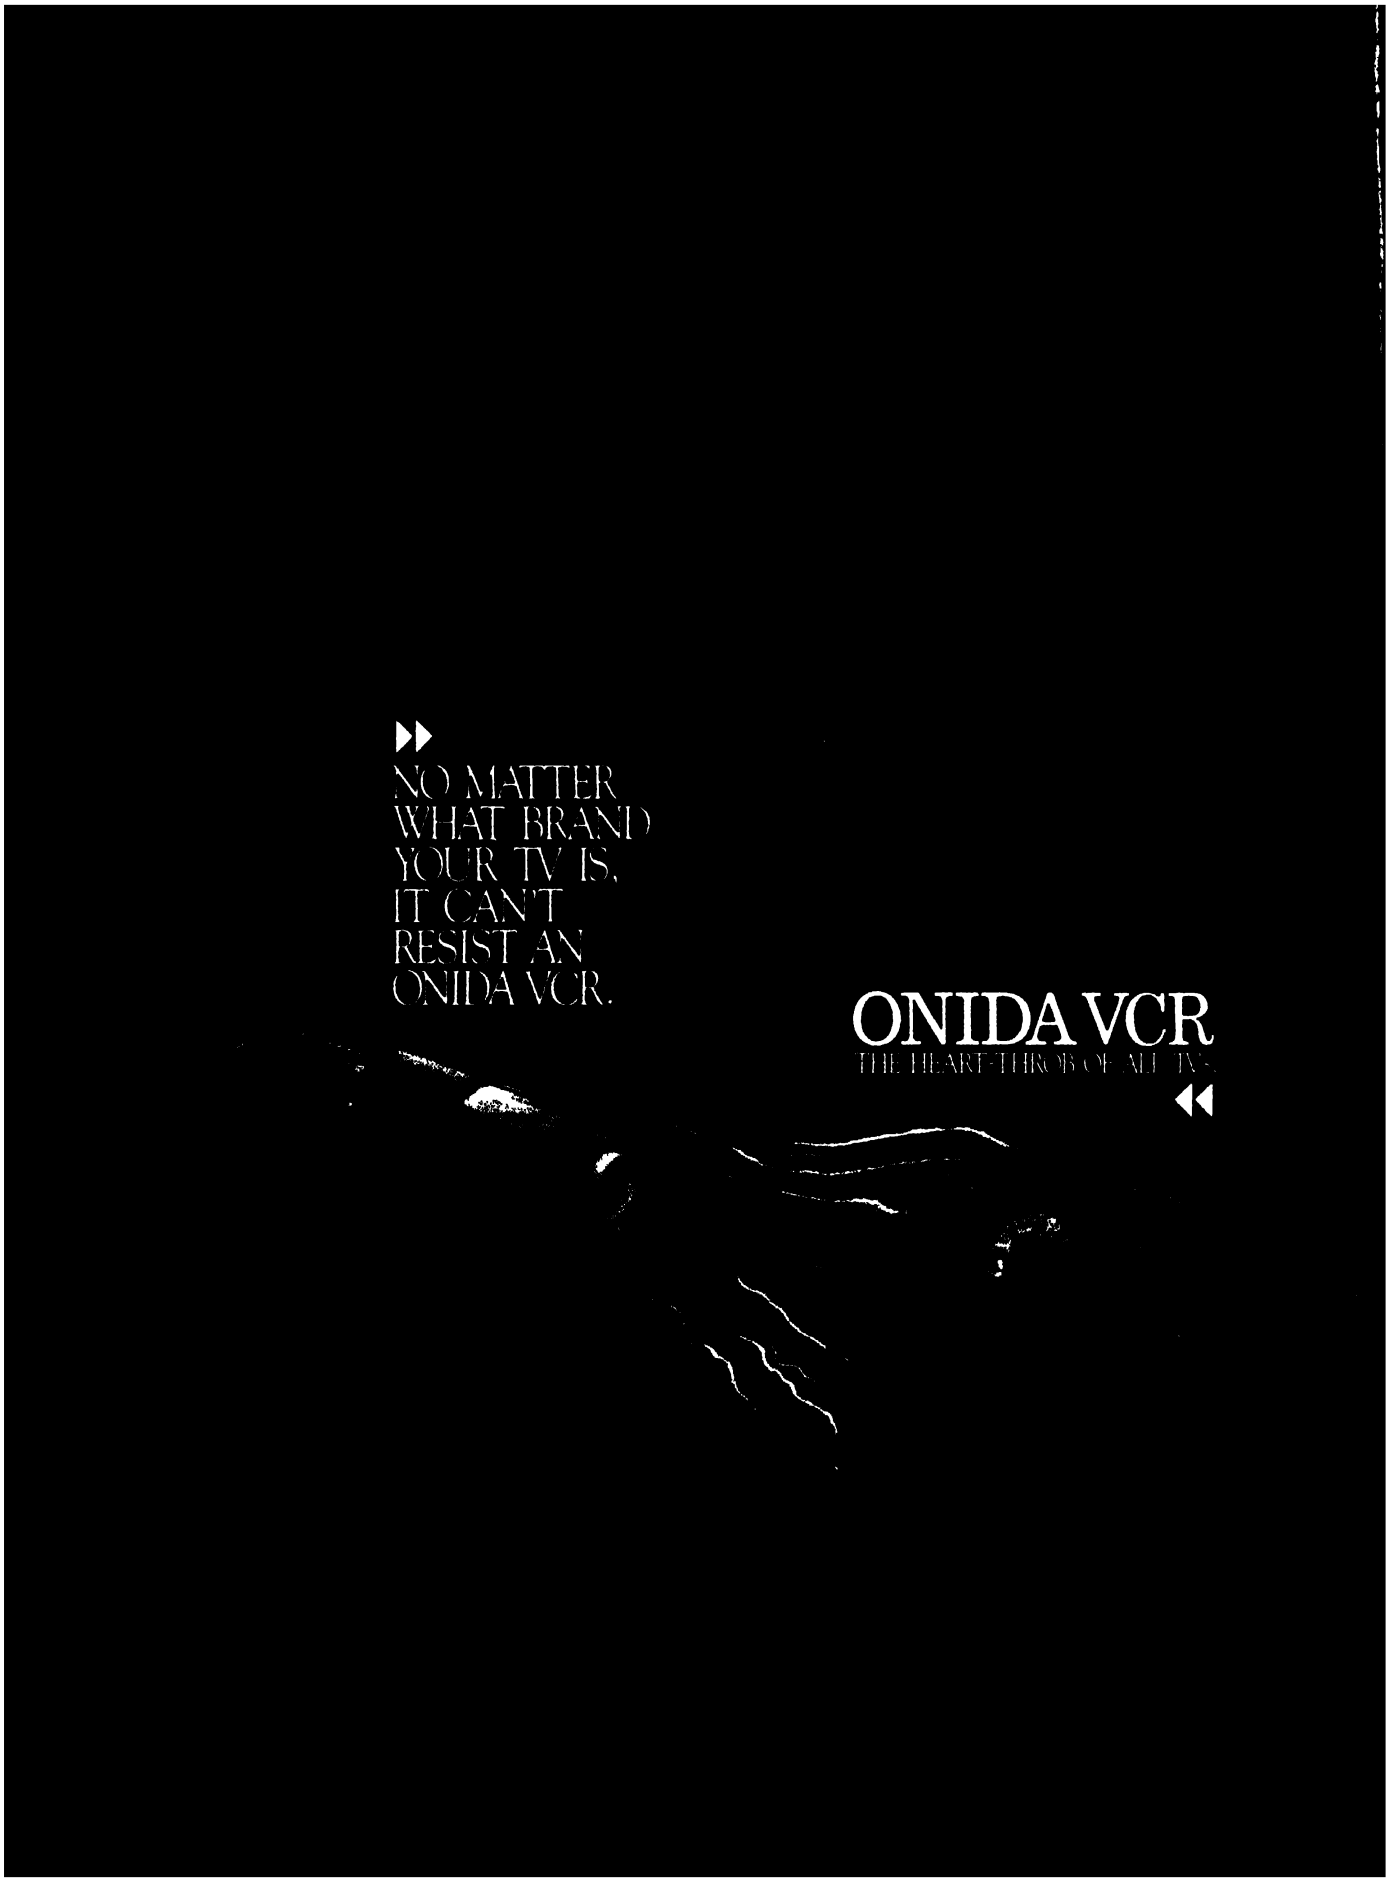
- V.P. Singh: In Punjab, Rajputs are included in the OBC list. And guess what that makes the Raja of Manda.
- Vijayaraje Scindia: The Rajmata of Gwalior and her son the Maharaja (Madhavrao Scindia) qualify to the OBC list, being Marathas in Madhya Pradesh.
- Mani Shankar Aiyar: He may be a caste Brahmin in Tamil Nadu, but in neighbouring Andhra Pradesh, Aiyar is as backward as Sharad Yadav. Or Ram Vilas Paswan, for that matter.
- Captain Satish Sharma: Never mind the Italian marble-tiled swimming pool (yes, the kind that all Indian Airlines' pilots have), the good Captain is an OBC in his native state, Punjab.
- Dinesh Goswami: In the Union Territory of Delhi, all Goswamis are OBCs. So the minister's progeny can avail of reservations; never mind the fact that they are classified as upper castes (Brahmins) in the rest of the country.
- K.K. Birla: The noted industrialist qualifies to this honour in Bihar and Orissa by virtue of being a Bania.

Life as a party

Nero might well have fiddled while Rome burnt. But home minister Mufti Mohammad Sayeed prefers to pontificate on the finer points of the best Scotch, while disaffected students immolate themselves to protest the reservation policy.

But we suppose as cocktail party performances go, the Mufti's was near perfect. For, yes, the honourable home minister of India was host at just such an affair while the anti-reservation students' stir turned the capital into a city of fear, anger and flames.

Mufti Mohammad Sayeed: modern-day Nero



His guests included highly-placed bureaucrats and the usual sprinkling of media persons. And nobody looking in at the gathering could have told that Sayeed had a care in the world. And they would have, probably, been right.

But then, the Lieutenant Governor of Delhi, Arjan Singh wasn't any better. On 2 October, while the students and Tikait's farmers gathered at the Boat Club to berate the government, Singh spent the entire day at the golf course, improving his handicap.

Well, to each his own.

Grading the ministers

The cover story (Checklist, 23—29 September) featuring the National Front ministers was absorbing. The performance of I.K. Gujral and Ram Vilas Paswan does not appear to be even mediocre. During the Gulf crisis, Gujral, instead of taking an independent stand, ordered the closure of the Indian embassy in Iraq at Saddam Hussein's behest.

On the domestic front, Paswan, the self-professed messiah of the backward classes, is bent upon dividing Indian society along caste lines. Therefore, it would have been appropriate to place them in the bad category.

Siddharth Sharma, Serampore (West Bengal)

■ The cover story on the performance of the central ministers was largely arbitrary, unfair and prejudiced.

There would be general agreement only on the home minister's showing, who has been characterised as rank bad. By his inept handling, the Mufti has allowed Kashmir to drift. Madhu Dandavate is reputed to be a man of honesty and integrity—rare qualities in Indian politics. But his record as finance minister has been dismal, especially because of the recent hike in the prices of essential commodities.

The averages were ill-chosen. For, George Fernandes has been a total disaster as the railway minister. While Ram Vilas Paswan and Sharad Yadav have proved themselves to be liabilities to the Cabinet. They are capable of shattering any Prime Minister's image by their blatantly casteist tendencies.

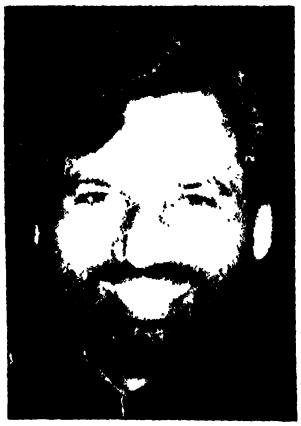
I.K. Gujral, the foreign minister, articulate and resourceful, seems to have done a good job with a difficult portfolio. It is hard to imagine anybody else doing any better to solve the problems of the Indian refugees stranded in the Gulf.

D. Anjaneyulu, Madras (Tamil Nadu)

■ The performance of Sharad Yadav and Ram Vilas Paswan cannot be rated as average under any circumstances. By supporting reservation, they are fanning communal sentiments and dividing the country along caste lines. They do not seem to have any respect for India's secular credentials. Therefore, they are liabilities not only to the party they belong to, but also to Indian society.

Jai Abe Cherian, Tumkur (Karnataka)

■ One is surprised to find I.K. Gujral and Sharad Yadav being labelled as average, when they should be labelled as bad. Under I.K. Gujral, India has lost the international prestige it had built up over the years—thanks to India's soft line on Saddam Hussein. India has now become the laughing stock of the world along with Jordan and Palestine.



Sharad Yadav's performance has been the worst in the government. Given that he is bent on dividing society along caste lines, it is really surprising to find him in the average category. To say the least, he has been a real disaster.

Amit Mathur, Sindri (Bihar)

Farooq Abdullah: opportunist

Running away

Farooq Abdullah's absence from Kashmir (The marathon man, 23—29 September) when the state was burning clearly shows that he is not the sort to tackle challenges head-on. Considering the fact that Farooq could have won over at least some of the misguided Kashmiris and thereby brought back a semblance of peace in the Valley, his action becomes even more deplorable.

This, however, raises another important question: why did Farooq decide to leave Kashmir at such a crucial time? His differences with the Centre over the appointment of Jagmohan as the Governor of J&K is well-known. And it is likely that Farooq wanted to prove to the Centre that his absence will worsen the situation in Kashmir. Alas, it only proves that Abdullah is now more opportunistic than ever.

V. Badarinarayana, Mysore (Karnataka)

■ The profile of Farooq Abdullah was excellent. It rightly suggests that the former chief minister should immediately be put at the helm of affairs in the Valley in order to tide over the present crisis. Though Jagmohan did his best to tackle the explosive situation in the state, he couldn't come up with a lasting solution. The main problems that plague Kashmir are both political and economic—for which there are no answers. And under such circumstances, it is only Farooq Abdullah—who is extremely popular in Kashmir—who can convince the estranged Kashmiris that their future lies with India and bring them back to mainstream politics. Time, however, is fast running out.

Kali Charan Banerjee, Calcutta (West Bengal)

■ Farooq Abdullah is solely responsible for the mess in Kashmir. The people of Kashmir were alienated by the misrule of Farooq. Rampant corruption and unemployment angered the youth. And whenever the going got rough, Farooq chose the easy way out—running away from the Valley. Therefore, one cannot agree with the opinion that "Farooq is still Kashmir's only hope". It will be a great mistake to thrust Farooq on Kashmir again.

Rajesh Kabu, Jaipur (Rajasthan)

Armchair criticism

The report (Fading glory, 24—30 June) on the Tawang monastery is full of insinuations and factual errors. It seems to be a deliberate attempt to tarnish the image of the century-old monastery.

The committee set up after Rajiv Gandhi's visit in March 1988, met four times and not once, as reported in the magazine. So, it is wrong to say that the Centre's initiative to preserve the ancient complex appears to have fizzled out.

And, can the reporter substantiate with proper evidence that obscene films were being screened in the premises? When did he visit the monastery? Simply by gathering most of the information from Arunachal Review or from Itanagar, he cannot justify his observations. The report has not only hurt the sentiments of the monks and the people of Tawang, but also the entire Buddhist community.

Tsering Lomden, District Information and Public Relations Officer, Tawang (Arunachal Pradesh)

Changing colours

The write-up (Chameleon, 2—8 September) was thought-provoking. But unfortunately, the chameleon has failed to hide its true colours. By deciding to implement the Mandal Commission recommendations, V.P. Singh has not only belied a lot of expectations, he has showed what he is: just another politician with an eye on the vote-bank. The Mandal report has already divided the country along caste lines and if its recommendations are finally implemented, then a lot of talented people could become its victims. So, it is time that the Raja does some soul-searching and set things right.

V.P. Singh: building up a vote-bank

Sasank Sekhar Mohapatra, Kamalang (Orissa)

■ V.P. Singh's decision to implement the Mandal Commission Report is a blow to India's professed social ideologies. Projecting himself as a casteist, V.P. Singh has provoked a caste war which threatens the basic solidarity of our country. Reservations along caste lines are politically motivated and are against the norms of social justice.

Mitali Mohanty, Bhubaneswar (Orissa)

The damaged Jaffna railway station: the battle continues

Mixed-up priorities

Notwithstanding the fascinating aspects of the hi-tech breakthrough (Enter, the Hyperplane 16—22 September), I was frankly dismayed at the gross mix-up of our priorities as a nation. Can we really afford the luxury of such expensive development projects? Have we really exhausted all avenues of work on this planet to tackle the process of colonisation of space? Why don't we ask our brilliant scientists to concentrate on solving some of the major problems confronting us, rather than wasting time on Hyperplanes?

Krishan Kalra, New Delhi

War is not the answer

The special report (The siege of Jaffna, 23—29 September) was scintillating. In a war where symbolic success counts as much as military achievements, the siege by the Sri Lankan Army cannot be underestimated. However, it would be naive for the Premadasa regime to believe that only a military victory can resolve the Tamil problem. For, the IPKF experience has shown that while the LTTE can be forced to retreat, it is impossible to exterminate it Therefore, Colombo should complement its military action with a parallel political strategy aimed at winning over the Tamils.

Chiranjib Haldar, New Delhi

A matter of faith

The charismatic group (Crossing over, 23—29 September) is unknown, unless it means the Catholic charismatic groups. These do not "repudiate all practices of the Rome orders" but have proved invaluable in offering a Catholic alternative to leaving the Church. The Emmanuel Prayer Group is Catholic, de jure and de facto, and holding its own meetings is an approved and endorsed practice in the CCR. The alleged anti-Mary statements of the EPG is hardly the issue. The real issue is whether the laity will be allowed to take their rightful place in the Church, against the wishes of certain priests whose very existence as priests is an anachronism. Businessmen's Fellowship is not a "splinter group" but a group of Christians who share their experience of Jesus Christ with professional colleagues.

Anthony Miranda, Bombay (Maharashtra)

NIRUPAMA SUBRAMANIAN

The war bogey

Keeping it alive serves Pakistan's interests

It is not at all in Pakistan's interest to either start or provoke a war with this country over Kashmir or any other issue. Why then are the Pakistani rulers—led by the man who calls the shots, General Mirza Aslam Beg—raising the ante steadily in both bitter words and diabolical deeds? The answer to this question is obvious. The scare, bordering on hysteria, that is being built up against India all over Pakistan is not entirely unconnected with Kashmir, where Islamabad continues to perceive a "golden opportunity" to wrest from India the lovely Valley it has been lusting after for over four decades. Both major military activity and infiltrations of armed and indoctrinated youth into the Valley would become almost impossible at the end of October, by when all mountain passes become snowbound.

Hence the sudden flurry of incessant artillery shelling in the Kupwara sector, normally the favoured route of the infiltrators. So that, with the attention of the Indian forces concentrated there, infiltrations could be attempted in the hitherto unused and extremely hazardous Gurez-Drass-Sonmarg trail. It is a measure of the desperate effort put in by the Pakistanis that from the Gurez-Drass sector, the security forces captured in the first three days of October more militants and greater quantities of sophisticated arms than they normally do in a whole month.

For the present, however, the main purpose of the anti-India campaign is related more to the elections due on 24 October rather than to anything else, including Kashmir. This is because all the clever plans formulated by President Ghulam Ishaq Khan, General Aslam Beg and their preferred politicians of the IJI and the Combined Opposition Parties (COP) at the time of Benazir Bhutto's dismissal have gone awry.

Benazir's popularity graph is going up and up. And neither the Pakistani military nor the President is prepared to accept her return to power

Far from being discredited by charges of corruption and court cases or weakened by a split in the PPP, Benzair has emerged stronger than before. Her personal popularity graph is going up and up. Her party is more united than ever before while the IJI-COP combination is in utter disarray. Even those who remain appalled by the reckless money-grabbing by her husband, Asif Zardari, see Benazir to be under persecution.

At the same time, neither the Pakistani military nor the President is prepared to countenance Benazir's return to power. Having realised that it was a mistake on her part to fight the army, Benazir has totally muted her criticism of the armed forces and made Ishaq the sole target of her trenchant attack.

Normally, Ishaq, acting at the army's behest, would have found some way to disqualify her or to postpone the poll. Benazir still apprehends that this might yet happen before E-Day. But there is a problem which the Pakistani ruling establishment must face. The Americans, for their own reasons, want elections to be held in Pakistan as scheduled and for these to be free and fair. This does not mean that they are wanting Benazir's restoration by the Pakistani electorate. But they want to see that the elections are not cancelled.

It is in this context that General Beg's attempt to build up a scenario in which Pakistan's security and stability is seen to be threatened by the "traditional enemy", India, makes sense as a desperate ploy to make the postponement of the poll justifiable. The sequence of events speaks for itself.

At first it was made out that Benazir had sent an emissary to New Delhi to plead for an Indian invasion so that the almost certain humiliation of the Pakistani Army could forestall the dismissal she was fearing before it actually took place. When this lie did not work—ironically, the story was publicised more in India than in Pakistan—Beg thought of an Indian plot to destabilise Pakistan. He backed it up with the equally false allegation that India's XII Corps had been moved forward to positions from where it could easily attack Pakistan. Since US and Soviet satellites keep track of all Indian and Pakistani military movements, the absurdity of the Pakistani charge was exposed in no time. Then came the expulsion of four Indian employees of the Indian consulate-general. Soon enough some other stratagem is bound to be tried and we will be witnessing a cliff-hanger. ●

VP blunders again

The Karnataka Governor's brazenness is turning out to be a major embarrassment for the Prime Minister

When Gerry Ford became the President of the US, Lyndon Johnson was not impressed. "He is so stupid," said LBJ. "He can't chew gum and fart at the same time." It would be uncharitable, even unfair, to express a similar opinion about Rajiv Gandhi. Nevertheless, his talent for messing things up sometimes takes one's breath away. I recently met a Janata party Rajya Sabha MP, who has played a key role in destabilising the V.P. Singh regime, and he told me that in late September and early October he had interacted with Rajiv on an almost daily basis. "He is hard-working, decent, patriotic, well-meaning, but he is completely out of his depth in politics. He just cannot absorb all the different information that comes his way." This assessment was delivered with a twinge of regret.

I see there is much jubilation within the Janata Dal over Rajiv's gift to the ruling party: President's rule in Karnataka. Characteristically, the Congress president created a crisis where none existed, thus allowing Governor Bhanu Pratap Singh to do the needful. In the process, Mr Gandhi wasted a fine opportunity to get rid of a chief minister he greatly disliked. What a screw-up. When journalists in Bangalore were told by the 'supreme' leader that Veerendra Patil wouldbereplaced in 'four days' they were so stunned that they asked Rajiv to repeat the statement. He duly obliged. This public and brutal humiliation of the chief minister left Veerendra Patil with no option but to defy the high command.

Actually, Mr Gandhi was on firm ground as far as the capacity of the CM to govern was concerned. The state had seen the worst communal riots in its history, and the chief minister—as Doordarshan pictures clearly showed—was in no physical condition to cope. Alas, Rajiv went straight for the jugular and clobbered a sick man with the sack. What he should have done is let the demand for the dismissal come from the Congress Legislative Party which he had in his pocket.

Not only has Rajiv handed Karnataka on a platter to the National Front, he has supplied vital oxygen to a gasping Prime Minister. For at least seven days in the month of October, V.P. Singh's mounting woes took second place to the daily drama in Karnataka. Had Mr Gandhi curbed his instinct for shooting off his mouth, the horrendous train carnage in Andhra Pradesh would have received its due attention. Under the circumstances, the first and most savage reply from the pro-Mandal forces got buried in the inside pages of the newspapers.

In one onslaught, the votaries of reservations butchered nearly 70 people in an attack of stunning barbarity. Is the bogie fire on the outskirts of Hyderabad a sample of the way in which the agitation will now progress? If the Karnataka drama had not diverted the country's attention, proper emphasis would have been placed on the fact that the train murders happened 24 hours after V.P. Singh, had addressed a controversial rally in Patna in which he exhorted the backwards not to lose heart but to redouble their efforts to secure a place in the sun.

The government tried very hard to play up the Naxalite dimension of the tragedy, and play down the reservation angle. The truth, however, is that the People's War Group (PWG) has never indulged in this sort of outrage: their targets are restricted and specific (police, landlords, forest officials) and they have always inflicted individual, not collective, punishment. Moreover, the distribution of pro-Mandal and anti-Supreme Court leaflets at the site of the crime leaves no doubt that the 'fitting reply' Ram Vilas Paswan so frequently threatens us with, has begun. It is possible that V.P. Singh's 'inner voice', that Rajiv Gandhi, Chandra Shekhar and Devi Lal are banking upon, may have been activated by the Hyderabad horror if the headlines on 11 October had concentrated on the Andhra train blaze rather than the suspended animation of the Karnataka Assembly.

In the past few months as the Prime Minister floundered aimlessly from crisis to crisis, demonstrating in the process that he was no different from the contenders for the big prize, Rajiv Gandhi had benefited by default. One frequently heard that our Rajiv may be incompetent, juvenile, given to forming 'coteries', but at least his larger vision of the country's future is sound. Now, we are back to the original portrait, a decent bloke perhaps, but 'hopeless'. Make him Prime Minister again and he will tie himself up in all kinds of knots. Despite his pedigree, and by now nearly ten years of experience in active public life, he remains a political innocent whose occasional attempts at individual enterprise (apparently, no one in the party had any inkling that the leader was about to give Patil the chop) end up as unmitigated disasters. Not surprisingly, then, the multiple follies of the National Front government and Vishwanath Pratap Singh have resulted in no 'bring back Rajiv' cry in the nation.

Unfortunately, these are bad days for V P Singh. Rajiv may have come to his aid by providing a timely diversion, but as the events in Bangalore unfold, it is the National Front government in New Delhi which may end up with egg on its face. I am certain the expectation in ruling party circles was that the imposition of President's Rule in Karnataka, temporary or long-term, would draw little flak since Governors during Congress years had on more than one occasion behaved in a blatantly partisan manner. So, while the Opposition would no doubt protest that constitutional norms had been violated, V.P. Singh was hoping for only a few murmurs of disapproval over Governor Bhanu Pratap Singh's dubious decision.

No such luck. The behaviour of Ram Dulari Sinha, Ram Lal, P.V. Venkatasubbaiah, while fresh in the electorate's mind, did not seem adequate justification for the use of Article 356 in Karnataka. Had the Governor exercised his judgement in a situation rife with arithmetical confusion there could have been some justification. But, Veerendra Patil, however deserving of our sympathies, is a lost cause. Out of the 181 Congress MLAs, his followers are less than 40. Therefore, the question of the local Janata Dal—who, incidentally number 25—coming to the rescue of the ailing chief minister does not arise. The Karnataka Governor had only two options, he could either have asked Patil to resign or prove his majority on the floor of the House. Few are going to buy the argument about the communal situation in the state being so grave as to make President's Rule imperative.

Ironically, the day Governor Bhanu Pratap Singh's decision was announced, the Prime Minister was lecturing the invitees to the first meeting of the Inter-State Council on the need to take heed of the Sarkaria Commission Report. And what were the main recommendations of the report? It had been scathing about the role of Governors, it had reiterated that the only proper forum to test the legitimacy of a chief minister was the Assembly floor, it had cautioned against indiscriminate use of Article 356.

V P Singh is a practising poet, so he probably values irony. Nonetheless, he should advise the Karnataka Governor not to make his partiality so apparent. On the day that President's Rule was imposed, the Indian Express reported: "Mr Bhanu Pratap Singh answered several provocative questions with a smile on his face." Playing around with the Constitution of India may be a laughing matter for Bhanu Pratap but for V P Singh, the Governor's brazenness is turning out to be a major embarrassment.

Let me construct an alternate scenario. Mr Gandhi goes to Bangalore on 6 October and performs his Chaplinesque act. The state Janata Dal falls over itself in excitement. Ruling party MPs and ministers deplore the manner in which the Congress treats its chief ministers. Even the Prime Minister expresses compassion for the hapless Veerendra Patil.

All the while, Bhanu Pratap Singh remains silent, receiving memoranda and delegations from all parties. He holds no daily press conference, issues no statements beyond, "I am examining the situation". After 145 Congress MLAs supporting change are presented to him on the lawns of Raj Bhavan, he issues a brief statement requesting the chief minister to summon the Assembly in 72 hours and prove his majority.

The Governors standing in the nation would have risen and the Prime Minister could then rightfully claim that his government was committed to higher values. As it is, in a few days Patil will have to go. President's Rule will be revoked with Rajiv's nominee secure in the CM's chair. And V.P. Singh will stand exposed.●

Rajiv Gandhi was on firm ground as far as the capacity of the CM to govern was concerned. But alas, he went straight for the jugular and clobbered a sick man, Veerendra Patil (above), with the sack.

The Hollow Man

Children burn on the streets of India as V.P. Singh frames his agenda in terms of a non-issue

SONDEEP SHANKAR

He is the first Prime Minister of India who does not look you in the eye. Ask Vishwanath Pratap Singh a straight question and he will dissemble. Stare him in the face and he will not meet your gaze. Confront him with an unpleasant truth and he will lapse into silence.

And yet, over the last five years, V.P. Singh has set the agenda for Indian politics. In 1985, Rajiv Gandhi hoped to use the largest electoral mandate in history to put politics on a new course, aiming directly for the 21st century He had good looks, charisma, the Nehru/Gandhi dynasty and the propaganda machinery of the Government of India on his side. But finally, his silicon chip, Doon-accented Rajiv revolution collapsed because his little-known finance minister raised an issue that seized the national imagination: corruption.

For four years from 1986 onwards, Indian politics revolved around corruption. Did the government have the guts to act against big business? Had Rajiv made money on the Bofors deal? Could the Congress party ever provide clean government?

Rajiv Gandhi refused to accept V.P. Singh's agenda; he lost his office. Chandra Shekhar told the country that the corruption issue was a red herring; he was written off as 'irrelevant'. R.K. Hegde was unable to clear himself of involvement in various land scams; he was tossed aside.

As each potential Prime Minister failed to see that V.P. Singh had radically altered the terms of reference for Indian politics, his career went up in smoke. Till finally, the Raja became the only alternative Prime Minister.

Two months ago, he rewrote the rules of the game again. Sensing that the corruption issue was losing its appeal, Vishwanath Pratap Singh set a new agenda. Now, the issue is caste-based reservation. Suddenly, everything in Indian politics is seen in terms of Mandal. You may be for it. Or you may be against it. Or—like most politicians—you may be both for and against it. But your position is still defined in terms of Mandal.

Once again, it is V.P. Singh who has framed the context. Everyone else is only responding to his initiative.

Men who set the agenda are usually great national leaders, statesmen—visionaries even. But up close, Vishwanath Pratap Singh is none of these. He is more shrewd than statesman-like. Much more a deal-maker than a dreamer. If he is a visionary, then perhaps he is the shiftiest visionary in the history of politics; the first great leader who has trouble meeting your gaze.

Yes, he always selects subjects that grip the national imagination, but never does he choose an issue that helps India go forward. Instead, he chooses those that cause division and spread suspicion. By making corruption the agenda, he ensured that everyone suspected everybody else; that resources that should have been expended on securing the future were wasted in an effort to reopen and re-examine the past in a series of never-ending investigations.

Moreover, he always chooses non-issues. In 1986, when he launched the raid raj, the then government faced several problems and had certain priorities. It had begun the process of restoring peace to the Punjab and had brought order to Assam, Kashmir and Mizoram. It had started dismantling the licence-quota-permit raj and was slowly beginning to bring India in line with the rest of the world. By mid-1987, all of that had been forgotten. The only thing that mattered was Bofors.

The consequence was that most of the problems got worse, the economic revolution remained unfinished and even today, with V.P. Singh in power, we are no nearer finding out the truth about Bofors.

The caste issue has been raised in much the same manner. Since V.P. Singh took office, Kashmir has blown up, Punjab has got worse and Assam is teetering on the brink of chaos. Inflation rages unchecked. Oil prices have sky-rocketed. Our economy seems poised for a recession. And the changes in Eastern Europe have made India all but irrelevant in the international context.

V.P. Singh has no solutions to any of these problems. The government does not have a policy on Kashmir, Punjab or Assam. The foreign ministry has formulated no coherent response to the Gulf crisis. And there appears to be no economic policy apart from ritual demands for austerity.

In the midst of all this—at the brink of perhaps our biggest crisis since 1947—V.P. Singh's solution has been to frame his agenda in terms of a non-issue: caste-based reservation.

There is much that is wrong with the Mandal proposals—reservation is counter-productive, to think in terms of caste sets us back 50 years, etc — but that is not the point. Even if Mandal made some sense—which it doesn't—it is still irresponsible to make it the agenda when the real problems are ignored.

But then, that is typical of V.P. Singh. Not only does he set the agenda, he takes care to pick a curiously unreal issue, one that has nothing to do with the crises of India.

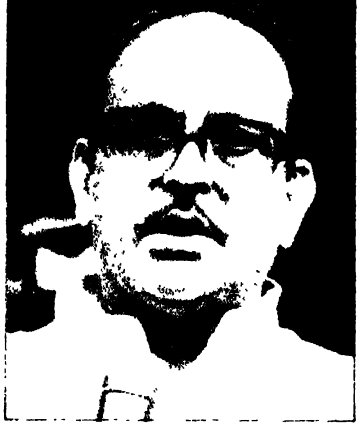
Admittedly, there is a short-term brilliance in his choice of these issues. Each time, he selects a position that cannot be opposed. In 1986, he talked about corruption. The best his rivals could say in reply was that it was a diversion or that it was not a key issue. Nobody could say that he supported corruption. Finally, everybody had no choice but to mouth his line that corruption was a very bad thing.

He has pulled exactly the same stunt with Mandal. By letting the genie out of the bottle, by breaking the last taboo of Indian politics and by setting the agenda in terms of caste, he has framed his context in terms that nobody dares oppose.

The reality of Indian politics is that everyone must accept the principle of reservation or risk losing Scheduled Caste support. Having accepted that principle, nobody dares refuse to extend it to backward castes for fear of committing electoral hara-kiri. Even Rajiv Gandhi, whose first instinct was to condemn the move, had to back down after Congress MPs threatened to revolt.

Thus, V.P. Singh can proudly state today that no political party of any consequence has opposed the Mandal Commission Report. Nearly all have quibbled with the manner of its implementation, but not one has phrased these objections in terms that make much sense.

This then is the key to his success. Invent an essentially hollow and fraudulent vision. Ensure that it has little to do with India's real problems and frame your position so that nobody dares oppose you.



Today, we are appalled by the cynicism. But last year, we were convinced enough to make him Prime Minister.

In metamorphosing from Mr Clean to Mr Caste, V.P. Singh has bartered away the future of our children. As more and more of them burn themselves alive, we pay the price for his ambition

Three weeks ago, Yashwant Sinha spoke at a meeting of the National Front Parliamentary Party. Slowly, almost patiently, he listed the failures of the government. Then, towards the end of his speech, he came to the point. "Therefore," he concluded, "I would respectfully request that the Prime Minister step down and give somebody else a chance."

The demand was not entirely unexpected. Sinha and Harmohan Dhawan had already told the media that they intended to ask for V.P. Singh's resignation. Nor was the Raja's response particularly unpredictable. As Sinha neared the end of his speech, V.P. Singh began muttering to himself—loudly enough for his neighbours to hear—"there is no need for him to go on and on. If they want me to quit,

DIVERTING ATTENTION FROM THE ISSUES

MANDAL

Never before has the country been so divided on such a non-issue. But VP has framed his agenda in terms of caste to win votes then I will. I don't want this job", etc., etc.

It was a variation on an old theme. Ever since he became Prime Minister, V.P. Singh has never tired of reasserting his readiness to give up the job. And indeed, hearing him mutter away at that National Front meeting, at least one MP thought that he would rise to his feet and announce that he was quitting.

In fact, he did no such thing. Instead, assorted chamchas (P. Upendra, Jaipal Reddy, etc.) were promptly assigned the job of drafting a resolution expressing confidence in his leadership and the assembled MPs were made to reaffirm their faith in the Raja. Yashwant Sinha was outraged. "I can understand a motion of no-confidence," he fumed. "But why a motion of confidence? Will you pass one each time an MP criticises the Prime Minister?"

Sinha's objection made some sense, but it missed the point. It is now clear that V.P. Singh has never meant it when he has offered to resign. Instead, he has always made feeble protestations when he is certain that others will persuade him to stay.

The leadership election was one such instance. Nobody could understand why V.P. Singh was so keen that Chandra Shekhar not put himself forward as a candidate for the leadership of the Janata Dal. After all, the Raja had the majority. Shekhar was certain to lose.

In retrospect, the answer is clear. Had Shekhar stood, there would have been an election. V.P. Singh would have won it, but to do so, he would have had to declare his candidacy. It is important to the Raja that he should never be seen as seeking office. Nevertheless, he desperately wanted to become Prime Minister, while still professing reluctance to take the job.

So, a rather sordid solution was found. Shekhar would be told that Devi Lal was the consensus candidate and would therefore withdraw his own candidacy and propose the Tau instead. Lal would turn down the post and hand his crown to V.P. Singh. Thus, the Raja would get the job without ever having said that he wanted it.

When Arun Nehru and company resigned over V.P. Singh's deal with Devi Lal, the Raja managed to divert attention from his understanding with the Tau by making his resignation the issue. But to ensure that the resignation was not accepted, he took care not to send it to President R. Venk-ataraman but despatched it to S.R Bommai, president of the Janata Dal. So while V.P. Singh was able to assert that he cared nothing for office, Bommai was handed the dirty job of ironing out a compromise.

The resignation issue is important because it illustrates the extent to which V.P Singh's prime ministership has been constructed on fraud and pretence. Those who conceded that he ducked the real problems to focus on such issues as corruption would say in his defence that he was other-worldly and obsessed with probity to the extent that nothing else—not even political office—held any meaning for him.

But now, that defence no longer holds. The Raja is far from other-worldly. Over the last year, he has shown himself to be devious and manipulative. He craves desperately for public office—he just doesn't like saying so. And as for cleanliness in public life, we have not heard much about that ever since V.P. Singh decided that Mandal was the way ahead and that the corruption issue had run its course.

Four months ago, SUNDAY called V P. Singh the Indian political phenomenon of the last decade. He was, we suggested, the X factor in Indian politics: a man whose actions were so unpredictable that all political analysis was rendered irrelevant once he made his move.

By rewriting the agenda of Indian politics, V P Singh has proved us right. Nobody expected him to metamorphose from Mr Clean to Mr Caste overnight Gone is the mild-mannered JP-clone who would hand in his resignation at the slightest provocation. In his place stands a stubborn, calculating cow-belt manipulator who will cling to his chair as long as he thinks he has the backward vote sewn up.

It is an astonishing transformation made all the more astounding by the ease with which he has switched personas—still, never once looking the people of India in the eye.

But to achieve it, he has bartered away the future of our children. And with each passing day, as more and more of them burn themselves alive, the cost of his manipulations is becoming painfully obvious.

Is any Prime Minister worth that price?

Justice for all

That's the motto of Ranganath Mishra, the new Chief Justice

"The common man is my interest," says Ranganath Mishra, the soft-spoken judge who has been appointed India's 19th Chief Justice. "My philosophy is simple: a smile on everyone's face." It is a somewhat optimistic note for Chief Justice Mishra to start his year-long term as head of the highest court in the land. Especially, when the country's legal system is burdened with a mountain of cases like never before.

Legal circles in the capital feel that it is too early to comment on whether the Chief Justice will be able to bring about far-reaching changes in the judiciary. Justice Mishra's preference for lok adalats is well-known: as executive chairman of the Committee for Implementing Legal Aid Schemes, he has, over the last five years, tried to take "justice to the doorsteps of the people". Justice Mishra himself is hesitant to hold out any promises for the future. He does, however, believe that there is a great demand for lok adalats, and is likely to work out a system to encourage people to file new petitions before these local courts. "With a pendency of over two-and-a-half lakh cases, the disposals can be doubled with the help of lok adalats," says the Chief Justice.

Over the years, Justice Mishra has built for himself a reputation of being a champion of the underdog. His pro-labour judgements, especially in the Rohtas Paper Mills case of 1989, where he helped reinstate 22,000 workers, have won him considerable acclaim. Environmentalists were also indebted to the Justice when he passed an order to stop quarrying in the Doon Valley; journalists too benefited from his interim order before the Bachawat case was settled. His other landmark judgements held that public sector employees got dearness allowance commensurate with other government employee scales; he also regularised jobs of Karnataka state government employees.

And yet, despite all the judgements which have considerably aided workers and government employees alike, the Chief Justice will always be criticised for his report on the 1984 Delhi riots as chairman of the Justice Ranganath Mishra Commission. The judge invited widespread anger because he failed to indict the culprits, allowed Congress(I) bigwigs to go scot-free, and even underplayed the dimensions of the massacre following Mrs Gandhi's assassination. Instead, the judge laid the blame on small-time party functionaries, and diluted the very purpose of an inquiry into the riots, ostensibly yielding to political pressure. Justice Mishra defends himself saying: "People abused me then without reading my report. I said 3,300 people were killed and arranged for 1,900 houses to be made available for the victims."

"Human problems are my biggest concern," says the Chief Justice. And yet, legal circles are quick to point out that the Chief Justice's image as a protector of the downtrodden has been tarnished by some of his judgements. As part of a five-member bench, Justice Mishra, along with the then Chief Justice, R.S. Pathak, allowed the controversial settlement with Union Carbide Corporation in the Bhopal gas leak case. In the Antulay case, Justice Mishra did an about-turn on an order he had passed along with the then Chief Justice, P.N. Bhagwati, saying that the Maharashtra chief minister should be prosecuted. Subsequently, he and the former Chief Justice,Sabyasachi Mukharji, quashed the order.

Other judgements for which the Chief Justice has invited criticism include the controversial ruling he gave in favour of Tamil Nadu liquor baron M Veeraswamy Udayar. It is believed that Udayar attempted to oust his tenants, Indian Airlines and V.G. Paneerdas, from Madras' Victor House building, which the liquor supremo had acquired during MGR's time. There were allegations that the judge had availed of Udayar's hospitality on his frequent trips to Tamil Nadu.

Yet, senior lawyers and legal luminaries who are still trying to get used to the idea of a new Chief Justice so soon (Justice Mukharji's term would have lasted till 1 June, 1992, had he not died so suddenly), are reluctant to comment on the new Chief Justice so early in his term. "He has all the right credentials for a good Chief Justice," says a senior counsel. ●

Letter to an Editor

V.P. Singh comes across as "an altogether bizarre figure" in The Times of India interview

To:

Shri Dileep Padgaonkar,
Editor,
The Times of India,
New Delhi

My dear Dileep,

Wasn't it Shakespeare (or, far more probably, P.G. Wodehouse) who said that if the hour reveals the man, it also remorselessly exposes the washout? Your interview with the Prime Minister (TOI, 30/9/90) left us with the most tantalising glimpses of V.P. Singh—the Populist, the Politician, the Powerbroker. Would that it had gone on a little longer--for there was so much more one would have wanted you to ask.

VP kicks off, in response to your first question about the Mandal Commission with how "we have advised our supporters to be restrained"—a phrase which raises, of course, intriguing implications of the most delightful complexity. Eg: who are these mysterious beings—"our supporters"? Clearly not the Tau or Chandra Shekhar—nor something like 30 Janata Dal MPs, give or take the handful who are being blandished, bribed or browbeaten into switching sides as often as you and I change our underwear (aya forward, gaya backward kind of thing!)—for neither of the principals nor their occasional followers has been particularly "restrained" in denouncing their titular boss for the cad he is. Clearly too not Arun Nehru and the rest of the Jan Morcha gang in the Cabinet, for while they have indubitably been "restrained", their thunderous silence betokens not "support" but pursed-lips denunciation. The "support", such as it is, comes from the two bearded Neanderthals—Ram Vilas Paswan and Sharad Yadav—and who could accuse them of being "restrained"? And when the Prime Minister himself is being so totally unrestrained in drumming up Mandalian crowds from Madras' Marina Beach to Patna's Gandhi Maidan, might one take it that even he is not to be counted in his list of "our supporters"?

But let's move on. "There is support for Mandal in the south," says the Prime Minister—and then quickly adds "the support in the north is no less". Oh, yeah? If even he believed that, would he have set up the north-south distinction in his answer—when you hadn't even raised it in your question? And if the north-south divide on Mandal is VP's source of hope, what happened in Madras on Sunday, 7 October, must surely have put a damper on his illusions: for, Mandal or no Mandal, where the DMK procession on 16 September took three hours to wind past VP and Karunanidhi at Spencers' point on Mount Road, Jayalalitha's show took seven to flow past her and Rajiv Gandhi standing on a platform at the same point. Where, oh where, have all the VP's southern flowers gone?

And when the Prime Minister, surrounded by the charred remains of innocent children and the debris of a thousand demonstrations, says that support for what he has done is "no less" in the north than in the south

V.P. Singh claims that they (the National Front) have been giving notice for years that "We are going to implement Mandal in the first year that we come to power". Then how is it that they failed to say so in the manifesto?

(notwithstanding the refusal of both BJP state governments, Jyoti babu, and even Biju Patnaik's wholly JD regime—besides the footdragging reluctance of the JD-BJP coalitions in Rajasthan and Gujarat—to implement Mandal) do you think, Dileep, our Prime Minister is amnesiac, mendacious—or merely ungrammatical?

Couple that with his extraordinary reply to your question: "How then do you explain the violent reaction to your decision in the north?" The Prime Minister says: "The media has been giving a one-sided verdict." What, one wonders is one-sided about young Rajeev Goswami lying burnt on all sides in Safdarjung Hospital? Or the score and more of bereaved and bewildered mothers and fathers watching the Mandal torch set their kids on fire? What of the rallies—even by so obscure an organisation as the Indian People's Front (ever heard of it?)—bringing lakhs to the lawns of the Boat Club? What of the smashed traffic lights on Rajpath? What of the daily headlines from Chamba to Chandigarh, Ambala, Kurukshetra and Sonepat, from Ghaziabad to Varanasi, from Kota to Khandwa and beyond—as far south as Andhra Pradesh and as far east as Bihar, Bengal and Orissa? One-sided?

Followed by this puzzling bit of pop sociology. "An issue becomes socially volatile when there is only one sort of projection in the media"! No wonder the Mandal Commission so summarily disposed of their sociology experts For V.P. Singh's expertise in sociology leads him, it would seem, to believe that an issue (any issue—including one that affects every segment of society) is not volatile in itself but is only made so by the press! It is not, so our Prime Minister holds, his petty politics of upstaging the Tau, nor his abject failure to take even his supporters into confidence, nor even his grave dereliction of duty in not anticipating the depth of antipathy which his decision would provoke, that is responsible for the volatile mess in which we today find ourselves. All, apparently, would in the Prime Minister's view, have been sweetness and light but for media reporting making Mandal a "socially volatile" issue!

You then mildly interject, Dileep, that it is not just the press but "some political parties (who) have also been very critical"—to which V.P. Singh mutters in reply that all such criticism is "basically" confined to "the NSUI and the Congress in Bihar". Oops! What about the Congress in the rest of the country? Or the thousands of students who till yesterday were not even on talking terms with the NSUI (which, for the uninitiated, is the Congress students' wing)? Or indeed—as it takes your next question to point out—his own "outside supporters", the BJP and the CPI(M)? Do you think the man does not know? Has forgotten? Or has merely lost the speaking notes that his press adviser must have slipped him?!

Let's soldier on. The Prime Minister claims that they have been giving notice for years that "we are going to implement it (Mandal) in the first year that we come to power". (Italics mine, if you don't mind!) Then how is it that they failed to say so in their manifesto? If Mandal was so important to the NF's designs, I wish you had asked him, Dileep, why did they not even have a separate section on the Mandal report in their manifesto? Or why the total number of words in which the manifesto disposes of Mandal is exactly nine? And mentions nothing at all about implementation "in the first year"! Indeed, so ambiguous on the question of Mandal was the President's address to the joint Houses of Parliament that it led to their own party MP, Ram Avadesh Singh, the King of the Backwards, noisily walking out on the Rashtrapati (not kowtowing backwards but straight forward!) both in December 1989 and in February 1990? You should, Dileep, have challenged the Apostle of Truth to produce one single official statement of the National Front (not counting the PM's off-the-cuff populism at assorted public meetings) pledging implementation of the Mandal report in the first year.

V.P. Singh then goes on to claim that they have been "preparing the ground for years and years". Really? Then why was "implementation" confined to one part of one recommendation of the Mandal Commission Report? And why so many retractions in the weeks that have followed the 13 August notification? Is VP governing or waltzing" And does he still know whether this "first phase" is to be followed by other "phases" (asserted at Thiruvananthapuram: denied the next day)? And when are these phases to be? And what will they contain? If this massive confusion (VP is not a Confucianist but a Confusionist!) can you imagine where the NF could lead us without preparation?

You then ask him, Dileep, about why the intelligentsia "has not been able to appreciate you more" To which the Prime Minister responds: "They haven't accepted it in their hearts". Wrong, Prime Minister: they haven't accepted it in their heads! For that, Prime Minister, is where the intelligentsia thinks. Or didn't you know? The fact is that the problem of backwardness varies so much from state to state that no one state's approach is similar to any other's. At least four states—Himachal, Haryana, West Bengal and Orissa (not counting six of the 'seven sisters' of the north-east)—deny that they even have a problem of caste—or community-based backwardness. They recognise only the backwardness occasioned by poverty. In Karnataka, on the other hand, upwards of 90 per cent of the population is classified as scheduled or backward. In most northern states the figure drops to well below half. The removal of backwardness is a constitutional obligation: it was not invented by Mandal but, decades earlier, brought into the Constitution by Jawaharlal Nehru at the instance of Kamaraj. The intelligentsia are pointing to the ambivalences and contradictions besetting the announcement of reserved quotas for the backward classes in central government jobs, even as the Supreme Court is directing the government to definitively identify the backward classes before extending concessions to them—but the Prime Minister apparently believes that since he wears his heart on his sleeve, that is where the intelligentsia should be hanging their brains!

Who are VP's "our supporters"? The support such as it comes from two bearded Neanderthals—Ram Vilas Paswan and Sharad Yadav—and who could accuse them of being restrained?

When it comes to undeserved Class I employ for Laloo Prasad Yadav's nine offsprings, V P. Singh is to the fore with "equity". But when it comes to 30 lakh jobs in urban and semi-urban India, he forgets all about backward quotas

The Prime Minister then protests that his high objective, Dileep,has been to bring "equity as the central theme of the national politics". First, it was Bofors that was touted as the "central theme". When that blew up in his face, he shifted focus to "the youth". Then it was "the empty coffers". Then it was "the threat from Pakistan". Then it was the holiday on Dr/ Ambedkar's birth anniversary. Then it was the urban downturn for rural uplift. Then it was Prasar Bharati. For a while it was even statehood for Delhi. Then came the National Security Council. Now he says the central theme of our national politics is "equity". In fact, as he knows—and the Tau knows (and as the Tau knows that he knows that the Tau knows)—the "central theme" of the National Front's politics has always been and ever will be the Tau. How to inviegle him in. How to cheat him out. How to retain his supporters. While ridding themselves of the man himself. Whom to cajole. Whom to tempt. Whom to bully. To whom to pander. If "equity" had any place in V.P. Singh's scheme of national politics, why does he adamantly refuse to pronounce himself on reservations for the backwards in Central Universities, ITIs, IITs, medical schools and the like?Blue funk, of course. But is equity in education alien to equity in nationalpolitics?

And, more to the point, if "equity" is to be secured by 27 per cent reservations for a few hundred central government jobs, why has V.P. Singh not provided for any reservations in the scheme that his government have announced—ironically, on the same day that your interview appeared—which, they claim, will conjure up 30 lakh jobs a year under their shiny new employment-generation programme (which, in fact, is nothing but a tired recycling—with the usual dilutions and distortions—of the previous government's Nehru Rozgar Yojana)? When it comes to undeserved Class I employ for Lalloo Prasad Yadav's nine offspring (and may his tribe, like Abou Ben Adhem's, ever increase!). V.P. Singh is to the fore with "equity". But when it comes to 30 lakh jobs in urban and semi-urban India—the vast bulk of which could, if he so wishes, be directed to the backwards—VP just forgets all about backward quotas! What dedication to social justice! What commitment to social emancipation!

The piffle goes on Asked by you whether his concept of emancipation from backwardness means a place for the backwards in the "power structure", VP shoots back a line of inspired verse: "My concept is as follows: even if it is a hut, it must be your home"! Now, what do you think that means—if it means anything at all? Perhaps enlightenment is to be found a few lines down when you ask VP when it was that the Congress came to a dead-end? His answer is illuminating: "I think the watershed came with the Emergency." That was the watershed that marked V.P. Singh's transition from a junior chhut bhaiyya to Congress chief minister of the largest state in India. It was the watershed that carried him beyond to Number Two in Rajiv Gandhi's Congress government at the centre. So what his issue/value-based politics (strike out what is inapplicable) amounts to is this: My hut is my home—and your hut is also my home. And I am going to sit in it whether you like it or not. Even if it means sharing it with the Tau!

As you remark in your introduction to the interview: truly "an altogether bizarre figure"!

Yours in the Mercy of the Lord,

Mani

A scion of the Mysore royal family accuses Sanjay Khan of distorting history in The Sword Of Tipu Sultan

Srikantdatta Wadiyar is an indefatigable fighter. A scion of the Mysore royal family, who recently won a 16-year-long marathon court battle to regain possession of 454 acres of the Bangalore Palace grounds, Wadiyar is now threatening to take Sanjay Khan, producer of the television serial The Sword Of Tipu Sultan, to court for distorting history.

But will one victory lead to another? While the first battle was Wadiyar's personal fight against the descendants of a contractor, Chamaraju, in the controversy over the TV serial he seems to have the Mysoreans by his side. And Wadiyar is adamant.

Khan has incurred Wadiyar's wrath because of the way in which he has protrayed the royal family in the serial. Krishnaraja Wadiyar and his wife, Lakshmammanni, contemporaries of Hyder Ali and Tipu Sultan, have been shown as a clown and a scheming woman. "It is not only a distortion of historical facts but character assassination," fumes Srikantdatta, protesting against the injustice done to his forebears.

And it is not just the royal family Khan has irked by showing the former rulers in a poor light, but also the general public. As each episode of the serial is screened on Saturday nights, more and more people in Karnataka feel disgruntled. Mysoreans, because of their proximity and ties with the royalty, feel particularly disturbed. They even organised a protest march soon after the first episode had been telecast.

Now Wadiyar has decided to initiate legal proceedings against Khan. He is bent upon extracting an apology from Khan for depicting the royal family as one given to a licentious way of life and is also demanding the deletion of all derogatory references to his predecessors.

Wadiyar, the Congress MP from Mysore, expressed his displeasure to the information and broadcasting minister, P. Upendra in a letter dated 5 July. He demanded an apology both from Khan and the Doordarshan panelists who cleared the serial for telecast.

He wrote: "To my great dismay I find that the serial is a totally distorted version of historical facts. Mr Sanjay Khan, in his zeal to portray Hyder Ali and Tipu Sultan as secular nationalists, seems to be oblivious and blind to the actual historical facts and has presented a totally distorted version of the life and times of my ancestor." Despite the disclaimer at the beginning of each episode that the serial was not based on facts but was a historical fiction, Wadiyar said in the letter that "the very fact that certain historical figures and places have been referred to by their real names tantamounts to character assassination".

When his letter drew no response from Mandi House, the former prince followed up by writing another letter to Upendra. Wadiyar asked the minister to tell his panelists to study the Mysore gazetteers to get a correct picture of the events of that era.

On 4 September, almost a month after Wadiyar's second letter, Doordarshan sent a telex to Sanjay Khan regarding the objections being raised against his serial. Gopal Saksena, controller of programmes, requested Khan in the message to ensure that no derogatory or disparaging references were made to the Wadiyar family in the subsequent episodes.

The only response from the Khan camp to the issue has been a stony silence. The Wadiyar family has not heard a word from Khan and the serial continues to be telecast.

Besides Wadiyar, a number of historians have entered the fray pointing out the factual errors in the serial. All of them have denounced the way Krishnaraja Wadiyar and the queen have been portrayed. It must be recalled that when the entire nation was debating whether Hyder Ali and his son Tipu Sultan were secular, no one from Karnataka raised any doubts about the secular credentials of the two Muslim rulers.

But historians stress that there was no need to berate the Wadiyar family in order to highlight the fact that Hyder Ali and Tipu Sultan were unwavering nationalists. H.J. Imam, who has studied the Mysore royal family in depth, says Khan's work is "in extremely bad taste". "There are quite a few flaws in the serial. Krishnaraja Wadiyar was a weak ruler, but he was not a clown," he points out.

Y. Umanath Shenoy, another historian, feels that the serial is not true to history. In an article published in the widely-circulated magazine, Tarana, Shenoy has pointed out that "Hyder led a simple life and not an ostentatious one as shown in the serial."

So it seems that Sanjay Khan, is up against hard facts and Doordarshan guilty of passing off distorted history.

While Srikantdatta has reasons to be sore over the serial, he is overwhelmed by his victory in the land litigation. "I had to struggle for 16 years with blood and sweat to get back our property," sighed Wadiyar after the Karnataka High Court validated a compromise formula worked out by him and the contestants. Wadiyar now gets back possession of 344 acres, of which 110 acres will be split between his five sisters. Another 110 acres will remain in the joint possession of Wadiyar and the contractors.

The end of the litigation gave rise to speculations that Wadiyar planned to covert the palace (built along the lines of the Windsor Castle) into a five-star hotel. Among the bidders in the forefront were the Taj and the Oberoi hotel groups.

What lends credence to the speculation is the money the hotel deal would fetch Wadiyar, who is trapped in a huge tax debt. Since the abolition of privy purses, Wadiyar has accumulated tax arrears close to Rs 30 crore.

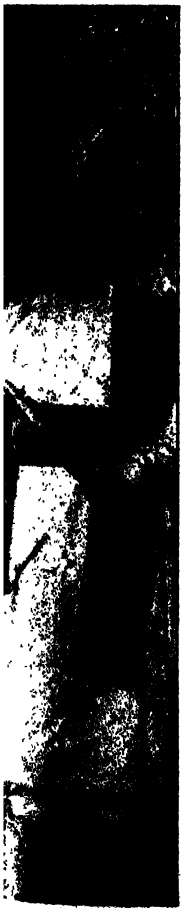
But Wadiyar soon scotched the rumours, saying: "You can forget such things. I am trying to maintain the grounds as a green belt."

The former prince and present Congress(I) MP, however, does not rule out the palace grounds being used for other commercial purposes. He says: "Our tax planners are working out the modalities. And we also have a few schemes which we are studying for feasibility."

MUSHTAQ AHMED

Built in 1880, the Bangalore Palace stands silent amid controversy. Rumours suggest that it might be converted into a hotel

The Bangalore Palace, constructed in 1880, is an attractive spot in Bangalore. The prime land, with good tree cover, is considered one of the lungs of the city on a par with the famous Cubbon Park and Lalbagh.



The dispute over the place grounds started during the time of Jayachamarajendra Wadiyar, who had agreed to sell the land to a contractor, Chamaraju. Though Chamaraju had paid Rs. 47 lakh as advance, the deal could not come through due to legalities governing the accession of the Mysore kingdom to the Indian republic. Sometime later, both Jayachamarajendra Wadiyar and Chamarju died, leaving their sons to continue the fight. The compromise formula they evolved in 1982 got the High Court's consent only last month.

But if Wadiyar has won the battle, he is far from winning the war. One of the clauses of the consent order was getting the government's clearance. Though Wadiyar says of his dispute with Chamaraju's heirs: "I am glad it has ended," the bigger obstacle he will have to clear is the Urban Land Ceiling Act.

Veerendra Patil's government seems to be in no mood to entertain his petition for exemption from the Act. "We don't care about any compromise between them. According to the law, they will have to surrender the surplus land. We'll look into the petition and consider our line of argument," Patil told SUNDAY.

"But the palace grounds do not fall under the Act," insists Wadiyar. While the stone and wood palace stands mute testimony to history, the differing perceptions of the government and Wadiyar promises another round of sabre-rattling. •

Scottish exposure

I had assumed that Scottish was a dialect of English. When I first heard Scottish poets recite their works and failed to comprehend what they were saying, I attributed it to lack of familiarity with their accent. I bought a couple of books of Scottish poetry including Robert Burns. I could make very little sense out of any of them. The reason is simple. Scottish is not a dialect but a language in its own rights with a sizeable vocabulary not found in English dictionaries. Then there is Gaelic which seems to have very little resemblance to either English or Scottish although it is spoken and written in parts of Scotland. Scottish and English have the same ancestry but by the 16th century they had become two different languages. The Scots continued to read and write English because thats where the money was; the English never bothered with Scottish except make fun of the way Scots pronounced English words—including those they never used. A great favourite on the English music hall stage was hoots mon! —hardly ever heard in Scotland. By the turn of the present century, radio and later TV, made English the sole lingua franca of the United Kingdom. Scottish like Gaelic, Welsh and Irish became relics of the past.

Scottish is as distinct a language as the Scots way of life—their food, drink, music and dance—are different from the English. Scottish food is much tastier than the stodgy English. Their lamb, beef, trout and salmon; their grouse, pheasant and venison are highly rated in Europe. They are the fathers of porridge, oat-cakes and haggis which is made of chopped offal, onions and spices. It is an acquired taste. I have acquired it.

Oats despised elsewhere remains the Scots' favourite. Dr Johnson, the most English of Englishmen, described it as "a food which in English is generally given to horses, but in Scotland supports the people". He evidently never tasted Athole Brose made of a mixture of honey, oatmeal and whisky; nor an oatmeal flat-cake called bannock or brose with milk, butter and salt. As a matter of fact, Scots have a variety of sweets (sweeties) which are found nowhere else.

Scotland is best known for its whisky. It was not always so because till the middle ages they were claret-and-wine drinkers which they imported from France. It was after Scotch had become the world's favourite drink, that it gained acceptance in Scotland. No nation has been able to produce the same quality of whisky as the Scots known to them as Barley Bree. Irish, Canadian, American and Japanese attempts to produce Scotch failed miserably. Our distillers and brewers have succeeded in producing reasonably good beer, gin and rum, but our whisky remains undrinkably bad and headache producing. Scotch is of two kinds: malt whisky distilled only from malted barley. It has many varieties; Glen Eivet, Glen Fiddich, Glen Morangie etc. The other is blended whisky made from a mixture of malt whisky and distilled from grain (usually maize). Famous brands like Chivas Regal, Johnnie Walker etc., are all blended. Whisky was once known as Usquebaugh (water of life). A vast vocabulary has been built up around its consumption. You want to wet your whistle or moustache *(mooch geelee karna)*you ask to weet your thrapple (thrapple being the gullet or windpipe). You have too much of it then you are Stottin (drunk).

Scotland is best known for its whisky. It was not always so. Only after Scotch had become the world's favourite drink, it gained acceptance in Scotland

Scottish names and place names have interesting origins. The surname beginning with Mac, Mc or just M' means son of. It is very much the same as the Arabic Ibn. Hence we have Mackenzies, Mcphersons and Mackintyres. Some of them are very confusing (Curfuffling) or tapsalteerie (upside down) and beyond the comprehension of the rabble (clamjamfry), nor for the rough and tough people of Glasgow known as Keelies: The literary snob uses elegant Scottish known as Lalluns.

The effeminate Scotsman is a Jessie; a fusspot is a perjink. Backsides (buttocks) are bahookies; a practical joke on April first a huntegowk. After this can there be any doubt that Scottish as a lingo is different from the English used by Sassenachs (Englishmen)?

Capital speed

Yavash means slow in Turkish. Accordingly, the Turks have nicknamed their capital city of Ankara, primarily a government centre known for typical bureaucratic delays, Yavashington—in homage to the American prototype. Can't we safely name our capital: New Snailhi?

Fire service

A small town had just purchased a new fire engine, the municipal board was meeting to decide what to do with the old one. After considerable discussion, a commissioner got up and suggested that they keep the old fire engine and use it for answering false alarms. •

The reluctant rebel

Patil's 'crime': he only bent when others crawled

As a politician, Veerendra Patil has rarely evoked strong passions. His low-key, self-effacing style may have won him both admirers and detractors. But if the praise has never been fulsome, then neither has the criticism ever been savage. At best, he has been characterised as mild-mannered, moderate and affable. At worst, boring, insipid and uninspired.

When Patil was sworn in as chief minister late last year, many predicted that Karnataka was in for a smooth, if uneventful, five-year rule. It's not hard to see why. During his first term—when Patil succeeded the Congress(O)'s S. Nijalingappa as chief minister about two decades ago—the state was run with stability and a quiet efficiency. While he may not have done much to remember him by, Patil is nonetheless credited with having managed both his men and money well.

Moreover, Patil seemed far too cautious (clever?) to become embroiled in disputes and wrangles. Yes, he lacked R. K. Hegde's celebrated charisma and Gundu Rao's crassly populist appeal—the men who, together, ruled Karnataka for the better part of two decades. But he also lacked (or appeared to at least) their tremendous appetite for controversy.

In fact, Patil has rarely been the butt of the kind of charges that are routinely levelled at politicians nowadays—corruption, nepotism, autocracy and the like. Perhaps, the most serious criticism he has had to bear with is that he has been something of an opportunist.

His detractors never fail to point out how he has shifted political loyalties whenever it suited him. There is some truth in the charge. During Mrs Gandhi's battle with the old guard, Patil aligned himself with the Syndicate and, after the party split, was with the Congress(O). He joined the Janata later where, on the persuasion of some central leaders, he fought Mrs Gandhi in the famous 1978 Chikmagalur by-election. Although he did his damnedest to sell that contest as one between the forces of democracy and dictatorship, he lost—and that by a considerable 77,000 votes.

But it was what followed that was the most curious. A year later, Patil deserted a divided and crumbling Janata and went scurrying back to Mrs Gandhi's Congress(I). His reward: a ministerial berth at the Centre.

Patil has since argued that he was a reluctant party to Chikmagalur—that he was talked into contesting by a couple of insistent Union ministers. He has also often explained that, within a year or so of the Janata coming to power, he had realised the experiment was a failure and that Mrs Gandhi was the best thing for the country.

These may well be regarded as a thin defence of his behaviour—a post hoc rationalisation of the shifts. But despite this, Patil has managed to retain a fair amount of political credibility—both with his colleagues and the people.

WHEN HE defied Rajiv Gandhi last week, Patil was characterised in the press as a militant mutineer, a rollicking rebel, an irrepressible individualist. It was an odd portrayal of a man who has all along been viewed as faceless, inoffensive and non-controversial—a boss who seemed every bit a backroom boy. So what made him do it?

If Patil differed from the average Congress chief minister, it was more in degree and less in kind. He was only willing to bend when others were prepared to crawl; compromise when others were inclined to yield; and be polite when others were more than ready to grovel.

However, with Rajiv Gandhi as party leader, such attitudes were equated with being mutinous. Patil's first "crime" was his insistence that he be allowed to choose his own Cabinet. Apart from the fact that this was his right, it seemed all the more reasonable given that he had just led the Congress to win its biggest ever majority in Karnataka.

Patil's defiance has won him what he lacked all along—a face, a character, an individuality. And also, a place in political history as the man who stood up to Rajiv

From then on, there were many other confrontations with the high command. Rajiv's men demanded that Vokkaliga champion K. H. Patil and backward class leader S. Bangarappa be taken on as ministers. (Patil—after holding out for four months—finally relented.) Then, there was the demand that Buta Singh be nominated to the Rajya Sabha from the state. (Patil—to the surprise of many—flatly refused.)

Needless to say, none of these controversies reflects well on Rajiv. As for Patil, they have led to the loss of his chair and possibly also the membership of the party. But at the same time, his defiance has won him what he lacked all along—a face, a character, an individuality. And also, a place in recent political history as the man who stood up to Rajiv Gandhi. ●

TRIUMPH AND TRAGEDY

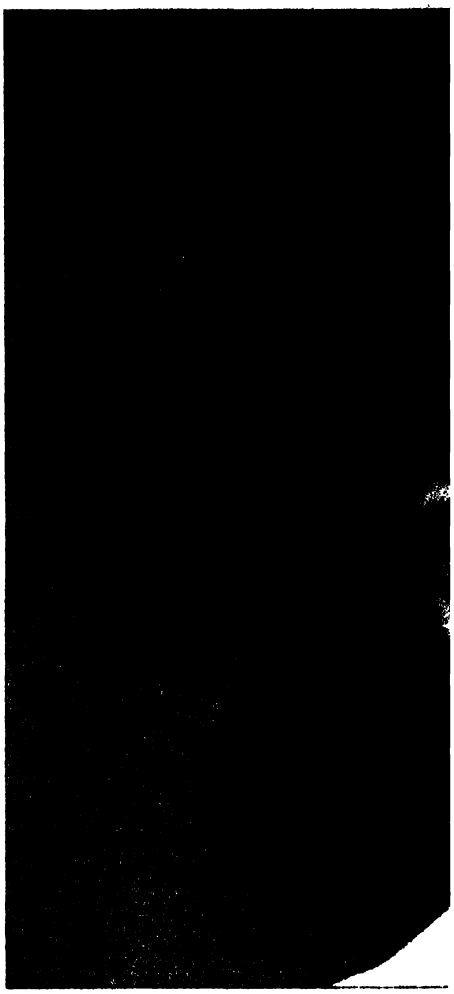
Cheers in UP; tears in Karnataka. Rajiv manages his own contradictions

It was the best of times. It was the worst of times. Things were going wonderfully well. It was all falling apart. The future was glorious. The future was only a slow motion repeat of the past.

Last week, as Rajiv Gandhi encountered both triumph and tragedy, nobody was sure whether the Congress was on the road to recovery or whether it was still stuck with the legacies of the past. As the party president's Sadbhavna Yatra received a rapturous response in Uttar Pradesh, Congressmen whooped with delight. But as Karnataka, one of only three states ruled by the Congress, almost seemed to have slipped out of control, party workers watched panic-stricken as their leader appeared to repeat all his old mistakes.

At the centre of the confusion was Rajiv Gandhi himself. Last year, he found only hostility and resentment in the Hindi belt, while in the south, he was hailed as the conquering hero. This year, that situation appeared to have reversed itself. As the Raja's support base in the cow belt evaporated, Rajiv suddenly began to look like a winner again. But in the south—where the Congress wielded real political power—things were not so simple. A single indiscreet remark by the party president led to a revolt in Karnataka, to a farcical situation during which the government failed to function despite being confronted by a bloody communal riot and finally, to the imposition of President's Rule by a partisan Governor.

The tragedy was that while the success in the north was the pay-off for a year of low-profile, good behaviour, it was very nearly wrecked by the fiasco in the south—a consequence of pretty much the same personal style that lost the Congress the last parliamentary election.



It was almost as though in the north—where the Congress had been routed—the reverses had produced a new, humbler Rajiv Gandhi. But in the south—where the Congress was all powerful—the old, arrogant, indiscreet Rajiv Gandhi still held sway.

Of course, reality did not entirely match the perceptions. And as the Congress came to terms with the consequences of Rajiv's behaviour in Karnataka, there were angry denials of claims that he had behaved irresponsibly.

At issue was the firing of Karnataka chief minister Veerendra Patil. (See following story.) What had happened was this: communal riots had broken out in Karnataka. Rajiv had rushed to the spot from Delhi and had been appalled by the failure of the government to get a grip on the situation. He had called on Patil, had discovered he was recovering from a paralytic stroke and had left for the airport to board a flight for New Delhi. At the airport, he had met the press and announced that Patil was to be replaced as chief minister.

The sudden announcement took the press by surprise. There was, first of all, the constitutional question. Who was Rajiv Gandhi anyway to decide whether the chief minister should step down? The Karnataka Congress Legislature Party (CLP) had elected Patil. If he had to go, then constitutionally, it could be done in one of two ways: either he resigned himself or the CLP chose to replace him. What was Rajiv Gandhi's locus standi?

The electoral reverses in the north appear to have now produced a new, humbler Rajiv Gandhi. But in the south, the old, arrogant, indiscreet Rajiv still seems to hold sway

But even the constitutional question receded to the background when an outraged Patil declared that Rajiv had not told him that he would be replaced before holding that airport press conference. Was it fair of the Congress president to summarily dismiss an ailing senior politician as though he was a peon? Didn't he have the courtesy to at least warn him before talking to the press?

It was R.K. Hegde, Karnataka's best-known politician and a friend of Patil's, who raised these questions most articulately. To Hedge, the entire episode seemed uncomfortably similar to the televised firing of foreign secretary A.P. Venkateswaran at a press conference in 1987.

Matters were further confounded when Veerendra Patil, not the most prepossessing of men (see Profile) suddenly discovered new reserves of courage and declared that regardless of what Rajiv Gandhi wanted, he had no intention of quitting. Patil's intransigence plunged Karnataka into a political crisis and when the Governor suspended the Assembly, it seemed as though Rajiv had put his foot into his mouth once again.

But had he? That certainly isn't the way that Rajiv Gandhi himself sees it. His view is that he behaved impeccably and only after full consultation with the chief minister. It was Patil who went back on his word.

"When I went to see the situation in the riot-affected areas of Karnataka, I found that things were very bad," Rajiv Gandhi told SUNDAY. "I knew that Mr Patil was seriously ill and I didn't think that he was in a position to effectively deal with the situation.

"He suggested to me that a deputy chief minister be appointed. I told him that it wouldn't work and that I thought that he should step down. Finally, he agreed and we discussed a date to call a meeting of the Congress Legislature Party. We even discussed possible new leaders."

According to Gandhi, the announcement did not come as a surprise to Patil: "I told him that the press will be waiting for me at the airport and I will have to tell them something so I will tell them about the change." Why then did Patil feign ignorance of the decision? Rajiv says he does not know: "I can't understand why he changed his mind. Immediately after I left his residence, he talked to one newspaper and to a few Congress MLAs and then, he suddenly changed his mind."

The way Gandhi sees it, he acted in the best interests of Karnataka. The Congress had promised the state an effective government and when it found that the administration was unable to control the riots, he acted quickly to rectify the situation. There was no question of insulting Patil because the airport announcement was made with his knowledge. The crisis resulted not from any indiscretion or arrogance, but because Patil went back on his word.

Assuming that Gandhi is telling the truth and Patil is lying, the Karnataka episode still reveals much that is wrong with the Congress. If Patil had, in fact, agreed to resign then Rajiv should have let him make the announcement. There was no need to announce that he had been replaced because this ensured that his exit would be treated as a firing rather than a resignation. Moreover, the constitutional question remains: Rajiv has no locus standi in the Karnataka Assembly.

But then, everybody knows that relations between Gandhi and Patil have been tense over the last few months. Partly, it is that the two men are simply not on the same wave-length. Partly, it is because Patil expected the kind of authority that a Congress chief minister had in the early Sixties—quite forgetting that on his own, he could never have been elected leader of the CLP. But mostly it is because Patil never hit it off with R.K. Dhawan, who has emerged as Rajiv's key adviser on political matters.

A mature political leader would have reined Patil in earlier and discounted Dhawan's advice because of the personal enmity between the two men. He would also have let Patil leave with dignity when it came to the crunch—after all, his intention should have been to replace him, not humiliate him.

But then, the experience of the last year shows that while Rajiv's instincts may well be decent, he has not come to terms with political management. On several issues—Ram Janmabhoomi and Mandal among them—he has not followed his own instincts and let the party's position seem convoluted and confused.

Nevertheless, judging by the reception in the north, his popularity is returning. Thus, by next year he might make his comeback. But will he be the same old Rajiv—popular when he does nothing; and a bungler when he tries to act? ●

Bungle in Bangalore

Indiscretion, rebellion and then, confusion

It used to be said of Indira Gandhi that such was her imperiousness that she never allowed herself to be spontaneous in public. Every statement, no matter how trivial, was always part of a power play. Even a paper called Stray Thoughts turned out to be the opening salvo in the battle to control the Congress in 1969.

Jawaharlal Nehru, on the other hand, frequently spoke his mind without fully evaluating the consequences. He led an unprepared nation into a disastrous conflict by suddenly declaring at an airport press conference in 1962 that he had ordered the Indian Army to "throw out the Chinese".

Last fortnight, it became clear that Rajiv Gandhi has inherited his mother's imperiousness and his grandfather's spontaneity. There was something of Indira Gandhi in the regal manner in which he summarily dismissed Veerendra Patil, the chief minister of Karnataka. But the lasting image was that of Jawaharlal Nehru's grandson: making his own gaffe at another airport press conference 28 years later. Even before the chief minister could make his announcement (and, according to Patil, even before he had been informed of his impending departure), the Congress president took it upon himself to declare that he was replacing the chief minister. The throwaway nature of the remark—made to the press at Bangalore airport before Rajiv boarded a flight for Delhi—took Karnataka's breath away.

It also plunged the state into a constitutional crisis.

Patil claimed that Rajiv had not consulted him before making his announcement and questioned the former Prime Minister's right to dismiss him anyway. Constitutionally, Patil was in the right—the chief minister is elected by the largest party in the Karnataka Assembly, not by the MP for Amethi, Uttar Pradesh—and when he refused to resign, there was little that Rajiv could do.

As the deadlock continued, Bhanu Pratap Singh, a Janata Dal hack who had been appointed Governor of Karnataka by V.P. Singh, decided to step in. Patil wrote to him demanding that the Assembly be dissolved. This gave the Governor the opportunity he needed. Shortly after receiving Patil's letter, he dismissed the state government, suspended the Assembly and declared Governor's Rule. When the Congress responded with outrage, Singh feigned incredulity. He had only suspended the Assembly, he declared, Patil had wanted him to dissolve it.

"I never anticipated it"

Veerendra Patil on his removal

During the political crisis in Karnataka, the ailing Veerendra Patil met very few people—and that too for extremely short periods of time. The interview with SUNDAY had to be put off at the last moment because Patil complained of fatigue and pain in his right limb, which had been struck by paralysis. He, however, agreed to answer the questionnaire left behind. Excerpts:

SUNDAY: Rajiv Gandhi insists he told you about the change in leadership. You maintain otherwise. What actually happened?
Veerendra Patil: The question of leadership was never discussed. Only the question of appointing a deputy chief minister was mentioned. I told him he should suggest someone or consult me.

Q: How did you feel when you came to know of Rajiv Gandhi's announcement? Did you anticipate it?
A: It came as a total surprise. I never anticipated it.

Q: If not because of communal violence, why did he decide to remove you?
A: You must put this question to him. As far as communal violence is concerned, it is not the first (time) as far as Karnataka is concerned. Karnataka is a safer place and the vulnerable places are very few. When violence broke out in Ramanagaram and Chennapatna, we did take immediate action. But still it flared up.

Q: Do you think dissidents were

Patil's refusal to resign resulted in a constitutional crisis

Surely, he ought to be congratulated on his moderation, not condemned for arbitrariness.

As the charade went on, it was clear that this was one situation in which everybody had behaved badly. Patil had failed to keep the riots under check and had misled the state about the seriousness of his illness. Rajiv Gandhi had been imperious and indiscreet. And the Governor had functioned as a Janata Dal partisan and not as the protector of the Constitution.

Less than a year ago, the Congress had captured power in Karnataka after eight years in the wilderness. It had won an astonishing 179 out of 224 seats in the Assembly, demolishing the Opposition with ruthless efficiency. Since then, under Veerendra Patil, a respected senior politician, it had given Karnataka a stable, fairly effective government that had almost erased memories of the chakku-chhuri era of the last Congress administration headed by the redoubtable Gundu Rao (from 1980 to 1983).

What had gone so wrong that despite a brute majority, the party had allowed a situation to develop in which the Governor could claim that he had to step in to restore order?

involved in the communal violence?
A: I can't say now if dissidents were involved. I shall say at an appropriate time.

Q: If your relationship with the high command was not strained, do you think you would still be chief minister?
A: We are in power only in three states. I hope wise counsel prevails to save the party.

Q: Why were you so reluctant to step down and call the Congress Legislature Party meeting?
A: The question of reluctance does not arise. My leadership was challenged, which was not constitutional.

Q: One hundred and forty two MLAs have expressed no confidence in your leadership, but you still say you will form the government. How?
A: I don't believe in guessing numbers. A majority of those who signed the no-confidence memorandum were coerced to do so. Later, they have come to me to express confidence in me.

Q: Why did you recommend dissolution of the Assembly and imposition of President's Rule to the Governor?
A: I can't divulge to you what I have written to the Governor. I have written more than one letter. It is confidential correspondence.

Q: Do you still consider Rajiv Gandhi to be your leader?
A: He is the president and leader of the All India Congress Committee and I belong to the Congress party.

Q: If you are expelled from the Congress, will you form a coalition government or a party of your own?
A: It is a hypothetical question.

Q: How do you rate your chances if fresh elections are called in the near future? How do you think the Congress(I) and the Janata Dal will perform?
A: Why should we think of fresh elections? I am in a position to form the government and I hope to form the government.

Q: Do you think disciplinary action will be taken against you?
A: Why don't you ask Rajiv Gandhi about it?

Q: What do you feel about the imposition of President's Rule?
A: It has been imposed only for a temporary period and the Assembly has been kept in suspended animation. It is good that we have got some time.

How ill?

What's wrong with Patil?

For as long as anyone can remember, Veerendra Patil has been on medication for migraine and diabetes. And on 24 September, his health worsened, with the 68-year-old Congress(I) boss in Karnataka complaining of severe giddiness and vomiting. His doctors recognised the symptoms of a paralytic stroke and rushed him to hospital.

To media persons who met the former chief minister on 7 October (around the time party president Rajiv Gandhi announced Patil's sacking, as always, informally), Patil looked sunken and pathetic, speech slurring and with little control over his limbs.

It appeared that Rajiv's reasons for removing him were valid: how can a chief minister who is seriously ill, run a state torn apart by communal violence?

But how ill is Patil?

Since his now-confirmed stroke, Patil has been on intensive physiotherapy and his condition has improved dramatically. One of the doctors who was in attendance mentioned that Patil would be "completely normal" in four weeks. As to what brought on the illness, doctors say the reason is simple: the stress of governing the state. Also, stress, say political observers, thanks to his detractors, such as All India Congress Committee general secretary Jaffer Sharief, who frequently launched virulent attacks on the former chief minister.

Patil could really be on the mend. "In any paralytic case," said the doctor, "it is the exercise that matters if you want to get well. Mr Patil is determined to become normal again, soon. I have never seen a 68-year-old so eager to do the exercises."

Politics and the desire to be in power can, perhaps, heal better than any medicine.

K VENKATESH

Former CM Veerendra Patil

Despite his stroke, he clung on

Many explanations were offered. The most obvious one came from Patil's supporters who said that Rajiv had never liked the former chief minister's insistence on functioning independently. Earlier this year, there was a mini-crisis when Patil flew to Delhi to seek Rajiv's permission for a Cabinet expansion. According to Karnataka MLAs, Rajiv kept him waiting for days for an appointment and then, insisted that he include the likes of S. Bangarappa in his ministry. Patil resented being pushed around, but Rajiv saw it differently. He felt that Patil would never have won the election as leader of the CLP on his own and that he owed his position to the high command. Therefore, he ought to clear every important decision with New Delhi.

Certainly Patil made no attempt to conceal his resentment at the manner in which he was being treated. He regarded Rajiv as arrogant and believed that he was being wrongly briefed by other Congress factions at the behest of the liquor lobby. His view—expressed most strongly after President's Rule was declared—was that he had improved the state's financial position by launching an excise crackdown on such liquor barons as the Khodays.

Once Rajiv announced his dismissal, Patil's supporters attributed this action to bribes from liquor manufacturers. The Karnataka finance ministry under Rajashekhar Murthy—who remained a Patil loyalist till the end—had raised over Rs 360 crores by cracking down on the sale of seconds (liquor on which excise is evaded). According to the Patil camp, the liquor barons paid Rs 25 crores to ensure the chief minister's dismissal and promised the Congress monthly payments of Rs 2 crores, regularly.

Bizarre as it may sound, this explanation was being taken seriously in Bangalore last week. Why else had Rajiv behaved so badly, asked Patil's supporters. After all, they added, he had made only a brief tour of the riot-hit areas and had spent more time confabulating with the chief minister's detractors.

While such rumours made the rounds, everybody ignored the obvious explanation. Patil's background.

Both of the Congress' other chief ministers—Sharad Pawar and Chenna Reddy—are men who were used to Indira Gandhi's style of functioning. Thus, while Sharad Pawar might talk big about his own base in Maharashtra, he is still comfortable with the chief minister-high command relationship evolved by Indira Gandhi in the Seventies. The same is true of Chenna Reddy in Andhra Pradesh.

Veerendra Patil, on the other hand, was a Congress(O) chief minister of Karnataka after the party split in 1964. He belonged to the Syndicate tradition of powerful local leaders to whom New Delhi deferred. He was never comfortable with Indira Gandhi's style of functioning—in fact, he stood against her from Chikmagalur during the Janata period—and she, in turn, preferred to rely on the Gundu Rao kind of obliging strongman.

In today's Congress(I), no local leader can aspire to the prominence of the Syndicate era. The party in each state consists of a coalition with factions headed by various contenders for the chief ministership coming together to support the high command's choice for the job.

Because Patil and Rajiv belonged to different political traditions, a clash was inevitable. Afterwards, Patil's supporters pointed out that Andhra's Chenna Reddy had been allowed to go abroad for medical treatment for a year while his state was rocked by Naxalite violence. So why was Patil treated differently?

The argument missed the point. Reddy understood today's Congress(I) and cleared his departure with both Rajiv and R.K. Dhawan. Patil, on the other hand, did not believe that his health was any concern of Rajiv Gandhi's or of his factotums. This stance only increased his alienation from the men around the Congress(I) president. R.K. Dhawan, for instance, has never forgotten that Patil was the man who fought Mrs Gandhi at Chikmagalur and would be much happier with the likes of Gundu Rao.

Then, Patil committed his biggest mistake. When other Karnataka Congress(I) leaders sent an SOS to Rajiv, Patil told him that there was no need for him to visit the state. Rajiv insisted on coming anyway and asked for the use of the state government helicopter. He was told that it was under repairs and so could he please use a car instead?

Thus, the Congress(I) president arrived in Karnataka angry and resentful. He was certain that Patil was hiding something. When he found that the chief minister was in much worse health than he had let on and that the riot situation was not under control, he flew into a rage.

Once that happened, Patil's fate was sealed. But so great was the difference in traditions that despite Rajiv's public announcement that the chief minister would be replaced, Patil still believed that he could hang on and win the support of the legislators.

It was a vain hope and, finally, Patil came to terms with the fact that it was Indira Gandhi's Congress—with its autocratic ways—that had won the battle in 1969, and not his Congress(O).

When Rajiv fired Patil, there was widespread support for the chief minister throughout Karnataka. Said K.H. Srinivas, a Patil supporter within the Congress(I): "There should be some self-respect within the party. This is no way of doing things. You can't dismiss and humiliate the chief minister." Others claimed that Kannadiga pride had been hurt just as the people of Andhra had felt humiliated when Rajiv had shouted at T. Anjiah at Hyderabad airport.

But even as a groundswell of resentment was building up, V.P. Singh made an even bigger mistake than Rajiv Gandhi had. The Governor of Karnataka, 70-year-old Bhanu Pratap Singh, is a Janata Dal appointee who was vacationing in Gonda district (UP) when the crisis broke. The Raja sent a special plane to fetch him to New Delhi and briefed him. It is not known what transpired between the two men, but it is reasonably certain that the Prime Minister phoned Veerendra Patil and promised him "all support". Janata Dal sources say that V.P. Singh only meant the support of Janata Dal MLAs in the Karnataka Assembly (a mere 24), but Congressmen hint darkly that the Raja was offering more substantial assistance—help from the Governor he had nominated.

Blame it on the Governor

Since he took over as Governor of Karnataka on 9 May this year, Bhanu Pratap Singh has studiously maintained a low profile, content with presiding over his mostly ceremonial functions. But, with the political crisis, which saw chief minister Veerendra Patil lose his seat and the imposition of President's Rule in the state, the affable man from Bulandshahar in Uttar Pradesh is now in the hot seat. For starters, he has to now ward off attacks on his integrity,

Governor Bhanu Pratap Singh

He functioned as a Janata Dal partisan

the time-tested bugbear of Governors in recent Indian history.

But the 70-year-old Singh, a 'farmer' like many of India's political players, seems to be handling the heat quite well.

Yanked out of a stupor from the gubernatorial barracks, the author of books on agriculture showed that he could give it back as well as he could take it.

When angry editorials condemned his action, Singh dashed off a press statement, countering Rajiv as well as the media. "Was it democratic," he asked, "or even humane of the Congress president to ask an ailing chief minister to quit simply because he was temporarily unwell? Would it have been democratic on my part to have allowed endless political manoeuvrings while Karnataka was burning?"

Singh's stand served to strengthen the feeling that he was entirely pro-Patil. This is surprising, as the latter had criticised Singh's assignment to Karnataka, and even complained that the Centre had okayed the appointment without bothering to ask him. But in politics, things have a way of changing: the Governor has now given Patil and his former fiefdom a clean chit.

The Governor's bio-data makes interesting reading. Basically a farmer, he joined politics following Jawaharlal Nehru's call to establish cooperative farming in India. He was twice elected to Parliament as a Swatantra Party candidate, but quit politics in 1974 claiming opposition was futile. He was arrested during the Emergency, though he was not active politically at that time.

But soon, he was back in the game. After all, can a politician ever be out of it? He joined Charan Singh, plumped for him and, as a reward, was made the Union minister for agriculture and rural development during the Janata rule. Later, with the Congress(I) in, Singh was out. Now, with Rajiv out, he has tried to make up for lost time.

THE DECLINE AND FALL OF PATIL

2 September: Communal clashes break out in Ramanagaram, claiming five lives.

4 September: Veerendra Patil is taken to task by MPs in Delhi over the "lethargy and obduracy" of his government.

24 September: The chief minister is admitted to hospital after he complains of giddiness. There is some mystery about his ailment and condition.

29 September: Patil is discharged from hospital and advised a week's rest.

3 October: Violence breaks out in Chennapatna, 70 km from Bangalore, and soon spreads to other areas—the worst communal riots in the history of the state.

4 October: The chief minister's office finally reveals that Patil had suffered a paralytic stroke and is fast recovering.

6 October: Rajiv Gandhi makes an unscheduled visit to Karnataka to survey the damage caused by the riots. On arrival, he visits Patil to enquire about his health.

7 October: Rajiv visits Chennapatna. Says nothing about the change in leadership. Before departure, he pays Patil a brief visit. At the airport before boarding his flight, he announces the state will have a new chief minister in four days.

Patil does not react nor does he meet anyone for hours. He finally announces his decision not to resign. He says Rajiv Gandhi had not told him anything about a change in leadership. Rajiv maintains otherwise.

Patil's announcement sparks off a crisis. At an informal meeting of the Cabinet, Patil's finance minister and right-hand man Rajashekhar Murthy, seeks to pass a resolution asking Rajiv to allow Patil to continue for a while. The resolution fails to be passed as most of the ministers dissociate themselves from it.

Moral support comes from the Janata Dal. National Front president S.R. Bommai criticises Rajiv for his dictatorial behaviour and assures Congressmen support if they break away from the party.

Rajiv Gandhi

8 October: Patil sticks to his decision about not

Certainly Patil -who had objected to Bhanu Pratap Singh's appointment—now began to regard the Governor as his friend, writing him letters insisting that he either be allowed to stay on or the state Assembly dissolved.

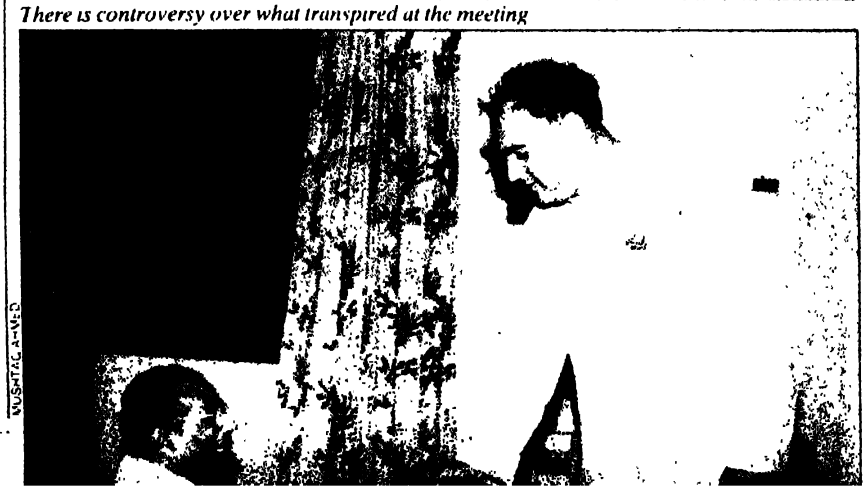
In reality, the Governor's options were limited. If the Congress Legislature Party (CLP) indicated that it backed Rajiv and not Patil, then he had little choice but to call on whoever the CLP chose as its new leader to form the government. Within a day it was clear that the CLP thought that Patil was through—even K.H. Srinivas, who had talked of "self-respect," now called for the chief minister's removal

But Singh had other ideas. Perhaps at the behest of his masters in New Delhi, he declared that any CLP meeting that was not called by Patil was unconstitutional ("How has he read the Constitution of the Karnataka CLP when we don't have one?" joked Rajiv Gandhi.) And then alleging horse-trading—for which he had no evidence—he called for the imposition of President's Rule. Delhi backed him to the hilt, featuring both the Governor and the deposed chief minister on Doordarshan news with obliging regularity

The Governor's position was untenable. As the uproar over his actions mounted it became clear that he would have to give in and appoint whoever the CLP selected as its leader. But because he had acted in haste, his intervention served to divert attention from Rajiv's bungling. Now, it became a constitutional issue and even the National Front's allies in Parliament—the Communist Party of India (Marxist) and the Bharatiya Janata Party—condemned the imposition of President's Rule.

In the melee, everybody forgot that this was an avoidable crisis set off by Rajiv Gandhi's tendency to shoot from the hip. In a bizarre twist, V.P. Singh had come to Rajiv's aid!

With Karnataka under President's Rule, the CLP turned to the immediate task at hand: the election of a new leader.



The first candidate in the fray was Gundu Rao, the former wrestler and Sanjay Gandhi loyalist, who had been chief minister from 1980 to 1983. Rao had left the Congress after abusing Rajiv, but once he was readmitted, he found himself entirely at home with the likes of R.K. Dhawan. Though Dhawan pushed for Rao's candidacy, Rajiv was adamant: having been accused of imperiousness once, he was not going to behave arbitrarily.

So, the CLP was told to elect its own leader and warned that the traditional Congress formulation of "we will leave it to our beloved Rajivji" would not be allowed. This time, Rajiv wanted a democratically-elected leader.

There was just one problem with this approach: no single politician could claim that he had the loyalty of a majority of MLAs. Among the conresigning. He tells Rajesh Pilot and central observers G.K. Moopanar and Mahavir Prasad that he will not quit.

Thirteen of his Cabinet colleagues submit their resignations to the observers, saying that they do not want to be associated with a chief minister who does not fall in line with the high command's wishes.

9 October: 142 MLAs and a number of Congress leaders gather on the Raj Bhavan lawns to demonstrate their strength. The Governor meets them, though he reiterates that he does not believe in head counting.

10 October: Fifteen ministers go to the Raj Bhavan and submit their resignations.

MUSHTAQ AHMED

The Governor greets pro-Rajiv legislators

The Congressmen gather at the party office to elect a new leader. Even before they begin the meeting, news trickles in about imposition of President's Rule.

12 October: The CLP removes Patil from the post of its leader and asks Rajiv to decide on the new incumbent. Rajiv turns down the appeal. The high command issues a guideline, which debars those who are not members of the Karnataka Assembly from contesting the CLP elections. Result: Gundu Rao, Shankaranand, Janardhan Poojary and Jaffer Sharief are disqualified.

While the central observers are still busy trying to effect a compromise, Veerendra Patil writes to the Governor urging him to ignore the CLP meeting, which according to him is illegal.

13 October: S. Bangarappa is unanimously elected leader of the Karnataka CLP.

Veerendra Patil is suspended from the Congress for his anti-party activities.

14 October: Bangarappa meets the Governor and stakes his claim to form the government tenders for the chief ministership—in addition to Gundu Rao—were Veerappa Moily, K.H. Patil and S. Bangarappa. Though each could claim a significant block of support, the CLP was too divided for any one of them to achieve even a simple majority.

Thus, the CLP failed to come up with a leader and the MLAs reverted to the chant of "let Rajivji decide". Some even went so far as to insist that if there was a secret ballot, they would write "Rajiv Gandhi" in the allotted space.

Finally, Rajiv agreed to a compromise. The new chief minister would be the man who got the most votes even if these fell short of a majority. The observers despatched by the high command from New Delhi met each MLA individually and ascertained the pattern of support. They concluded that S. Bangarappa had the most support, Moily was second and Patil third.

Where did this leave Gundu Rao? According to one version, Rao and Bangarappa had done a deal whereby Gundu's MLAs would opt for Bangarappa. In return, the new leader would accommodate Gundu Rao's men and interests in his ministry.

Once Bangarappa had emerged as the leader with the most support, the CLP put on a façade of unanimity. Moily proposed Bangarappa's name, Patil seconded it and the 57-year-old leader was declared "unanimously elected".

It now looks as though Bangarappa will be the next chief minister of Karnataka. On Sunday, 14 October, Governor Bhanu Pratap Singh told a press conference that he was recommending that President's Rule be withdrawn. He defended the decision to suspend the Assembly but argued that now that it was clear that Bangarappa had the support of the CLP, he would have no difficulty in inviting him to form the government.

Should that happen then it will be third time lucky for the veteran Karnataka politician. In 1980, he opposed Devraj Urs and expected to be appointed chief minister by the Congress(I). He was passed over in favour of Gundu Rao and left to join Kranti Ranga. In 1983, his new party allied with the Janata to defeat Rao's Congress, but once again, he missed his chance and watched helplessly as Chandra Shekhar nominated Ramakrishna Hegde.

Bangarappa rejoined the Congress and became leader of the Opposition in the Assembly till he was removed after a court passed strictures against him. He was replaced by Moily. So, Bangarappa must have taken a particular pleasure in defeating Moily in the leadership elections.

If all goes well, then Karnataka may have had the shortest spell of President's Rule in Indian history. But for Rajiv Gandhi, the episode should have proved at least one thing: act like your mother and you will end up with those (Gundu Rao and Bangarappa) who hung around her. •

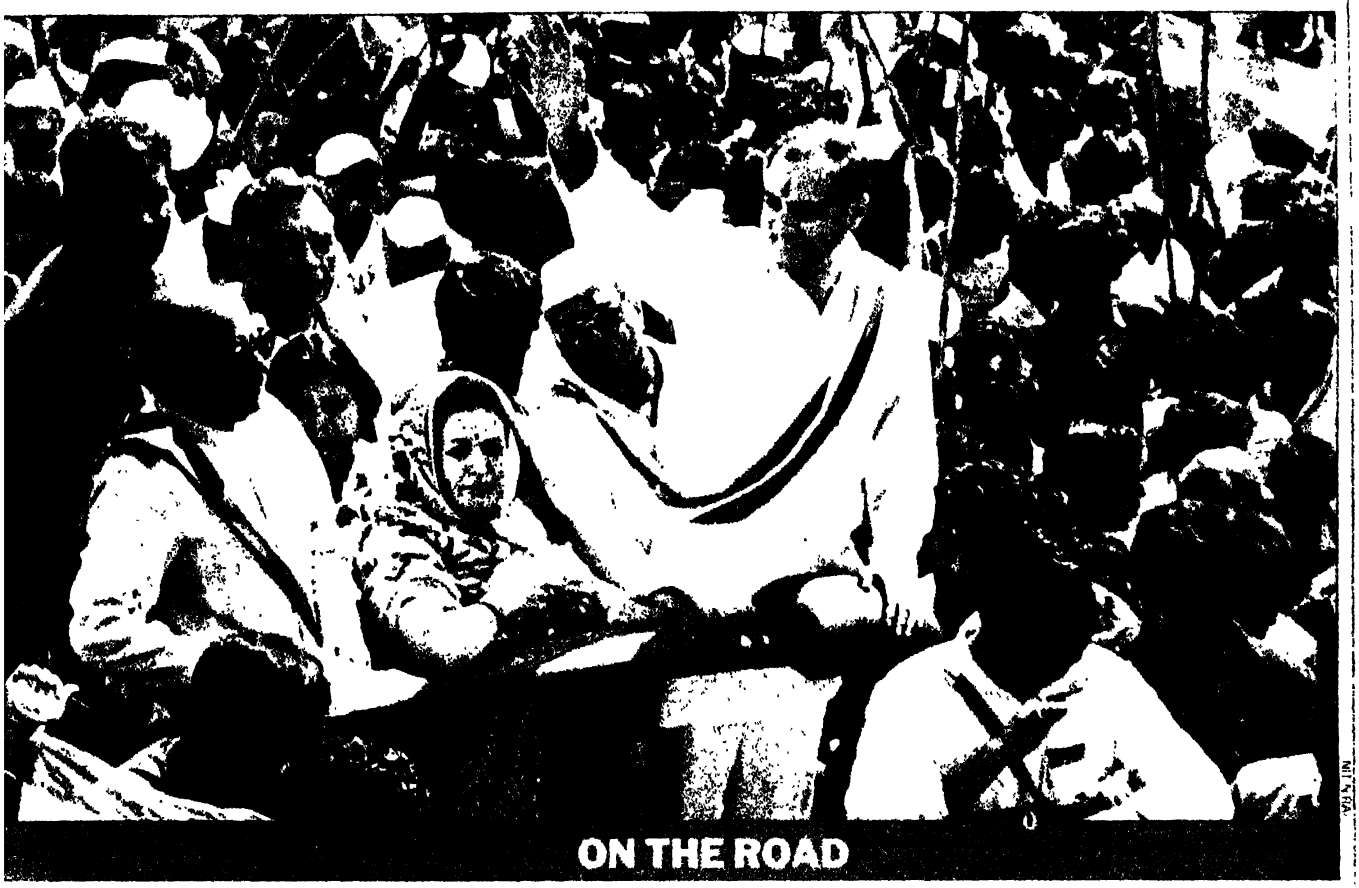
WAVE AFTER WAVE

The mood is changing. Rajiv Gandhi's Sadbhavna Yatra draws huge crowds all the way

November 1989: The run-up to the general election. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi lands at Kanpur airport and is all set to proceed to the city to address a public meeting. Only to be told that there are only a few hundred people at the rally and can he please wait until local leaders rustle up a respectable crowd. Gandhi hangs around the airport for an hour, but even then there are only about three thousand people in attendance when he takes the dais.
October 1990: Rajiv Gandhi, now leader of the Opposition, is passing through Kanpur on his second-class train tour through the Hindi heartland. No, he isn't scheduled to break journey here. Nevertheless, over 30,000 people land up at the railway station to have a glimpse of his increasingly less cherubic visage.



The last election seemed just another bad memory as the Rajiv Gandhi juggernaut made its way through Delhi and the cow-belt. In less than a year, the mood of the masses seemed to have changed completely. Instead of sullenly ignoring Rajiv's innumerable speeches made in his distinctive brand of pidgin Hindi and staying away from his meetings altogether, as they had done during the 1989 poll campaign, people were now lining the route the Congress president's Sadbhavna Yatra was to take. Garlands and diyas in hand, all set to perform aarti of the great new hope of the nation.

It didn't begin too well, though, with Rajiv getting his timing all wrong. The Congress president kicked off the yatra from Rajghat on 2 October, Mahatma Gandhi's birth anniversary, after all the assembled Congressmen had taken a pledge to safeguard secularism, a particularly evocative vow at a time when the Ayodhya issue had divided the country on communal lines. But unfortunately for Gandhi, 2 October was also the day the anti-Mandal Commission Front had chosen to stage a show of strength at the Boat Club lawns, with more than a little (unwelcome) help from Tikait and his goon brigade. The capital was overrun by the anti-reservationists, the usual drama of violence was played out and media attention was diverted from Rajiv's little effort for communal amity.

That didn't deter Gandhi, though. A smiling Sonia by his side, Rajiv rode in his open-top Gypsy through the crowded roads of New and Old Delhi, evoking a response that cut across communal lines. The reaction to the Congress president's drive-through was quite phenomenal in the Jama Masjid area, especially, indicating that Mulayam Singh Yadav notwithstanding, Rajiv hadn't lost the minorities completely.

The indication couldn't have come at a better time, vindicating as it did those party leaders who had advised Rajiv to undertake such an exercise. It was during the last AICC(I) session at Mavalankar Hall that Gandhi had first announced his intention of taking on the communalists in the country head-on. Soon after, prominent Youth Congress leader, Tariq Anwar, suggested to his president that he organise a Sadbhavna Yatra from Rajghat to Ayodhya over 2-30 October, and do his bit to ensure that the Babri Masjid was not demolished by the Vishwa Hindu Parishad activists. The idea appealed to Gandhi and a core group, comprising Dinesh Singh, Arjun Singh, H.K.L. Bhagat, Tariq Anwar, R.K. Dhawan and Mani Shankar Aiyar was set up to work out the modalities of the proposal.

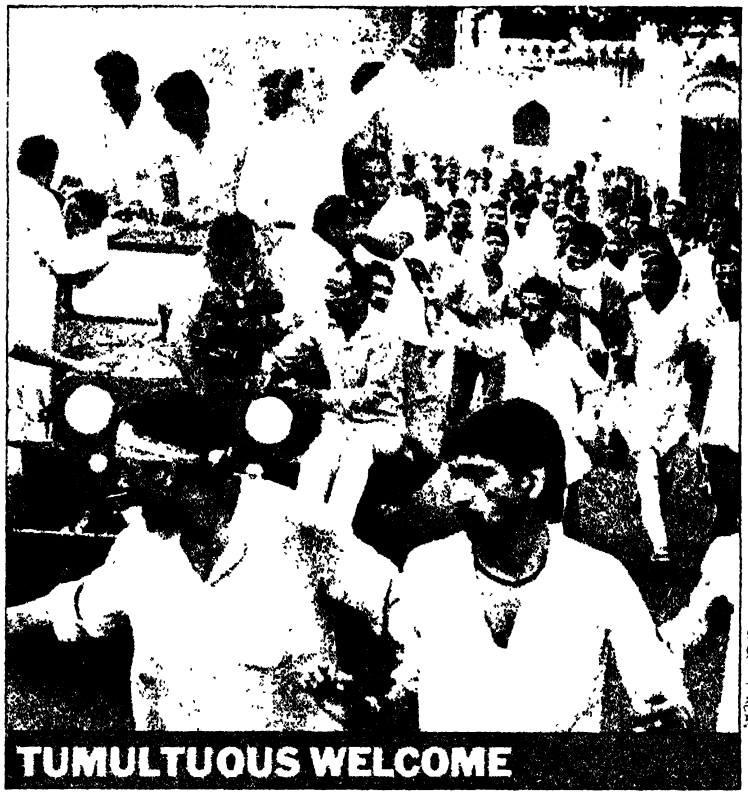
The Congress leaders, however, had second thoughts on this. Such a long padayatra, with lakhs of people joining in on the way was bound to create security problems, and seriously jeopardise law and order. Also, the government was unlikely to give permission to an exercise which seemed likely to culminate in a confrontation with the BJP, the party having decided to commence the task of temple building at Ayodhya on 30 October.

Rajiv Gandhi kicked off the yatra from Rajghat on 2 October Mahatma Gandhi's birth anniversary after all the assembled Congressmen had pledged to safeguard secularism

So, the programme was modified accordingly. Now the yatra would proceed through those parts of north and south India, where communal harmony had been adversely affected, and where Advani's rath yatra had surcharged the atmosphere. A team of leaders, including V.N. Gadgil, Ghulam Nabi Azad, M.J. Akbar and others were put on the job to assist the high-powered Sadbhavna Yatra committee headed by Dinesh Singh.

And Rajiv's progress through the capital appeared to indicate that the game plan had worked. The response to the yatra's message of maintaining communal harmony was positive at worst and phenomenal at best.

The high mead of the enti e programme was, without a doubt, the journey through Fatehpur, the Raja of Manda's constituency. Rajiv arrived here a day late, having had to defer his tour because of the death of veteran Congress leader Kamlapati Tripathi. But that didn't prevent the town from turning out in full strength to welcome their MP's bete noire. The railway platform was crowded with people as the Kalka Mail drew into the station, and it was near impossible to carve a passage through the crowd.



But what gave Gandhi greater cause for cheer was the presence of the Kshatriya Mahasangh, an important Thakur organisation just outside the station. The representatives of V.P. Singh's community had come out in full force, pink turbans and all, to honour Gandhi with the Rashtra Raksha Padak (Medal to Safeguard the Nation), a sword (no doubt to help him in this onerous task) and a cheque for Rs 1 lakh. The message couldn't have been louder: the Raja of Mandal had lost the Thakurs with his vote-catching machinations. And the rest of the electorate wasn't too enamoured of him either, if the stickers on 80 per cent of the vehicles ("Don't blame me, I didn't vote VP", "I'm ashamed I voted VP") were anything to go by.

The message of secularism was reiterated throughout Rajiv's progress with a Hindu gifting him a Koran, while a Muslim gave him a Gita and a Ramayan

And the Raja's loss was Rajiv's gain.

For once Gandhi didn't need to use the Congress' money power to get the crowds into his meeting. Despite the fact that most buses and trucks had been requisitioned to cart people to Lucknow to attend Mulayam Singh's rally, about one lakh faithful turned up at Rajiv's meeting, getting there by tractor, cycle or even bullock cart. If this was an unexpected development, Rajiv hid his surprise well, lashing out against V.P. Singh in his speech (in slightly improved Hindi, though). Said

TUMULTUOUS WELCOME

The high mead of the entire programme was, without doubt, the Raja of Manda's constituency

HAPPY DAYS

Nobody doubted that the public mood had changed. For, the response had been uniformly heartening the Congress president: "On the one hand, he is encouraging communal forces like the BJP and on the other he is instigating a caste conflict in each and every village in the country just to increase his vote bank. He is doing just what the British did to destroy this country."

The rhetoric, though not too rousing by cow-belt standards, worked. Said a young Thakur, when asked who would win the next election from Fatehpur: "Anybody but V.P. Singh."

But Rajiv wasn't through as yet. He went on to visit the three villages of Fatehpur where Harijans had been brutally massacred. The usual ritual of expressing sympathy for the affected families followed. With one difference: this time nobody found the concern phony, indicating that Gandhi had managed to redeem himself in a large measure in the public eye.

Rajiv then proceeded to journey further into the Raja's territory, taking the road to reach Allahabad, V.P. Singh's home town, the next morning. The first stop was the ancestral Nehru home, Anand Bhavan, followed by a tour of the city, thousands of people lining the route of the yatra. Predictably, by the time Gandhi landed at the Faizabad airport, he was two hours behind schedule. But the crowds were out in full force and the 12-kilometre distance from Faizabad to Ayodhya took over five hours to cover.

By then, however, nobody seriously doubted that the public mood had changed. For, the response had been uniformly heartening from the time Gandhi boarded the Kalka Mail from the Old Delhi railway station. The stopovers at Ghaziabad and Khurga provided good cheer, but the reception laid out at Aligarh had all the Congressmen rolling in the aisles in ecstasy. The crowd, comprising Hindus and Muslims in equal measure, was all over the station, trying to get close enough to Rajiv to touch him. And the same scenario was played out at Mathura, Tundala and Etawah, with Congress leader Sheila Dixit among those receiving him at the last station.

The reception laid out at Aligarh had all the Congressmen rolling in the aisles in ecstasy. The crowd, comprising Hindus and Muslims, was all over the station, trying to get close enough to Rajiv to touch him

At Kanpur, the security arrangements went completely haywire, with Gandhi insisting on getting off the train and mingling with the people. The crowd, of course, went completely hysterical in the bargain, and the train had to be delayed until a semblance of order was restored. His co-passengers couldn't have been too happy, so Rajiv utilised the Kanpur-Fatehpur stretch to mollify them, signing autographs for anyone who took the trouble to ask. The little time left over was devoted to briefing the local press.

HOT FAVOURITE

JAGDISH YADAV

Ayodhya had decided on pulling out all stops in its effort to welcome Rajiv. He seemed to have replaced Ram as the favourite deity

For, Rajiv knew well enough that his final conquest was yet in some doubt. Ayodhya, where everyone appeared to be in the throes of some sort of religious ecstasy, fanned by the periodic attempts at shilanyas at the site of the proposed Ram Temple.

As it turned out, he needn't have worried. For, Ayodhya had decided on pulling out all stops in its effort to welcome Rajiv.

The crowds at Faizabad airport were impressive, but Rajiv decided to make his way through them anyway. Securitymen clutched their heads as the leader of the Opposition walked the half kilometre stretch to his jeep, pushed and jostled by the delirious crowd. To his credit, Rajiv maintained his temper, smiling throughout the ordeal, even though he may well have sustained some injury. The journey to Saryu Ghat proved that Gandhi had learnt all the tricks of the electoral trade: he ate whatever was handed to him, never mind how grubby the hand; he drank the water offered, no matter how suspect it seemed; sat on a rickshaw; walked with the crowd. And was rewarded with their applause all through the five-hour journey.

They walked with Gandhi's motorcade, refusing to fall back when Rajiv increased speed. Instead, they broke out into a run in order to keep pace, and the Congress president had little option but to slow down again. The air reverberated with slogans such as, "Rajiv tum sangharsh karo, Hum tumhare saath hain", instead of the usual bhajans, and Rajiv seemed to have replaced Ram as the favourite deity (if only for a day) with women performing aarti and children garlanding him. By the time Gandhi reached the ghat his face was red, thanks to the profusion of vermilion tikkas on his forehead.

V.P. Singh: playing the caste card

The message of secularism was reiterated throughout Rajiv's progress with a Hindu gifting him a Koran, while a Muslim gave him a Gita and a Ramayan. Even security personnel seemed quite carried away, leaping for the garlands Gandhi threw back at the crowd, forgetting for the moment, the dignity of their uniform.

The effect, however, was spoilt by the presence of Chaubarjee Mahant, who came to welcome Rajiv and then, astride a horse, escorted his cavalcade for a couple of kilometres. And the attendance of some lower-level BJP leaders diluted the message of communal harmony somewhat.

But it couldn't take away the fact that Rajiv had made his comeback in the Hindi belt—riding on his Sadbhavna Rath. ●

SPECIAL REPORT

Losing ground

The National Front government comes in for criticism for extending President's Rule in Punjab

Punjab has been lost. At least for the V.P. Singh regime. For the people of the state—who are by now fed up with the repressive measures adopted by the administration in the name of containing terrorism—the short session of Parliament that was convened in the beginning of October held out the promise of restoring popular rule in Punjab. But by pushing through the 76th Amendment Bill extending President's Rule in the state by another six months, the National Front government has in one stroke alienated the rank and file in Punjab.

The reactions were spontaneous and immediate. Simranjeet Singh Mann, president of the Akali Dal (Mann), promptly resigned from the Lok Sabha in protest, and there was widespread resentment among politicians of all hue. Prakash Singh Badal, a former chief minister and an Akali Dal heavyweight, felt that Prime Minister V.P. Singh had committed a grave blunder by postponing elections in the state again: "The people now think that there will never be polls in Punjab." Bimal Khalsa, Akali Dal (Mann) MP, echoed his sentiments: "The government is afraid that the militants will pass a resolution in favour of Khalistan in the elections. But how long can they go on postponing elections in the state?"

Even in the trouble-torn districts of

Punjab, the refrain is the same. Most people feel that the V.P. Singh regime has let down the masses by extending President's Rule. Suddenly, the Prime Minister, who had received a rousing reception during his trip to Amritsar last year, is being compared with Rajiv Gandhi. Argued Sohan Singh, the aged sarpanch of Gohalwar village in Tarn Taran district: "The government talks of violence but there was no violence during the parliamentary elections. The Janata Dal, the Congress(I) and the BJP all know that they can never improve their base if Assembly elections are held now."

Popular resentment against the Centre is so widespread that most Punjab politicians today are keen to distance themselves from the central government. In such a situation, Simranjeet Singh Mann's resignation from Parliament was only expected. At one time it was felt that Mann was being propped up by the Centre to take over the leadership in Punjab. This had done him enough harm and the Akali leader was looking for an opportunity to take on the Centre. Thus erupted the kirpan controversy which was rather crudely handled by Mann himself.

There is no doubt that Mann was the key figure in the post-parliamentary election scenario in Punjab. Having burnt its fingers in trying to play the Mann card, the Centre was desperately looking for an alternate leadership in the state. The move to prop up Badal too, failed; neither Mann nor Badal was willing to condemn the terrorists openly. For a brief period, Amrinder Singh was in favour, but ultimately the government suspected his intentions. The Centre also toyed with the idea of projecting Atinder Pal Singh and Rajdev Singh, both MPs, as the future chief minister of Punjab, but this idea too fell through, and V P. Singh was left with no option but to extend President's Rule in the state.

Would the election have been a bloody affair as the Centre had made it out to be? Though most political parties in New Delhi felt that holding polls in Punjab at this juncture would have brought on large-scale violence and rioting, police personnel in the state thought otherwise. Said Sanjiv Gupta, the SSP of Amritsar district, which is among the violence-prone areas of the state, "I think it was a mistake to put off the polls. We were capable of handling the law and order

"I am shocked"

Akali Dal (B) president Prakash Singh Badal lashes out at the Centre

SUNDAY: Once again, elections in Punjab have been put away. How do you react to this?
Prakash Singh Badal: When we attended the all-party meeting in Delhi, we were in favour of holding Assembly elections in Punjab. We clearly said that President's Rule is no solution. Now, we are shocked that President's Rule has been extended. People have begun to feel that there will never be any election in the state.

Q: Do you think that the Prime Minister backed out only because of pressure from the BJP, the Congress(I) and the left parties?
A: The Prime Minister knows best why he did so. But many times in the past, V.P. Singh had said that he had committed a blunder by postponing elections in Punjab. We are really shocked that the blunder has been committed once again. If parliamentary elections could have been held in the state, I see no reason why Assembly polls cannot be conducted.

Badal : blaming the Centre

Q: If the polls would have been held, would it be free and fair?
A: People's representatives are much better than bureaucrats. The people of Punjab are facing great hardship because of the police and the bureaucrats.

Q: The Centre is keen to have a moderate leadership in Punjab, a leadership which would condemn terrorism. Do you think that such a leadership exists in Pubjab today?
A: For the last 40 years, they (the central government) have not done anything for Punjab. We are not fighting for new demands—we are fighting against repression and injustice. Successive governments have done nothing to solve the state's basic problems. Today, there is a police raj in the state and all other institutions have become redundant.

Q: You have never condemned terrorism openly. Why?
A: I have always said that I am against killing of innocents either by the police or by individuals. My party has said this too several times.

Q: Do you think that the Centre is caught up with other problems and Punjab is no longer a priority area?
A: I think that Punjab is not just there in their list of priorities. The Centre has announced a couple of measures like the arrest of former Congress (I) MP Sajjan Kumar and the rehabilitation of those who deserted the army following Operation Bluestar. But these are just eye-washes. The latest package announced by V.P. Singh is also an eye-wash. If they were seriously interested in solving the Punjab problem, they would have taken bold steps. We are completely disappointed with the performance of the V.P. Singh government.

Q: Are there any chances of the different Akali parties coming together in the near future?
A: We are in favour of unity and I have suggested steps to bring the Akalis together. But the other factions have not responded. What can I do alone? I think it is in the interest of Punjab and the community that we have one Akali party.

"It was a right decision"

Holding elections in Punjab would have led to law and order problems, says K.P.S. Gill, director-general of Punjab Police

SUNDAY: Most political parties have expressed the opinion that the holding of elections in Punjab would give rise to a serious law and order problem. Do you have the same fears?
K.P.S. Gill: The reading is correct because there has been stepped-up terrorist activity in some areas. I don't think there can be two opinions about that.

Q: But there was little poll violence during the 1989 general elections. Do you mean the elections wouldn't have been free and fair?
A: There are various interpretations of the results of the general elections. But you see, elections aren't the only thing about the political process. With so many other factors, it isn't right to concentrate only on the electoral process. And if the state feels that terrorism has to be dealt with first, so be it.

Q: Is there any political or economic initiative which you think will help you quash terrorism in Punjab?
A: People do not speak against terrorists because of fear. In the countryside and towns there is no support for the terrorists whatsoever. Their support is also declining abroad. Since the government has lifted the restriction on foreigners visiting Punjab, it has enabled a large number of Sikhs to come and see things for themselves. They find that the reality is completely different from what the terrorists propagate there.

Q: There have been a few cases of desertions by police officers who were in league with the militants. Does this worry you?
A: There have been a few such instances and we have found ways of dealing with this. The militant leaders often appeal to the special police officers but no, this is not a cause for worry.

Q: Who are your main targets now?
A: We have a list of about 40 'A grade' terrorists belonging to groups like the Babbars, the Khalistan Commando Force and the BTFK. They are our main targets.

K.P.S. Gill: toeing the Centre's line situation." Satpal Dang, the CPI Politburo member from Punjab, added: "I think the election would have been peaceful, though it would have been the peace of the graveyard. Even the Lok Sabha polls were held at gun point. There is no reason why the Centre should put off Assembly elections in Punjab."

Satpal Dang has even chalked out a post-election scenario. The senior CPI leader feels that contrary to the government's contention, the militants would not give a call for Khalistan immediately after the polls. They would first ensure that all their members held in jail were released, after which they would infiltrate the administration and demand the removal of the BSF and the CRPF from the state. Only after that would the militants pass a resolution in favour of a separate Sikh state. "Today," lamented Dang, "no Akali leader is willing to sign an agreement with the Centre within the framework of the Indian Constitution. And, any pact outside the Constitution is not acceptable to the country. That is the irony of the Punjab situation."

Whatever politicians might say, in the final analysis it is the various militant groups which call the shots. What is their stand on the elections? While any number of splinter organisations have mushroomed in Punjab today, it is basically three groups that matter. They are the Babbar Khalsa led by Sohan Singh, the Khalistan Commando Force with Wassan Singh Zaffarwal as its chief, and the AISSF-Akal Federation-Damdami Takshal combine.

The Babbars have made their stand clear: they are against any constitutional solution and would oppose the elections. The other two outfits are yet to come out with such a categorical statement, but is widely felt that they are exerting pressure on Mann and other Akali leaders to boycott the polls.

What now? According to sources in New Delhi, the government is contemplating a change of Governor, followed by an administrative shake-up. But it is doubtful whether even this will satisfy the Sikhs. And, already the state's politicians have begun to dismiss the Centre's efforts. Explained Bimal Khalsa: "You see, as the days go by, the demands of the people are increasing. The Punjab problem has become a cancer for the country." Added Amrinder Singh: "The government will have to start working backwards. The killing of Sikhs by the security forces must stop. Our men must be released. We will settle for nothing less."

In this atmosphere of confusion, it is only the militants who are benefiting. They have stepped up their activities, gunning down innocents and looting property at will. The security forces, too, have taken up the challenge. As Narinder Pal Singh, the police chief of Tarn Taran district, said: "The battle is being fought between the security forces and the terrorists. And, casualties are rising on both the sides." ●

I'LL TELL TO THE MINISTER!

When you're the reigning sex goddess of the Bombay film industry, it's not difficult to imagine that you're above the mundane rules that apply to the conduct of lesser mortals. But such delusions do land you in trouble, anyway.

As Sridevi discovered, much to her own discomfort.

The domestic terminal at Meenambakkam Airport, Madras, is where it all happened. The film star arrived to take the flight to Bombay, accompanied by her sister Srilata and her brother-in-law.

Which was all very well, except that the star's family insisted on entering the area where boarding passes were issued, even though the entry of visitors is restricted.

Airport staff objected to their presence. But the duo stayed put. Until the duty manager summoned them into his room to give them a talking to.

But her sister and husband had to stay out of the restricted area anyway.

The film, directed by Surendra Gupta, was publicised as the recreation of a rape which took place in Elphinstone College last year. But was in actual fact, nothing more than an attempt to romanticise sexual violence and titillate the audience in the Appalled that such a movie had been certified fit for viewing by the censors and that the howls of protest from various public organisations had gone unnoticed, Deora decided that drastic action was in order.

And landed up at the censor office, with a band of followers to lodge his protest.

Meanwhile the film ran to packed houses all over the country. •

AD-VANTAGE

If you don't innovate, you're dead. This is today's advertising message. And agencies are giving it all they have "A few weeks after his new Ferrari came in from Italy, Roy's wife filed for divorce. I ran into her at a cafe..."

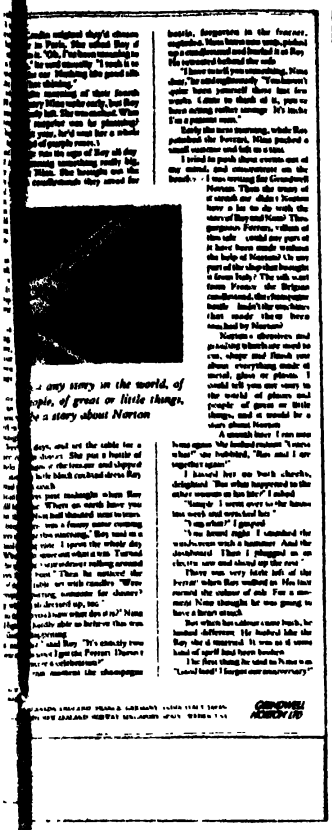
"When I was thirteen I fell madly, foolishly in love with a girl eight thousand miles away. As I sit here..."

"The gentlemen sitting next to me was obviously terrified of flying. I was on my way to Japan..."

Three opening lines from Trikaya Grey's latest campaign for Grindwell Norton Ltd, a company that makes abrasives. Only, an entire page of flashy, fast-paced ad copy that follows all openers have almost nothing whatsoever to do with Grindwell. Which makes you wonder what a divorce, falling in love, or fear of flying has to do with products the company manufactures.



GAUTAM PATOLE

Ambience's Ashok Kurien: "Innovation is bound to occur when there is such ad volume"

They do not, on the face of it. But an identical, and boldly outlined paragraph at the centre of each ad provides the missing link: "I could tell you any story in the world, of places and people, of great or little things," it goes, "and it would be a story about Norton."

"Never before have people noticed our ads," says a Grindwell director, talking about the campaign that even the ad industry considers to be one of the most innovative presentation gimmicks this year. "Our corporate image has received a tremendous boost."

NEXUS advertising's ploy, which uses muted images to sell the product

Whether they are trying to establish a corporate identity, or coaxing customers to part with big bucks, the creative minds in the ad world are coming up with messages that are slicker, sassier, and more sophisticated than ever before. As the country's television and print media grows and evolves rapidly, there is more newsprint and video-tape time to fill. And, the 'hidden persuaders' are sledge-hammering their messages home, making cash registers ring louder than ever. The industry calls it a "quiet revolution", perhaps the understatement of the decade.

The buzz-word is innovation. For, to stand out in a world crammed with consumer goods and corporate attention grabbing, one has to be innovative. Concurs Ashok Kurien, managing director of Ambience, one of the hottest agencies in Bombay: "Innovation is bound to occur when there is such a volume of advertising."

A good thing, too. "For the advertiser it is a great chance to display his product," says Mohammad Khan, who runs Bombay-based Enterprise, one of India's most dynamic ad agencies (memorable campaigns: for Charms cigarettes, National Egg Coordination Committee, Vadilal ice creams). "For us, advertising is to create an impact for the brand and we will continue to use our creativity to find novel ways of attracting attention. Tomorrow, I may want to put a whistle inside a newspaper or magazine, so that when you open a page the whistle blows." He exclaims: "What a great innovation it will be."

Trikaya's Chris D'Rozario: with todays ad overload, "innovation can be an irritant"

Actually, one advertising agency has already done something similar. Nexus, one of the country's small but innovative agencies (See box: Stay small, think big), which presented the new Indian Express advertising package saying "thank you for blowing our trumpet" in a letter to the newspaper group's advertisers, and sent along a miniature brass trumpet to all of them. "As long as advertising exists," says Khan, "innovation will be around."

It will. And not just with little trumpets either, but every which way. For example, says Rajiv Agarwal, of Bombay-based Nexus, "the use of three-dimensional effects on hoardings really makes them stand out". Such as, he says, when a hoarding advertising Rallifan actually had a fan stuck on it, blades and all. Or when real curtains are draped across a hoarding advertising draperies. In other ways too, an ad could be eye-catching. All done very simply. "Using sepia, black and white accentuated with colour has become a big trend overseas," says Agarwal, as it usually uses a dull picture but has the product highlighted in colour. The trend is catching on in India, as Trikaya's widely appreciated campaign for Sweetex sugar substitute shows: a black and white picture, product in colour, and one, just one, snappy sentence of copy.

But innovation works with a crucial proviso: the product has to sell. All creative pundits are unanimous on this score, as innovative advertising works only if it does not queer the sales pitch, however brilliant it may look. "Good advertising is not good advertising until it sells your product," says Gurcharan Das, doyen of a laid-back yet professional management style and managing director of Procter and Gamble India Ltd.

Because, while there is a new thinking in the ad world, says Gautam Rakshit, a director with Avenues advertising agency in Bombay, there is also a "veritable deluge, a surfeit of advertising". Selling is difficult in an environment where if everyone innovates, less ads get noticed, going by the simple law of visual overloading. Not the Onida campaigns though—Avenues' creations—which are as difficult to look away from as they are to forget. The Onida devil for TV sets, the chameleon for the video cassette recorders. And a campaign for Onida audio tape recorders which puts Nastassia Kinski's role in The Cat People to shame: with a screaming, hissing

Stay small, think big

Minor ad agencies carve out a market share with few clients—but major ideas

None of the promoters were novices. It would never have worked that way.

When Rajiv Agarwal, Arun Kale and David Innes decided to start Nexus over five years ago, they were already at the top, each considered a whiz-kid in his own field. Agarwal, a management graduate from the Indian Institute of Management, Ahmedabad, was part of the crack team that left Rediffusion Advertising to form Enterprise, still considered to be a trail-blazing ad outfit. Kale, one of the most respected art directors in the trade, an old Rediffusion hand who later started Kalegraphics, his own art/design studio. And Innes, ace copywriter, starting out with Ogilvy Benson and Mather (now Ogilvy and Mather), moving to Hindustan Thompson Associates, then on to J. Walter Thompson in Australia, and later Rediffusion.

The trio started Nexus in September 1985 with zero business, backed only by talent, goodwill and terrific track records. Now, Nexus is one of the hottest—and among the biggest small agencies in town—with a turnover of Rs 5 crores a year, working for a select group of companies. HMV, the Oberoi Group of hotels, Bank of America, German multi-national engineering company Buckau Wolfe, the Indian Express, Double Bull shirts, and the Garden Linen range, for Jaya Shree Textiles.

And like other breakaway outfits—all small, smart and successful—Nucleus and Ambience (another Rs 5 crores agency with Thums Up's Taste the Thunder and Garden Vareli fabric campaigns in the belt), among others, worked with a raison d'etre that is as simple as it comes. After working with the country's top agencies, the team felt that nobody was questioning themselves about what their function was anymore. "The boom that's caught the industry," says Agarwal, "has made it rich with money. But has left the industry poorer than ever when it comes to advertising ideas—an agency was no longer as good as its last campaign."

The early breakaway—now big-time—agencies were Enterprise and Avenues. Enterprise handled the hugely successful Charms 'Spirit of Freedom' cigarette campaign, and though people dubbed it the 'Spirit of Cancer' campaign, nobody could deny the brand's sky-rocketing sales graph afterwards. The campaign is now considered to be the advertising feat of the 1980s.

But agencies such as Enterprise and Avenues have now grown very large. Nexus-like agencies have not. They are choosy about their clients, and says Agarwal, "we plan to keep it that way". Why? "Because we are small," he says, "the number of levels through which an ad passes before it reaches the media are limited. The actual act of creating the ad isn't an impersonal function happening somewhere in the bounds of a bureaucratic giant."

Smaller agencies find that they score over their larger competitors because they lack a hierarchical structure. Thanks to this, they can take decisions boldly—this increases risk, but it also brings out the best. "Some of the ads we created," says Ashok Roy, a director with Avenues, now a Rs 17 crore company, "would never have been allowed through by the so-called professional market research organisations."

Smallness and a brazen attitude—innovation, initiative, et al—helps to focus on an advertising campaign. "What business are we in?" asks Agarwal, talking about his clients' needs. "The shirt business, the hotel business, the music business." Simply put, what he means is that a small agency can liase with a client that much more effectively, and the returns all round are that much more profitable.

It appears to work. "You'd think they (the large agencies) wouldn't feel threatened," says the boss of a big, Bombay-based agency, "but they are pretty perturbed by the success stories of a handfull of small agencies."

cat-woman. None of the character portrayals have anything to do with the products they are selling, yet they sell so well that Onida is near the top of the audio-visual heap.

"When there are so many brands on the market," says Rakshit, "all of them reasonably good in technical terms and with their differences narrowing, the consumer durable (product) has to be sold on the basis of psychological appeals." The Onida campign, for example, plays on envy, revulsion and hate, all negative sentiments as opposed to the sun-is-shining-flowers-are-blooming sort or, I'm-sweet-buy-me stuff of babyfood ads. But the public denouement was to go and buy Onida, denouncing the ads, but not the products.

An unthinkable situation, say industry professionals, even in the 1970s or early '80s.

But today, anything negative has undeniable impact. Most political advertising -and what could have been more negative than Rediffusion's election campaign for the Congress(I) last year -- uses the negative emotions of fear and pity. As do numerous public service and insurance ads. (For these, says Kersi Katrak, creative director with Lintas India Ltd, "the raw material is drawn from life. Something that exists, and can be identified with.")

And today, irrespective of what urbanites may feel,even the unaesthetic has impact. Take an example, the TV ad for Cema bulbs. In one sequence, it has Bollywood bomb Sridevi superimposed so that it appears she is dancing inside a bulb. The idea is not bizarre. Srivedi is— dressed in frills, plump beyond belief, and unappealing in a way she never is on the silver screen. "Everybody tells me how much they hate the ad," says Bharat Dhabolkar, who has kept motorists and passerbys in splits with his smart-alecky, often-incisive ads for Amul butter for over 15 years now. "But in villages of Maharashtra and Gujarat, where the product is sold," he continues, "Hindi films are very popular. And so is the ad." Dhabolkar's agency, da Cunha, created both Amul and the Cema ad. "You don't give an audience Satyajit Ray," adds Dhabolkar with a laugh. "when they want Manmohan Desai." Dhabolkar, though he may sound condescending, is actually being as realistic as an ad person ought to be.

Amul-ads Dhabolkar: "You're only as good as your last campaign"

But when people want slick, you give them slick. Like in the ad for Castrol Super TT engine oil for two-wheelers. The campaign, created by Lintas, the country's number two agency (in billings) after Hindustan Thompson, has just four pictorial elements. A blue sky, deadwood branches, a motorcycle rider and a crow- the way it is, you might think it a swallow- in a far corner. All aesthetically spread across two pages in a magazine, with a bold opener: "Zen and the art of motorcycle madness," it says. "Take-a my girl, but don't touch-a my bike. Hey!" The way it is, the ad may sell more mobikes. On the other hand, that is good for Indrol Lubricants and Specialities Ltd, the makers of Castrol.

These stark elements nothwithstanding, another style has permeated ad minds. "The latest trend seems to be to write a lot of copy," says Christopher D'Rozario, creative head with Trikaya. "Like our Norton and Ceasefire (portable fire extinguisher) ads. And the Hero Honda ads (created by Hindustan Thompson). Also, says Dhabolkar, another innovation is the use of the mixed language metaphor. "But you have to make changes," he cautions, "for ads appearing in different parts of the country. Humko Binnie's mangta worked very well in Bombay (where

"What we are talking about is not innovative ads," says Enterprise's Khan, "but innovative layouts"

Screen sense

Computers and creativity are sprucing up Indian TV ads

The coveted ad slots in the super 'A' special category of television programmes—a serial such as Mahabharata, Chitrahaar, or the Sunday Hindi feature film—cost the advertiser Rs 90,000 to one lakh every ten seconds. For a minute, the bill is a staggering Rs six lakhs.

The cost hardly deters anybody. Or, the fact that with so many ads crowding a pre or post-programme slot, the messages they convey tend to get diffused. It actually makes advertising agencies work harder—in a replayof print advertising—with their creative minds eager to rise above the clutter.

Deven Khote : "It's a great beginning"

"What has been the biggest boost to film advertising is the level of sophistication of the equipment available," says Deven Khote, creative director with Bombay-based United Television. "There's pop art and graphic art, as in the Cinthol Lime ad, the Frooti ad, and the Tips and Toes ad." And then there is experimentation with the musical form. "The entire Milkfood (yoghurt) ad is sung," exclaims Khote. He adds: "It's a great beginning and I hope that we now go places."

Khote can rest easy: TV advertising is going places all right. Every evening, the scores of ad messages that tumble out of the TV screen in drawing rooms—and village recreation centres—across the country, are sometimes good enough to become part of the popular culture. But while sophisticated computer hardware has enabled gimmickry to reach new heights—the card-flip effect, the science fiction scenarios, and computer generated animation—it is the ideas that score. Because today, everybody has access to computer sophistry.

The striking Onida spot touting video cassette recorders, for example, which uses a live chameleon—spray-painted for effect to offset the otherwise stark imagery. Or the Nutramul ad, a Khote offering, which has an animated monster chasing kids. Till one of them drinks Nutramul and becomes strong enough to take on, and beat, the monster. Or, the spot for Kawasaki-Bajaj motorcycles, in which computer-aid merges an animation cheetah with the bike, in an attempt to show the product's speed, power and machismo.

The increasing growth of TV advertising has prompted advertising agencies to make their own ad films, rather than trust the work to independent film-makers. "It gives us total control," says Ashok Roy of Avenues, a Bombay-based ad agency. (Avenues created the Onida chameleon-VCR spot.)

State-of-the-art gadgets and innovative ideas nothwithstanding, one of the most successful ad films in Indian television history is the Liril soap ad, which initially had model Karen Lunel cavorting under a waterfall. The ad lived through a second incarnation, and the move is now on for a third, with yet another fresh face. "There are some properties and ideas too valueable to give up," says Kersi Katrak, creative director with Lintas India Ltd, which handles the Liril account. "And the Liril ad is certainly one of them."

Lintas' ad for Castrol engine oil: space, ze any Hindi corruption goes), but not in the north."

Time for some introspection. Because, even innovation has its pitfalls, presentation its blind corners, and advertising its presumptions.

"What is needed is not just a good, creative mind," says Dhabolkar, "but one that can produce good ideas within a time-frame, or disciplined creativity." He adds: "You are only as good as your last campaign." This, however, is more of a warning than a criticism. Besides, time-frames and disciplined creativity are what most of advertising is about anyway.

But the point is crucial because it helps brings in a discussion about innovation—and problems. And some, such as Enterprises' Khan, are blunt. "In the first place, let's get this straight," says Khan. "What we are talking about is not innovative advertising but innovative lay-outs. And also, let's get this clear. Advertising is meant to be innovative."

"See," he continues, "advertising is an intrusion into people's lives. People do not buy newspapers and magazines to read advertisements. They buy them for their editorial content. That is why an advertisement must be noticed strongly. An advertisement must not only compete with other ads, but it must also compete with the editorial." He adds: "If publishers feel that these (innovative) lay-outs are killing their editorial, then my advice to publishers is do not sell out". Touche.

But if they do—prompted by the money, that great pacifier, ads bring in—"then innovation becomes an irritant", says Trikaya's D'Rozario. No problem, retorts Khan, "innovation in design will continue as long as the reader does not complain. And let me assure you, readers are very quick to respond to irritants." As far as advertising goes, irritation has not crept in yet. Fortunately for the industry.

Fortunately, again, that key element in advertising—clients—are playing along.

Whether the industry likes it or not, all its innovation and bravado would not amount to much—nay, never take off—if advertisers dug their heels in. Because, behind every good ad, or should one say effective ad is a client who is willing to take the risk. According to Dhabolkar, half the credit for his Amul ads goes to his client, a conglomeration of Anand, Gujarat-based cooperatives, which despite the raciness of the campaigns, has "conservative" and "government-control" written all over it. But this risk, like everything else, is relative.

"The message has to be slipped in subliminally" says Lintas' Katrak, "people don't like being sold to"

Much of the advertising that we see today is pre-tested, ideas culled from endless market research reports. "A lot of great advertising has to be altered if research shows that it doesn't work," says Dhabolkar. "With space and television time becoming astronomical (in cost), neither the agency nor the client can afford to take risks."

Now, a word from advertising deity David Ogilvy, in this trypically descriptive and somewhat condescending manner. "Suppose," he goes, "your gall-bladder has to be removed this evening, will you choose a surgeon who has read some books on anatomy and knows where to find your gall-bladder, or a surgeon who relies on his intuition? Why should our clients be expected to bet millions of dollars on your intuition?"

Ogilvy has it down pat. The thing is, times are changing, and clients are more adventurous than ever before. And advertising bibles are being completely rewritten, almost every year, changing with the target audience's new income patterns, aspirations and lifestyles. The only factor that remains constant is the drive to maximise the bottomline.

And to achieve this end, advertisers have arrived at a stage where they are willing to try practically anything provided it follows a style and is backed by brilliance.

But not only brilliance. Advertising, according to Lintas' Katrak, must also entertain and involve in order to work. "The message has to be slipped in subliminally," he says. "People don't like being sold to." He cites the Cherry Blossom Charlie Chaplin spoof ad as a good example of this. "The deeper you bury the message, the better off you are," says Katrak.

But sometimes, just sometimes, it works so well to simply blow it all up' to the sledge-hammering level. Like that innovative ad for Araldite adhesive abroad, which went to the extent of sticking a real car onto a hoarding to display the product's binding ability. While this might be imitating the West, "nothing is new or original in that sense," says Kattak. So, go for the jugular, and discount imitation as long as it delivers. Innovation does.

And, in advertising, the sky is the limit. "If people are surprised at the innovations today, watch and wait, I will tell them," says Enterprise's Khan with a flourish, "you ain't seen nothing yet." ●

STOCK MARKETS

Come-uppance

When you're high, remember there's a fall ahead. Indian share markets forgot to last fortnight, and they are paying the price

If there is a crash, it must be October—as far as stock markets are concerned. There was Wall Street's Black Monday in October 1987, when the Dow Jones Index knocked off an unprecedented 508 points in a single day, and almost knocked out the US economy. Two years later, Wall Street did a near-repeat. Early this October, The Nikkei Index at Tokyo's stock exchange slipped below the 20,000 mark for the first time in three years. And last fortnight, the Bombay Stock Exchange (BSE) sent out feelers that it belonged in the same league.

The BSE sensitive index peaked at 1602 on 9 October—a phenomenal rise since 21 June, when it recorded 790 points. Enter the mutual funds and financial institutions, namely, the Unit Trust of India.

They sold off a large chunk of their massive equity holdings (funds and institutions hold almost 40 per cent of Indian stocks) and immediately, prices began dropping. Just two days after the 9th high, the decline turned to speculative panic. All those speculators, went the market grapevine, who were so content to live on the borderline of sheer profit, driving up prices to where they have never reached before, realised they had a panic on their hands. Thanks to the lead provided by government-run funds and institutions, they started dumping shares.

Tata Steel (TISCO), which was selling at Rs 280 (par value: Rs 10) on 9 October, slid to Rs 227 three days later. Hindalco, another key scrip, dropped by Rs 62 to Rs 336. Reliance Industries Ltd fell to Rs 218, from a high of Rs 260 per share. Tata Tea knocked off Rs 58 to close at Rs 436, Associated Cement Cos (par value: Rs 100), the high flyer of the year, crashed by a massive Rs 425 to end the week at Rs 1,800. And by Friday, the 13th, the BSE was considerably less non-chalant to close the index at 1402, a solid 12 per cent drop from its high period, in the space of only three trading sessions.

It had to happen sometime. In an interview to SUNDAY in early September, BSE executive director M.R. Nayya, had forewarned a disaster: "I am sorry to say that speculators are not content with a stable market... My overall view is that it is an overbought market, and cannot sustain itself for long, it has to find its level." He added: "What we are worried about is the likely fall emanating from an undue rise in prices, which will shatter the confidence of the investor." People heard him, but nobody really cared much—they were too busy raking it in.

However, men on Dalal Street, which houses the BSE, and Lyons Range, its Calcutta equivalent, and the number two exchange, insist they had seen it coming. "For the past three months," says Shevantilal Shah of Stewart & Co, a major stock broking firm, "we had a scenario in which there were just no bears (a stock dealer who, in anticipation of a fall in price, sells shares at current prices. And if the price falls, the bear purchases at a lower price, taking his profit from the price difference.) Only bulls (who buy to sell higher) in a rapidly rising stock market." Because the prices had shot up too fast, the bears had been trapped, says Shah, and had exited the market after suffering huge losses. "This made our markets vulnerable," says Shah. "Had he (the bear) been around when prices dropped rapidly, he would have entered to buy at every level, thereby stabilising the decline." "Now, the market only had sellers, but no buyers. So, it went into a tailspin."

There are other factors that pushed equities downhill, as well. The growing political crisis in New Delhi, and the spectre of communal tension. A key factor was also the rising cost of financing speculative, or badla, purchases of shares, which draws unprecedented 100 per cent interest per annum. Besides, the market was shaky about a possible hike in bank lending rates, which in turn would result in increasing capital costs for industry.

And, of course, the ever-present Gulf crisis and its impact. International crude oil prices have zoomed up—a barrel of oil now sells for US $ 40 (about Rs 720 at current exchange rates). The thing is, when finance minister Madhu Dandavate talked about an additional Rs 5,000 crore oil import bill, he had the price pegged at US $25 a barrel. The government had slashed its oil quota by 15 per cent, and has hiked prices. This has affected the entire petrochemicals industry—Reliance and Bombay Dyeing, to name a few. In fact, it will affect any industry that uses oil or its derivatives to run itself.

BSE executive director M.R. Mayya: vindicated, but in no mood to say "I told you so"

Also, it did not help very much that a top international financial consultancy firm, Merril Lynch, said that Indian stock markets were over-valued (echoing Mayya's sentiments) and could collapse anytime. Chaos, stock market panic- and collapse.

Market analysts are looking at another reason behind the price slide. With the Indian industry confused, double-digit inflation a real threat, and not much happening on the policy front, the government used financial institutions and mutual funds to "police" the equities, and bulls, into submission.

There is one piece of good news, however. Recession or no recession, the Indian stock markets could bounce back and fairly soon. Not because corporate results are hot, the monsoon benevolent, or, in the unlikely hope that the government will snap out of its disastrous slumber and get some decent economic measures going.

But because Indian stock markets have incredible resilience, they hate lying low for long. It may take a while, but the bulls will be back •

Kothari General Foods looks to Brooke Bond for a desperate bail out

It has been a long time in rough weather. And the Madras-based Kothari Group wants to get out—fast. Actually, they have wanted to get out ever since Kothari General Foods (KGF), a group company, launched soft-drink concentrate Tang and JU-C amidst much fanfare in 1987. And followed it up with disastrous sales.

KGF is now a Board for Industrial and Financial Reconstruction (BIFR) recognised sick company, and accumulated losses of Rs 19.52 crores, including depreciation, has gobbled up the Rs 15.16 crore equity capital of the company. All that kept KGF ticking over—only just—was its export of instant coffee to the USSR. Over the past two years, word has gone around of buyouts by some of India's top corporate names: Vijay Mallya of UB Group, RPG Enterprises chief Rama Prasad Goenka, the Modis, Jagatjit Industries Ltd. and the fast-emerging Indodan (the Gold Cafe people).

The deals fell through, and the

KGF Chairman D.C. Kothari and vice-chairman Pradip Kothari: happy with Brooke Bond's chicken feed

Kotharis were forced to pump in money to keep their ailing venture afloat. Now, there is word that Brooke Bond India Ltd, the Rs 550 crore instant coffee, tea and processed foods company, which moved under the Hindustan Lever fold last year, is willing to buy KGF. "Merger" is the terminology used if one goes by the book, but in effect, it is a straight case of Brooke Bond buying in.

The proposed KGF-Brooke Bond deal is to take place under Section 72A of the Income Tax Act that allows for the merger of a loss-making company with a profit-making one. This will facilitate Brooke Bond to show as losses the KGF liabilities it picks up, which means a hefty tax concession. In return for just Rs eight crores-odd in investment for buying into KGF.

"That investment is just chicken feed for Brooke Bond," says Pradip D. Kothari, vice-chairman and manging director of flagship company Kothari Industrial Corp. Ltd (KICL), "a company which had declared a cash surplus of Rs 30 crores last year." Also, says Kothari, along with stock, Brooke Bond will get a state-of-the-art instant coffee plant, intended to make the Maxwell brand of coffee, "for a song". He adds: "Its capacity, added with what they already have, will make Brooke Bond much bigger than Nestlé (Food Specialities Ltd, the makers of Nescafe, and Brooke Bonds's key competitor). Brooke Bond makes the Bru brand of instant coffee.

Ironically Kothari's euphoria about the proposed merger almost exactly matches the KGF euphoria when they launched their products in early 1987. The Indian consumer was primed for a processed foods revolution, and future competition such as Rasna, made by Pioma Industries Ltd, was already showing how far the market would go.

In this set-up, the Kotharis tied up General Foods of the US (now Kraft General Foods) for the KGF venture, which planned to introduce the US conglomerate's premier brands—Tang, Ju-C, et al—in India. The Kotharis still hold 33 per cent equity in the company, General Foods the same, financial institutions five per cent. The rest is with the public.

The venture went sour, almost from day one. For starters, Ju-C tasted just a little too bitter for the Indian consumers, who prefer their drinks sweet. And Tang was just too expensive: at Rs 110 a jar, when competition sold for Rs 65.

Besides, KGF had to import Tang concentrates, and faced its own problems with the government deciding to ban imports of such items, which the finance ministry termed non-essential. By the time KGF got down to providing a desi touch to Ju-C, Rasna was way ahead. And Tang simply never went anywhere.

Interestingly, the sale offer comes at a time when KGF has actually improved its performance—turnover is up, and operating losses down

In this scenario, selling appeared to be the soft option. However, when the Kotharis initially wanted to pull out of KGF, General Foods decided to hang on just a little while longer. Now, they do not seem to mind the Kothari disinvestment, but are watching their new team-mate very, very closely.

Interestingly, the sale offer comes at a time when KGF has actually improved its performance, substantially. Turnover in 1989-90 moved up to Rs 8.55 crores, from a dismal Rs 4.02 crores in the previous financial year. And operating loss, after interest and depreciation has come down to Rs 3.69 crores from Rs 5.31 crores during the same period.

Brooke Bond has decided to pay off KGF shareholders in cash, rather than give its own shares in exchange. This, a wise move, would prevent enthusiastic KGF shareholders to make inroads into blue-chip Brooke Bond.

The financial institutions appear to have agreed to the deal in principle. The Industrial Credit and Investment Corp. of India, the lead KGF holding institution, has given the go-ahead. Only General Foods is holding back, hanging on to the memorandum of understanding which outlines the deal. "They are a huge group", Kothari says in defence, "and maybe, this Indian operation is not necessarily in their priority rating."

Perhaps, but Kothari is sticking to the confident note despite any hesitation General Foods may exhibit. It is all part of a Kothari plan to junk any company they cannot handle. And they have done it before: three years ago, they sold a caustic soda plant to the Southern Petrochemicals Industries Corp. Such casting off is expected to help the Group concentrate on businesses they can handle, such as its plantations in Tamil Nadu and Karnataka, textile units in Coimbatore, and its fertiliser operaitons. "The parent company, KICL, has done quite well last year," beams Kothari. "We should do even better in the coming months. The KICL share was quoted at Rs 101 (last week) and I expect it would touch the Rs 200 mark by the end of the year."

Bingo, But General Foods has yet to play along. •

■ Get 'em!

The Reserve Bank of India (RBI) is on the rampage, if recent studies, prophecies and circulars are any indication. First, the RBI let loose with a salvo which said all the bad things that the finance ministry was trying to hide: no money, totally overdrawn on credit, and an economy going nowhere at all. Then, the RBI predicted doomsday, and with the recent spurt of belt-tightening measures announced by the government, it looks set to happen as soon as next year. And third, it initiated measures which grab government agencies by their shirt-collars and ask them to behave: 16 per cent lending rates to all public sector production and distribution agencies, policing the finances of financial institutions, and their operations, to boot.

In an era of backtracking and shameless evasiveness, the RBI is behaving like a country's model bank ought to. It remains to be seen how the affected outfits react, but with R.N. Malhotra around as RBI governor, they don't have a choice but to go along.

R.N. Malhotra: shoot to heal

■ Try again

Fact: Dhirubhai Ambani needs money to grow, no matter that paraxylene and Patalganga bring in lots of the stuff. Fact: Key financial institutions are unwilling to lend him any money. Fact: the situation is not about to change, unless the government itself changes. Fact: Ambani has tied up financing—of course, pending official okays—of about Rs 150 crores. But that leaves the incredible entrepreneur terribly short.

So, go to the market for another flash of the Ambani magic wand. There is talk that Reliance plans to unload a mega Rs 500 crore issue on the stock markets. But when? The markets have hit a low (see story: Come-uppance) and pickings there are dicey. But one never knows with Dhirubhai Ambani. He might just be able to convince investors that he is still a good bet—and whatever anyone might say, he actually is survival instincts and all—and fall for his line.

POLITICIAN OF THE WEEK

Madhu Dandavate

Union finance minister

● This is it. Last week, the finance minister went on TV to tell the good citizens about what they had feared for weeks but were afraid to ask: are we going to pay more? Yes, said Dandavate, a lot more. For petro-products—except for the politically crucial liquitied petroleum gas that feeds kitchens countrywide—you have to pay 25 per cent more, thanks to the Gulf crisis. And if you are a company, an extra seven per cent in taxes. But yes, we'll pull oack a bit: as you have to pay more for petroleum products, all restrictions, such as the move to curb sale of petrol and diesel, go. The finance ministry backed him up with a press note, anticipating trouble:"... the government would urge all citizens to exercise maximum restraint and contribute to the national effort to meet the situation..." The government might get lucky with its "request": we don't have a choice, good citizens, do we?

■ Bengal. Boom!

Welcome to West Bengal. Here, most things do not work, and most companies are leaving for safer pastures. But not the house of Tatas, going by chief minister Jyoti Basu's persistent wooing of the number ones. They got the Rs 3,000 crore Haldia Petrochemicals project: it is yet to take off, but that is another story. Now, it looks as if the Tatas may land another massive project: the 2,000 MW super thermal power project at Sagardighi, in Murshidabad district. The project, estimated to cost about Rs 4,000 crores, is being planned as another Tata-state government joint sector venture, a la Haldia. But this one will have a different Tata boss, going by the grapevine. Ratan Tata. As Darbari Seth appears to have had his fill with Haldia.

Ratan Tata: beautiful Bengal

It is truly surprising that the Tatas find Bengal so enticing when other entrepreneurs are thinking twice about playing ball with Basu. For them, business in Bengal equals a disastrous explosion. For the Tatas, however, it appears to signify a business boom of an entirely different kind. ●

Boot-lick business

What they most definitely don't teach at Harvard Business School

Indian businessmen and managers, as their total insignificance in the international marketplace indicates, are far from being efficient or versatile. It is just that they have learned the ropes of doing business in India.

Only, these are precisely the ropes they do not teach in Indian management schools. For an Indian entrepreneur who wants to start a large or medium-sized project (promoting a small scale unit requires an 'untaught' technology, but more of that later) the first step is usually to find a foreign collaborator. But, the netas and the babus who minutely supervise Indian industry have no faith in the Indian people. Therefore, their first requirement is that an entrepreneur acquires a foreign collaborator. And the chosen collaborator must meet with neta-babu approval. Quite unmindful of the adage that a little knowledge is a dangerous thing, they will finally choose the collaborator. Which again depends on his political hue and his 'reasonableness'.

Alas, I have never been to business school. But is the subject of how to choose a foreign collaborator taught in Indian schools of management? I doubt it.

Let us press on. Once a project promoter acquires a foreign collaborator, he runs up against a more formidable hurdle: bagging an industrial licence. This is a complex procedure which weeds out the boys from the men. All over the free world—and these days, the free world includes the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe—promoting a new project is a matter resolved between an entrepreneur and his bankers. Not so in the socialist, secular and generally holier-than-thou Republic of India. Here, the netas and babus have to get into the act. Again. And to get them to issue the all-important licence, you need to know the complex 'technology' of running the gauntlet. Which means you should not only learn about whom to pay off when, to what extent, and distinguish between effective and ersatz middle men, but also learn abject servility. Because, the discretionary powers of the lowliest babu is formidable.

Is the art of squeezing out licences from venal government officials taught in management institutes? No? Well, it should be. Because, if their future bosses know it by instinct, then graduates—not as privileged—need to be told about it.

Also, if business schools wish to impart comprehensive education, they should teach the other all-important tactic: how to stifle competition.

Then there is the fine art of getting money out of the public financial institutions. Under the nation's complex industrial licensing regulations, scrutiny by the babus of the industry and other ministries, as well as the Cabinet Committee on Economic Affairs is not enough. The entire form-filling, pleading, begging and whining ritual has to begin from scratch, to satisfy the babus of the financial institutions. Which means the merits of the project are not the final consideration. The applicant has to know the appropriate 'technology'—a mixture of tall promises, bribes, threats and servility in absolutely correct dosages.

Do the curricula of the institutes of management include instruction and/or case studies on this vital—indeed, make or break—subject? In fact, do graduates of the nation's business schools know what an industrial licence application form or a project proposal to be submitted to the financial institution looks like before leaving the portals of their institutions? I suspect not.

The Indian executive: lifestyle, yes. Ropes, no

However, the institutes do impart instruction in production, finance and marketing management. But these subjects are not very important in the Indian context. Because, so well protected is Indian industry from external and internal competition, that there is an eager market for whatever is produced—price and quality hardly matter. (Come to think of it, the smugglers' trade is doing the consumer a favour: if it was not for the ubiquitous smuggler there would be no attempt to upgrade the quality of swadeshi goods.)

Are things better for small-scale entrepreneurs? Hardly. Perhaps worse. They are set upon by state government officials, inspectors, and a collapsed judicial system. They too have to learn the 'technology' of robbing the consumer to pay off the local netas, babus and inspectors. I doubt if the schools of business management acquaint students with the subtle art of keeping lumpen politicians and grasping, envious bureaucrats and inspectors in good humour.

All this is not to say that a management education is without value. As is becoming increasingly clear, even to business-illiterate politicians and babus, industrial and economic growth is almost impossible in such a perverse business environment. This is why the process of liberalising the Indian economy—however slow—has begun. This means that over a period of time the disciplines of business management will become increasingly relevant.

Meanwhile, however, it might be useful to pay some attention to the more vital aspects of managing a business in contemporary India. ●

Chalo, Ayodhya!

On the road with Advani's rath yatra

It is many things all at once. On the face of it, it is a DCM-Toyota van which has been rather tastelessly dressed up as a chariot. To the ordinary Hindu villager—who waits for hours at the roadside for a glimpse—it is God's own rath, an object of awe and reverence. To the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP), it is the vehicle to launch what party president L.K. Advani called "the biggest mass movement in the history of the country". And to the Muslims and the secular-minded, it represents the greatest threat to communal harmony in this country.

Last week, when a visibly elated L.K. Advani drove into Delhi, in the manner of a courageous, if ageing charioteer, he completed the first leg of his 10,000 km Somnath to Ayodhya rath yatra. Contrary to widespread rumours, the BJP president was not arrested on his arrival at the capital. And as he rode in, tired but triumphant, Advani warned the government as he has been doing right through his journey: "You may be able to stop this rath. But you will never be able to prevent this mass movement from achieving its objective."

It is a journey that has taken him through Gujarat, Maharashtra, Karnataka, Andhra, Madhya Pradesh, Rajasthan and Haryana. But it is the next leg—where the rath is due to travel through Bihar and Uttar Pradesh—that will rivet a nation that has already turned its eyes towards Ayodhya and has its attention fixed on 30 October. If Advani and the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP)—which is planning to stage many yatras which will converge on Ayodhya on that date—have their way, then work will begin on the contentious Ram Janmabhoomi Temple.

With the Imam of Delhi's Jama Masjid calling on the Muslims to stop the rath and Uttar Pradesh's Mulayam Singh Yadav swearing that he will not allow Advani and his VHP friends into Ayodhya, the battlelines have been already drawn. The risk of large-scale violence if the situation comes to a head needs no exaggerating. But Advani—even as those around him chant Kasam Ram ki kathe hain/ Mandir wohin banayenge'—claims that he holds out the hope for an amicable settlement. "The government can still find a solution to this problem," he says. "Any agreement it reaches with the VHP is acceptable to me."

The response to the yatra—despite large sections of the press having, perhaps right-mindedly, played it down—has been very impressive. Largely, this is a consequence of the religious air that attends the journey. Advani admits as much. "Many of the people that crowded the roadsides to welcome this rath hadn't either heard of me or the BJP," he keeps telling the audience modestly in his speeches. "They came out of sentiment for Lord Ram."

Of all the states that Advani travelled through, it was in Rajasthan that he received the most tumultuous reception. At Ajmer, which Advani reached on the evening of 12 October, the yatra's route into the city was illuminated with a brightness that would overshadow a Diwali festival. "Just look at the city...It is like a mela," exclaims the BJP's O.S. Lakhawat.

During his public address at Daulathag in the city, Advani was the most restrained of the speakers, most of who were blatantly inflammatory. The BJP's Rajya Sabha MP, Pramod Mahajan, who has accompanied Advani all the way from Somnath and is responsible for overseeing the yatra was at its rabble-rousing best. "Are you children of Babur or Ram, Akbar or Rana Pratap, Aurangzeb or Shivaji?" he thunders. "Those who do not answer this question properly have no right to be in this country."

Advani—as he was in his addresses elsewhere—was relatively more moderate. Much of his speech—the text of which remains pretty much the same right through the trip—was devoted to arguing why the best solution to the Masjid-Mandir tangle lies in shifting the former to a nearby site.

To the apparent displeasure of some of the more extreme elements in the crowd, he criticised those youth who had been raising slogans which threatened the destruction of the mosque. (Ek dhakka aur do/Babri Masjid tod do.) The plea that the Masjid must not be destroyed at any cost is made at all his major addresses. "In India, many temples have been destroyed to build mosques. But let there not be a single case of a mosque being destroyed to build a temple," he says.

The turnout at Jaipur was even more impressive. The crowd that thronged the street was so large that the rath took a good two hours to reach Tripolia Gate, the venue for the speech. According to one estimate, there were a staggering four lakh people out on the roads that day. Said one harassed police official; "I have never seen anything like this in Jaipur and I hope I never will."

It was as if the Hindu population in the city was celebrating a mela. Makeshift gateways, banners and posters lined the yatra route. There were BJP, VHP and Bajrang Dal members on the roads dispensing puffed rice, channa and water to anyone who wanted them. As the rath drove in, there were deafening cries of "Jai Sri Ram" and that favourite yatra slogan, "Bachcha, bachcha Ram ka, Janmabhoomi ke kam ka". During his speech, Advani admitted that he hadn't received a better welcome than that in Jaipur, leading state chief minister Bhairon Singh Shekhawat—who shared the podium—to look as pleased as punch.

In Delhi, the extent of the religious fervour that attended much of the Rajasthan trip was missing. All the same, an estimated two lakh people poured on to the yatra's route shouting slogans, waving trishuls and showering the rath with rose petals and marigolds. "No leader has ever received such a tumultuous welcome," claimed Delhi BJP chief Madanlal Khurana who rode the festooned chariot along with Advani, Dr J.K. Jain and other leaders.

Giant arches marked the whole route and in the relatively more affluent colonies in west Delhi, the BJP and its suporters erected fancy shamianas, distributed apples and bananas and even lined the roadside with chairs. Religious songs blared through ubiquitous loudspeakers as Advani greeted the crowds with folded hands and Khurana kept up a constant stream of BJP rhetoric.

At almost every major intersection, there was frenetic dancing accompanied by whistles, war-cries and slogans that ranged from the relatively harmless to the blatantly incendiary. A sample of the latter: "Masjid todo/ Mandir banao" (Demolish the masjid/ Build a temple); "Jab jab Hindu jaga hai/desh se mullah baga hai" (Whenever the Hindus have arisen/the country's Muslims have fled); "Jo roke mandir nirman/Usko bhejo Pakistan" (Whoever stops the construction of the temple/He should be sent to Pakistan).

On the same day, Advani addressed a press conference where he adopted his typically soft and persuasive tone. "The rath yatra had nothing to do with either the Hindu-Muslim conflict or the Mandir/Masjid issues," he said. Rather, that it was concerned with issues such as nationalism and secularism. Advani claimed that he was pained by the reports in the press that his yatra had contributed to communal tension. "On the contrary, we have contributed to the easing or removal of tensions in all the states we visited," he said.

Khurana, however, was more blunt. "New Delhi's eyes should be opened now to what the people in the country want. Who will dare stop the yatra now?" As the rath prepares to leave Delhi in the coming week this is a question that will be uppermost in many people's minds. •

"The yatra will go on"

L.K. ADVANI sees no reason to call off his march to Ayodhya

INTERVIEWED BY MUKUND PADMANABHAN

SUNDAY: Do you hold out any hopes for a compromise on the Babri Masjid/Ram Janmabhoomi issue before 30 October?
L.K. Advani: I have always been hopeful After all, it is not such an intractable problem that it cannot be resolved. I see no reason why the suggestion I have been publicly making—that the masjid be relocated—shouldn't be accepted.

Q: But the government refuses to accept this. Will you call off the rath yatra for anything less?
A: I am of the view that all these matters have been debated and discussed by the Vishwa Hindu Parishad with the government—both this one and the one before. I have never been in the picture and I don't want to come into it. I am not at all keen. If any proposal is acceptable to both parties, then I have no objection.

Q: But what is your stance? That you will go to Ayodhya in the absence of an agreement?
A: Yes. There is no reason why the yatra should be discontinued. Everyone who has appealed or threatened me (to call off the yatra) has had no reason to do so but for the fact that the point of view I represent has suddenly acquired enormous public support. It is only this which leads them to say that my rath yatra is creating communal tensions. This has no basis.

Q: Will you be prepared to call it off in the event of a serious communal riot?
A: I don't see why this should happen. There is already tension in the situation for which I have no solutions. This yatra is contributing to the relieving of the tension. This is the impact everywhere. But the people of Delhi are upset because they feel that they are being forced to change the status quo (on the Babri Masjid/Ram Janmabhoomi dispute). Or at least consider doing so.

Q: If your rath yatra is forcibly stopped by the government, will you consider withdrawing support?
A: What has that to do with this? It would be for the party to consider. I do not want to relate my rath yatra with support for the government.

I am more concerned with the government's attitude to the issue as such. This is a symbolic issue. Even in my speeches, I have said that the issue has become a symbol of a certain approach to problems such as national unity, secularism and communalism

Q: But in your speeches, you have also obliquely threatened to withdraw support if the government stops the rath?
A: There is no question of threat. I do not have to threaten the government. It is the ground reality which has to make the government realise that my viewpoint cannot be treated with contempt.

Further, this question has been raised all through the last nine or ten months. I was asked this the moment I said that the withdrawal of Jagmohan from Kashmir was a monumental blunder. My consistent answer to this question is that we had reservations even when we decided to support this government. Just three weeks before our party took the decision, the leader of the Janata Dal refused to go on a platform in support of his own candidate because the BJP flag was flying there. So, the decision was taken after due deliberation. And if there is any change, it has to be done with due deliberation.

Q: You disagree with the government on a number of issues which you hold very important—Kashmir, Ram Janmabhoomi, the Mandal report and so on. Isn't it odd that you continue to support the government? Where are you going to draw the line?
A: It may well seem odd, but the day we decided to support the government, I had been telling my colleagues that this is a very difficult task, a very difficult role.

As for me, I would have been very happy to sit in the Opposition without having to do anything. When I decided to support this government, it was only to honour the people's mandate, which was clearly anti-Congress, which was clearly in favour of change. It was not because I had particularly high hopes of the government. Moreover, on issues that concerned me directly, this government is on the other side of the fence.

But a very mature, well-considered decision was taken after weighing all the pros and cons. So, if there is to be a change in the situation, it has to be duly considered. This is a consistent stand I have taken.

Q: Your party has been promising all along that if it came to power it would do things for the Hindus, redress historical injustices and so on. Now that the BJP is in power in a few states and is more than capable of influencing the Centre, what has it done for the Hindus in these last nine months or so?
A: I have never spoken in these terms. These are attributed to me. I have always said that all the problems that the party has taken a stand on, have been taken in the national interest. And not in terms of the interests of the Hindus as a group.

But all the governments till now have been reacting to Hindu sentiments in a manner that has hurt the Hindu psyche very badly. This has impaired national unity and has also hurt the interests of the minorities.

A sea change has come over political thinking in the last 40 years. And I hold that it is extremely damaging to national harmony. It is just pseudo-secularism or minorityism. And these euphemistic terms for pandering to the minority vote-bank

Q: And it is OK to pander to the majority vote-bank?
A: You don't pander to the majority vote-bank. Everyone in public life knows that Hindu society is not monolithic to constitute a vote-bank. It is therefore treated with so much contempt.

Otherwise, you wouldn't have a person like Mulayam Singh Yadav speaking as he does. He be-

"It is not such an intractable problem that it cannot be resolved. I see no reason why the Babri Masjid should not be relocated" lieves that Hindu society is inclined to think in terms of caste and language.

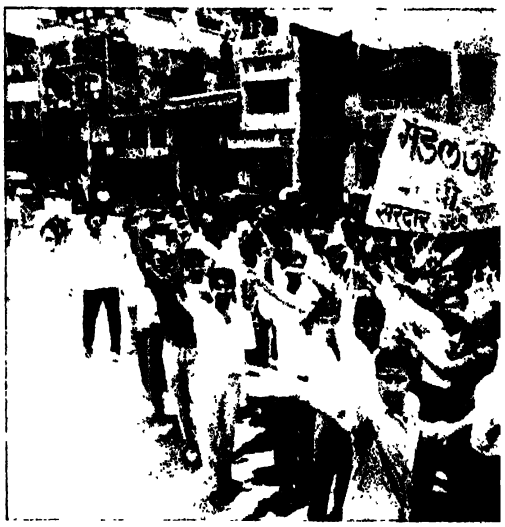
Q: But isn't it exactly because Hindu society is not monolithic that you are using the Ram Janmabhoomi issue as a rallying point?
A: Even if I were to accept that charge, I would not think that trying to make 85 per cent of the people rise above narrow political loyalties or think in terms of 85 per cent of the people is going to weaken the country. On the other hand, it is going to strengthen it.

Q: At the cost of the other 15 per cent?
A: No, not at the cost. Even on the Ram Janmabhoomi issue, I have been specifically stressing again and again that I do not want the Babri mosque to be broken. I do not want this. I would feel very unhappy if this was to happen.

Q: Your approach to the Ram Janmabhoomi issue seems odd for the following reason. On the one hand, you say that the dispute cannot be resolved by the courts because it involves 'deep', 'religious' or 'transcendental' sentiments. At the same time, you talk of a deal—that is if the Muslims were to give up their claim on the Babri Masjid, then the Hindus will give up their claims on a couple of disputed monuments, one of them being Krishna Janmabhoomi at Mathura.

A: I would like to make it clear that I'm in no position to offer a deal. Because this whole movement is led by the VHP. If I keep stressing the Ram Janmabhoomi issue, it is because it is an issue with which my party is directly concerned, because we have adopted a resolution (on it). We have not adopted any resolution with respect to any other place - one place only. I said that if the Muslim leadership and Muslim society were to agree to this, then it would be a big, monumental step in the direction of national harmony.



Q: My question is how an issue involving religious sentiment can be the subject of a deal if it cannot be a subject for the courts.
A: It's not a deal. And if it is a deal, then there is nothing wrong about it. But it will depend on the people concerned.

Q: But if you hold this position, then it leads to the conclusion that Ram's birthplace is more important than Krishna's.
A: No. It is not. Why is it that even though there are thousands of (disputed) places, the VHP talks of only three places? It specifically says that we are interested in three symbolic places—Varanasi, Mathura and Ayodhya.

Q: Then, you are more interested in one than the others?
A: No, I am not. I am interested in national harmony. And I feel that if in 1986, the Babri Masjid Action Committee had not been formed, then the Ayodhya issue would not have acquired this present dimension.

MAHESH JETHMALANI

Why I support Mandal

Try reading the report before criticising it

I must confess that before preparing for the subject-matter of this column, I was virulently anti-Mandal. I realise now that that was partly because of a pronounced libertarian make-up, conditioned in turn by a liberal Western education, the pursuit of a conservative discipline like law and residence in a highly competitive society, such as the urban life of Bombay constitutes. For me, the constitutional mandate of equality before the law was consistent only with a strict meritocracy. My convictions were fortified by the trenchant and near-hysterical criticism of Mandal in a section of the press and, particularly, by news of the immolation of students in protest against Mandal.

I then proceeded to read from cover to cover the Mandal Commission Report, relevant provisions of our Constitution dealing with reservation, pronouncements of our Supreme Court concerning reservation and the plethora of outpourings in the press both for and against Mandal. I discovered to my amazement that much of the criticism against the Mandal report was either uninformed or politically motivated. I also discovered that the best answer to the criticism against Mandal was contained in the report itself, in our constitutional provisions and in the Supreme Court judgements.

First, as to the criticism about the principle of reservation itself. Our Constitution recognises reservation through Articles 15(4) and 16(4) which are exceptions to the main provisions of those articles dealing with prohibition of discrimination by the states on grounds of religion, race, caste, etc. and equality of opportunity in matters of public employment, respectively. Several states have introduced reservation not only for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes but for Other Backward Classes (OBCs) as well. The Mandal Commission itself was appointed in accordance with Article 340 of the Constitution, and its recommendations were made in accordance with the provisions of that Article.

The argument against reservation, however, is founded on moral grounds. It is suggested that the policy of reservation is unfair, particularly to those who are excluded from the reserved quota, since it is at odds with equality of treatment of all citizens. This argument totally ignores the goals which a policy of reservation seeks to achieve. In the first place, reservation is aimed at remedying historical injustice. The policy recognises that in India there has been a history of invidious treatment to certain ascertainable classes, which has resulted in these classes carrying in the present the accumulated disabilities of the past. Secondly, the policy recognises that formal equality of all citizens guaranteed by the Constitution, requires to be made substantial in practice by eliminating prejudices against historically discriminated groups that may have become entrenched in the process of selection to jobs and which accordingly perpetuate the result of earlier discrimination. Thirdly, the policy aims at national integration, in that, it seeks to bring within the power structure groups which had hitherto been excluded because of social discrimination, and accordingly give them a stake in the system.

The second criticism is directed on the criterion of caste as the basis for reservation. According to this criticism, reservations based on caste militate against the goal of a casteless society, accentuate caste consciousness, inject caste into politics and accordingly, perpetuate the caste system. The students who have immolated themselves are apparently martyrs in the cause of a casteless society. This criticism is specious in the ex-

The rhetoric of opportunist politicians has plunged the country into a caste war. Pro and anti-reservation agitators clash, without bothering to read the Mandal report and understand its implications treme and should be viewed with considerable scepticism. There are a number of answers to it.

Firstly, Mandal did not create caste: caste is a glaring fact of Indian social life, particularly in the rural areas. The Constitution abolished untouchability but did not abolish the caste system. The law permits caste associations and several of them exist with varying degrees of membership in several parts of the country including highly industrialised centres. They have come into existence as pressure groups whose aim is to lobby for greater benefits for members of their caste. Their very existence—apart from their activities—enhances caste consciousness.

In any event, no one who has cared to read the Mandal report could ever suggest that the Commission recommended caste per se as a basis for reservation. The terms of reference for the Mandal Commission were defined by Article 340 of the Constitution. Article 340 seeks to ameliorate the condition of "socially and educationally backward classes". The Commission did not blindly recommend that the castes which it identified in the report were socially and educationally backward. After using as large a data-base as possible, including reports of the Tata Institute of Social Sciences, Anthropological Survey of India, the Indian Council of Social Science Research, the National Labour Institute, the Centre for Study of Developing Societies, the Institute of Economic Growth, the Indian Law Institute; after conducting extensive field surveys and research; and after formulating and applying 11 indicators of backwardness, the Commission identified these castes, which it considered to be socially and educationally backward. In other words, the Mandal Commission used caste as a unit for the sake of convenience, recognising thereby two factors.

(i) that the members of a caste tend to share a common level of opportunities and resources, and

(ii) that social and educational backwardness is the result of a hierarchical caste system in which some groups were assigned low status and deprived of advantages.

The Supreme Court itself has recognised that caste is also a class of citizens. In a 1968 decision on reservations, the Court observed that "if a caste as a whole is socially and educationally backward, reservation can be made in favour of such a caste on the ground that it was a socially, educationally backward class of citizens within the meaning of Article 15(4)". In 1971, the Court went a step further when it observed: "If after collecting the necessary data, it is found that the caste as a whole is socially and educationally backward, in our opinion, the reservation made for such persons will have to be upheld, notwithstanding the fact that a few individuals in that group may be both socially and educationally above the general average".

Mandal did not create caste: caste is a glaring fact of Indian social life. The Constitution abolished untouchability but did not abolish the caste system

The criticism which focuses on caste can accordingly be dismissed as stemming from gross ignorance about both our social realities and our constitutional development. Moreover, its very ignorance lends credence that it is in addition motivated. While it rests its case on an ostensibly altruistic platform—avoiding a caste divide in the country—as a matter of fact, it exploits the odium attached to caste in a modern society, only to deny redistributive justice to the downtrodden castes.

Then, there is the criticism that some of the castes identified by the Mandal Commission Report, are not in fact socially and educationally backward. This is tantamount to merely saying that there are some errors in the report pertaining to identification. Surely, such a criticism does not vitiate the entire report of the Commission?

Some quarters have suggested that instead of caste as a basis for reservation, the criterion should have been economic. Several political parties have emphasised this as a more appropriate criterion. The suggestion is totally misconceived on at least three grounds.

Firstly, Article 15(4) which permits reservation and Article 340 under which the Mandal Commission was appointed refer to socially and educationally backward classes. Both the Articles do not refer to economic backwardness. The rationale behind theArticles is obviously that social and educational backwardness is a much more pernicious problem in Indian society than poverty, and that it was low caste status and lack of education that in fact led to perpetual impoverishment. Secondly, the Supreme Court has in two decisions categorically asserted that reservation based only on the economic criterion, that is, poverty levels and annual income of families, were not determinants of social and educational backwardness. Thirdly, the Mandal Commission in assessing social and educational backwardness gave due weightage to economic indicia. It can be safely assumed, therefore, that the identified castes, apart from satisfying the social and educational backwardness test, also satisfy the economic deprivation criteria.

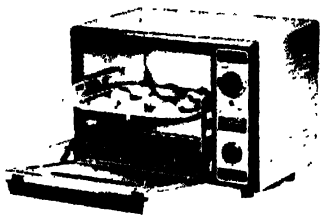
This brings us to the last argument against the Mandal Commission Report. The report itself, it is suggested, is unassailable; but the method and timing of its implementation by the present regime is dubious in the extreme and leads to an irresistible inference that the implementation was politically motivated. This criticism has been chanted like a 'mantra' ad nauseum by every politician and pressman hostile to the present Prime Minister.

The Mandal Commission Report has been in existence for 10 years. It constituted a part of the Janata Dal's manifesto. The present Prime Minister can hardly be faulted if rival political parties have not educated themselves or their supporters about the contents of the reports. Indeed, on so momentous an issue, it was incumbent upon all responsible political leaders to initiate a political dialogue from the time the report became public. Their failure to do so reflects a marked disinterest in the welfare of the backward classes.

One cannot but grieve for the unfortunate students who immolated themselves. If only they had cared to read the report, the nation might have been spared the tragedy of their brave but misconceived acts

It has been said that the motives of the Prime Minister in implementing the Mandal Commission Report were to counter the BJP's strategy of consolidating the Hindu vote through Ram Janmabhoomi.



The BJP stand on the Mandal Commission Report is ambivalent. In Maharashtra, the party strongly supports its implementation. So does at least one MP from Rajasthan, Mr Nathu Singh, according to whom "Mandal is here to stay and V.P. Singh has achieved a revolution". Besides, one cannot understand why a party which seeks the unity of Hindu society would balk at the implementation of the Mandal report. Surely, there is no better way of bringing about Hindu integration than by the privileged Hindu castes championing the cause of their less fortunate brethren. Indeed, the BJP seems to have been presented with a golden opportunity to once and for all silence the traditional criticism that it is a party of the status quo dominated by caste Hindus. It ought to grasp the opportunity with both hands and whole-heartedly support reservations.

One cannot but grieve for the unfortunate students who immolated themselves in the belief that by their sacrifice they would avert a fratricidal caste war. Their belief was undoubtedly influenced by the rhetoric of opportunist politicians and by the tendentious editorials of politically motivated scribes posing as crusaders for the cause of a casteless society. If only they had cared to read the Mandal Commission Report and the Indian Constitution, the nation might have been spared the tragedy of their brave but misconceived acts. •

CUT!

Students and the faculty at Pune's film institute are tired of government indifference and an insensitive director

If one walks into the Film and Television Institute of India campus in Pune, the impression is one of complete peace and contentment in idyllic, wooded surroundings.

It is deceptive.

The students have a hunted expression on their faces, and a deep-rooted cynicism has replaced the enthusiasm that once characterised the institute. Once a haven for aspiring actors and film-makers, the FTII, as the institute is better known, is languishing from a lack of funds, absence of policy, and, say FTII students and alumni, administrative disinterest. Besides, they complain that the very purpose of establishing what is considered to be Asia's premier film institute is diluted when the information and broadcasting (I&B) ministry views it merely as a training school for Doordarshan and Films Division technicians—and not a melting pot of creativity. A fate that mirrors the state of India's other "cultural" bastions.

Trouble erupted last year, with a three-month long strike, and has since refused to dissipate. There has always been some unrest in the FTII's 29-year history, but never before have the students displayed such a defeatist attitude. "It is as if the institute has contracted a deep-rooted disease," says a student, as he lounges under the 'wisdom tree', a mango tree which is a popular meeting place on campus. "What bothers us most," says the student, who declines to be identified, "is that there is no change in sight, nobody really cares enough to stem the rot."

Over the last two years, FTII students have done almost all they could to highlight their problems—boycotted classes, demonstrated at international film festivals, asked for help from influential alumni such as Shyam Benegal (who is directly involved as chairman of the FTII governing council), Mani Kaul, Kumar Shahani and Saeed Mirza, among others. Students say that Kaul and Shahani have been virtually banned from entering the campus because, allegedly, they instigate students.

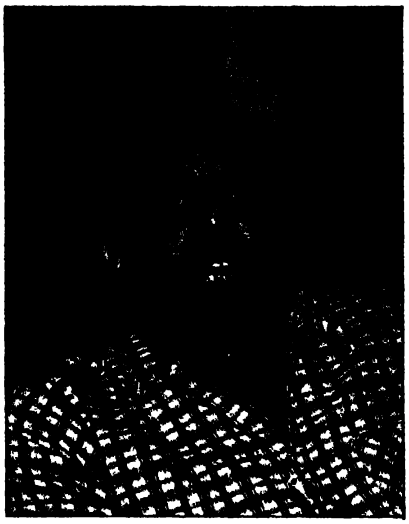
The students say they were optimistic that the new government would solve their problems. But nine months have passed since I&B minister P. Upendra promised to visit FTII, at a time when all students can think about is being shortchanged on government commitments.

Besides, it does not help to have a director who students mistrust. In fact, it is a feeling closer to hatred. K.G. Varma is an Indian Administrative Services officer, someone, say students, who is so bureaucratic and blind to creative pursuits that problems cannot be solved till he is removed. "Varma is a mean-minded man," says K. Vinayan, president of the FTII students union, "not an academic head. It's the rule of autocracy here, and everybody, including the staff, lives in dread of the director." In addition, say students, they feel intimidated by the 27 security guards prowling around the campus, keeping a tab on everything that is going on.

Director Varma admits that such reports reach him everyday. In a post-graduate institution, it seems a little bizarre that the head should want to know which student sat where and with whom till what time of the night. But Varma makes out as if he does this for the security and well-being of his flock. "I have never taken action based on these reports," he defends himself, a little awkwardly. "So what is wrong with them (security measures)?" Nothing, one might say, but even visitors to the campus are not spared Varma's somewhat paranoid espionage. While he sits in his room, holds his head in his hands, and says forlornly that he cannot figure out how his relationship with the students has soured so drastically.

FTII students on a film-making exercise: problems, and more problems

"There is nothing seriously wrong with the institute," he says with some bravado. As he tells it, the administration was in a mess when he took over as director in November 1986. "There was a low morale situation," says Varma. "Nothing was working." He adds: "I set a lot right."



Students, however, disagree. They complain that their creative freedom has been curtailed with a set of draconian laws. For example, one that forbids them to shoot on campus for filming exercises. Certain parts of the campus are out of bounds for "security reasons", says Varma, but declines to elaborate.

Students do not have access to on-campus video cassette recorders to do their private study viewing. Varma rationalises this by saying that if students are allowed to watch films outside their course hours, they will not do much else, and waste their time. "Watching films is a very tiring activity," he says. "It is like telling students that they will not have access to a library because they will spend all their time reading fiction," says Linus, a student. "Watching films is very important for us."

Students also allege that Varma has used institute facilities to amass an impressive, private video tape collection. "This is an unfair allegation," says the director. "When I came here, I already had a personal video library. My interest in films goes back a long time—in fact, I allowed students to borrow films from me, films like, Taxi Driver, Raging Bull, Apocalypse Now that they didn't have access to otherwise." Very unlikely: the FTII has almost all movies in its library, the most comprehensive collection in the country.

"I have done my best," says Varma. "And all I've got is abuse...I would love to get away from here"

Varma has also antagonised the faculty. Some members allege that the director favours staffers who kowtow to him, granting them prized foreign trips, among other things. But some academics, such as Suresh Chhabria, a FTII professor for film appreciation course, do not allow Varma to interfere. Chhabria admits that sometimes he bypasses the director to deal directly with the governing council, to ensure that his area of work does not suffer as a result of institute politics. He says Varma has tried to do away with the course—citing budget constraints—but he goes on with his work, regardless.

Here, while most faculty members agree that many campus problems stem from Varma's worldview, Surendar Chowdhary, professor of film direction—and from FTII's class of 1971—believes that it is wrong to blame it all on a personality clash. Despite the fact that from all accounts, he has serious differences with Varma, but stubbornly refuses to admit it. "We must dream the future afresh,"he says idealistically. Adding: "Budget constraints are a part of life today."

As if on cue, Varma rants about how students are being taught almost for free. "Our costs have gone up from Rs 50,000 to Rs five lakhs a month," he says, "but fees have remained at Rs 100 a semester, since the institute's inception." This comment leads to student outrage. "He pretends we are orphans being brought up," says one. "If we are entitled to government subsidies, it is because we are serving a purpose."

Varma insists that students are on the warpath because he has tried to instill some discipline at FTII. He agrees that a review of activities is overdue, but refuses to accept that budget constraints have in any way jeopardised the training and facilities provided to students. "I have done my best," he stresses, "and all I have got is abuse." Varma says he will continue in office till mid-1991 "due to personal reasons". He adds: "Otherwise, I would love to get away from here. The atmosphere here is terrible. There are threats to kidnap, even kill my family. How do you think I feel about this?"

Students under the "wisdom tree": decrying nonsensical policy

From numerous accounts, Varma himself is to blame for the unsavoury atmosphere. "If one person is causing so much trouble," says a noted Bombay film-maker, "I fail to understand why the government cannot replace him." He may have a point. But the thing is, the FTII is a long way from New Delhi. And culture is a long way from the Centre's current preoccupations. Besides, the way things are, will the situation change once Varma leaves? Till he does, there is no way to find out. ●

SHANKAR NAG (1954-1990)

If you asked Shankar Nag's friends to describe him, the two most commonly used adjectives would have been "restless" and "enthusiastic". In the end, it was perhaps these two qualities—which endeared many to the talented and popular actor-director—that were most in evidence on that fateful night of 30 September. Nag, who had gone to bed completely exhausted, had decided against attending the mahurat of Jokumaraswamy — the Girish Karnad-directed film that he was both producer and lead actor of. But in the middle of the night, he woke up—restless at first and then enthusiastic about making the journey to distant Bijapur district, where the mahurat was to be held. He asked his wife to pack, picked up their six-year-old daughter and left Bangalore at about 2.30 am. But, as fate would have it, Nag was killed when his car collided head-on with a truck on the Bangalore-Pune highway. His wife was gravely injured in the accident, but his daughter providentially escaped.

The measure of Nag's popularity in the state was evident when thousands of grieving fans thronged his recording studio and his house to pay their last respects. Lamps were lit and his photographs garlanded even in remote parts of Karnataka. It was as if the state was mourning more than just the passing away of a star—but a unique personality, whose zest for life and unaffected ways struck a chord with the people. Says journalist Y.N. Krishnamurthy, who Nag credited with moulding his career: "He had a remarkable knack for making people he worked with feel at ease and at the same time extracting the best work from them."

Nag made his debut as a film actor 12 years ago after he was offered the lead role in a film made by his mentor Girish Karnad. Nag told Karnad that he would rather be assistant director, but when the latter persisted, Nag agreed to do the role. Apart from establishing himself as an actor, his performance in Ondaanondu Kaladalli fetched him the Silver Peacock award.

Nag had no apparent difficulty in making the transition from art to popular cinema. Although the director of his first commercial film Seetha Rāmu had trouble with teaching him how to dance and play the conventional hero, the film was a hit and launched Nag as one of the top stars of Kannada cinema. After that he was as comfortable gallivanting round bushes with heroines or bashing a baddie in as performing in an off-beat film.

When he found that the role of a star was limiting, he took to directing. His first venture Minchina Ota—which he also starred in—won him a number of awards, but failed at the box-office. So did the next four which followed in close succession, though each of them won critical acclaim. The best film he directed was easily Accident, which had a political theme woven around it. It added a national award to his list but, typically, left an even bigger hole in his pocket.

All this while, he kept his interest in theatre going. Nag, who had been closely associated with Hindi, Marathi and Gujarati theatre before he took to films, never left the stage. Sanket, the theatre group he formed along with his wife Arundathi and his brother Anant Nag (also a film actor) has many memorable productions to its credit. A few years ago, he took to television—making that memorable 39-episode serial Malgudi Days and then following it up with Swamy And Friends and The Vendor Of Sweets. Nag's short association with television won him a larger following and enhanced his reputation as a man of many parts.

Nag was also something of a dreamer. Among the various schemes that he had in mind were the erection of a ropeway up Nandi Hills (a picnic spot near Bangalore), the creation of a circular railway around the city and the setting up of a large garment manufacturing unit. One dream that did translate into reality was, of course, the Country Club. Launched in August this year, the holiday resort was built on 15 acres of land on the outskirts of Bangalore. His other ideas are at various stages of implementation.

Because of his varied interests, Nag was always a man in a hurry. "I used to keep telling him to slow down," recalls brother Anant. "But he would always reply that this was the time to work and that relaxation could come later." But knowing Nag, he was unlikely to have ever eased up. It was his zeal for work that shaped his personality—gave him that endless energy, that infectious charm. The air of a man who didn't just live but was alive. ●

Gloss and sheen

A new photographer sparkles on both sides of the lens

In film-crazy Bombay, her only identity had been that of director Ramesh (Sholay) Sippy's attractive daughter. And arty circles knew her as the granddaughter of painter A.J. Patel (whose pictures still hang in the New York Museum) and the daughter of Gita Patel, a painter as well though not quite so significant. Not any more. Today, at 24, Sheena Sippy has carved out an identity for herself. She is Bombay's brightest up-and-coming photographer, who promises to change the way pictures are seen and understood in the glamour city. And elsewhere.

With her father in films and a grandfather credited with opening the first colour film centre in Bombay, cameras weren't a novelty as far as Sheena was concerned. "I never discovered the camera," she discloses. "I always had it around me. I just discovered my passion for it."

A passion which led her to train informally with celebrated fashion photographer Gautam Rajadhyaksha, on one of her vacations home from Michigan University. She didn't just get clued in on such technicalities as lighting, but also learnt how best one could put one's subject at ease.

The training came in useful when Sheena began work on her first assignment: a photo-session (in black and white only) with noted industrialist J.R.D. Tata. Then followed shoots with Pakistani cricketer Imran Khan and megastar Amitabh Bachchan, who proved to be her most enthusiastic subject yet. Recounts Sippy with a laugh: "He went totally wild, stuck out his tongue, rolled up his eyes, cocked his head and did a Bill Cosby number for me."

Her first byline, however, appeared with a glamour picture of Sonu Walia in Filmfare. "The photograph was spalshed over an entire page and I was glad to see it," Sheena enthuses.

Next on the cards were a Debonair cover with model Rhea Pillai, a photo-feature with music maestro Pandit Jasraj and a stint with Meher Jesia underwater for the fashion magazine Glad Rags. The latter assignment provided some laughs when Sheena was featured on a Doordarshan talk show with several other photographers. The interviewer asked earnestly: "Why did you shoot Meher Jesia underwater?"

Bored beyond measure by the contrived sincerity of all the participants, a nonchalant Sippy shot back: "Why not?"

This, apparently, was not the answer the interviewer was looking for and she persisted.

By now quite irritated with the way things were going, Sippy replied: "Because it was hot!"

"I never discovered the camera," Sheena discloses. "I always had it around me. I just discovered my passion for it"

She confesses: "I don't think they liked me very much."

But her subjects do. The village women she shot in Rajasthan, for instance. "They were so colourful, yet so shy," she reminisces excitedly. "They danced for me, told me about their lives." And Sippy learnt a lot more when she travelled all over India, looking for picture possibilities. Raves Sheena: "Rajasthan, Goa, what places, what movement, even in a barber's shop."

Street photography, however, is not all there is to Sheena. She's done a fair bit of work for the ad agencies, too: The Garden Vareli ads for Ambience and some shots for the Vadilal account for Enterprise agency. But while it was exciting to see her work in print, the payments left Sippy cold. "Payment?" she mocks. "I think you should run a laughter track over that question. Though, sometimes you do get lucky."

Among Sippy's forthcoming projects is a film—she's not Ramesh Sippy's daughter for nothing—Pathar Ke Phool with Salman Khan in the lead. "I want to give the film a new look," she says earnestly, "a new identity."

That's not all. For, Sheena, who claims to be the non-conformist of the decade, promises to create a new-look photography as well. Her guru, she says, is Herb Ritts, of Gap clothes campaign fame, and Sippy wishes to work in his style, "so simple, yet so strong". So, Sheena's going to continue zooming in with her Nikon FM2.

Sharp as a stiletto in ice. ●

Living for the future

Dr Rustom Soonawala makes handling birth defects a little easier

"Of an 800 million population," says Dr Rustom P. Soonawala, "ten million children are born with minor or major defects. And to try and ease the trauma for to-be mothers—and their as-yet-unborn children—the well-known Bombay gynaecologist has founded the Indian Society for Prenatal Diagnosis and Therapy (ISPAT).

Basically, the organisation, which Soonawala has founded—with three other top specialists, Adi Dastur, Hema Purandare and Bharat Parekh—plans to make a largely illiterate public aware of the grey zones of pregnancy. It also expects to advise central and state government health programmes on technical and clinical aspects of foetal therapy. ISPAT will be offering awards and scholarships to Indian scientists and doctors, in an attempt to promote prenatal diagnosis, and ultimately, to check infant mortality.

Says Dr Soonawala, "We'd like parents to know that if a pregnancy poses a problem which cannot be altered and will grossly affect the child, it should be terminated. But we can only counsel."

"Pardon me, for this may seem most unclinical," says Soonawala, smiling, "but we doctors do get involved with the pregnancy. She, the mother, that is, places her trust in us. She starts coming here (to Pashmina, Soonawala's clinic on central Bombay's Peddar Road), she calls up if she has any pain as the baby starts forming. Even the clinic staff gets involved." And then, says the doctor, when the baby is born with defects, the parents and clinic staff feel terrible about it.

"I question myself," says Soonawala. "Did I do right? Why didn't I diagnose it properly? Should I have terminated the pregnancy?" For the parents it is definitely a nightmare, says the gynaecologist, and to assist them in facing social stigma—the unfortunate but all-too-true by-product of a child born with defects—is another ISPAT function.

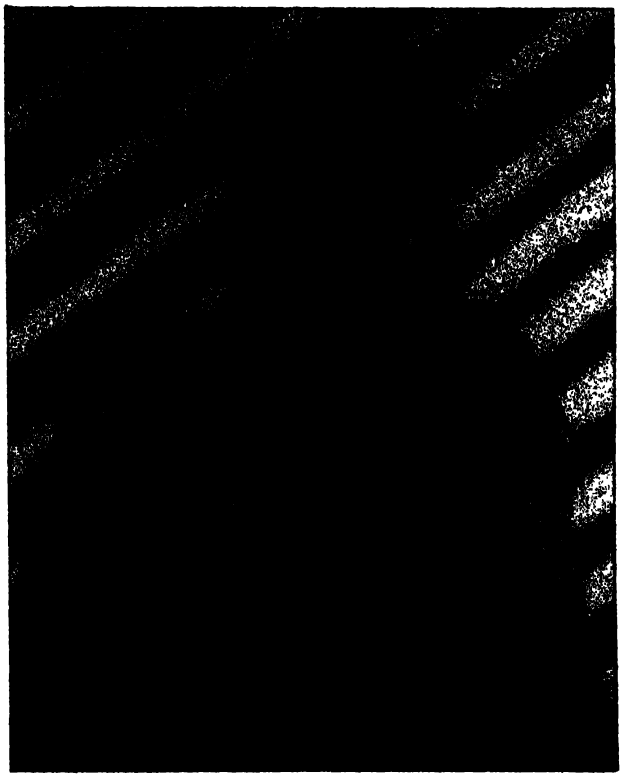
Soonawala says that he and his colleagues would like people to know that childbirth from a late marriage, today's fast deteriorating environment, and often, lack of basic nutrition in the mother's case can cause a fatal pregnancy. Certainly for the child, and in extreme cases, for the mother. "We'd even like them to know," says Soonawala, "that if a pregnancy poses a problem which cannot be altered and which will grossly affect the child, it should be terminated." He adds: "But we can only counsel. The ethics of the medical profession allow us informative counselling, not directive counselling. It is upto the couple. Sadly, because of certain religious beliefs, mothers wish to go ahead with it (the pregnancy)."

ISPAT found that it could push through with some of its public awareness intention last month, at the first international meet on foetal therapy in Bombay. Top specialists from around the world attended—Italy's Bruno Bambati, Guy Besley from the UK and Yves Oumez from France, among others—to discuss current international trends on foetal therapy. The good thing was that admission was thrown open to the public.

While that helped in the awareness campaign, it also helped bring in money. Soonawala says ISPAT received 150 donations—tax-free for both the giver and the taker. One businessman, Yoginder Mafatlal, sent over a cheque for Rs 1.5 lakhs right away. Soon, he says, he will approach big industrial houses for donations.

The funds, says Soonawala, will be used for meeting the expenses of visiting doctors. And to build a reference system for storing—and updating—medical information. Besides, the money will pay for the awards, research, and training of personnel and holding workshops and programmes on pre-natal care in cities as well as small towns. And all the while, ISPAT plans to introduce the latest international techniques in India.

"In the US they have already started performing surgery on the foetus," says Soonawala, "and hopefully, we will start soon." Corrective operations on the foetus have been conducted even in the sixth month of pregnancy, says the doctor, where the uterus has been opened up, surgery done on the foetus, the wound closed up, and then it is just a case of pregnancy as usual. This is, as yet, a little advanced for India—only three such operations have been conducted worldwide—but Soonawala is looking at the basics for now. Diagnosis, treatment and counselling. Says he: "It doesn't require a legal license, just expertise and very sophisticated equipment—that can rectify any kidney or liver damage. It can collect blood samples which can give accurate diagnosis."



But most importantly, says the doctor, the public should help out, by volunteering and involving themselves. "We gain as much from it as they do," he says. "If parents take the initiative and enroll (in ISPAT programmes) they have done their part." No second-opinion on that count. ●

Cyrus Merchant/Bombay

When she appeared on the scene some time back everyone was sure Tanvi Azmi would go places. With a sister-in-law as influential as Shabana Azmi, she appeared all set for a great future.

But, even after a memorable performance in Vijaya Mehta's Rao Saheb, she went nowhere near the stardom everyone had predicted.

To make matters worse, she is now reduced to accepting TV roles—in a Marathi serial she plays a female cop. Her reduced stature in the film world appears to be in tandem with her sister-in-law's plunging career graph.

Anu Aggarwal: wondergirl

Mahesh Bhatt's film on pulsating love and memorable ditties, Aashiqui seems to have achieved entirely different results for the lead pair of Anu Aggarwal and Rahul Roy. While Rahul has been dismissed as just another wooden non-actor, the film has done wonderful things for Anu.

Almost every magazine worth its circulation has dwelt at length on how the ex-sociology student from Delhi University fell in love with Bombay and decided to stay on in the big bad city, after a tearful farewell from her family. She then proceeded to find her bearings in the modelling world and was more than successful at it. And then, she kind of strayed into films, courtesy the roving eye of Mahesh Bhatt.

Aashiqui got her rave reviews from the press and critics talked about how the "ultimate" dusky Indian actress had finally arrived, as opposed to the peroxide beauties that we routinely see on screen.

Anu may be one of the oompher things to have happened to the Hindi film industry in recent years, but it should not detract attention from the fact that she is something of a wondergirl. For, to have achieved all this after going through a matchless academic performance at college (or so she says), a stint with a UN project, a successful career as a model, and a nine-month-long sojourn abroad, and to still claim that she is just a sweet 22 in a recent interview to a film magazine is nothing short of a miracle.

If only she was half as intelligent as her credentials suggest. Or maybe, she just got worked up a little early.

Meenakshi Seshadri: incredible luck

Meenakshi Seshadri really has nothing but brave words to fall back on. Her attempts to attach herself to the Ghayal success story are quite pathetic, considering she did not have much to do in the film (which could be a blessing in disguise).

The success of Ghar Ho To Aisa too seems to have eluded the incredible Seshadri. She has lost producer Feroze Nadiawala's next venture, Pratikar, to arch rival Madhuri Dixit. And that must really hurt.

So, she teeters on the brink of a spectacular comeback only to fall back into further ignominy. Life can't be much fun this way. Maybe she should scout around for a new bag of tricks. That old Seshadri magic has a touch of the obsolete now.

Juhi Chawla may be a baby-faced charmer but she has plenty of grey cells too.

It would take a smart operator to outwit the deadly combination of Govinda and his brother Kirti.

The brothers had invested them hard-earned money in Radha Ka Sangam—the comeback film for Govinda who has not been doing too well. And

Juhi Chawla: smart operator

Govinda was confident that his role would be well looked after, what with brother Kirti directing the film. He got a rude shock, though, when he saw the rushes and discovered that the film revolved around Juhi and not him.

Govinda is still dumbstruck.

The moral: When the deciding factor is Juhi Chawla, do not trust your brother. ●

The Shah of Blah

Salman Rushdie turns autobiography into fiction

FRANK SPOONER PICTURES

Eighteen months of virtual captivity has not only left Salman Rushdie plumper, he's also developed a new chuckle—almost a half-giggle—which makes him look every bit the benign laughing Buddha. Gone is the arrogant, defiant Rushdie, and a new reconciliatory, reflective man seems to have taken his place. His obvious good humour, despite his adversity, makes it difficult to believe that this is the man a million Muslims in Britain are gunning for.

"It hasn't been a whole lot of fun since February '89," he told Melvyn Bragg of UK's ITV on the South Bank Show last week. "Writers shouldn't have lives this interesting. It gets in the way of your work." In his first television appearance since going into hiding following the Ayatollah's death threat, Rushdie spoke as fluently as ever, hardly showing any rage. The man whose last appearance on television had been an angry defiance of the Ayatollah—"Frankly, I wish I'd written a more critical book," (BBC Television News, 19 February, 1989)—was now apologising for having hurt the feelings of Muslims.

"I'm sorry," said Rushdie, "I didn't want to do it, I'm very sad that, that should be the case. People have said that I ought to be punished and so forth. Well, all I can say is, if punishment was the aim, well I've had some. For me the greatest loss is to be reviled by the people I wrote about.

"I've been separated from the thing which was the motive in my own writing, the places and people, the ideas that have been, that have generated everything I've done. I've never rejected the world I came from. I've tried to do the opposite. I've tried to bring it into the world I'm in. To be rejected by it is horrible."

It is this pain at the separation from his subject which surfaces in his latest book, Haroun And The Sea Of Stories. Written for his 12-year-old son, Zafar, whom Rushdie has not seen for over a year, the book is about the adventures of Haroun and his father—the story-teller Rashid Khalifa—variously known as the Shah of Blah, or the Ocean of Notions. The Shah of Blah loses the gift of the gab—the allegory with Rushdie's own situation is too obvious — and father and son go on a wild journey a la Alice In Wonderland.

While western critics have carefully tried to avoid comparing the book with Rushdie's situation, the similarities are striking; Rushdie's novel begins in a sad city: "A city so ruinously sad that it had forgotten its name"

Rushdie's remote hiding place, surrounded by burly special branch men, seems the replica of the sad city. Yet, from here Rushide breaks out, flying out on his magic carpet to the Land of the Fantastic, where the good guys laugh and gossip and the bad ones walk around in fashionable dark glasses in the Land of Darkness. It is here that Rushdie spins a fable, that will be recorded as one of the classic allegories of his time to be enjoyed by adults and children alike.

Rashid Khalifa loses his gift of the gab. The Ocean of Stories from where he draws his fabulous tales is slowly being poisoned by the Prince of Silence—Khattam Shud—who wants to control the world. Khattam Shud hates stories: for him stories are no fun, they only create trouble. He is plainly an Ayatollah-like character.

Haroun is determined to restore his father's gift. He sits on Butt the Hoopoe, who always talks without moving his lips, and travels to the Land of Gup. But a war is on: between the citizens of Gup City and those of Chup City The Guppies are the good guys: theirs is the city of fun and make-believe which is lit by the Moon Kahani and where the people are liberal. A process too complicated to explain is in operation here to keep the balance and help the citizens out of trouble. The city is defended by General Kitab and his army of books and is ruled by Prince Bolo.

The Chup City, by contrast, is the hooded city, where forces of darkness rule. Free expression is illegal here and there are no theatres, courts or schools. The Chupwalas always have their lips zipped-up and defend their shadowy world by spreading pollution and darkness. It is ultimately the light that Haroun carries that blinds the Chupwalas and leads to the final conquest of Chup City.

Helping Haroun in Rushdie's classic fight between the forces of darkness and light are absurd characters like Butt the Hoopoe, Iff the Water Genie, and two plentimaw fishes called Goopy and Bagha (here Rushdie borrows straight from Ray's film for children Goopy Gyne Bagha Byne).

As Rushdie explains in a glossary—the first time he has used one in any novel—the Goopy and Bagha characters are taken from Ray's movie and are the names of two goofy characters. "The movie characters are not fishes but they are certainly very fishy," writes Rushdie.

There is also the brave Blabbermouth, and Princess Batcheat—who is kidnapped by the Chupwalas—and the mad driver Butt, who faces Haroun and his father in the Valley of K—variously known as Kachi-Mer (a place that hides the sea) and Kosh-Mar (nightmare) which has at its centre the Dull Lake (no prizes for guessing what Rushdie is referring to). The Valley of K is of course ruled by the despot General Bhuttoo who lies to his people but is eventually overthrown when Rashid gets back his story-telling powers.

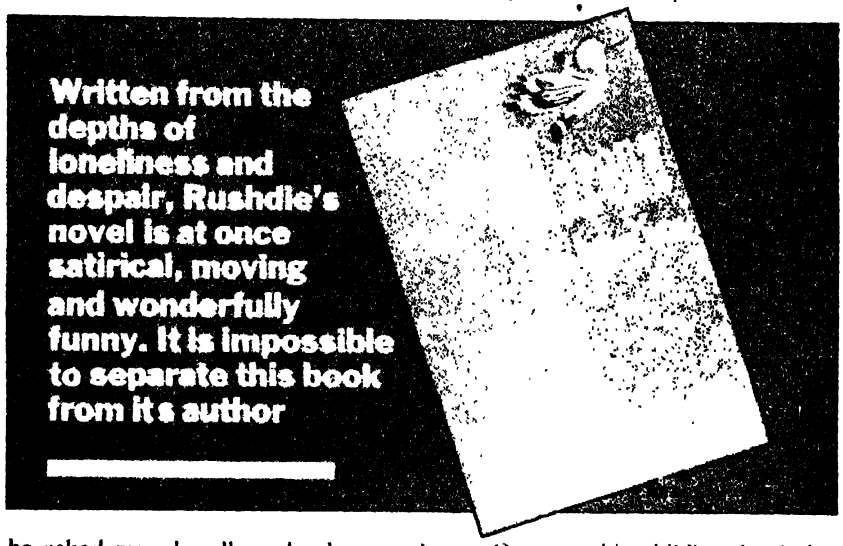
Written from the depths of loneliness and despair, Rushdie's novel is at once satirical, moving and wonderfully funny. At the end of the war, Haroun searches for a happy ending that is not make-believe. The last few pages where Rashid Khalifa gets back his fabulous gift of the gab, and where Haroun's mother returns to look after them both, is a reader's delight. Haroun at last finds a story that is true: joy breaks out in the sad city, and they've even remembered its name. The city is called Kahani or story, and what could be more wonderful than that?

No Lewis Carroll ending here, but one that is the most optimistic that a persecuted writer could write. It is impossible to separate this book from its author and the end is a suitable emotional climax.

Describing the relationship with his son, Zafar, as one that he missed the most, Rushdie told Bragg, "It's been an incredible loss, I think, for us both. When I was writing my previous book, he asked me why all my books were for grown-ups and I said good question, and he and I then did a deal, which is, I would be allowed to finish the book I was writing, on the condition that the next one would be one that he might enjoy reading.

"So maybe I should have not written it and written this one instead," he laughed.

"Usually when parent-child relationships occur in books meant, at least partly, for children, either the parents are terrible, or they have to be got rid of, so that the child's world can take over. And I wanted to write a book in which that didn't happen: in which the parent and child were equally involved in the world and where the relationship between them might be full of irritations and mutual contempt, but it was also an affectionate relationship."



It was modern art cinema that initiated him into the world of writing, said Rushdie. He was also a great admirer of Satyajit Ray, who he said was "an extraordinary lyricist of the real" rather unlike most of what he had done. "He's primarily a realistic film-maker in most of his films. There's the other side of him which is the wonderful children's movies. I loved those films and the one of course which I somewhat shamelessly ripped off him in Haroun is The Adventures Of Goopy And Bagha."

It's obvious Rushdie misses India—his source of stories—and particularly Bombay. "The thing that has always been of central importance to me in my writing is the city of Bombay and God knows when I'll be able to get there," he said. He had two relationships with Bombay, said the writer. One was his childhood relation with the city, the other the adult one that he had built up over the years by returning to it and by keeping in touch with his friends there

"My writing has always I think come out of the experience of being a member of the British-Asian community and there's rather colossal disruption in that relationship at the moment. This affair has changed my relationship with the world and there are great losses in it."

It was only his work that kept him going, said Rushdie. Though Haroun did not make it to the Booker Prize short-list this year, it is a novel that will stand as a classic of English literature and testimony to the fact that some of the best literature in the world is produced when the novel itself is under threat. ●

Ramnath Goenka takes over the Gentleman group

Minhaz Merchant's decade-long adventure in publishing has came to an end. He is one of the few journalists who wanted to be his own master, publish his own magazines, build an empire, and make it big. For ten years he did just that. His Sterling Newspapers Pvt Ltd brought out five glossies and everything seemed to go well till upsetting newspaper economics made the Sterling founder. And in the end, Merchant gave up. On 1 October, the Sterling Group's management was taken over by the holding company of the Indian Express Newspapers.

Minhaz Merchant: bowing out; the Sterling magazines: moving into a bigger network

In 1941, journalist Russy Karanjia set a new trend by editing and publishing the Blitz and 50 years later, he is still flourishing. But there was no one to follow his footsteps, not until the 25-year-old budding journalist Merchant came in. That was in 1980. After 10 years, he looks back with a tinge of sadness and feels he cannot do it all over again. Newspaper economics has put publishing forever beyond the hands of the journalist. It is today a venture only big business can afford, says Merchant.

Starting his career as a trainee in The Times Of India in 1976, Merchant became the bureau chief of India Today before venturing on his own. "There comes a time when you decide to do your own thing and there in no better way to learn than when you are doing it alone. It's like being at the deep end of the pool", Merchant feels and goes on to compare himself with Russy Karanjia. "Russy had only one brand. I had five-- Gentleman (1980), GFQ (1982), TV and Video World (1983), Technocrat (1985) and Business Computer (1986). I made what now looks like a big mistake by buying Megacity from IBH. I had a record of five magazines in eight years. Each magazine grew organically. The profits of Gentleman were ploughed into GFQ and so on."

Talking of the magazines he launched, Merchant observes that Gentleman was started when there was a general magazine boom in the late Seventies. In the early Eighties, Park Avenue and Sheetal revolutionised the fashion industry, and it was time for GFQ to be born. The TV boom followed the '82 Asiad and it was time for TV and Video World to step in. It netted Rs 45,000 in six months at Rs 2 per copy. It was a runaway success and imitators lost out in the race. After Rajiv Gandhi entered the political arena, the accent was on industrial liberalisation and modern technology. So the Technocrat hit the stands.

The 1988 decision to buy Megacity, according to Merchant, was a bad gamble. There were already two city magazines, and newsprint prices were soon hiked by 100 per cent. It threw the magazine economy out of gear and people began selling out to big business. The Daily went to Birla, Sunday Mail to Dalmia. The Bachawat Award dealt the industry another hard blow. "The Dalmias,Birlas, and the Ambanis started offering senior editors huge salaries and we could not match that," says Merchant. "Actually big business houses changed the arithmetic."

There were a couple of business houses that wooed Sterling Publications too, but they were averse to any "strategic alliance". They wanted an outright sale. It did not suit Merchant, who laid down three conditions—the staff had to be retained, complete editorial independence guaranteed, and the terms of agreement made acceptable.

The deal was a secret affair. No one heard a word before Ramnath Goenka's low-profile grandson, Vivek Khaitan, announced it. Vivek and another grandson, Manoj Santhalia, were instrumental in clinching the deal. "Yes, it was almost an overnight decision to buy the Sterling Group," says Manoj. "It was an exciting offer and we thought it would be the best way we could use our large distribution network."

Merchant feels that a publishing house would do more justice to his magazines than a business house would have. "It is not like selling toothpaste," says Merchant. "A magazine is probably the only product in the whole world that sells for less than its cost of production."

With the magazine boom entering a new phase, Merchant feels that the new chapter in magazine publishing will see the emergence and strengthening of specialised publications like those on fashion, computers and automobiles.

With big money entering the scene, it is anyone's bet how long general magazines will survive. The age is one of specialisation and the big fishes are out to get the small ones.●

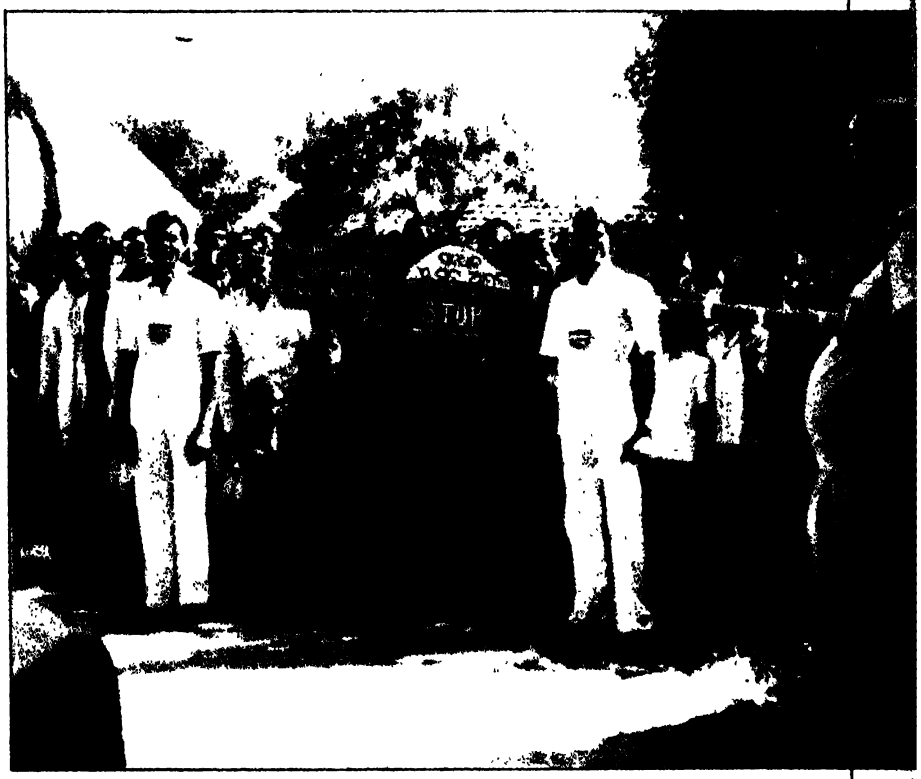
Signals from Baliapal

Has the Centre shelved the national missile test range project?



ORISSA

Strange things are happening in Baliapal. For nearly five years the country's national test range (NTR), planned to be built there, has remained a contentious issue, with the Union government doggedly sticking to its decision to go ahead with the project and the people putting up a fierce resistance. When the Congress(I) was in power at the Centre before November 1989, the Opposition Janata Dal had sided with the disaffected people, who faced the prospect of being displaced from the fertile coastal area in the state's Balasore district. But after coming to power, the Dal's central leadership staged a volte-face by concluding that Baliapal provided the most suitable site for the NTR.

The issue is, therefore, proving to be a major embarrassment for the state's ruling Janata Dal and its ally, the Communist Party of India (CPI), which had campaigned vehemently against the NTR before the last parliamentary and Assembly elections. In fact, the setting of the NTR in Baliapal has become a question of survival for the Dal and CPI leaders in Balasore, one of the richest agricultural districts in the state. With the V.P. Singh regime at the Centre opting to pursue the Congress(I)'s policy regarding the NTR, the people of Baliapal are beginning to feel "defrauded" and are growing alarmingly restive.

What the Dal dreads most is the revival of the anti-NTR agitation at this juncture, when the National Front is being battered by a spate of agitations against the Centre's decision to implement the Mandal Commission recommendations, proposing quota reservations in government jobs for the backward classes. And this uneasiness on its part has prompted the Dal's state unit and the CPI to evolve strategies to avert a crisis in Baliapal, at least for the time being.

The stratagem they have adopted is one of subterfuge. The two parties are trying to create the impression that the NTR project has been shelved by "deciding" to lift the embargo on the extention of financial aid to the people under various government schemes so that development activities could be resumed. At a meeting of the District Rural Development Agency (DRDA), the Balasore CPI MLA, Arun Dey, moved a resolution to this effect, which, according to him was "unanimously adopted ".The meeting, chaired by the district collector, was attended by several ruling party MLAs from the district, including the minister of state for education, Dr Kamala Das. Obviously, the collector was sought to be made a party to the political resolution prepared by the Dal and the CPI leaders, hinting that the project had been virtually abandoned.

The people's checkpost at Baliapal: no let up in vigilance

But the state's home department sources told SUNDAY that no such embargo had ever existed and, therefore, the question of it being withdrawn did not arise. Moreover, there has been no indication from the Centre so far to suggest that the NTR project was being dropped or shifted elsewhere. In fact, the people had reasons to doubt the Centre's intentions when a delegation of the Baliapal Test Range Resistance Committee (TRRC), led by the Balasore MP and former Union minister, Samarendra Kundu, drew a blank from the Prime Minister when it met him last month.

The people of Baliapal have more reasons to feel apprehensive. Last month, chief minister Biju Patnaik went back on his promise to visit the area during the Pujas, giving rise to speculations that the state government was going to endorse the Centre's plan of action. According to Arun Dey, the TRRC had planned to open the gate they have erected to prevent government officials from entering Baliapal during Patnaik's visit. But since Biju failed to show up, the gate remains shut, and no state official is being allowed into the area, despite the DRDA resolution on financial assistance.

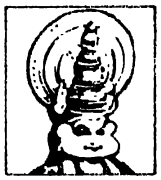
Interestingly, it was the infighting within the Dal that prompted Biju to cancel his Baliapal trip. The chief minister was clearly miffed at the initiative taken by Samarendra Kundu in leading the TRRC delegation to Delhi and he told some Baliapal leaders that he was not going to take up their cause with the Centre.

The people of Baliapal cannot rest assured till the Centre issues a statement scrapping the project. What worries them most is that the rehabilitation programmes are still on

Meanwhile, the appointment of Arun Singh as the advisor to V.P. Singh on defence matters has made Kundu and his followers doubly suspicious. They see Arun Singh as "another hawk" in South Block, who, they believe, will prevail upon V.P. Singh to go ahead with the NTR project.



Even though Biju Patnaik is on record having said that the project will never be implemented, the people cannot rest assured till the Centre makes a categorical statement scrapping the project. What keeps the people's fears alive is that several rehabilitation schemes for those who are likely to be displaced in the event of the project coming through is progressing apace.

The sentiments of the people are aptly expressed by the Janata Dal MLA from the area, Aswini Kumar Patra, who says that "the agitation will be revived in greater intensity than ever before if the test range project is not shelved". And his party colleagues have no other option but to take recourse to specious propaganda. The people, they realise, must be reassured at any cost. •

CPI(M) workers avenge the killing of their comrades

KERALA

An uneasy political calm prevailing in Kerala for sometime has been rudely shattered. During the last fortnight, two Congress(I) workers were slain by CPI(M) supporters in Chimeni and Kundera. The murders would not have normally attracted mere than usual attention had it not been for the fact that the victims were undertrials who had been acquitted by the court. They had been charged with the murder of CPI(M) workers, and the recent killings were a sequel to the vendetta between the two parties.

Rajan, secretary of the Youth Congress(I), Chimeni Mandalam unit, was hacked to death in broad daylight, allegedly by CPI(M) activists. Chimeni happens to be chief minister E.K. Nayanar's constituency in the Kasargod district. Rajan was the thirteenth accused in the Chimeni murder case in which five CPI(M) workers were killed by Congress volunteers on the day of the state Assembly elections in 1987. One of Rajan's co-accused, Biju, another Congress(I) worker, has also been done to death by the CPI(M) in Kundera,near Quilon.

Says Oomen Chandy, a Congress(I) MLA and a former home minister: "The spurt in political murders and violent activities in Kerala is worse than what is happening in Kashmir and Punjab." He says that the CPI(M) cadres are awarding "death penalties" to those who had been accused of murdering Marxist workers, but were later acquitted by the courts.

The Kerala Pradesh Congress(I) Committee (KPCC-I) president, A.K. Antony, who has also raised a hue and cry against the killings, has demanded that the CPI(M) hand over the home portfolio to some other constituent of the ruling Left Democratic Front (LDF). He alleges that the police have been totally politicised and are incapable of working impartially.

Ironically, it is not only the Congress(I) but also the CPI, the second largest constituent in the LDF, which is unhappy with the CPI(M)'s handling of the home portfolio. In fact, a war of words has broken out between them. It was the AITUC, the trade union wing of the CPI, which first fired the shot by accusing the Marxists of making a partisan use of the police for supressing trade union activities, rigging elections to co-operative societies, implicating the CPI and

A.K. Antony (with a megaphone): loud and clear

AITUC cadres in false cases, and raiding CPI offices. But the chief minister's office rebutted these charges. So, the CPI state council isssued a statement, listing the charges made by the AITUC.

But the CPI(M) state committee countered the allegations saying that the CPI leadership was being fed with wrong information by its cadres. Says a furious J. Chithranjan, MLA and AITUC secretary: "The CPI(M) leadership has failed to take corrective steps

Meanwhile, a section of the CPI workers have demanded that the party withdraw from the ministry and support the government from outside. The CPI has been also criticising the policies of the Nayanar government. Lately, tourism minister P. S. Srinivasan, the CPI strongman, did his best to sabotage the Taj Group's plan to set up hotels in the state. But, the group had the backing of K.R. Gouri, the powerful Marxist industry, minister, who finally saw the deal through. And more recently, the AITUC working committee criticised the state government for succumbing to pressure from liquor barons by allowing them to run licensed arrack shops.

But chief minister Nayanar is unfazed. Regarding the political murders in his own constituency, Nayanar says that neither he nor his government approves of such methods to settle political scores. He pooh-poohs the Congress(I) ascusation that CPI(M) cadres have unleashed a reign of terror and cites examples to prove that Congress(I)'s hand are no less bloody.

However, the CPI(M) is careful enough not to rock the LDF boat too viciously and is, therefore, ignoring the CPI broadsides. The Marxists are determinded to set a record by leading the first communist government in the state through its full term. Already, the CPI(M) is gearing up for the district council elections to be held later this year. And, expectedly, allegations of the electoral rolls being fudged are surfacing with the Opposition parties complaining that the names of their supporters are being struck off the list. The district elections are crucial for the LDF, as they serve as a dress rehearsal for the 1992 Assembly elections. And clearly, the CPI(M) is ready to overlook the present belligerence of its partners for the sake of future gains. ●

Damaged two-wheelers: anti-socials were active

Back to brickbats

After 50 years of harmony, communal clashes break out in Raipur

MADHYA PRADESH

For half a century, Raipur had an impeccable record. It could boast of absolute communal harmony, when most other places were stained with the scars of riots. But early this month that reputation suffered when Hindus and Muslims clashed on Prophet Mohammed's birthday.

The reason behind the mayhem was flimsy. The clash could have been avoided had the administration been more alert and the two communities considerate. It happened on 3 October, when 10,000 Muslims and the All India Vidyarthi Parishad brought out processions on the same street. The police burst tear gas shells and made lathicharges to bring the situation under control.

Leaders of the two communities, however, debunk reports that the incidents amounted to a communal strife. They maintain that anti-social elements on both sides created trouble with the intention of looting shops and business establishments. In the process several two-wheelers and motor cars were damaged and a number of people injured.

All political parties—the BJP, Congress(I), the Janata Dal—have, held the district administration responsible for failing to take preventive measures. They argue that the authorities should never have allowed the two processions to come out at the same time and proceed along the same route.

Government officials, however, rebut this charge as rank political opportunism. They say that the leaders of the Vidyarthi Parishad were requested to lead their march through a different locality. But influential BJP leaders, having the backing of the minister of state, Brij Mohan Agarwal, insisted that they be allowed to take Malviya Road where the Muslim procession was scheduled. And the inevitable happened: the rival groups confronted each other, much inflammatory slogan-shouting followed, and fighting broke out.

Eyewitnesses told SUNDAY that some Parishad members had tried bursting crackers, but were prevented by the more sober elements. In fact, they say, some leaders of both the communities had frantically tried to lead the marchers away from each other so that a physical clash could be avoided. But before they could take their followers to a safe distance, the stone-throwing began.

As a curfew was clamped on the town, the situation limped back to normal. But presspersons had a harrowing time doing their rounds during this period. Despite holding curfew passes, they were beaten up by the police. About six of them ended up with fractured arms and one suffered head injuries. As a result, the Raipur Working Journalists' Union and the Raipur Press Club have imposed a ban on reporting official programmes, press conferences and statements.

Talking of rubbish

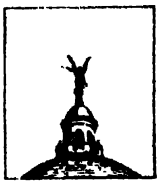
Bombay looks for new dumping grounds

MAHARASHTRA

Wealth from waste is what Bombay's armchair environmentalists never tire of discussing. In reality, however, very little is left for conversion into useful stuff after the ragpickers do their rounds. They pick off everything recyclable, leaving behind soggy rubbish that is not even good enough for the incinerators.

And in it lies a problem. Four major garbage dumps, spread over 900 acres of land about 25 km from Bombay, will be able to cope with the filth the city produces for another five years. After that, the solid waste management department (SWMD) of the Bombay Municipal Corporation will have to find new dumping grounds. And like many things, land, near the booming metropolis, is difficult to come by.

C.D. Kotnis, chief engineer, SWMD, says that he is negotiating with the government for the procurement of more land to meet the growing conservancy needs. There are tracts of open spaces at Vikhroli and Bhandup that could solve the problem for another 25 years. But as yet there is no guarantee that they will be made easily available.



It would have been most convenient, if the garbage could be burnt in giant incinerators, though the arrangement may have given rise to an obnoxious side-effect: air pollution. "Bombay's garbage has very low calorific content per kg," says Kotnis, explaining why the burning-up option is not being pursued.

The city's conservancy operations are still predominantly manual, though the SWMD is bringing in modern technology to augment its handling capacity. The department has acquired about 40 compactors (dumpers with hydraulic lifting devices) to facilitate mechanical loading and unloading of garbage. •

Cops under fire

CPI(M) leader Biman Bose lets loose a scathing attack on the police

WEST BENGAL

Protests against police atrocities by CPI(M) leaders can be construed as thinly veiled criticism of chief minister Jyoti Basu, who holds the "law and order portfolio." But the party's central committee member Biman Bose is always ready to do the unexpected. After police fired on agitated citizens protesting against heavy power cuts on 26 September, killing at least two persons, Bose expectedly turned on the heat.

Though a senior policeman has been sent on leave, and an administrative enquiry ordered, Bose demanded a thorough probe into the firing. "The policemen will have to explain their conduct...we don't want the police to blacken the Left Front's name...we won't allow policemen to shoot innocent agitators," Bose said at a rally in Baguihati, where the rattled policemen had opened fire. After the tonnes of criticism, came unwanted advice. Policemen should pore over their service manuals more carefully, be patient and courageous and exercise more restraint, felt Bose. Even during the Congress regime, the central committee member reminded the large crowd, policemen usually fired teargas shells first, before blasting crowds with bullets.

Bose, one of the younger CPI(M) leaders patiently waiting his turn at the top, was not alone. Outraged leaders of the Front's junior parties also drew blood. "We condemn the arrogance of the police service in West Bengal," Forward Bloc leader Ashok Ghosh thundered, while Gurudas Dasgupta, the outspoken CPI MP, warned that more "shameful incidents" would occur if proper steps

Frontier science for farmers

Agricultural scientist M.S. Swaminathan sets up his own research institute

A unique farm research institute, brainchild of the internationally-famous agricultural scientist, Dr M.S. Swaminathan, is coming up at Taramani, in south Madras. The scientist, who won the prestigious World Food Prize for his contributions to agricultural science,. hopes to "respond to the challenges inherent in the changing nature of national food security" by initiating his own research programmes.

And the accent of Swaminathan's projects is on the uplift of rural women and youths through the creation of skilled employment. He wants to integrate traditional skills with frontline technologies, while evolving ways to preserve ecosystems without jeopardising development.

The institute—Research Centre for Sustainable Agricultural and Rural Development—will focus attention on programmes for conservation, evaluation and utilisation of biological wealth, with an initial emphasis on the coastal areas. "Youths and women will be the main target groups since the major challenges facing rural India are the flight of educated youths from the villages, low and uncertain incomes, and the enormous drudgery of women," Swaminathan told SUNDAY. Most of the research would be done at various farm sites and the findings analysed and desseminated at the Taramani centre.

But the research facilities, ...

Biman Bose speaking at Baguihati: no-holds-barred were not taken this time. The RSP has also demanded a discussion on the incident at the next Left Front meeting.

But chief minister Basu's (away on holiday in salubrious Hallong, in north Bengal) riposte has been silence. Nor has the primary problems—prolonged power cuts—been solved. The state is shrouded in darkness every evening, its antiquated power plants on the brink of breakdown.

Baguihati is only another example of the shoot-first talk-later style of the men in uniform . With the Left Front slowly losing its administrative grip, Bengal may be entering another era of lawlessness reminiscent of the Sixties. Forced to fire on angry mobs an unprecedent eight times in August and September, policemen have killed ten persons including three Congressmen and one SUCI worker. Yet the policemen, heavily politicised after 13 years of Left Front rule, have failed to protect not only senior politicians like former Congress(I) MP Mamata Banerjee who was beaten up by toughs while policemen stood and stared on August 16.

Senior policemen are also appalled by the Left Front's petty politics. Faced by the Congress(I) agitation when bus fares were hiked, the CPI(M) leadership decided that party cadres would maintain law and order, a decision that worries the cop on the beat as does the lumpenisation of the party cadres. Perhaps the Jyoti Basu government has over a year to solve the state's problems: the next big moment of truth, the 1992 Assembly elections, are still a fair distance away.

Srinjoy Chowdhury/ Calcutta

sure to involve large investments. And Swaminathan hopes that financial contributions would be forthcoming from various quarters. Already, a Japanese industrialist has donated 1,00,000 dollars, and Swaminathan says: "I wish to get good response from people locally."

Swaminathan was inspired to set up this research centre by the Nobel laureate, the late C.V. Raman. "He told me (in the early Seventies) that after my retirement, I should dedicate myself to developing research and technologies in agriculture for the uplift of the rural poor. His words lingered in my mind for a long time, and when I got the first World Food Prize, I decided to make the Rs 25-lakh prize money the initial corpus to start a trust," recalls Swaminathan.

His dream project is still at an embryonic stage, but if it develops, Indian peasants, who form 25 per cent of the world's farming community, could hope for a green renaissance. ●

Time to forget...

The BJP's loan waiver scheme, as Patwa fails to get central sanctions

MADHYA PRADESH

Poll promises are often made only to be forgotten. But for a while it seemed that the BJP government of Madhya Pradesh would prove this wrong. Last fortnight, chief minister Sunderlal Patwa announced a liberal loan-waiver scheme for the 70-lakh-strong farming community of the state. But it took very little time for the peasants to realise that the grandiose plans might come to nothing, as the state authorities were yet to receive the mandatory sanction from the Centre to waive the farm loans.

Under the scheme announced by the government, farm loans, totalling a whopping Rs 664 crores, would be written off outright. And the burden would be shared by the Centre and the state: the central government would shell out Rs 125 crores as grant, another Rs 125 crores would be raised as loans, and the remaining Rs 414 crores would be paid by the state government from its own resources. But the catch is that in the 1990-91 state budget only a paltry sum of Rs 135 crores have been set aside for the loan waiving scheme.

Observers feel that Sunderlal Patwa went ahead and hastily announced the scheme because this was one of his main electoral promises. What is more, even while in the Opposition, the BJP had relentlessly demanded that farm loans be waived for the benefit of the peasants. In fact, on New Year's Day this year, the party had organised rallies in all the district headquarters where the leaders told the farmers that they would soon be free from debts. Naturally, when the BJP stormed to power after the Assembly elections this February, the peasants began to press Patwa for the fulfillment of the pledge. Patwa was thus left with no other option but to make an announcement that would placate the farmers. ●

The angry hills

The anti-outsider agitation in the north-east gains momentum

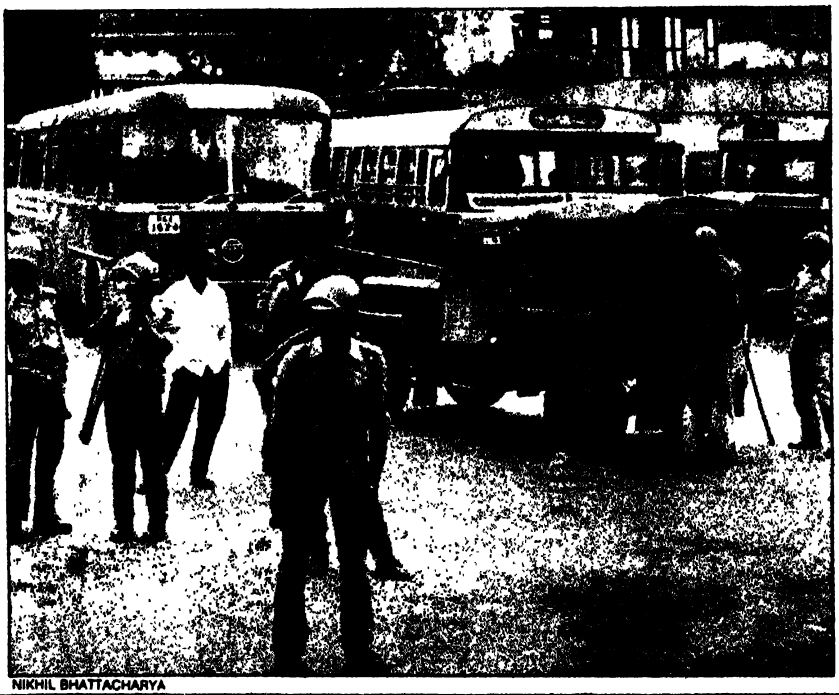
• There was palpable tension within the campus of Shillong's prestigious St Anthony's College once the institution opened after the holidays. The non-tribals found that their tribal friends were no longer talking to them. And on 11 September, Bijan Roy was surrounded by a couple of tribal students and stabbed in front of the principal's office to the cries of "non-tribals quit Meghalaya".

• On 12 September, S.S. Agarwal, a rich Marwari contractor at Dimapur, Nagaland's commercial hub, and his brother received a letter from the Naga Youth Liberation Front (NYLF), a newly-raised shadowy outfit. The curt letter accused them of being corrupt and warned them not to submit any more tenders to bag government contracts. What is more, the NYLF imposed a fine of Rs 10 lakhs on the contractor. Brothers Agarwal caught the next flight out of Dimapur.

If you're planning to start a business in the north-east, or even thinking of holidaying there, forget it. The entire area—the states of Meghalaya and Nagaland in particular—is in the grip of a fierce "anti-outsider" wave, which has already taken its toll and driven away hordes of non-tribal entrepreneurs. Though the United Liberation Front of Assam (ULFA), currently the most dreaded outfit in the north-east, claims that its movement is not aimed against "outsiders", the truth is that the ULFA's target have been prominent businessmen, most of whom are non-Assamese.

In Meghalaya, dkhara (outsiders) is the buzzword today. Since August this year, Shillong, the picturesque hilltop capital, has been rocked by violence. Night curfew has become the order of the day and five people have died as a result of clashes between tribals and non-tribals.

Trouble started when the Federation of Khasi, Jaintia and Garo People (FKJGP), a militant body raised with the sole purpose of driving out the "outsiders", issued an ultimatum to all non-tribal traders in Shillong, having no trading licences, to pack up and leave the state. (There are over 3,500 non-tribal traders in Shillong alone and fresh trading licences were not issued to them by the government since 1987 for inexplicable reasons.)



Another militant outfit, the Khasi Students Union (KSU), which spearheaded the anti-Nepali stir in June 1987, also threw in its lot with the FKJGP. Its members took to the streets demanding reservation of jobs and more seats in educational institutions for the Khasis.

An ethnic upheaval was perhaps inevitable. On 28 August, Gopinath Banik, who runs a metal-ware shop in Shillong, was killed. The next day, the non-tribals, in a rare show of solidarity, brought out a procession which clashed with the tribals. The police had to intervene to restore peace. Again on 13 September, a 500-strong mob of tribals ransacked several shops and houses owned by non-tribals. This time the damage would have been greater hadn't the administration come down with a heavy hand.

But for how long can the uneasy peace hold? The polarisation of the tribals and non-tribals in Meghalaya is near-complete and many families have already moved out of the Khasi-dominated localities. The non-tribals have even formed vigilante groups to guard their houses and property at night.

The movement against the so-called "outsiders" in neighbouring Nagaland is even more strident. Apart from terrorising the entire non-tribal trading community, the NYLF has also served notices on all non-Naga employees in the state to give up their jobs and quit the state. Argued NTLF president Sounder S. Cajee: "We are in favour of preserving the exclusive tribal character of Nagaland and that is why we are insisting that the outsiders leave the state."

The fear of the non-Nagas has been further compounded by another notice circulated in the state by the National Socialist Council of Nagaland (NSCN), the pro-Maoist insurgent gang led by the fabled Muivah. It threatened to "liquidate every living Indian national in Nagaland", as they were "agents of exploitation".

Already, non-tribals have begun to flee the state. Said Anup Singh, a trader in Dimapur: "We have started shifting our families to the plains. We cannot afford to become the willing victims of any organised violence against the non-locals."

The anti-tribal movements in the north-east have justifiably worried New Delhi. Recently, Union minister of state for home, Subodh Kant Sahay (right), curtly told both Vamuzo (centre) and Lyngdoh (left) that they should set their houses in order

In both Meghalaya and Nagaland, it is always the politician who capitalises from the hillman's sense of insecurity by channelising all hostitlity against "outsiders" into bouts of anti-tribal frenzy. A recent report by a central intelligence agency has pointed to the nexus between a faction of the KSU and the Congress(I) in Meghalaya. In fact, a number of state Congress leaders were seen accompanying the 13 September procession of Khasis in Shillong. Chief minister B.B. Lyngdoh even blamed former Congress(I) CM Purna Sangma for fuelling the anti-tribal agitation with his irresponsible remarks. Sangma, on the other hand, held the present ruling coalition of regional forces in Meghalaya responsible for the present mess.

The NYLF, too, has Congress(I) links: the chauvinist outfit is said to be the handiwork of former chief minister S.C. Jamir. Some youths recently abducted Limatoshi, the NYLF chief, and extracted from him a sensational confession. He revealed that his organisation had "links" with a number of Congress politicians and state government officials. What is more, Limatoshi, who was earlier a contractor, alleged that "some" pro-Jamir bureaucrats in the state had collected a staggering sum of Rs 69 lakhs and handed over this money to the NYLF for unsettling the present government in Nagaland.

Such anti-tribal movements, which seem to be spreading fast to the other states of the north-east, has justifiably worried New Delhi. Recently, Subodh Kant Sahay, the Union minister of state for home, curtly told both Vamuzo, the chief minister of Nagaland, and Lyngdoh, the Meghalaya CM, that they should set their houses in order. And since unemployment is said to be the main reason behind more and more youths joining the ranks of the militants, the state governments have been asked to create more jobs. Said Sahay: "We are ever ready to sanction more productive projects in the tribal areas of the north-east. But those who believe that tribal youths could be lured away from the national mainstream will be in for a shock. We will not hesitate to deal with such forces with a heavy hand."

But the rot has already set in and the anti-outsider feeling is so pervasive that it will require more than just jobs and projects to win over the tribals.●

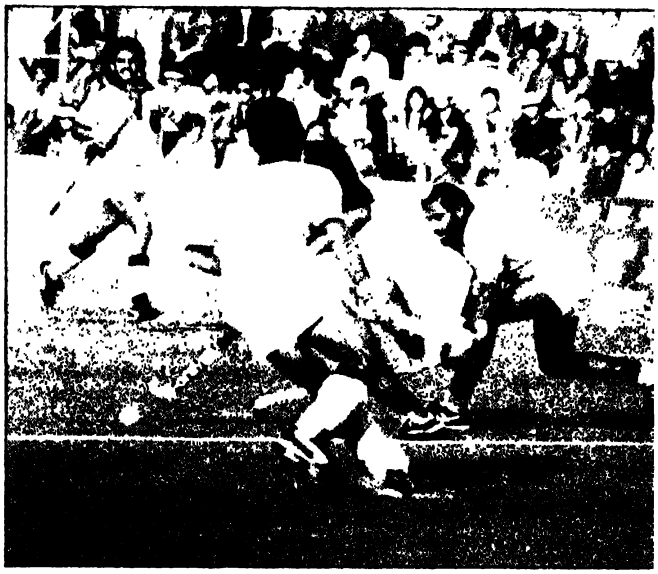
After the debacle

The Sports Authority of India is blamed for India's humiliation at the Beijing Asiad

India fared so poorly in the Beijing Asian Games that recriminations were only expected. What was not, however, was the demand—now increasingly strident—for the abolition of the Sports Authority of India (SAI). Describing it as a "white elephant", the president of the Amateur Kabaddi Federation of India, J. S. Gehlot, said it served no useful purpose and should be dissolved forthwith.

Gehlot can afford to voice his opinion. Kabaddi was the only sport which brought in gold for the country as India plummeted to its lowest depths in terms of achievement in the Asian Games since the competition began 39 years ago. Our lowest haul of gold medals was in 1974 at Teheran, where India managed just four. But in Beijing, we barely kept ourselves afloat with the lone team gold in kabaddi.



A cryptic note from Prime Minister V.P. Singh to the human resources ministry to probe the debacle and submit a report set the ball rolling. The minister in charge of sports, Bhakta Charan Das, has, in turn, asked the various federations and the SAI to submit reports to him on the causes of our failure.

It has to be understood that SAI is the administrative wing of the government and will, therefore, not be in a position to criticise anyone except the federations and the people concerned. According to sports officials, this report will be biased and will serve no purpose.

The federations themselves are still not clear about their own stand. While some have blamed SAI outright, others have maintained that the government's short-sightedness has resulted in this debacle. The president of the Amateur Athletics Federation of India, Suresh Kalmadi, has, of course, laid the blame squarely on SAI. "The sports ministry and SAI have failed totally," he said. "They have spent lakhs of rupees on foreign coaches, but whatever success sportsmen have achieved has been due to the efforts of our own coaches." He felt things could not continue like this. He said the entire sports policy of the government should be scrapped and new plans formulated. And, sports federations should be given complete freedom with regard to the conduct of coaching camps and team selection.

The chiefs of two other federations, however, refrained from criticising the official machinery. V. K. Malhotra felt India had done reasonably well in archery, while hockey federation president R.L. Prasad said the players let the country down. K. S. Bains of the cycling federation blamed the government for the team's poor performance. "Essential equipment was sanctioned very late and the ministry continuously refused to let our cyclists gain international experience. We should have sent the entire team to the Soviet Union for six months, where they had been assured all facilities free of charge."

A serious charge against the federations came from the chef de mission of the Indian contingent to the Asiad, Mohammad Aslam Khan. He wanted an investigation into the procedure of recording performances in the trials before the Games. He said it was hard to explain the poor performances in Beijing, adding that they were 'worse than the timings recorded in India. The implication is quite clear and it would be interesting to hear the reactions of federation officials.

Another charge—more direct—was that the sportspersons did not seem to be interested in giving off their best. Aslam Khan felt that all the participants merely concentrated on qualifying for the Asian Games. Once that was achieved, the athletes seemed to let themselves go. Sincerity and determination, he said, were lacking. Of course, this was not a sweeping charge. He said there were exceptions, like Kabita Garari in the women's 10 km walk and the archery team members, as also the women weightlifters.

Taking a middle-of-the-road policy, Aslam Khan said the SAI should be divided into two wings—administrative and technical. He felt the latter should be the preserve of people with requisite experience and the knowledge of what to expect from athletes and sportspersons. The administrative wing could be looked after by others.

The problem with SAI, according to some federation officials, is that it is not only over-staffed, but full of people with very little knowledge of sport. To make matters worse, government policy on sport encourages official control to such an extent that, in many cases, it is the SAI which chooses coaches, instead of the federations concerned with sports. SAI allocates funds, decides when and where coaching camps will be held and, in the ultimate analysis, even the final composition of teams to participate in international events.

If SAI had had federation officials in charge of the technical aspects of each sport, the situation would not have been so bad. After all, it has to be admitted that the federations are getting a lot more finance for their coaching and training schemes through SAI than they got before its existence.

But it is this financial lever through which SAI has been arresting the growth of sports and even hindering India's prospects in international competitions. This is what Gehlot claimed when he alleged that SAI almost robbed

Bhakta Charan Das: needs to get tough

India of its only gold in the recent Asiad. The sports authority had approved of 11 members in the Indian squad, when the stipulated number was 12. "It was lucky that Indian officials still control kabaddi in the Asian arena," he said.

Privately, most federation officials are sore over the authoritarian attitude of the SAI. They realise that it is only the lack of funds that is preventing federations from completely ignoring the government body. They feel that if the government really wanted to aid in the development of sport in the country, it should maintain its financial support, without the stifling presence of "half-baked, so-called experts of SAI, who are nothing more than career officials who are merely serving time," as one sports official said. "SAI officials have no business to meddle in the affairs of sports about which they have no knowledge" said another.

As all these accusations and counter-accusations mount, former Indian athlete Milkha Singh said that Indian sport should henceforth be looked after by Services personnel. He felt that the different federations could settle all issues of coaching and training with Services officers. If the latter takes control, he said, the much-needed concentration and discipline would return to sportspeople, most of whom do not take sport seriously nowadays.

Milkha's salvo is now being echoed by Aslam Khan and, more important, by Bhakta Charan Das. In the near future, one may find more voices in support of what is only a note of desperation. But even this possibility can only be considered after SAI has been well and truly laid to rest. •

What to read on the Seventh Day

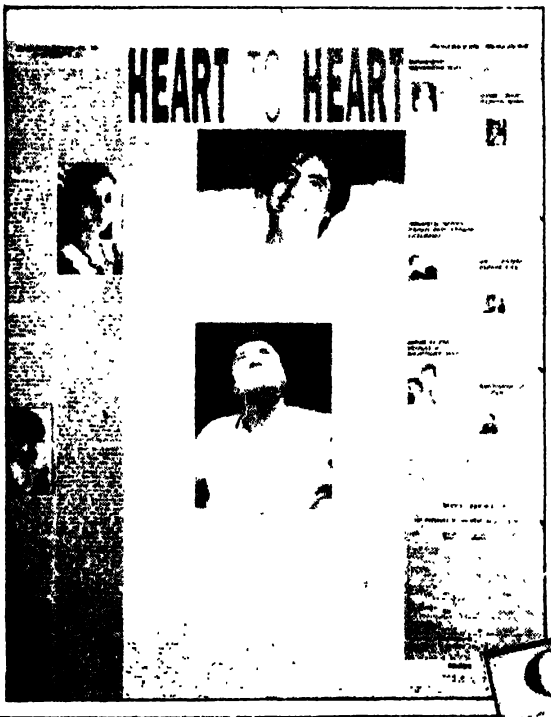
"By the Seventh Day God finished what he had been doing and stopped working. He blessed the seventh day and set it apart as a special day, because by that day he had completed his Creation." (Genesis, The Old Testament)

God could afford to do that. He did not have the Sunday papers to read, not seven or eight of them, each more bulging than the other. Not the 40-page, new-look The Sunday Observer or the 32-page Sunday Times (the Sunday edition of The Times of India).

The Sunday Observer which was sliding downhill sprang a pleasant surprise. The enlarged edition is well-planned, designed, with lots of good, interesting reading material to suit all tastes. The masthead, despite using up too much space, is eye-catching. The lead story on the Gonda riots by a staffer was well displayed with a three-column photograph of a surviving couple, despair on their faces. Communal riots or mayhem, life has to go on and thank God the paper did not choose to publish pictures of rotting corpses.

The front page edit explaining the new avatar was, I guess, necessary. But why use a double column for the contents panel? A single column should be enough. The news content was varied, ranging from the complaint of Rajeev Goswami (the Delhi student who allegedly set fire to himself to protest against the Mandal report) that he had actually been torched, to a detailed report on the controversial suicide of Mukesh Aggarwal, film star Rekha's husband. Since The Sunday Observer sells more in Bombay, it should have carried at least one local story on page one.

A four-page City Observer, including two pages on reviews and a weekly cultural calendar, forms the city coverage. Dowry deaths, Mulayam's visit, Pawar-Sena pact, Vishwa Hindu Parishad-Shiv Sena ties are all okay. But Bombay city has a unique spirit and reporters must look for off-beat stories which reflect this spirit.



Personally speaking, I enjoyed Chandan Mitra's interview with Girilal Jain. The Observer interviews of the past had been mostly routine, too long and featuring run-of-the-mill politicians. Girilal Jain made several valid points, the decline of the editor and his staff in the new, commercially-oriented newspaper set-ups, the emphasis on 'look' rather than the 'contents' (to get more colour ads) and the lowering of the standards of the edit page and its contents. Was he thinking of The Times of India?

And three cheers for the colour section! Minus his rage and obsession for V.P. Singh and the National Front goverment, Mani Shankar Aiyar's, Yes, Ambassador is all wit and wisdom and packed with anecdotes. Do you know that former foreign secretary Ram Sathe, while posted at the consulate of Kashgar and cut off from his Nanking embassy by revolutionaries, received no salary for three years and subsisted on provisions purchased from Kashmiri traders against hundies that were later honoured in Srinagar by South Block accountants sent there with the express purpose of determining how many kilogrammes of cooking oil per month Sathe & Co were entitled to!

The book page disappointed. Why carry excerpts from Nancy Reagan's Memoirs? But theatre personality Satyadev Dubey's Open Letter to Amitabh Bachchan was a good idea, far superior to a routine interview where the same questions are asked and stereotyped answers given. Advises Dubey, "There is an innate humility and sense of values in you. Fall back on that. Find somebody non-political, non-religious, non-market, non-artiste, non-fanatic. You need a breather."

Every single page had photographs or sketches, a big plus point. The layout, with a bit of borrowing from London Observer, The Guardian and other foreign papers, still was innovative. The following Monday, I still remembered three articles (despite my age and failing memory!)—Jain's interview, Aiyar's comments and the Gonda massacre reports.

The Sunday Observer, has finally arrived. ●

The 'open letter' to Amitabh Bachchan, in The Sunday Observer, was a good idea, far superior to a routine interview where the same questions are asked and stereotyped answers given Yuppie haven?

■ Floods in the Garhwal region have had one beneficial fallout. The ruins of a 16th century temple have been discovered on the banks of river Malini.

What makes this archaeological discovery slightly different from other routinely mundane discoveries is the fact that this is the temple where Kalidas' romantic duo Shakuntala and Dushyant are supposed to have got married. The discovery has considerable historical importance. No wonder then, that historians and archaeologists are quite excited about it.

■ The fashion scene in Calcutta is improving. What with several showrooms—Park Avenue, Benetton, the fashion conscious male no longer need look westward for sartorial inspiration—or satisfaction.

Surinder Virmani's Louise Philippe showroom, the first of its kind in the city, is one such place. Offering the entire Louise Philippe range including the Elysee collection the shop has the latest in formal and executive wear for men. And just across the road is the recently inaugurated Beach Fashions showroom catering to more casual and trendy after-hour tastes.

All things considered, a pretty pleasing prospect for the city's yuppies. His entire fashion needs are now well looked after—for a price of course.

■ The Central Sahitya Akademi is bringing out a comprehensive anthology of modern Indian literature of 22 Indian languages into English. The ambitious book is edited by the noted scholar Dr K. M. The next section covers novels and the third deals with drama, prose and other literary pieces.

In all, there are 650 items from the modern period of Indian literature (1800-1975). In the words of it's chief editor the anthology demonstrates the eternal unity of the country. Comforting words, considering the nation is not really at its united best now.

THIS INDIA

HISAR: The Anti-Reservation Front of Haryana has distributed posters all over the state offering people crash courses in dacoity, looting, bomb-making and begging. The 'institution' where these courses have been offered has been named the V.P. Institute for Forward Classes. The poster in Hindi, entitled Rozgar Samachar, informs readers that in case they are talented, unemployed and belong to an upper caste, they can enlist in half-a-dozen courses. The first is a three-month course in bomb-making, followed by a 45-day course in arms manufacturing. The third is a one-month course in dacoity and highway robbery. The fourth is a two-week course in western styles of begging. The last two courses are in shoe-shining and road sweeping, of 12 hours and six hours, respectively. Though the name of the Front is given at the bottom, the printline seems to be fictitious. It carries the name of Shubh Lakshmi Printing Press, without any address—Indian Express (Tarlok Singh Chhabra, Chandigarh)

MUZAFFARPUR: Senior Janata Dal leaders thrashed the district collectorate nazir, Janki Mistry, in the presence of the state minister, Ramnath Thakur, at the Samastipur circuit house on Thursday. Apparently they were annoyed with the nazir as he did not serve chilli chicken at dinner, two days ago. A case in this connection has been filed with the Samastipur police. The named accused in this case are district Janata Dal convener, Ramjapit Rai, and two Yuva Janata Dal leaders, Satyendra Rai and Pradip Mahto—The Times of India (Prem C. Sinha, Patna)

I no understand English

The person who has lost out the most in the Karnataka mess is, strangely enough, not Veerendra Patil or even Rajiv Gandhi, but Mahavir Prasad, the AICC(I) observer sent to the southern state to extract a resignation from the reluctant CM.

Things went wrong for Prasad right from the beginning. First, he had problems getting someone to introduce him to Veerendra Patil. And once he succeeded in that, he came up against another obstacle: the language barrier. For Patil speaks only Kannadiga or English, while Prasad is conversant only in Gorakhpuri Hindi.

Mahavir Prasad: losing the high command's confidence

After trying sign language for a frustrating hour or so, Prasad gave up and called upon G.K. Moopanar to help him out. This made things a trifle easier, but Prasad still couldn't convince the chief minister to step down in the larger interests of the party, whatever they might be.

And in the bargain, he injured his own interests, with the party high command deciding to assign him no sensitive tasks in the future.

HEARD AT THE TEXTILES MINISTRY

Is this Mandela any relation to Mandal?

STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO SHARAD YADAV BY HIS CIVIL SERVANTS

Keep out!

He has been landed with the sobriquet, "the invisible home minister of India". And every-time the unfortunate Mufti Mohammad Sayeed tries to get more high-profile, his efforts are stymied by his party leaders.

Now, it's Mulayam Singh Yadav's turn to keep the Mufti in the shadows. Apparently, the home minister's Gonda visit was effectively sabotaged by the Uttar Pradesh chief minister. Sayeed sent his detailed programme to the CM's office, so that the UP administration could make the necessary arrangements for his entourage. But Yadav wrote back to advise the home minister to stay out of Gonda. This was a state affair, he informed the Mufti, and he was perfectly capable of taking care of it himself.

And hogging all the consequent publicity, no doubt.

How Rajiv's advisers rate

R.K. Dhawan: King of all he surveys. Is as much like Chanakya as Rajiv is like Chandragupta Maurya. On all political matters, RKD has the last word, with results that are often spectacular, ie, the current mess in Karnataka.

P. Chidamberam: An educated counter-point to RKD's intrigues. Chidambaram continues to be the leader's favourite intellectual. But when it comes to the crunch, RKD tends to win out.

Captain S. Sharma: Still a friend, still used for liaison with industrialists, but has little or no political clout.

Buta Singh: Is currently engaged in launching a Safai Mazdoor Congress. No truth in the rumour however that he will be marching to Ayodhya—as part of Advani's entourage.

Mani Shankar Aiyar: Will always have a certain importance in that set-up. But his problem is that he tells Rajiv what he already knows. RKD, on the other hand, thinks of delicious intrigues that Rajiv could never have dreamt of in a million years.

Jaitley vs Khurana

Arun Jaitley's run of bad luck continues. And this time, it's old enemy Madan Lal Khurana who's making life difficult for the additional solicitor-general.

Khurana's enmity with Jaitley goes back to the time when the BJP was handing out tickets for the last parliamentary poll. Jaitley was an aspirant for the South Delhi seat and was lobbying extensively for a nomination. And Khurana was going out of his way to sabotage his chances.

In the end, it was Khurana who succeeded. Jaitley lost the chance of a stab at a Lok Sabha seat.

Arun Jaitley: up against M.L. Khurana

Of course, Jaitley made a brave comeback, prevailing on the Raja to appoint him additional solicitor-general.

But Khurana didn't give up, getting his supporters to heckle Jaitley on the rare occasions he turned up at the BJP office. The ostensible reason being that Jaitley's incompetence had led to the entire Bofors mess, the rejection of the Letter Rogatory, etc. And that the additional solicitor-general should be sacked forthwith.

Jaitley is holding out against the attack at present. And is distancing himself from the BJP to make more friends and influence other people ●

Losing favour

When R.P. Joshi was appointed director, Intelligence Bureau (IB), everyone made out that he was the Raja's favourite sleuth. And the fact that Joshi was cabinet secretary Vinod Pande's brother-in-law only increased his importance in the Raja's durbar—in the public eye at least.

It didn't take long for differences to develop between the PM and the IB chief. VP was particularly indignant about Joshi's failure to even provide an accurate list of the dissidents in the party during the Janata Dal crisis.

R.P. Joshi: losing out to M.K. Narayan

Joshi's loss was M.K. Narayan's gain. The former IB director, now appointed chairman of the joint committee (intelligence), had been relegated to the shadows by the Raja's regime. But with Joshi out of favour, Narayan has been resurrected somewhat

Much to the chagrin of the Joshi camp, which now goes around saying that the man (Narayan) who had ruined Rajiv will now destroy the Raja.

Not that VP needs much help in that connection, the way he has been going of late.

Sorry, no room!

The Raja's media relations just seem to get from bad to worse, despite the well-meaning efforts of Prem Shankar Jha.

First, V.P. Singh was pilloried by almost every major newspaper in the country for his blatant and irresponsible casteism, vis-a-vis his stand on the Mandal recommendations. And now, his insensitive handling of the Delhi press corps has alienated journalists even further.

Weeks before the PM's Patna rally, his media advisers had informed the journos in the capital that they would be given a free ride to the venue to facilitate their covering the event.

But the night before the flight was to take off, all the mediamen were called to be told that since too many ministers had opted to accompany the Raja, there was no room for them in the aircraft. Only the official news agencies would go along with the Prime Minister.

The rising son

The last time the Raja and the Tau made a deal of sorts, it revolved around Om Prakash Chautala. Now, it appears that Ranjit Singh, the Chaudhary's other son, may have replaced his father in the power stakes.

Delhi gossip has it that V.P. Singh intends to win over Devi Lal by accommodating Ranjit Singh in the council of ministers. And that the dinner meeting the Tau attended at the Prime Minister's residence was devoted in the most part to getting the details right.

V.P. Singh: reconciling with the Tau

Insiders also maintain that the Raja is trying to convince his former deputy to withdraw his resignation from the Lok Sabha. At present, Lal doesn't appear inclined to go for a compromise, but if Ranjit does make it to the Union ministry, he might just change his mind.

Hotel intrigues

In one of his numerous press briefings when the Janata Dal crisis was at its height, party general secretary Jaipal Reddy announced grandly that it would take more than conspiracies hatched in the Ashoka Hotel to depose V.P. Singh.

Guess who was staying in the Ashoka at that time?

None other than Jayant Malhoutra, treasurer of the Janata Party.

Malhoutra's room in the ITDC hotel was, apparently, the haunt of such dissident leaders as Chandra Shekhar and Om Prakash Chautala, with Janata maverick Dr Subramaniam Swamy performing the role of postman, relaying messages from the Congress party to Chandra Shekhar and vice versa. But despite the flurry of activity in the rebel camp, nothing came of the effort.

And Jaipal Reddy, for once, got it right.

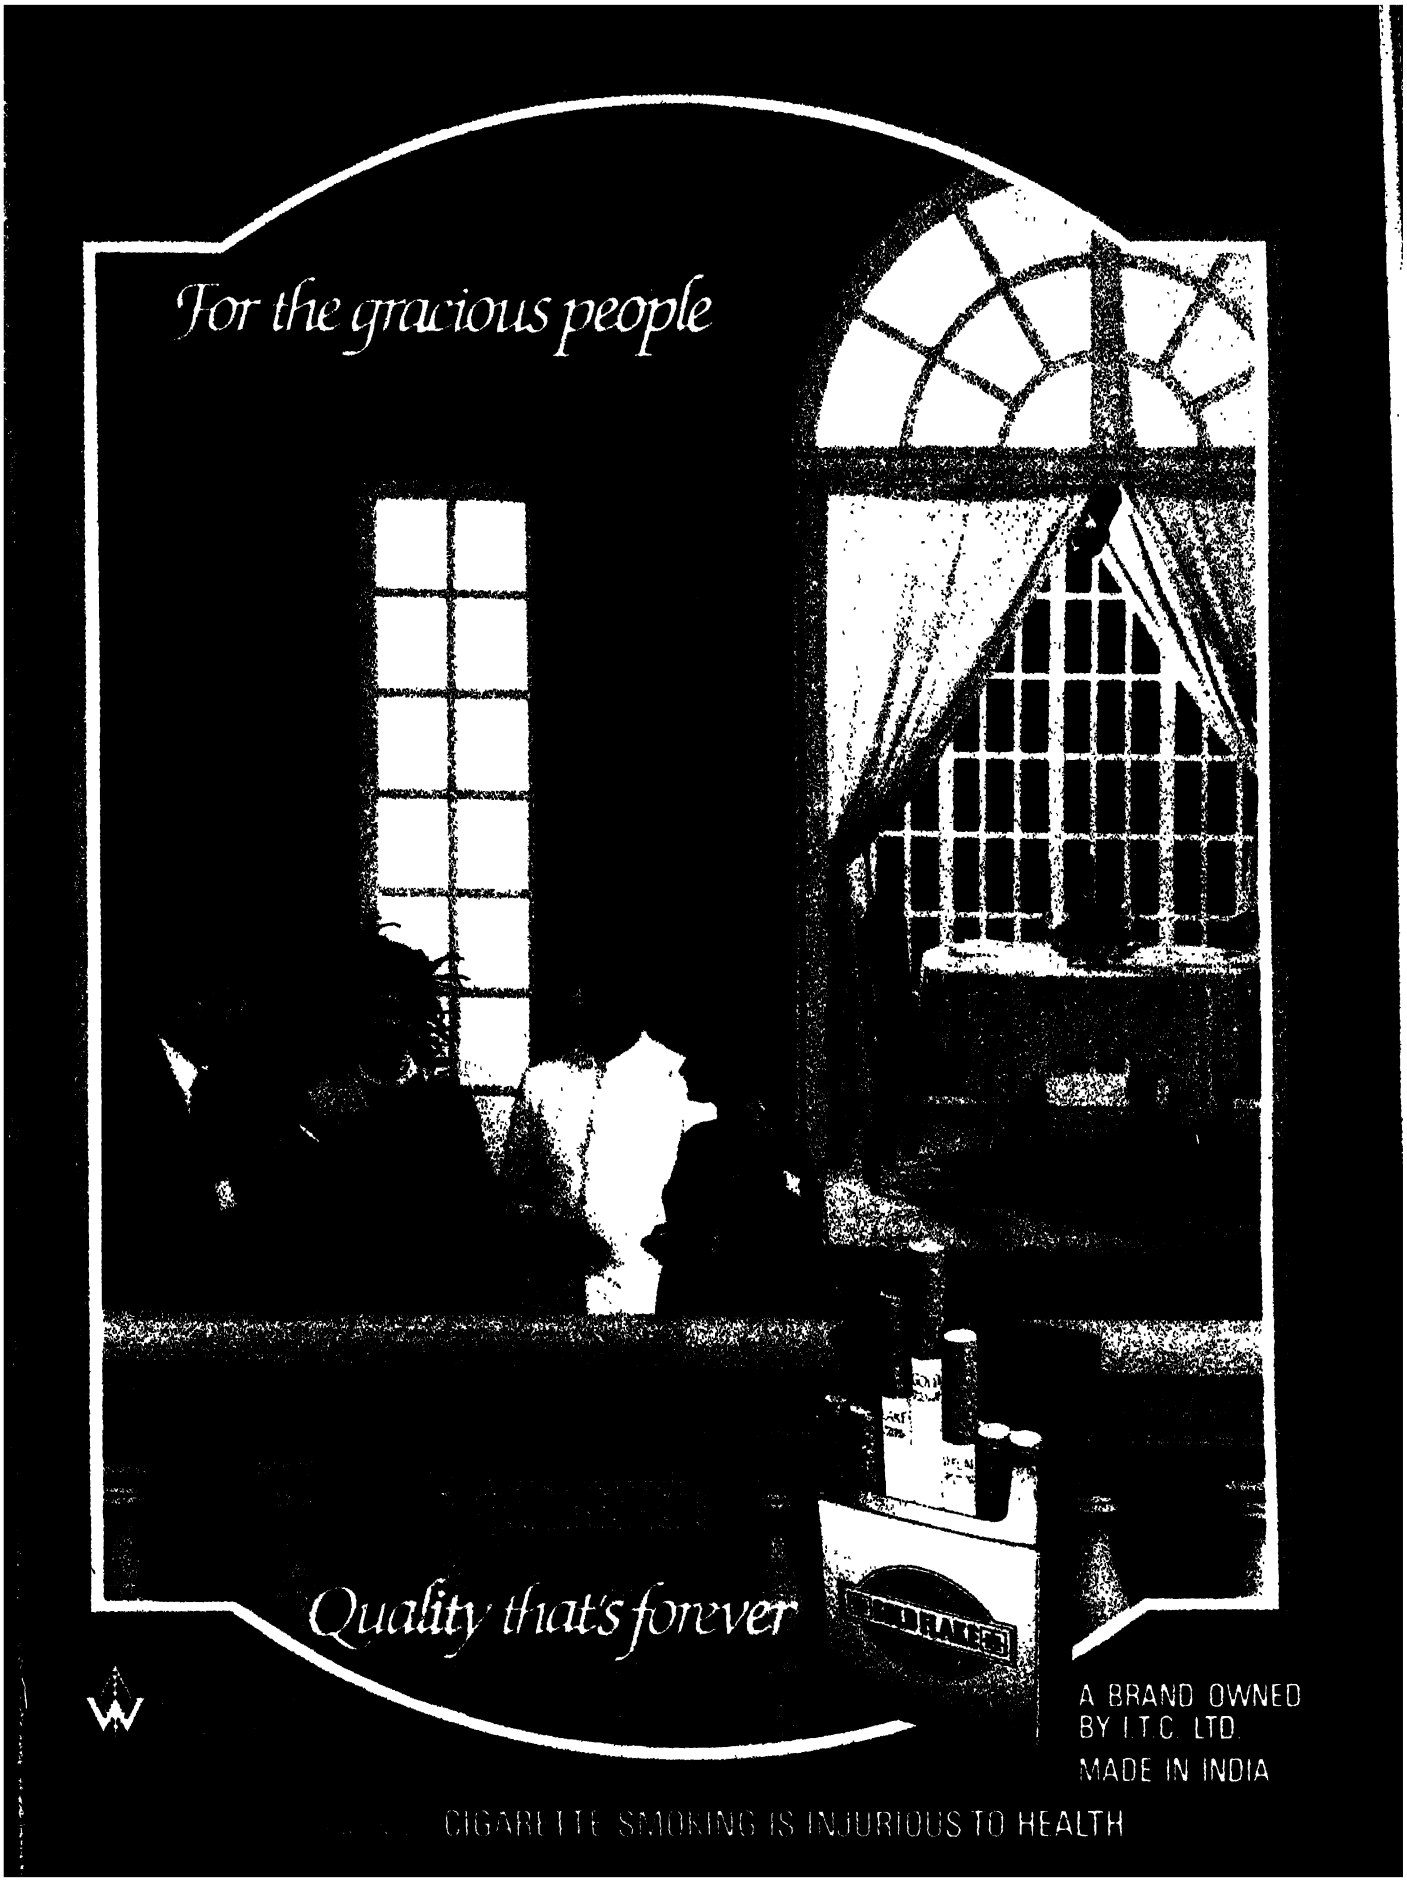
How the Raja's advisers rate



Sharad Yadav: The new strongman of the Janata Dal. Everytime VP is depressed, Yadav bucks him up with a hefty dose of OBC rhetoric.

Ram Vilas Paswan: Not so much an adviser as a cheerleader. The Raja needs him to keep his potential Scheduled Caste constituency intact.

Vinod Pande: Less important than he used to be now that V.P. Singh has transformed himself into the Raja of Mandal. Still important in administrative matters though.

Arun Nehru: Disapproves heartily of Mandal. And so his faction sees no point in helping VP cope with the crisis. Is back to travelling abroad on a regular basis.

The Express Lobby: Not the monolith that people think it is. Arun Shourie is viciously anti-VP, but S. Gurumurthy is more sympathetic. Nevertheless, the Raja feels let down by his favourite newspaper.

The dancing sensation

The cover story on Madhuri Dixit (Ek, do, queen, 7--13 October) was a refreshing change. Madhuri looks startlingly different. And her performances in Ram Lakhan, Tezaab and Dil were definitely above average. She has been cautious enough to judiciously mix commercial appeal with her acting ability.

Madhuri's biggest advantage is that she looks very much a woman of flesh and blood and success has not gone to her head. In today's world of showbiz, one has to compromise a lot. So, Madhuri has to put in memorable performances in order to carve a niche for herself in this highly competitive market.

Chiranjib Haldar, New Delhi

■ The write-up on Madhuri Dixit was simply superb. In fact, Madhuri, the glamour girl of Indian cinema, is a judicious blend of the beauty of Madhubala, the innocence of Jaya Bachchan, serenity of Waheeda Rehman and the sensuousness of Dimple. Her ability to evoke emotions speaks volumes of her natural talent. Her perfect physique enhances her electrifying presence on the silver screen. She also has the added advantage of being the girl next door.

She danced her way into the heart of millions in Tezaab and people went crazy listening to the Ek do teen number. In Dil, she has beautifully characterised the role of a college girl and also a woman totally dedicated and obsessed with her husband's love. Though she now faces tough competition, she still reigns supreme, and seems all set to pip Sridevi to the post.

Shubhendu Mohanty, Bhubaneswar (Orissa)

■ It was a real pleasure going through the cover story on Madhuri Dixit. She is undoubtedly a gifted star with a bright future ahead of her. It seems that she is quite balanced and she has proved her versatility in many films ranging from Tezaab, Ram Lakhan to Dil. She should now concentrate on doing meaningful films instead of the regular dance and disappear ones.

S. Hussain, Dibrugarh (Assam)

■ The article on Madhuri was really good and entertaining. There is no doubt about her acting talents and histrionics. But since she has already established herself in the topsy-turvy tinsel world, she should now concentrate on choosing roles which give her the scope to portray her acting prowess. This will help her to prove her versatility both as a commercial artist and as an actress in the true sense.

J. Sarkar, Calcutta (West Bengal)

■ The Ek do teen girl has definitely made a mark in Hindi cinema with her pleasing looks, attractive figure and dancing talent. In Madras, Tezaab ran for several successful weeks mainly due to Madhuri's scintillating performance. It was her dancing which captured the hearts of the cine-goers. Undoubtedly, Madhuri is all set to become the queen.

Jayanthy Subramaniam, Madras (Tamil Nadu)

Madhuri Dixit: the reigning star

■ Madhuri has come a long way since her Hifazat days to establish herself as the numero uno among the present crop of Hindi heroines. Her sincerity, remarkable talent and professional approach have set her on the road to success. It was Madhuri's rendering of the Ek do teen number that exposed her acting talent in such ample measure which really did wonders to her film career.

She may not have the oomph of Sridevi but she has a classical dimension which Sridevi lacks. Her ability to infuse realism into every sequence is her forte. And with Dil's phenomenal success, she has established herself as a star performer.

Shashank Shekhar, Meerut (Uttar Pradesh)

Business sense

Abid Hussain's interview ("India needs the US", 16—22 September) was like a whiff of fresh air. His remark, "In order to enrich the poor we don't have to impoverish the rich. And in order to strengthen the weak we don't have to weaken the strong", should be repeated over and over again for our policy-makers to see its wisdom. For 40 years, Congress leaders have succeeded in just doing the opposite by making the poor poorer and the rich richer. At least, let us give V.P. Singh a fair chance.

Hussain: plain-speaking

But Abid Hussain, in his otherwise lucid answers, strikes a discordant note when he says, "That is where a state will continuously have to come in to see that private profit does not harm social benefit." Does this not provide the garb to the government to do what it has been doing so far? The right thing would be that the private profits should be channelised to do social good. Of course, befriending USA would do India a lot of good. A little less of egoism in us will certainly repair our relationship with the great country.

R. Singh, New Delhi

Wrong policy

The special report, The siege of Jaffna (23—29 September), vividly describes the prevailing situation in northern Sri Lanka. There is a tragic human problem on the island and India should not stand by watching idly. The time has come for India to take a diplomatic step and help bring about a peaceful reconciliation in Sri Lanka.

A. Jacob Sahayam, Thiruvananthapuram (Kerala)

Tarnished image

The special report (A dangerous place, 2—8 September) shocked everybody. Ruled by the Marxists, West Bengal had a relatively clean record as far as state administration was concerned. It is time chief minister Jyoti Basu did some soul-searching and toned up his administration.

K.V. Rajagopalan, Madras (Tamil Nadu)

Dividing the nation

The cover story (Caste war, 16—22 September) reveals an hitherto unknown aspect of V.P. Singh's character: his spinelessness. At a time when children are dying on the streets of India every day, when public property worth crores are being destroyed, the Prime Minister remains unmoved, busy framing his arbitrary policies. It is time he realises that an empire can't be built on the tombstone of the nation's youth or by dividing the people along caste lines.

R.N. Vaswani, Bombay (Maharashtra)

Anti-reservationists on the rampage: but VP is unmoved

Speaking out

Azharuddin's views in the article, It's not cricket (16—22 September) were precisely to the point. Ever since Bishen Singh Bedi took over as manager of the Indian cricket team, his attitude towards the players attracted considerable criticism. Moreover, his ill-timed comments on former Indian skipper Sunil Gavaskar put Bedi in the thick of a controversy. Therefore, it was not unusual for Azharuddin to have demanded the abolition of the post of the cricket manager. It is now up to the BCCI to sort out things if it wants to get a better performance from Azhar and his men.

B. Nithyananda Rao, Tezpur (Assam)

Planting stories?

I am happy to be able to reassure Mani Shankar Aiyar (whose remark about potshots being taken at personalities amused me in this context) that I did not pass any story on the Haksar report either under or over the table to anyone (Culture vultures, 12—18 August). But why has he overlooked the fact that The Hindu carried a story on the Haksar report from its special correspondent in Delhi on 24.7. '90, one day before Anjali Puri's story in the Indian Express?

K.V. Ramanathan, resident editor, Indian Express, Madras (Tamil Nadu) Ameeta: is the trauma over?

Not the final verdict

If one were to go by the court verdict (Acquitted!, 7—13 October), then the agony of Ameeta Modi, wife of the slain Syed Modi, is over. But if one considers the human angle of the incident, then her trauma has not ended. For, whatever the court might say, it is clear that Ameeta was definitely having an extra-marital affair with Sanjay Singh and was in a way resposible for the death of her husband. Ameeta Modi does not deserve any sympathy.

City characters

Every city has its eccentric characters in every age. When names of city fathers, judges and other dignitaries are forgotten, these eccentrics are remembered by generations to come. Strangely enough, it is beggars and hawkers who pass into local legend more than the rich and the distinguished. When I recall my younger days in Delhi, it is not upper class dandies or whoremongers that come to mind but the colourful beggars who came to the door for alms or hawkers selling chana jor garam or peytee kee barfee. One regular visitor to our home was a large, swarthy, grey-bearded Muslim draped in saffron robes from neck to ankle. In a melodious voice he chanted, "Aarey! aarey! teyrey bacchon kee khair maangey Jamna Fakeer." My grandmother toppled a katora full of flour in his jhola. Then there was an elderly Rajasthani woman dressed in white and apparently from a good family. She sang a couplet ending with "talaab banaa do pakka". She was raising money to have a brick-lined pond in her desert village. She was always invited in, asked how the pond project was going on and given five rupees. Both the Jamna Fakeer and the pond lady must have died a long time ago but their memories haunt me.

Glasgow has had its poor eccentrics who are remembered to this day. Dorothy Whitaker has been able to dig out the past of 14 of them and reconstructed their pictures from accounts that have come down in Auld Hawkie and other Glasgow Characters. "Society has always had to deal as it thought best with those poor unfortunates whose physical or mental disabilities rendered them incapable of earning a living by ordinary means," she writes. And continues, "A few of them, very few, however, refused to become anonymous, refused to relinquish their individualities—and in doing so earned the sobriquet of 'characters'...Their names and careers have come down to us, those defiant non-conformists with whom even Bailies and grand city magnates were not ashamed to indulge in verbal sword-play and whose sayings and actions amused and still amuse the citizens."

Glasgow's list of characters begin with "Blind Alick". Alexander Macdonald born in 1771, lost his vision due to small pox but became a popular fiddler playing in the streets and at weddings. Dwarfish, dressed in rags and usually drunk but remembered in ballads to this day.

The most famous of Glasgow's characters was William Cameron, renamed by himself as Auld Hawkie. He had only one leg but a loud preacher's voice and went about in his rags preaching fiery sermons on the fate of evil-doers. He has been described as one of the greatest and wittiest beggars that ever infested the streets of Glasgow. He published a book, The Prophecies of Hawie, A Cow. He died in 1851 and is the subject of a biography published in 1888.

Glasgow still has a few colourful beggars who might be recognised as characters. One I saw on the steps of the Central Station. She was a fat, old blind woman with silver white hair and her white cane. She sat on the ground swilling beer and throwing crumbs of bread to flocks of pigeons which surrounded her. Also sang lustily in a most unmelodious voice. If anyone teased her by calling her "hey granny", she broke into a torrent of abuse, "git goin you bloody mother fuckin bastard! I'll spit on yer behookie (backside)".

Strangely enough, it is beggars and hawkers who pass into local legend more than the rich and the distinguished

I ran into one man who is bound to find his name among Glasgow's characters. By no means a beggar but a reasonably prosperous shopkeeper. He is a sardarji in his forties. Early one morning, as I stepped out of my hotel to get the morning papers, I couldn't believe my eyes when I saw a blue turbanned Sikh in yellow shirt, kuccha, sneakers, a kirpan slung on his side jogging along at some speed with his pedigreed Alsatian dog following on his heels. I saw him enter the news vendor's shop. As I entered he greeted me with a loud "Wah guru jee ka Khalsa, wah Guru jee ki Fateh." I replied meekly with a "Sat Sri Akal." He collected his paper, gave the paper vendor blessings of the Sacchey Padshah and was off hurtling down the road with his German Shepherd. "He is an ardent jogger," said the shopkeeper to me. "He does his ten-mile run every morning. He runs in the city marathons every year and is always among the first five. With his turban, beard and kirpan, everyone recognises him. And likes him because he exudes cheer and goodwill. Always full of blessings of the Sachhey Padshah." I discovered his identity from Sewa Singh Kohli. He has been teaching mathematics in a Glasgow school for 20 years and there he is known as Master Ajit Singh. His wife, sons and daughter live in Bradford. He spends all his spare time doing service in one or the other of Glasgow's four gurudwaras. Whatever he saves he sends to Bhagat Puran Singh's pingalwara (leprasarium) in Amritsar.

The next morning I went to check up with the news vendor. "No", he said. "The man you met here is not Master Ajit Singh. Ajit is unwell. This man is Amreek Singh, he runs a grocery shop. Also jogs every day and runs in the marathon."

So there are two sardars who will go down in the Glasgow book of record as characters: ●

BJP vs Rest of India

And, in the battle, the Mandal report and V.P. Singh will be automatic casualties

Those of us who instruct the world on a weekly or fortnightly basis seldom admit to fallibility. A pundit who gets it all wrong will soon be out of a job; and the wise one leaves enough escape routes in his manuscript so that he can beat a hasty retreat. A luminary pundit, who wrote reams of praise for the Emergency, when confronted with the uncomfortable fact keeps insisting that if you read para 9 line 5 of his article in X publication you will discover with what vigour he had opposed Indira Gandhi's "bitter medicine" to the nation.

Without claiming any prizes for candour, I at least must confess to being utterly and totally wrong in my analysis of Lal Krishna Advani and the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP). In these very columns I had argued that while Mr Advani and his party will make much theatre out of the Ram Janmabhoomi/Babri Masjid controversy, they will baulk when it comes to a final confrontation. And if the BJP had second thoughts about the wisdom of pursuing 30 October as a do-or-die date, the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP) would also cave in, finding the 'larger national interest' a convenient alibi. All the government had to do, I argued, was to stand firm on its original commitment favouring either a mutually acceptable settlement or the court's verdict.

With Diwali crackers bursting all around, the BJP president has exploded his own time-bomb, one which unequivocally sets him and his party on a collision course with all responsible thinking in the country. While Rajiv Gandhi played his characteristic cat-and-mouse game with the all-party conference in Delhi, the Congress position on the temple/mosque dispute is no different from that of the National Front government. (I suspect Mr Gandhi is sitting back for a while and enjoying seeing V.P. Singh stew in the Janmabhoomi juice). Thus, with 21 recognised political parties behind the government, it is BJP vs Rest of India. Mr Advani is going for broke, and I can forward no rational explanation why he has taken such an enormous gamble—one in which chances for success are extremely slim.

The gamble becomes even more inexplicable when you consider that at the very top the BJP is made up of inveterate non-gamblers, prudent, thrifty, calculating men who think well into the next century and are not given to hankering after consolation prizes. Why, one may then ask, have they boxed themselves into a position from where movement is impossible? After having arrested 5,500 BJP and VHP activists in Uttar Pradesh, Mulayam Singh Yadav can hardly back down, while V.P. Singh has at last found an issue on which dithering and backtracking are not required.

Moreover, the dramatic, even insolent, manner in which Mr Advani has posed the challenge leaves no option for the beleaguered Prime Minister but to arrest the BJP president the moment his rath sets wheels in Uttar Pradesh. I notice that the responsibility for communicating to the President that the BJP has withdrawn support for the V.P. Singh-led minority government has been left to Atal Behari Vajpayee. We must therefore conclude that he is a major player in this nasty adventurism. Subramaniam Swamy maintains: "When it comes to the crunch Vajpayee is a coward." Sadly, Atalji is lending substance to that charge.

Miracles, especially when such formidable gods are being placated, should not be ruled out, but at this late stage I cannot see the courts or hastily-stitched formulas obliging. At any rate, Mr Advani has now categorically rejected the jurisdiction of the Allahabad High Court (the fact that he and Vajpayee all of three weeks ago initialed a resolution, under the aegis of the National Integration Council, agreeing to abide by the court's verdict is presumably history) and solutions like the one put forward by Mahant Avaidyanath which avoid demolition of the mosque are unacceptable to the BJP. Only the "relocation of the structure" will satisfy L.K. Advani.

I can forward just one explanation for the course the BJP has charted out. Mr Advani has been so beguiled by the "tremendous response" to his rath yatra that he feels his party has finally found an instrument to counteract the ravages of Mandal and reestablish the primacy of Hindutva. Admittedly, the crowds that have greeted Advani since he embarked on his historic journey have been tremendous. The piety in which the yatra has been bathed has given it a fervour which, on superficial examination, combines religiosity with some vague feeling that Hindu honour is being reasserted. Nevertheless, whatever the mood and the motivation of the multitudes, Mr Advani is too seasoned a politician to fall for the crowd gambit.

He has only to look around him to observe that another shifty customer (Rajiv Gandhi) on a yatra not unlike his own is also drawing phenomenal numbers. Which proves? Yesterday I got a call from a friend in Lucknow breathless with excitement over the anti-communal rallies staged in various parts of UP by Mulayam Singh Yadav. It seems lakhs upon lakhs of people of all denominations and creeds sat patiently listening to pleas for communal harmony, restraint and, finally, resolve. Moral: the easiest thing in India is to gather people.

Mr Advani should know better than anyone else that crowds do not necessarily translate into votes. Two examples from the not too distant past should refresh the BJP president's memory. In 1987, Mr Rajiv Gandhi's election meetings in West Bengal were so well attended that his acolytes predicted the Bay of Bengal for Jyoti Basu and the CPI(M) in the Assembly elections. More recently, in Tamil Nadu, after the death of MGR, the equation between crowds and votes did not materialise for the Congress, even though Rajiv got the kind of throngs his mother would have been proud of. Surely, Mr Advani cannot be a victim of this fallacy?

What Mr Advani has bequeathed to the nation is a general election sometime in March or April '91. Since the BJP has declared that under no circumstances will it support the Congress, and since neither the Janata Dal or the Congress can cobble together a working majority, President Venkataraman will have to dissolve Parliament with V.P. Singh as caretaker Prime Minister in the interim period. The BJP leader seemed fully prepared for this eventuality because along with his threat to withdraw support, he said defiantly: "Let there be a mid-term poll."

Famous last words? Just under a year ago, the BJP won 88 seats to Parliament, an all-time record and a substantial improvement on its 1984 tally of two. Madhya Pradesh, Rajasthan, Gujarat, Maharashtra and Bihar provided the best pickings for the party. However, in most of these states there were seat adjustments which enabled straight fights—a situation not likely in today's scenario. Indeed, the BJP will be presented to the nation as the single villain which cut short India's second experiment with a non-Congress government at the Centre. Subsequently, three or four-cornered contests, which have traditionally favoured the Congress, will become inevitable.

Whatever enthusiasm L.K. Advani's rath yatra may have evoked among the Hindus, in north India at least Mandal will have its impact. V.P. Singh will go around the cow belt shouting that the upper/intermediate castes have stabbed him in the front because he was committed to the Other Backward Castes (OBC). As a result, the BJP will enter the election without benefit of straight contests and the sword of Mandal hovering menacingly. In the circumstances, I would be most surprised if Mr Advani's party retained even half its strength in the Lok Sabha.

It is a devious thought, but could the BJP have deliberately created this crisis simply to get rid of Mandal, in which case V.P. Singh would be an automatic casualty? Rajiv Gandhi's Congress, recipient of 42 per cent of the national vote last time around, has only to hang on to its 1989 support base to win a clear majority in the emerging scenario. To ensure that victory, a sacrifice of 50-odd seats in Parliament for five years is not too high a price to pay if the BJP's principal demon (Mandal) is removed from the national agenda—something Rajiv Gandhi is guaranteed to do on assuming power.

Meanwhile, Mr Gandhi's incredible run of good luck continues. Despite his manifest and numerous deficiencies as a leader, he seems destined to preside over our destinies. Not only was he born with a golden spoon in his mouth, but the gods look benignly on him. They don't on V.P. Singh. He is smart, sincere, capable, relatively honest, but nothing goes right for him. His failure has tragic dimensions. Politics, alas, is a cruel game in which losers, however attractive, can operate only from the margins. •

Like Advani, another shifty customer, Rajiv Gandhi, is also on a yatra around the country. And he too is drawing phenomenal numbers. But crowds do not necessarily translate into votes

Enter Bangarappa

The new Karnataka CM has his work cut out for him

The ten days of nerve-wracking political uncertainty in Karnataka may have ended with the revocation of President's Rule and the swearing-in of a new Congress chief minister. But S. Bangarappa—despite the apparent support of the majority of MLAs—is likely to have his work cut out for him.

Although the ambitious backward class leader may have every reason to be delighted with his ascension ("I am very happy. Why shouldn't I be?" he told SUNDAY), Bangarappa's term could well be marked by many difficulties.

For one, he inherits a state that was ruled by Veerendra Patil who, although non-descript and unenigmatic, provided a stable and efficient administration. Patil may have had his share of detractors, but he was able—and that too in the face of orchestrated attempts by the high command to foment trouble—to contain dissidence in what is a notoriously divided state Congress party.

If Bangarappa is likely to have more difficulty in keeping his flock together, it is because his relations with most senior partymen are already very strained. His infamous temper and his tendency to be caustic and scathing have contributed in large measure to this state of affairs. Although he has tried hard to mend fences after becoming chief minister, there are few Congress state leaders—whether K.H. Patil, Veerappa Moily or Janardhan Poojary—who do not have serious reservations about him. Even Gundu Rao—who was forced by the high command to withdraw his claim and back Bangarappa for the post—is no friend. In the late Seventies, Bangarappa, who was a minister in Gundu Rao's Cabinet, held him guilty (on a staggering 60 counts) of maladministration and inefficiency before quitting the Congress and forming his own party.

That not everyone was happy with his nomination was evident when state heavyweight Veerappa Moily was absent at Bangarappa's swearing-in. Moily, who fancied himself as the strongest contender, however, denies that he was trying to make his displeasure known by staying away. "I was with (central observer) G K. Moopanar at that time. There are no motives for my absence at the function," he said.

On the face of it, Bangarappa's backward class credentials—which was what perhaps tilted the balance in his favour—may appear as an advantage. But Bangarappa—unlike his former mentor Devaraj Urs—does not enjoy the reputation of someone who has worked for the downtrodden. Moreover, he presides over a legislature party which comprises as many as 43 Lingayats and 41 Vokkaligas—the two powerful communities that between themselves have ruled Karnataka for much of the time since Independence.

Although the Lingayats have lost Veerendra Patil (who was perhaps their ablest representative) and the Vokkaligas are badly divided among themselves, neither community has been traditionally well-disposed to an Bangarappa has more to fear from his own party than the Opposition. As Patil and other Congress CMs of Karnataka have learnt, the threat within is often more dangerous than the threat without

A long climb

After many abortive attempts, Bangarappa makes it to the top

Fifty-seven-year-old Sorakoppa Bangarappa has never concealed his desire to be Karnataka's chief minister. It is a dream he has cherished for over a decade—an ambition which has often brought him into confrontation with his political colleagues.

When he was sworn in recently as the state's CM before a large number of his jubilant supporters, Bangarappa reached the apex of what has been a chequered political career. He entered politics as a Lohiaite and was one of the three MLAs elected on the Samyukta Socialist Party (SSP) ticket. But he got into a wrangle over the question of leadership and formed his own party—the Karnataka Kranti-kari Paksha. In 1977, he accepted Devaraj Urs' invitation to join the Congress and was offered a ministry as a reward.

In time, Urs and Mrs Gandhi fell apart, leading the former to form the Congress(U) and later the Kranti Ranga. Although much was made of the Congress(U), it was badly defeated in the 1978 elections by Mrs Gandhi's Congress.

Bangarappa, who was then the Karnataka Pradesh Congress chief, staked his claim for the chief ministership. But just when he seemed certain to make it, Mrs Gandhi sprang a surprise by plumping for the controversial Gundu Rao.

Bangarappa, despite nursing many grudges against Gundu Rao for pipping him to the post, joined his ministry nevertheless. But, clearly, the disgruntled politician was only biding his time. When Urs died, Bangarappa made his move.

After raising as many as 60 charges of inefficiency and maladministration against Gundu Rao, he quit the Congress and went back to the Kranti Ranga. To his credit he managed to rejuvenate the party. In the 1983 elections, the Kranti Ranga won 33 seats after forging an alliance with the Janata. Although the Janata had many more, Bangarappa began eyeing the chief minister's chair again.

Once again, he lost out—this time to Ramakrishna Hegde, who emerged as a compromise candidate in the squabble between the Lingayat and Vokkaliga lobbies. Bangarappa, somewhat typically, became a rabid Hegde-hater—he remains one to this day.

Hegde offered to make him deputy chief minister but, evidently, Bangarappa didn't think this befitted a man of his stature. In keeping with his reputation as a floor-crosser, Bangarappa—who perhaps realised he could not shake Hegde's grip on the Janata—changed horses once again and rejoined the Congress. His reward: the post of leader of the Opposition in the Assembly.

He was in the running for the chair once more when the Congress routed the Janata Dal in the 1989 elections. When he lost out to Patil, he may have believed he would have to wait another five years to occupy the chair. Tropically, it came to him when he least expected it.

'outsider' running the state. Bangarappa may not face a threat from either at the moment, but he will have to be cautious (and also perhaps hold his infamous tongue) when dealing with them.

The new chief minister is probably aware of such problems. After being sworn in, he went to embarrassing lengths to make out that he will always be a loyal servant of the high command. I will always consult Rajiv Gandhi about every step I take, he said. Given the potential dissidence he may have to face and the fate that his predecessor Veerendra Patil met, the abject show of subservience was perhaps politically expedient.

While Bangarappa has promised to do all the right things—eradicate poverty, improve administration, speed up developmental work and so on—there are bound to be comparisons between his rule and Patil's. One of the questions that has generated interest is how he will deal with the extremely well-entrenched and often corrupt liquor trade in the state.

Patil's term was marked by strong measures against the liquor lobby which won him the reputation of being honest and gutsy Bangarappa, however, has been very evasive when asked if he will continue with the measures Patil took when chief minister—only adding to the suspicion that he was installed at the behest of the liquor lobby. If he allows the trade the kind of untrammelled freedom it enjoyed in R.K. Hegde's time, then the contrast with Patil's reign will be all the more marked.

Bangarappa has less cause to worry about the Opposition Patil (who has been suspended from the party) may have won a great many admirers by standing up to Rajiv Gandhi, but politically, his options are limited. He does not enjoy the kind of support required to strike out on his own and is in any case much too ill to mount a challenge at the moment. He may choose to join the Janata Dal, but the state party—now managed by S.R. Bommai, J.H. Patil and Jeevaraj Alva—stands discredited by its performance when it was last in power. Moreover, Bangarappa has the necessary majority to fend off an attack from this quarter.

So, Bangarappa has more to fear from his own party than the Opposition. As Patil and other Congress chief ministers of Karnataka have learnt, the threat within is often more dangerous than the threat without. ●

Fear of terrorists is turning Punjab's rural folk into urbanites

Ranjit Avenue is one of the posher localities of Amritsar. Only sometimes, it does not seem that way. Visitors to the city are surprised when they find farmers atop tractors returning home in the evening to their bungalows in Ranjit Avenue. "This," says Sarabjeet Singh, the deputy commissioner of Amritsar, "is because of the urbanisation of rural families." And, despite a general real estate slump in Punjab, rents in the area keep moving up.

The phenomenon has been noticed in several cities and small towns in Punjab, especially those in the violence-ridden districts of Amritsar, Gurdaspur and Ferozepur. The reason: the large-scale internal migration which began in Punjab around 1986, but which has increased, thanks to the growing terrorist problem.

The militants continue to use the rural areas as their operational bases and for shelter. As a corollary—obvious, in a way—the rich peasantry have become targets for extortions and kidnapping. As a result, the rural-folk are abandoing their ancestral behks (farmhouses) and are looking for safer residences in towns.

The trend has been noticed by officials at the state's police headquarters in Chandigarh. Interestingly, available figures show that the exodus out of Punjab has trailed off somewhat, and a larger number of families are opting to migrate to urban areas in the state. So, say officials, as much as two-thirds of the movement in Punjab can be categorised as internal migration.

Interestingly, again, while 70 per cent of all external migrations take place among Hindu families, as many as 80 per cent of the rural families moving to towns are Sikhs. Says Sanjiv Gupta, senior superintendent of police in Amritsar: "Every house (in the rural areas) has become a hideout. The terrorists come and demand money, clothes, use of telephone and food. There are allegations of rape, and especially, the villagers with grown-up daughters are slowly moving to towns."

Deputy commissioner Singh points out that many of the internal migrants were among those who had been contemplating a shift to towns for some years. "Earlier," he says, "they were planning the action to improve their style of living, but were lethargic about it. Terrorism and its resultant insecurity became an immediate provocation."

Take Gohalwar, a Sikh-dominated village in Tarn Taran district. "Since the past one year," says Sohan Singh, the sarpanch, "rich Sikh farmers have become targets of extortions. They are being forced to leave and are mostly taking to trading in towns." Dilbagh Singh, a Gohalwar farmer, explains that besides threats and extortion demands, people of both communities are suffering a complete change of lifestyle. They have stopped tending to fields at night—previously a regular practice. And in any case, if the villagers were not moving to towns they were shifting from their behks to the lal dora areas, which are really a cluster of houses in the centre of the village unit.

Many farmers, says Dilbagh, worked in the fields throughout the day and returned to the lal dora area by the evening. Those who had already shifted to towns made sure they returned home before sunset. Many farmhouses had become be sirag, or abandoned, with terrorists using them as hideouts at will. "It saddens our hearts," laments Dilbagh, "but people don't dare to return to the farmhouses again. And they have no resale value because nobody is willing to buy them."

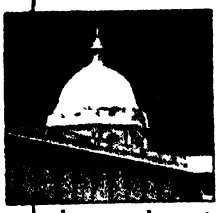
More tales of woe, now from Rajesh Kumar, earlier a resident of Boparai Kalan village in Amritsar district. On 7 October, 1987, his family was attacked by militants while they were returning home from their cloth shops in the village chowk. The gang demanded the day's take from the group. When they resisted, the militants opened fire. Four of Rajesh's family, including an uncle and three cousins, were killed.

Rajesh left Boparai Kalan after the 13-day mourning period, never to return. At that time, there were 14 Hindu families in the village. Now, there are none. Rajesh and his clan shifted to Charhta, an industrial town in the outskirts of Amritsar, and took two shops on rent. Only his father attends to the business in the village, and returns in the evening. His interpretation: "Though work in the town is slack, it is far better than facing the dread every day in the village."

There are many Sikhs, too, who like the Hindus have migrated to Charhta. Says Sawinder Singh, a cloth merchant, originally from Badri village in Ajanala district: "I will never go back. I am not even interested in visiting the village I have left behind."

Last year, Sawinder's family received an extortion demand from the Bhindranwale Tiger Force of Khalistan (BTFK). The family had heard horror stories of families who had defied such demands being totally wiped out by the militants. Helpless, they paid up the Rs 50,000—in instalments—and then, fled to the town. Though there were commonplace incidents of violence in large towns and cities too, the villages were worst affected. "Even today," says Sawinder, "terrorists are moving around freely with automatic rifles, with nobody to stop them. Extortions are increasing. Even if Khalistan is formed, many Sikhs like me will leave Punjab and go and live in Delhi."

What is most unfortunate is that with ever-increasing migrations, the complexion of rural Punjab is being transformed. As a people, the Sikhs are a flamboyant, aggressive lot, fond of—among other things— flouting their wealth. All that is a thing of the past. Rich farmers and landlords now conceal their income, call off celebrations and even take their drink behind locked doors.



The movement of militants and frequent encounters between the gangs and the police have obliterated the peace and tranquility of the villages. And ironically, though displacement for the villagers was something like an amputation, urbanisation was the only way out for survival. •

INDER MALHOTRA

Ignoring India

New Delhi is excluded from the Cambodian peace process

If only to get away from the subject of Pakistan, let us turn our gaze to some other developments of significance in the realm of international relations. And since we have to endure what we cannot cure, let us also dispense with the lament about the lack of interest in foreign affairs because of our doleful absorption in the almost literally burning and bloody issues of Mandal and mandir.

To begin with, a word of gratitude to the Cambodian Prime Minister, Hun Sen. But for his visit to New Delhi no one in the corridors of power here would have given a moment's thought to Cambodia or the vexed Cambodian issue, now mercifully nearing a solution. Hun Sen put his finger on the heart of the matter when he pleaded, courteously but pointedly, for a greater Indian role in smoothening the transition in Cambodia from a seemingly unending war to durable peace.

Indo-Chinese surely is an area where our stakes are very high. Time was when nothing of importance could happen without Indian participation. Now others are as anxious to exclude us from the Cambodian peace process as we seem to be to stay out of it.

It would be instructive to look back at the story from the beginning. In 1954, when the first Geneva conference on Indo-Chinese took place, the Big Four—the US, the Soviet Union, Britain and France—had invited only China to join them (Dulles, of course, had refused to shake hands with Zhou Enlai). India was not asked. But without standing on ceremony, Krishna Menon, clearly with Jawaharlal Nehru's consent, invited himself to Geneva and worked tirelessly to veer the conference towards a solution India could support. Since then India has been chairman of the International Control and Supervisory Commission in each of the three Indo-Chinese states. The commissions were dysfunctional for long stretches of time; but the meaning of their continued existence was crystal clear.

By the time the second Geneva conference became necessary, in 1962, to straighten out the mess in Laos, India's active role was sought by all participants except China with which India's relations were then fast deteriorating.

Then followed the long night of the Vietnam War and the unspeakable Cambodian nightmare during which a third of its population was butchered by a regime backed by both the US and China until only the other day. No one could do anything for the Cambodians during those terrible years.

However, during the second half of the last decade the world conscience was disturbed and an international conference on Cambodia in Paris began. India was duly invited to it. Indeed, India and Canada jointly chaired a committee on "control mechanism" for whatever transition arrangements might be agreed to. Rajiv Gandhi and his minister of state for external affairs, Natwar Singh, took commendable interest in pushing forward the Cambodian peace process.

By early this year, the five permanent members of the UN Security Council had taken over the task of peace making in Cambodia. Their scheme of things, envisaging a transitional UN administration in that country, has been accepted by the four warring factions though they have not yet been able to effect a cease-fire.

Meanwhile, China has complicated matters by supplying tanks to its old clients, the murderous Khmers Rouges.

The UN-sponsored plan of the five permanent members (P-5) excludes India completely and the Janata Dal government appears to have been content with this. Apart from sending L.L. Mehrotra, a secretary in the external affairs ministry, to Djakarta and inviting Hun Sen to Delhi it has done little.

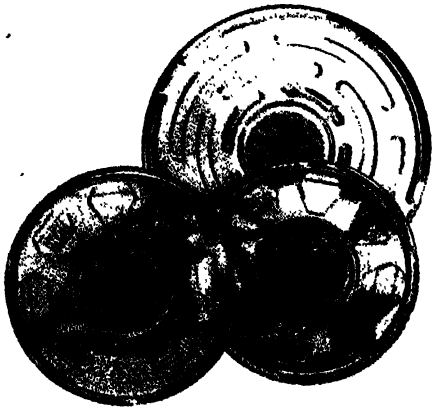
By comparison, the government's record over Afghanistan is somewhat reassuring. Najibullah's recent visit to India was a useful exercise. It strengthened his position, established largely by his own efforts, in Kabul.

Hun Sen greeting Mother Teresa

But for Hun Sen's visit to India, no one in the corridors of power would have spared a moment's thought to the Cambodian issue

Since then, however, Pakistan—more specifically, the notorious Inter Services Intelligence (ISI)—has launched a last-ditch assault on the Najib regime in the hope that, having belied earlier expectations of its overnight disintegration, it would fall now. A two-pronged attack on the Afghan capital is now on, and its outcome remains to be seen.

The desperate Pakistani plan has two objectives: to topple hitherto unbeatable Najib and to replace him by the totally fundamentalist group of Peshawar-based Mujahideen, led by Gulbuddin Hekmatyar. The second part of the plan has aroused strong opposition from other Mujahideen groups in Pakistan. But the ISI has curtly told them to lump it or get out.



The unsung hero of the Indian silver screen. It's not the young star who never made it to big time. It's not the also-ran at last year's Golden Peacock Awards. Nor is it the latest box-office flop

It is the film on which Indian cinema is captured. The very basis of the world's largest motion picture industry: Hindustan Photo Films' INDU Cine Positive Film in Colour and Black & White. And Cine Sound Negative Film.

Picture this. There are over 12,000 cinema houses in the country today, with a daily attendance of around 1,50,00,000 — and HPF's role becomes more than entertainment

It sustains the Rs.1600 crore Indian film industry. Has curtailed raw stock imports And, indirectly provides a livelihood to over 2,00,000 people.

The next time you watch an Indian movie, whether it's an award-winning production or the stuff box-office hits are made of, remember the unsung hero.

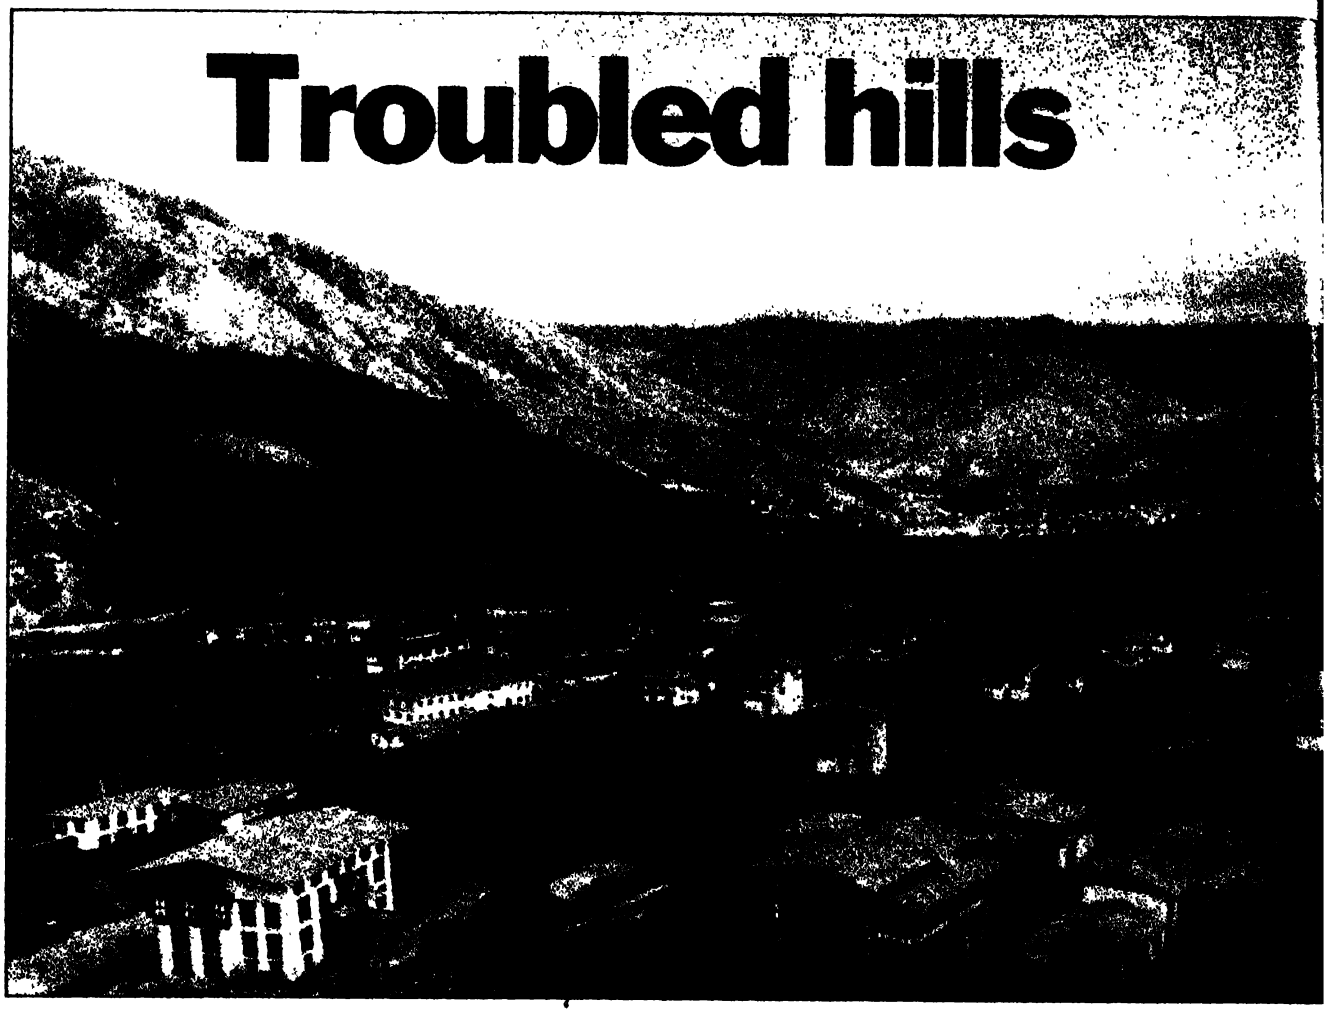
ZEN AND THE ART OF MOTORCYCLE MADNESS

"The closest I'd been to Goa was Martin's, the restaurant at Colaba. One night after the vindaloo, I decided. The bike glistened gloriously in the dawn light. But would she make it as far as Khopoli? Three days later I had been chased by a bull, had a puncture repaired by a drunk called 'English' and eaten dust for breakfast, lunch and dinner. I was also in Goa."



If it's hard to explain your obsession for motorcycles, it's probably impossible to explain why you buy Castrol Super TT. When it's tougher to find than any other engine oil. When it's more expensive. But as Zen says: some things in life should not be explained. Merely experienced.

Ethnic violence breaks out in Bhutan—and spills over into India

After a long working day, Munna Dorji, 23, garaged his employer's car and started walking back home. He only got half way. The shot that killed him was fired by the Bhutanese army—the Indian Police and locals insist. "The attack was entirely unprovoked," says Prabh Das, the district magistrate of Jalpaiguri, West Bengal. Two Indian civilians were killed and two injured in the burst of automatic fire. And the additional superintendent of police, Jalpaiguri, had a narrow escape.

For a border area, this incident at Chamurchi, on the India-Bhutan border, might not seem uncommon. But India and Bhutan have never clashed, and the shooting of Indian civilians allegedly by the Royal Bhutan Army (RBA) is unprecedented. Kanchi Dorji, 19, who had been married to Munna just a year ago, says her husband was not politically active. "He was just coming home," she mutters. Panjamaya Tamang, widow of Buddhiman Tamang, 48, also killed in the attack, says her husband had gone to the market and stopped for a paan. They simply happened to be at the wrong place at the wrong time.

But ever since some Bhutanese of Nepalese origin started agitating against the Royal Bhutan Government, things have been wrong for the locals on both sides of the border. The agitation started in late 1988, when ethnic Nepalese dissidents in southern Bhutan rebelled against the "Bhutanisation programme" of the government. The tiny Himalayan country, which still boasts a well-oiled monarchy in perfect working order, had decided to curb the influx of Nepalese immigrants, mainly from North Bengal and Assam. The alarming immigration threatened to wipe out the last off-shoot of Tibetan culture preserved in the lifestyle of the Drukpas, the original inhabitants of Bhutan. In 1988, King Jigme Singye Wangchuck ordered a new census and the implementation of Driglam Namzha or the traditional Drukpa code of conduct.

Rebelling against this "cultural imperialism", a section of the ethnic Nepalese, who constitute about 70 per cent of southern Bhutan, launched a "pro-democracy" movement to fight this "violation of human rights". The campaign for ethnic equality has now turned militant, spearheaded by three organisations—the Bhutan People's Party (BPP), the People's Forum for Human Rights (PFHR) and the Student's Union of Bhutan (SUB). The dissidents are camping along the border, on Indian soil, supported by their ethnic brethren in India and Nepal. With no clear demarcation of the border, except at a couple of points on motorable roads, and half the local Indians earning their living in Bhutan, the clash seems unavoidable.

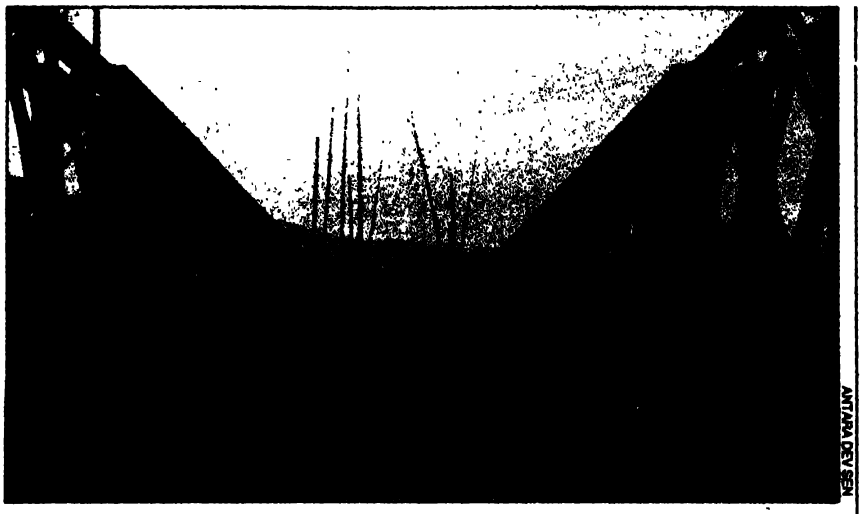
And the Chamurchi incident is not a bolt from the blue. Since early this year, the area has been heating up over various minor issues. Finally, on 23 September, to protest against the harassment faced by Indians across the border, locals blocked the road in front of the border check-post near Samchi, in Bhutan. An RBA convoy of 11 trucks was coming back to Samchi that afternoon, since roads linking the border towns of Bhutan loop through India. The officer-in-charge (OC) of the nearest police station, Banarhat, rushed to the spot, received the memorandum from the protestors, and after four hours of soft-talking, managed to clear the blockade.

Meanwhile, Rakhal Das Mukherjee, additional SP (superintendent of police) of Jalpaiguri, was on his way to the spot, overtaking the army trucks to get to the OC out front. "We were about 4 km from the check-post, passing the last but one truck," recalls Fatik Barman, Mukherjee's driver, counting from the rear. "Some boys let out a shout from the roadside and the RBA fired instantly." Barman's left eye was hurt by the splinters of a shattered windscreen as the bullet whizzed past his temple. "We have lodged a complaint and preserved the windshield as evidence," says Jalpaiguri SP Tooshar Bhattacharya.

But the Bhutan government begs to differ. According to government sources, the Indian police, failing to control the violent mob, had fired a few shots. "We offered to carry out a joint investigation with the Indian police," says a senior official. "But nothing came of it. We use 7.62 calibre SLRs and 9mm pistols, whereas the Indian police use .303s. The reports should have been conclusive."

For all of last month, the Bhutan government has been busy denying various allegations of killings. Just two days before the Chamurchi shooting, there had been a clash between the rebels and security forces in Chamurchi Bridge, in Samchi. A Kyodo and an AFP news report from Kathmandu put the toll at 327. Not a single shot had been fired, the Bhutan government countered, since the RBA and RBP (Royal Bhutan Police) were under strict instructions not to fire under any circumstances. However, hospitals in West Bengal host Bhutanese rebels under treatment for bullet injuries.



King Jigme Singye Wangchuck: preaching non-violence

According to BPP members, on 19 September, peaceful processions started out from various parts of southern Bhutan, including Sibsu, Pugli, Phuntsholing, Samchi and Samrang. The idea was to march to the district headquarters and submit demand petitions to the dzongdags (equivalent to a district magistrate). One, 6,000-strong, marched from Charghari block to the Changmari subdivisional HQ, and on 20 September proceeded towards the district HQ at Samchi. It was first stopped at the Diana bridge, but the demonstrators defied orders and carried on. However, they could not cross the Chamurchi bridge, a few kilometres away from the dzondag's office.

The entrance of the bridge was blocked by an excavator, followed by a barricade of barbed wire. The dzondag and the police were at the other end of the bridge, ordering them to go back through a megaphone. "They had SLRs pointed at us and the SP, with some policemen, were half-way across the bridge," says Anand Chettry, a BPP member. "They suddenly started firing. About ten people must have been shot. We just ran for our lives." Bablu Tamang, 19, was on the excavator, scrambling to get to the other side. He got hit on his left leg. Recently released from hospital, he is back in the Garganda camp, near Jalpaiguri. "Many were wounded," he says. "Three were probably admitted to Luksan hospital and the others taken to Siliguri." Bir Bahadur Galey, who had climbed to the top of the excavator, was not that lucky.

And the Bhutan government admits to his killing. "They were hurling bombs at us," says Lekhpak Dorji, the Samchi dzondag, locally known as a 'toughy'. "Our SP and a constable were badly hurt by a bomb as they approached the agitators to accept their demand charter. The SP fired to cover his retreat." Apparently, SP Sonam Dhendup had fired specifically ten shots from an SLR at the excavator—which sports seven bullet marks. "Three shots are unaccounted for—those three might have wounded or killed three people..." suggests Dorji.

And there are reports of police atrocities in Sibsu, too. Shyam Pradhan, 22, being treated in the surgical ward at North Bengal Medical College and Hospital, Siliguri, was wounded there on 21 September. "The police blocked the way in Golabazar," he says. "They charged with bayonets and shot at us. We ran, but there was no escape route—it was a hilltop. Many fell to their deaths—into the Jaldhaka River far below..."

In the same ward lies Arun Rai, 16. "I wanted to fight against injustice," he says, with bewildered eyes. Dil Bahadur Chhettry, 28, Deoraj Pradhan, 20, Sarad Rai, 20, and Karga Maya Gurung, a 15-year-old girl injured in the bridge shooting, are also in surgical wards of the same hospital.

Further south, on the Indo-Bhutan border at Jaigaon-Phuntsholing, locals talk of the hundreds jailed and the handful killed by Bhutan police. In a BPP camp near Khokla basti, Jaigaon, Om Prakash, 16, nurses his wounds. "The RBP arrested us and gave us electric shocks," he says. "But they let most of them go," adds Meghnad Chhettry, 15. "Only 24 have been jailed." And among them is their camp commander, Mahindra Rana. "One Indian was killed in the violent lathicharge," says Binay Rai, 18. "He had gone to the rally because his brother worked in Bhutan."

The Bhutan government has handled the charges rather ineptly. Beginning with the no-firing-all-lies stand they passed on to a-few-shots-yes-but-nobody-in-hospital stand, finally graduating to please-open-bandages-and-inspect stand. "We use SLRs," points out Dago Tshering, the deputy home minister of Bhutan. "I would expect the victim to be killed if shot, not to lie there with a flimsy bandage."

And the government has its own quota of horror tales. The rebels' "campaign" has claimed many victims—not just killed, but maimed and mutilated grotesquely. Starting from the two administrative officials in Gomtu, who had their heads chopped off on 2 June, the confirmed number of decapitations alone by the BPP now stands at six. Photos of chopped and burnt victims, both dead and alive, fill the police files. About 152 people have been kidnapped.

Not surprisingly, people seem to be terrified of these rebels. Threat letters to administrative officials, schoolteachers and ethnic Nepalese who don't support the agitation, have practically paralysed the little kingdom, till now unexposed to political violence. Industries, schools and even some offices have closed down, and development work has come to a standstill, as all reserves and manpower are channelised to counter the agitation.

In keeping with a statement by A.P. Mukherjee, director-general (DG) of West Bengal police, that the state will not allow any agitation against Bhutan to be launched from Indian soil, the police foiled a "long march" by rebels into Bhutan scheduled for 26 August. But with an open border and the legal right of every Bhutanese national to stay in India, as well as the absence of any directive by the Indian or Bhutanese governments to extradite the agitators, the local administration seems to be at a loss. Added to that is the love and sympathy showered upon the political refugees camping in the Dooars by the Indian Nepalese, local leftist parties and the Gorkha Liberation Organisation (GLO). Besides, the GLO is supposed to be providing the rebels with arms, while an ex-CRPF man in the Lankapara camp, Kumar Thapa, is said to be giving them training.

The trouble began with the imposition of Driglam Namzha in 1988, in an attempt to preserve national heritage. This prescribed for all Bhutanese nationals the Drukpa dress—gho (or bakku) for men and kira for women—the national language Dzonkha and generally the Drukpa etiquette. Not surprisingly, the ethnic Nepalese, constituting at least 30 per cent of Bhutan's population, and a clear majority in the south, found that tough. Especially after Nepali was dropped from the school syllabus and Dzonkha made compulsory. The immigrants." The green ID, modelled on the Green Card of the US, gives all rights to the residents except the rights to vote and apply for foreign scholarships. But the rebels had started their agitation against the "racist policy" of Bhutanisation and put forward a 13-point demand charter. Apparently, in order to mobilise people the BPP uses both the carrot and the stick—promising free land in a democratic Bhutan to those who join, and a gory death to those who don't. Families with no member to spare for the agitation have to pay a huge fine, it seems. Said a young agitator: "I joined because our leaders threatened to cut off my father's head."

A rebel pamphlet compares the "far richer" Nepalese culture to the "cheap and educational facilities, the agitators are not accepted as true fighters for democracy. "Why should outsiders tell us to change our system of government?" retorts Dawa Tshering, the foreign minister.

But the agitators are Bhutanese nationals, led by important former government officials. The jailed leader, Tek Nath Rizal, was a member of both the National Assembly and the Royal Advisory Council—the highest committee in the government. Accused in 1988 of "falsely" informing the king of a probable uprising in southern Bhutan, he was stripped of his ranks and charged with inciting the southern Bhutanese. He fled to Nepal, but was extradited and jailed in Thimphu. PFHR leader Gop-violation of dress and language codes could cost Rs 200 in fines. And overzealous policemen, who were promised half the amount, went crazy. "Even our grandparents were forced to wear the Drukpa dress...they work in the fields..." says Sabitri Sharma, 17, a member of the Women's Organisation of Bhutan who is now in the Garganda camp, the rebel base. She left school and joined the movement after her teachers forcibly cut her hair, as keeping short hair was [illegible] Drukpa custom.

What put the lid on [illegible]s the new census programme [illegible] the immigrants took to be a charter for their ouster. "But we weren't planning to throw out anybody," explains Dago Tshering, the most powerful man in Bhutan after the king. "We wanted to issue identity cards—red ones to the genuine residents, who were here before 1958, and green ones to later and concocted versions of Sino-Tibetan customs". It plays on the Gorkha sentiment, reminds them of their blood brothers in India and Nepal, and threatens that the "borders of the Gorkha state of Sikkim and adjoining districts of Kalimpong and Darjeeling can very easily be extended across the whole of southern Bhutan". This shocking similarity to the dream of a Greater Nepal, born in the 18th century, makes one wonder whether this "fight against Drukpa cultural imperialism" is not a fight for Nepalese expansionism as well.

And, with reason, the Drukpas (literally Bhutanese) guarding the last bastion of Buddhist Tibetan culture after Tibet was annexed by China and Sikkim made a part of India, are alarmed by the swelling Nepalese immigration. Regarded as economic refugees drawn to Bhutan by her better living conditions, including free health al Sharma, BPP leader Balaram Poudyal, BPP president R.K. Budathoki, were all important government officials. And other than Rizal, all are now in Garganda.

And this may well be only the beginning. However, in a small landlocked kingdom without industries or even newspapers (except for a government-run weekly), where young men in Texas leathers and flashy Toyotas knot a cursory bakku apron-like over New York denims, where sleepy hilltop villagers have no concept of life beyond the hills, modern western concepts might not make total sense. And constitutional monarchy or democracy may not make any difference to the larger masses. Meanwhile, some nerves are tense, some progress stalled and some lives lost. ●

"The people will decide"

King Jigme Singye Wangchuck on the future of Bhutan

Hindu ethnic Nepalese, settled in southern Bhutan, have rebelled against what they call the "cultural imperialism" of the majority Buddhist Drukpa community. These southern Bhutanese have demanded the democratisation of the Himalayan kingdom's political system. It appears that the turmoil is about to intensify. So what is King Jigme Singye Wangchuck doing about defusing the crisis? "I am not opposed to democracy," he told SUNDAY. But he has certain conditions. Excerpts from the interview:

Q: Do you feel threatened by the pro-democracy movement?
A: Well, I am not opposed to democracy, or to any political change, as long as the changes are good for Bhutan and her people. I firmly believe that the future of Bhutan does not lie in the hand of one individual, like myself, but in the hands of the people. Because we have a monarchy, people outside seem to feel that Bhutan has a feudal system of government. And hiding behind the veil of democracy, our boys across the border get away with all the extortions, sabotage, kidnappings, murders and mutilation of bodies.

Q: Would you hold any measures taken by the government responsible for the crisis?
A: For many years we have tried to bring the southern Bhutanese into the mainstream—economically, socially, culturally, politically—because Bhutan is too small a country to be divided. The one nation and one people concept is essential for the survival of Bhutan. But, I am sorry to say that some of the things we did to implement this have been unfortunate. We meant well, but these did not have a very good impact.

Q: And now?
A: A lot of demands have been made by the anti-national boys—don't know whether it is fair to say 'anti-national'—and they want a separate identity in the south. That would mean autonomy, which is just one step away from separation. Bhutan cannot afford that.

Q: Is the agitation numerically quite strong?
A: I think it is about 30,000-strong. That is five per cent of our population. The total number of the southern Bhutanese would be about 25 to 30 per cent. But, if five per cent of our population feel very strongly about something, I, as the King, obviously have to take their sentiment very seriously. Because I am only one individual and the views of one person are less important than the views of 30,000.

Q: So, what do you plan to do?
A: I believe that every problem—political, economic or social—can be resolved through sincere dialogue. I am ready for it, as long as their demands do not jeopardize the security and well-being of Bhutan.

Q: And have you made any progress on starting this dialogue?
A: No. The situation is not conducive for it. There have been more than 152 people kidnapped and the figure is going up. A lot of them have been killed or mutilated. Unless the conditions are conducive for it, it is difficult to have a sincere dialogue. And if I start a dialogue now, they will take it to be a sign of weakness.

Q: What are the conditions?
A: Well, all the kidnapped people must be released. Secondly, the boys guilty of killing innocent Bhutanese nationals have to be brought to justice. Thirdly, all their terrorist acts must stop. When you have a gun pointed at you, it is difficult to actually have a dialogue in an atmosphere of goodwill, sincerity and trust.

Q: Which way is the gun pointing? Both ways?
A: Not both ways. I have given strict orders to security forces not to fire under any circumstances. But the boys across the border don't have peaceful processions, as they say. They have women and children in front, but at the back the anti-nationals in camouflage army uniforms come fully armed.

Q: What do you regard to be your greatest disadvantage in countering this situation?
A: Mainly two—one, that nothing is more effective than their terror tactics. And second, our monarchy. Outside people automatically feel that the system must be very feudal and oppressive.

Q: And how do you feel about the monarchy?

A: The biggest flaw with monarchy is that the king holds so much authority and power not because of merit, but because of birth. That means you can have a good king or a bad king and Bhutan's leadership cannot be dependant on birth-on the hope that we will have a wise, capable, benevolent king.

The political system of Bhutan will never be safe in the hands of one individual. It must be based on a system which is strong and durable, and on an efficient government.

Q: Before the turmoil, had you taken any steps to achieve this?
A: We had. In the last two Five-year Plans, our top priority has been to decentralise power down to the zonal and district levels. And in '82, we formed the Civil Service Commission, controlling our 11,000 civil servants. Earlier, I had complete power to promote or demote whoever I wanted to-an impossible job for one person. Then, in '84, I gave the Royal Advisory Councillors the power to report against the King to the Cabinet and the National Assembly, if they felt the King might harm the nation's interest. I have always put the national interest first, and will never compromise on that.

Q: The rebels claim their rights of speech and expression are being curbed.
A: That is bogus. They made 13 demands, then nine more. Most are on problems we don't have in Bhutan, as the southern Bhutanese themselves will tell you.

In a nutshell, they want two things—democracy and a separate identity. The long list is cosmetic.

Q: But the rebels claim your people went about the job brutally. Like forcibly cutting girls' hair...
A: (Smiles.) All my wives have long hair.

Q: How effective is the National Assembly?
A: Quite effective, relatively. It takes all the decisions and rectifies laws and regulations. The majority of the seats go to the people

Q: Is the representation fair?
A: No. I agree with our boys in the south that the representation is not fair. When my father established the National assembly in '54, no one had any idea about it and nobody wanted it. So, when he forced its creation, the seat representation was done on an ad hoc basis. We had no census. It definitely needs to be changed in accordance with the demographic distribution in the districts.

Also, our official population figure is 1.3 million, but actually, it is closer to 6,00,000. People think Bhutan deliberately gave a wrong figure in the Seventies, when we joined the United Nations. But in truth, someone had told my father that if he gave a figure less than one million, we would not be taken seriously by the UN.

If I was confident that it would be for the greater good of Bhutan, I would actively work towards achieving democracy. Otherwise I would not be a patriotic Bhutanese national Q: Was that "someone" Indian?

A: (Smiles). It was so many years ago, and I was away in school in England.

Anyway, there was no scheme to project a larger northern Bhutanese figure and reduce the percentage of the southern Bhutanese.

Q: Has the change to democracy in Nepal, changed your relationship with that country?
A: Not at all. It is a close neighbour, and we will sincerely try to maintain good relations.

Q: You do not anticipate a similar situation in Bhutan?
A: The mass uprising in Nepal should not be taken as a case example for Bhutan. Here, we are talking about five to a pessimistic 25 per cent of the people. A liberation movement needs majority support.

Q: Is the concept of 'Greater Nepal' alive?
A: (Smiles.) Well, the Nepalese in India have always wanted their own Gorkha state. That's no secret. I can only hope that they do not include southern Bhutan in that Gorkha state.

Q: Is your economic structure ready for democracy?
A: Yes. Incidentally, our per capita income is over $400, not $150, as projected. It might be the highest in South Asia.

Q: And your army and police strength?
A: About 5,000 and 1,000.

Q: Is that sufficient?
A: No. That is why we are getting volunteers now. With the voluntary militia, we can withdraw the army and free the police.

Q: Are you thinking of asking India for military support?
A: No. This is a family problem.

Q: What is your jail capacity?
A: We hardly have one proper jail. And arresting people does not resolve problems. So, when I went down to the south, I released 405 out of 452 arrested there. We gave them food and bus fare back to their villages.

Q: What would you expect India's role to be, now?
A: The present role is more than satisfactory. India has been very concerned and supportive. She is our closest friend and neighbour. We have received a tremendous amount of cooperation, goodwill and friendship. Also, the West Bengal government, too, has extended tremendous support and goodwill.

Q: So much for your southern border. What about the northern?
A: We are in the process of demarcating it. We are having a dialogue.

Q: Does India have a role in the dialogue?
A: No, we are talking directly to China.

Q: And do you see substantial changes in your political system in the near future?
A: We have a very unique system and are going through a unique period of great change. I think, in a few years, we will surprise a lot of countries. ●

JAYA JAITLY

In defence of Mandal

The controversy holds up a mirror to the nature of our society

As a trade unionist working among the informal self-employed artisans and weavers, who almost invariably come from the lowest castes, one marvels at the perfectly honed, most powerful trade union that the caste system of India actually is. After all, the protection and furtherance of professional interests is what trade unionism is all about. And with professions having been given a hierarchy and a status sanctioned by religion 5,000 years ago, it is no wonder that even the claim to merit is being ardently protected by the upper castes. Priesthood, anointing the ruler, administrating, keeping the accounts, and even plotting horoscopes, in other words the use of the 'head', was their safely protected prerogative. The beneficiaries of this system have been so well entrenched for so long, that they do not understand the incongruity of statements like "but we don't practice caste, after all we have educated our bhangis children".

Anti-reservation activists: emotionally surcharged

In a country where the entire organised workforce is only 10 per cent and the rest struggle for pitiful gains in the unorganised sector, the furore about 27 per cent of government jobs being allocated to the backward classes shows up the true nature of the problem. Government jobs mean, at best, power to make decisions and, at least, lifelong job security. The same people who are crying themselves hoarse about merit are those who decry the babu culture where thousands of so-called meritorious government employees drink tea, chat and listen to cricket commentaries. Let alone the poor clerks, what about the high priests of the civil service—the IAS officers? There was a time when the colonial whitewash was still around, civil servants joined the All India Services with a sense of idealism and a spirit of service, no matter how feudal or mai-baap its manifestations were.

The emotionally surcharged students who care about social justice in their country should perhaps stop to ponder over this point for a moment and read page 23 of the Mandal Report which has a beautiful cameo of two young men, Mohan and Lallu. Mohan is a typical portrait of a child in any one of our families. Lallu first of all is a name we laugh at in the conference rooms and drawing rooms of Delhi, but the description of Lallu's life and background is stark in its reality. How many more centuries must Lallu wait to become a Mohan, and are all our Mohan's who haunt our Bhavans, discotheques and corporate offices all that perfect? If Lallu obtains a degree and cannot find a job, he has to pull a rickshaw, shine shoes or become an autorickshaw driver. The agitated Mohans of today, never created a furore to improve Lallu's lot, but instead cleaned shoes to show the extent of their misery if the Mandal Report was implemented.

With professions having been given a hierarchy and a status sanctioned by religion, it is no wonder that even the claim to merit is being ardently protected by the upper castes

Emancipated women who see themselves as equal and active members of society have no less shown the strong influence of caste as the single most dominant undercurrent among all status symbols that people adhere to in society. Housewives who stir no further than the nearest market to buy vegetables or drop their children at school are today vociferously throwing stones at the police, along with rioting young men. At a more sedate level, wives of senior bureaucrats have finally come out of their gulmohar tree-lined houses in the more posh government colonies of Delhi to march with placards against Mandal. A mighty trauma indeed has finally stirred them from their usual worries of where their next posting will be and how to set their recalcitrant servant boys aright. When I commented on the illogic of young girls raising slogans saying "We don't want unemployed husbands" because they should be more concerned about jobs for themselves and were indicating their caste bias by rejecting the possibility of marrying anyone from those castes who stand to benefit from reservations, I received a flood of mail. Some were very supportive but I was asked by others whether husbands should be reserved by the quota system too and since jobs were in short supply what would men do if women also started demanding jobs?

CRUNCH!

After Advani's rath yatra: chaos, confusion and more uncertainty

In the end, it was not Devi Lal's fiery rhetoric, Chandra Shekhar's bitterness or Rajiv Gandhi's sneers that pulled the plug on Vishwanath Pratap Singh's National Front government.

When it came to the crunch, it was not the Raja's enemies that turned on him, but a man he had regarded as an ally for the 11 months of his term.

The mild-mannered, self-effacing L.K. Advani made an unlikely wrecker. While V.P. Singh had been buffeted by criticism from all sides, Advani had held his peace. His attitude to the government was one of detached support: each time a Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) leader shot off a statement attacking the Prime Minister, Advani would hastily issue one of his own, moderating the hostility and pledging his party's continued support.

But when the BJP decided with startling suddenness that it could no longer continue to back the Prime Minister, it was Advani himself who was at the centre of the crisis. At 6:30 am, on Tuesday, the 23rd of October, Advani was arrested at Samastipur in north Bihar. The BJP president was on the cow belt leg of his 10,000 km rath yatra, in support of building a temple to Ram at the disputed Ram Janmabhoomi/ Babri Masjid site in Ayodhya. Also arrested was Pramod Mahajan, the voluble BJP MP from Maharashtra, who is regarded as one of the party's hardliners. Another BJP leader (among them K.P. Mishra, Yadunath Pandey and Dinanath Pandey) were taken into custody.

The reaction was swift and immediate. In New Delhi, the BJP declared that it was withdrawing support to the National Front. A.B. Vajpayee, Advani's predecessor as BJP president, flew into the capital from Calcutta and drove to Rashtrapati Bhavan to tell President R. Venkataraman that his party would no longer back the government in Parliament.

That action landed the crisis-prone government with its biggest test to date. With only 143 MPs, the National Front has just over a fourth of the Lok Sabha's membership. It had survived these 11 months with the support of the BJP and the left parties. While the left continued to back it, the loss of the BJP's 86 MPs left it dangerously short of a majority.

The honourable course was to accept that he no longer had any moral right to continue as Prime Minister of India and resign. But with the opportunistic obstinacy that has become his hallmark, V.P. Singh refused to quit. He was hanging on, he told his colleagues at a Cabinet meeting called on the morning of Advani's arrest.

At noon, he met the President to assure him—incredibly—that he did not believe he had lost his majority and would prove this on the floor of the Lok Sabha.

It was a sad comedown for a man whose proudest boast had once been that he cared nothing for public office.

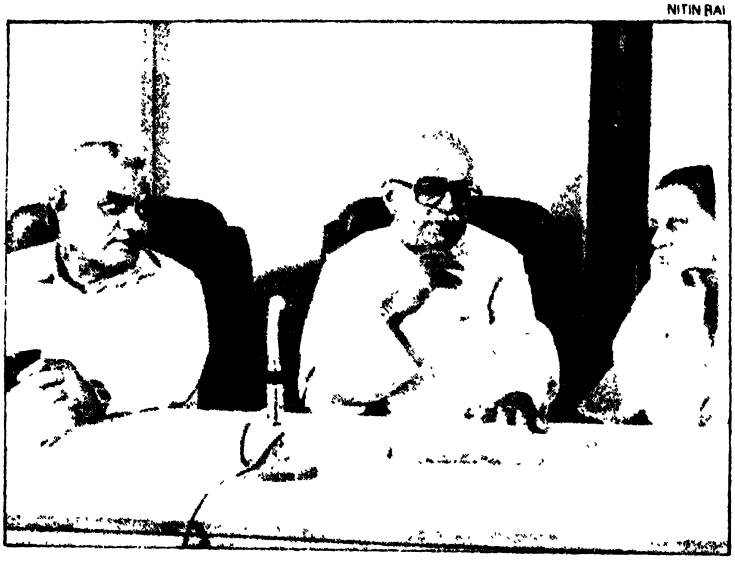
If V.P. Singh's behaviour was surprising, so was the rapidity with which the Ram Janmabhoomi/ Babri

THE RATH

The mild-mannered L.K. Advani made an unlikely wrecker. But his arrest pulled the plug on the National Front government

Masjid crisis overtook everything else to torpedo the National Front government. Almost from the day the Raja had been sworn in, everybody had known that the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP), a Hindu militant organisation with close links with the BJP, had made the Ram Janmabhoomi temple the centre of its appeal. The Congress(I) had lost the last general election by appearing to play both sides in the Ram Janmabhoomi/ Babri Masjid dispute. And the BJP had served notice that it would back the VHP—at least to a certain extent—on the issue.

But to V.P.Singh, the potential crisis remained just one more contradiction to be managed. He seemed confident that a compromise could be found and that—in any event—it was not the kind of issue that would topple his government. To be fair to the usually shrewd and perceptive Raja, many others shared this view.



Partly it was because of Advani himself, who at best appeared only half serious. For one, his decision to undertake the yatra seemed less a part of a calculated political strategy and more a knee-jerk reaction to V.P. Singh's sudden move to implement Mandal's recommendations. Advani is scared of losing the backward class Hindu vote to the Raja, the argument goes, and the yatra is aimed at preventing this.

Moreover, as any journalist who accompanied Advani on the Somnath to Delhi leg of his journey would have discovered, he often assumed the air of a reluctant charioteer—a man who, as it were, had been driven to the roads. It was as if he was making a conscious effort to distance himself from his rabble-rousing supporters and their raucous cries of "Ek dhakka aur do/Babri Masjid tod do". And when he addressed audiences, he seemed willing to risk both boredom and disappointment by making speeches that were—in comparison with those of his BJP colleagues and VHP associates—reasoned and moderate.

In virtually every major public address, Advani criticised those who called for the destruction of the masjid, which he said would be both a mistake and a shame. When others talked of confronting the government head on, he held out the hope of an amicable settlement. And while his colleagues boasted that the rath was unstoppable as it was Ram's own vehicle, Advani struck a more down-to-earth tone. "What is this rath but a mere DCM-Toyota?" he would keep telling the crowds. "Anybody can stop it with the use of force." Predictably, not everybody appreciated this bit of realism. Muttered one BJP member at Jaipur: "It is as if he wants the government to arrest him."

NITIN RAI

SURPRISE MOVE The BJP's national executive had caught the government off guard by threatening to withdraw support

Apart from this, the very manner in which the yatra's schedule was drawn up raised expectations of a settlement. Advani, who left Somnath on 25 September, arranged it so that he would spend six whole days in Delhi before setting off on the second leg of his yatra. Although the organisers claimed that this was to allow him time to rest and recuperate before going to Bihar, West Bengal and Uttar Pradesh, there was no doubt that the break would be used to negotiate with V.P. Singh's government.

There will be a little give, a little take, the optimists concluded. And the rath yatra will be called off at Delhi.

Of course, none of this happened. The Imam retracted his call to the faithful to have the rath stopped; the BJP's position hardened with the threat that any attempts by the government to hamper the yatra's progress would lead to the withdrawal of support; and Advani went ahead with the second leg of the yatra claiming he would settle for nothing less than a temple built on the very spot the masjid stands.

The only thing that happened as predicted were the negotiations. But all that ensued from the five days of

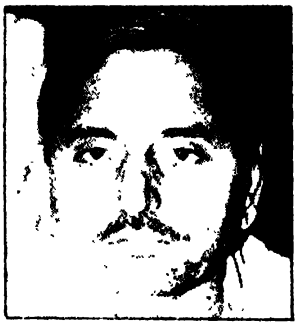
● L.K. Advani's rath yatra completes its first leg when it arrives in New Delhi to a tumultuous welcome.



● Advani swears he will proceed to Ayodhya, but there is talk that the government may reach a compromise with the BJP and the VHP.

● The yatra proceeds through various parts of Delhi. There are disturbances in the Chandni Chowk area, which leads the police to resort to tear-gas shelling and firing in the air.

● In Uttar Pradesh, Mulayam Singh Yadav continues to round up BJP and VHP activists as a preventive measure.

discussions—which involved Hindu and Muslim priests and politicians of every ideological hue—was an ill-conceived government proposal which found favour with nobody. The BJP and the VHP rejected it outright as it did not go far enough and, worse, it left the Muslims feeling betrayed and outraged.

By the time the rath reached Delhi to a tumultuous welcome on 14 October, V.P. Singh appeared to have chalked out three parallel strategies to deal with the problem.

- Meet Advani personally and use direct moral suasion to get him to call off the yatra.
- Put pressure on the BJP by isolating it to achieve the same end.
- If either of the above fails, stop the rath and arrest Advani in Bihar.

It was never very likely that the first would work. The Prime Minister, after all, had spoken to Advani more than once over the telephone during the yatra's first leg. In any case, V.P. Singh met Advani on 16 October and later along with Jyoti Basu on 18 October to give it a try. Somewhat predictably, the meetings resulted in failure.

The all-party meet on the mandir/masjid issue was fixed for the 17th. For V.P. Singh, a consensus was necessary for two reasons. Apart from isolating the BJP (which had announced that it would boycott the meeting), it would give the government the necessary sanction to halt the rath yatra if the need arose.

THE PRESIDENT

For R. Venkataraman, a chance to do what he does best, play the political judge for India

But the BJP had a surprise in store for him. On the day of the all-party conference an emergency meeting of the BJP's national executive warned the government that the party would withdraw support if either the yatra or work (kar seva) on the construction of the temple was disrupted. The resolution passed at the meeting described the National Front government as a "total disappointment"

If this caught V.P. Singh off guard, it is because Advani had maintained all along that the rath yatra must not be linked with his party's support for the government. Only a fortnight ago, he told SUNDAY: "What does that (support) have to do with this (the yatra)...The decision to back this government was taken after due deliberation and any change will also have to be made after due deliberation." This week, however, he seemed unconcern-

- Prime Minister V.P. Singh says that the government is committed to maintaining the status quo on the issue.
- In a significant development, the BJP warns that it will withdraw support to the government if the rath yatra is stopped.

18 OCTOBER

- The Prime Minister summons Jyoti Basu to Delhi to talk to Advani.

19 OCTOBER

- The Centre places three proposals—including allowing the construction of the temple on undisputed land in Ayodhya—before the VHP, which turns them down.
- The VHP rejects the proposals as they do not meet its basic demand: that the temple be constructed on the very site the mosque stands.

- V.P. Singh and Basu fail to persuade Advani, who leaves Delhi for Dhanbad to resume the yatra.
- A late-night presidential ordinance states that the Union government will refer the mandir/masjid dispute to the Supreme Court for expeditious disposal. The Centre also acquires the disputed site and the land around it through the ordinance.

20 OCTOBER

- The rath travels unstopped through Bihar.
- Muslim organisations declare a Bharat bandh on 30 October in protest against the government's ordinance.
- Advani declares in Bihar that he will settle for nothing less than a temple on the spot where Lord Ram was born.

21 OCTOBER

- The government gives in to pressure and stays the ordinance.
- There are strong rumours that V.P. Singh is preparing to call for a mid-term poll after having Advani arrested.

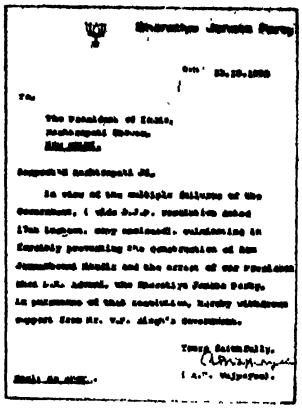
ed about the consequences that a decision to discontinue support could have. When SUNDAY asked him whether this wouldn't hasten the return of the Congress, he replied: "Yes, it is this which has restrained us

But there are limits. If mid-term polls are announced, let them be."



In the end then, it was not the all-party meeting called by the government which pressured the BJP but, oddly enough, the BJP's meeting which pressured the government.

Nevertheless as many as 20 political parties were signatories to the resolution of the all-party conference, which promised, among other things, to respect the "sentiments of the Hindus on building a Ram temple at Ayodhya within the framework of the law". In his speech at the meeting, V.P. Singh reiterated the government's commitment to maintain the status quo on the mandir/masjid dispute. At the end of the day, the two sides only seemed to have drifted further apart.

Next day (18th), there were fleeting hopes that a settlement was on the cards following Advani's decision to stay on in Delhi till the evening of the the 19th in order to meet Jyoti Basu, who was summoned by V.P. Singh to the capital. Although it was a public holiday, both the Cabinet and the Cabinet Committee on Political Affairs held marathon meetings. While both the BJP's threat to withdraw support to the government and the possible law and order problems that the continuance of the yatra could create were discussed, there was no talk of reaching a settlement with the Hindu organisations.

On the 19th, however, all last-ditch efforts—by V.P. Singh, Jyoti Basu, N.T. Rama Rao and others—failed and Advani—after declaring that the only solution was to have the Babri Masjid relocated—left by train to Dhanbad, Bihar to resume his journey to Ayodhya.

It is then that he should have resorted to the last alternative—to forcibly stop the rath. V.P. Singh had already formulated a plan along with Bihar chief minister Laloo Prasad Yadav to have Advani arrested soon after he reached Bihar. The arrangement was to confront the rath in Gaya district, take Advani to Patna by helicopter and then move him to Delhi's Tihar Jail in a Border Security Force plane.

If the Prime Minister had chosen Laloo Prasad over Mulayam Singh for the job, it is because the former is regarded as a 'V.P. Singh man' (Mulayam's attitude to the Raja is at best ambivalent.) Getting Laloo Prasad to make the arrest would have served two purposes. It would have signalled that the yatra was discontinued at V.P. Singh's behest. At the same time, it would have allowed the Raja to distance himself from the action if the need arose.

Clearly, the BJP's threat to withdraw support and Advani's departure for Bihar, led the Raja to change his ever-wavering mind. By the 19th, 'Operation Laloo Prasad' was shelved and the Prime Minister, who held a number of meetings with his senior party colleagues, had opted to reach a compromise with Advani and the VHP.

That evening, the government announced a three-point formula which it hoped would win them over. Under this:

- The Centre would acquire the plot on which the Babri Masjid is located and the surrounding areas.
- Barring the land on which the disputed monument is located (about two acres), the rest would be made available to the Ram Janma Yagna Samiti trust for the construction of the temple.
- The legal dispute over the monument, which was being heard by the Allahabad High Court, would be transferred to the Supreme Court for quick disposal.

That very night, the government issued a presidential ordinance to acquire the land and refer the mandir/masjid dispute to the Supreme Court. A little later, V.P. Singh phoned Laloo Prasad Yadav in Patna to say: "Don't stop the rath in Bihar."

It was a shameful comedown and appeared the reaction of a man who

THE ENFORCER

Bihar chief minister Laloo Prasad Yadav stuck to the Raja and dumbfounded the BJP by arresting L.K. Advani on the home stretch was desperate to keep himself and his creaky government in power. And as it proved later, it was also ill-conceived and politically inexpedient.

The Centre's three-point proposal found favour with virtually nobody. The VHP rejected it outright, claiming that it fell far short of its basic demand: that the temple be allowed to be constructed over the garbh graha (sanctum sanctorum) or the very spot on which the masjid stands. The BJP took a slightly different view. We will consider the proposals if two infirmities in the ordinance are rectified, the party said. One: that the land acquired be referred to as the Ram Janmabhoomi. Two: that the time frame for the Supreme Court adjudication be specified. Said BJP general secretary, Murli Manohar Joshi: "The promulgation of the ordinance was a small step in the right direction, but (came) too late."

Predictably, the compromise formula and the subsequent ordinance left the leadership of the Muslim organisations outraged. For although the Centre's action may have fallen short of handing over the masjid to the Hindus, it affected Muslim interests in other ways Zafrab Jilani, convenor of the Babri Masjid Action Committee, complained that by referring the dispute to the Supreme Court, the government had robbed the Muslims' right to appeal to any court of law. "This ordinance has taken away our rights for a judicial redressal," he told SUNDAY.

The other grouse was that the ordinance constituted a direct interference with Muslim personal law. Said Sultan Salahuddin Owaisi, MP and the Action Committee's president, "The land that was acquired was wakf property. The Shariat does not permit conversion of wakf property into anything else." Echoed Syed Shahabuddin, convenor of the rival Babri Masjid Movement Coordination Committee (BMMCC), "The government has the right to acquire land only for educational institutions, hospitals, etc. Doing so for religious purposes is unheard of."

The Muslim leadership also indicated that V.P. Singh could no longer count on the community's vote. Thundered Syed Abdullah Bukhari, the Shahi Imam of Jama Masjid: "Rajiv Gandhi played the same game with us. He told us that he will not allow the shilanyas and did. This government has done a similar thing." The implicit threat: Rajiv's games lost him the last election, V.P. Singh's could lose him the next.

Although the compromise formula was a desperate, last-ditch attempt to persuade

- A.B. Vajpayee rushes to Delhi from Calcutta, and gives President R. Venkataraman a letter saying that the BJP is withdrawing its Parliament support. Calls for the Raja's resignation. Trouble breaks out in Bombay, Calcutta as the BJP calls for a bandh on 24 October.

- Meetings in Delhi. Everybody with everybody else. Outcome: the BJP holds firm. The CPI(M) backs the Raja. The Congress(I) wants the Raja to quit.
- The Raja meets the President. Says he will prove majority in the Lok Sabha. VP meets Devi Lal. More permutations, show of strength. Mid-term polls seem likely.

Chandra Shekhar

- Chandra Shekhar says he is "willing to accept any challenge" if he were to become Prime Minister.

Advani to call off the yatra, it was not a new one. The formula was first discussed two months ago during a meeting between Union minister George Fernandes and the Shankaracharya of Kanchipuram. Later, representatives of the government sounded out prominent Muslim leaders on it. Given this, the government ought to have known that the proposals would not meet with approval. This makes it all the more difficult to understand why the formula was offered unilaterally—without any attempt to get the Hindu and Muslim leaderships to accept it.

In the end, V.P. Singh did what he had to. On 22 October, the decision to arrest Advani was taken. So desperate was the Raja to ensure that Mulayam Singh received no credit that he resolved to arrest the BJP president before he entered UP. The task was entrusted to Bihar chief minister Laloo Prasad Yadav, generally regarded as a V.P. Singh loyalist in the post-Mandal phase, who took Advani into custody on 23 October.

No sooner had Advani been apprehended than the BJP reacted with unprecedented viciousness. Not only did it demand V.P.Singh's resignation, but the normally restrained A.B. Vajpayee issued a bitter statement. Tearing into the Prime Minister's broadcast of the night before, Vajpayee called it "mealy-mouthed" and "full of half-truths, untruths and innuendos". He termed V.P. Singh's politics "blatantly casteist and vote-oriented", accused him of "communalising politics" and claimed that "his closest friends are some of the worst communalists in the country".

Shortly after Vajpayee issued his broadside, others got in on the act. At a crowded press conference on the lawns of Chandra Shekhar's bungalow, three Janata Dal dissidents, Yashwant Sinha, Kamal Morarka and Harmohan Dhawan, demanded the Prime Minister's resignation. So did Congress(I) spokesman Vithal Gadgil. And indeed, many expected that a man who had consistently reiterated his lack of ambition would step down once he lost his majority.

This, however, was not the way that V.P. Singh saw it. Shortly after Vajpayee told President R. Venkataraman that the BJP was withdrawing support, the Prime Minister made his own representation to the Rashtrapati. V.P. Singh's argument was constructed as follows:

THE SITE Militant organisations fight over it while security forces guard it. But it may not save VP, the BJP or the Muslim fundamentalists

- He had been called on to form the government last year after Rajiv Gandhi, the leader of the largest party in Parliament, had turned down the job. The invitation had been extended to him as the leader of the second largest party.
- Only after he had accepted the invitation had the BJP submitted a letter promising support.
- Therefore, the withdrawal of support did not mean that he had to resign.
- Yes, it was possible that he no longer commanded a majority in the Lok Sabha, but this was best tested on the floor of the House. Until that happened, he was entitled to argue that there was no proof that he had lost his majority.
- Parliament was meeting on 24 November, and he was willing to face a motion of confidence then.

The argument had a superficial plausibility, but was deeply flawed. First of all, he had not been called to form the government only because he was the leader of the second largest party in the Lok Sabha. The President calls upon a person most likely to command a majority in the House to try and form a government.

He doesn't actually swear him in until after he has demonstrated his majority. So, had the BJP not agreed to support the Raja, he would not have been Prime Minister—the first invitation was to see if he could cobble together a majority.

It took all of one day for V.P. Singh to realise that the compromise formula and the subsequent ordinance achieved nothing. As Advani's rath continued to rumble through the Bihar countryside, the Muslim leadership threatened to agitate—starting with the Bharat bandh on 30 October.

So, the Prime Minister changed his mind again.

On 21 October, the Centre stayed its hastily-promulgated ordinance. The BJP had welcomed it, but had insisted that the rath yatra would proceed on schedule. And the Muslims had been outraged by the expediency that had led to its promulgation. Consequently, the Raja abandoned it and formulated a new strategy.

Now, he called a meeting of chief ministers in an effort to give a non-partisan colour to his efforts. Initially, the Congress seemed unwilling to go along with this, but then V.P. Singh asked Jyoti Basu to step in. The West Bengal chief minister met Rajiv Gandhi at Congress MP Dinesh Singh's residence and got him to promise that Congress chief ministers would attend.

THE IMAM

Syed Abdullah Bukhari called for peace talks, felt betrayed by their breakdown and is now reduced to doing not much else but watching

But even as these consultations were going on, the master magician of Indian politics seemed to have run out of tricks. There was no way in which V.P. Singh could persuade Advani to call off the rath yatra. Yet, to stop him would be to lose the support of the BJP.

However, even if the Raja once again chose the politically-expedient course and did nothing, he still had a problem on his hands. If he did not arrest Advani and disrupt his yatra, then Mulayam Singh Yadav was certain to do so. Yadav had been livid when the ordinance was passed without consulting him and had made it clear that he would stop Advani regardless of what V.P. Singh might desire.

In effect, the Raja now had no choice but to arrest Advani. Yes, it would lead to a crisis, but perhaps that could be managed. The alternative scenario was much more depressing: Mulayam would stop Advani and become a hero with the minorities. The BJP would withdraw support and the central government would lose its majority. At that stage, one of two things would happen. Either Chandra Shekhar and Mulayam (along with Devi Lal) would distance themselves from the Raja and declare that the Dal had an alternative leader (ie, Shekhar) who should be Prime Minister. Having lost his majority, V.P. Singh would resign. Shekhar would take over and the Congress would support the government. This scenario received a new credibility when Rajiv Gandhi declared on 20 October that the Congress would back any Janata Dal leader who was not V.P. Singh.

The second prospect was as terrifying. Having lost his majority, the Raja would have to call elections. (Assuming that the President agreed.) At that stage, Mulayam and Shekhar (and again, possibly Devi Lal) would split the party, take the credit for the arrest and deprive V.P. Singh of his Muslim and backward vote-banks.

If either alternative went through, the Raja would be history.

This view was forcefully conveyed to the President by a series of legal luminaries and by a succession of politicians. The Congress believed that V.P. Singh should be asked to step down. The Shekhar camp said that he should be asked to submit a list of MPs who supported him and that if this fell short of a majority, then he ought to be made to resign.

What then? The Congress did not want an election right away. It preferred keeping another Janata Dal Prime Minister (perhaps Chandra Shekhar) in office till it was ready for the polls.

It was precisely this eventuality that V.P. Singh sought to avoid. His advisers propounded the following scenario:

- As soon as Parliament reconvened, the Raja would talk about the need to put secularism first.
- Then, he would ask for a vote of confidence on his decision to arrest Advani.
- Obviously, the BJP would vote against him, but the Congress would have no choice but to vote for him or—at best—abstain.
- Having demonstrated majority support, V.P. Singh would call an election with himself as caretaker Prime Minister at the head of a united Janata Dal.
- Such a scenario would not only keep Shekhar out and ensure that V.P. Singh retained a grip on the party, but it would also allow him as caretaker Prime Minister to make sure that his backward caste supporters were able to vote.

As this option was discussed, the Raja's men told lies to keep their morale up: they already had the support of 249 MPs; 70 Congress MPs from the backward castes were ready to defect; the Janata Dal dissidents had lost their will, etc.

But the fact remained that even V.P. Singh's best case scenario was misconceived. First of all, the Congress could move a no-confidence motion that would be taken up before his confidence motion. And secondly, the notion that the Congress would not vote with the BJP was also bogus: Rajiv Gandhi suggested that he would dismiss the Raja's attempts to turn his confidence motion into a referendum on Ram Janmabhoomi as fraudulent and vote against him anyway.

Either way, it was difficult to see how V.P. Singh could survive.

As SUNDAY went to press, only two things remained unclear. Whether India would get a new Prime Minister or whether there would be a poll. And two: the timing of the denouement. The betting was that the normally cautious President R. Venkataraman would not fire the Prime Minister. But nor would he wait till the end of November. Instead, he would call an emergency session of Parliament and settle the issue swiftly.

The sooner the uncertainty ended, the better it would be for India. •

The Valley in flames

Security forces fight fire with fire

Sangrama was just another picturesque Kashmir town on the Sopore road. Until the day a portion of it was burnt down. On 15 October, militants opened fire on a Border Security Force (BSF) picket. The paramilitary personnel retaliated by setting fire to the main market and some houses nearby. The next morning, Mahmood Subhan Sheikh, 68, rummages through the debris to salvage whatever little he can from his family's three shops. "We have all fled from here, or they will burn us," he cries. Tears roll down his cheeks as he loads charred quilts and pieces of corrugated sheet onto a pony-cart. "I have lost Rs eight to ten lakhs worth of merchandise! Where do we go now?"

Basheer Ahmed, a fruit-seller who lives across the street, has large blisters on his feet; he couldn't escape the devastating blaze in time. It was around 11 in the morning when the men, women and children of Sangrama hurriedly left their homes, some of them fleeing to nearby Choorba for shelter. "They didn't even spare our cattle," says Abdul Khalik. "What have we done to deserve this? Even in war, they spare the old, the sick, women and children. But these so-called security forces are worse than animals," he despairs.

The nightmare did not end there. The day after the Sangrama incident, the paramilitary men gutted the market at Sopore following a gun-battle with the militants. The little shops with residential quarters on top of them were torched—the remains of melted television sets, burnt typewriters and a kiosk that once housed a tailor's shop bear mute testimony to the mindless act. Altaf Hussein, an eyewitness, swears he saw CRPF men sprinkle gunpowder on the shops and set them aflame. The timber logs in an adjacent saw mill were also set on fire. Abdul Rashid Dar says this is not the first time that such a thing has happened—some months ago, the Iqbal Market down the road was gutted too. "This is a new form of warfare they have started," says Ghulam Nabi, a tailor, whose shop was looted before it was reduced to ashes. "They even took away packets of salt from the provisions store."

Destroying suspected militant hideouts seems to be the only option left for the security forces now. And the easy way out is to set them on fire—at random mostly. "Our men are demoralised," admits a CRPF commandant. "Everybody here seems to be a militant, and they sometimes shoot at us from the most harmless looking houses. Our men don't have either the weaponry or the training to deal with such guerrilla tactics." Asked whether the Disturbed Areas Act actually empowered the paramilitary to set fire to houses and shops which could be harbouring militants, the commandant corroborated that the Act did give them some powers. Governor Saxena, however, denies this (see interview), and says he has ordered enquiries into the incidents. Senior paramilitary personnel, however, are confident that the administration will not come in the way of any action taken by them. "Whatever the Governor might say, we are clearly on the defensive," says a BSF commandant. "There may be arrests all the time, but there are an estimated 50,000 trained men in the Valley," insist army and police sources. That is over ten times the number that Governor Saxena estimates, officially at least.

KASHMIR BURNING

(From far left) The Islamia College on fire; gutted shops in Sangrama; houses destroyed by the security forces in Handwara; paramilitary men frisking people: the nightmare continues

Faced with mounting odds, the security forces have chosen to retaliate in the most barbaric way. Consider what happened in Handwara on 1 October. Two BSF personnel were shot dead while they were buying vegetables in the market. Soon after, a BSF convoy was ambushed while passing through the main town bazaar. The paramilitary men returned with an entire contingent and set fire to the shops and houses on both sides of the bazaar. The blaze that raged for the most part of the day gutted 412 buildings, including 31 houses, 55 commercial establishments, 256 shops, four cowsheds, 50 granaries, two trucks, a bus, three taxis and a scooter. Over 25 people died in the fire; many more must have been trapped under the debris. The BSF even refused to let fire tenders enter the town for over two hours. Even the special commissioner of Baramulla and Kupwara, P. Phonsong, admitted that the firemen were prevented from entering Handwara, and that the "victims were mostly innocents". The police, however, laid the blame entirely on the militants, claiming that the fire was a "result of firing and the use of hand grenades by the militants".

Two weeks after the incident, Handwara still seems like a ghost town. Its inhabitants are yet to overcome the shock. Some of them dig around the piles of rubble, looking for whatever may have survived the fire. The people point out that the only section of shops that have not been gutted display a board saying that it belongs to Kashmiri Hindus. "The militants fired and ran away, and our houses and people were burnt," cries Abdul Razak. "Do they plan to kill us all and take our land? Why don't they bomb us all at once?"

Governor Saxena admits that "some bad heads" among the paramilitary may have been responsible. He was prompt enough to institute an enquiry. On 7 October, a deputy commandant of the CRPF was shot in the head (he died later in hospital). An enraged CRPF battalion again went through their routine of setting fire to a crowded place. Nearby, at Noor Bagh, a stretch of over four kilometres has been completely razed to the ground. This incident took place on 10 October. The firing continued for over eight hours, and the blaze that followed could not be contained till the next day. A hotel nearby provides temporary shelter to the homeless.

Destroying suspected militant hideouts seems to be the only option left for the security forces now. And the easy way out is to set them on fire—at random mostly

On 16 October, fire tenders were pressed into service to combat the blaze that erupted at the Islamia College. Some part of the building had already been burnt in an earlier fire—this time, the college library was completely gutted. Since the institution housed paramilitary personnel, it is quite likely that the security forces were not responsible for this particular fire.

"Let Kashmir become a desert, but we won't give up the struggle," swears Aasiyeh Andrabi, head of the Dukhtarane Millat, a woman's organisation. Andrabi nowadays is busy organising relief work among the homeless families; there is no sign of official relief forthcoming, though the Governor has promised to compensate the affected people. The Dukhtarane Millat's chhaapa maar team even visits houses where weddings are taking place to convince the bride to part with most of her valuables. "In difficult times like these, we cannot enjoy new sofa sets while others have no place to sit," argues the petite young leader.

It is this sense of camaraderie that is helping the Kashmiris to weather the storm in these trying times. •

"There is a definite change of mood"

Jammu & Kashmir Governor GIRISH SAXENA on the situation in the Valley

INTERVIEWED BY SHIRAZ SIDHVA

SUNDAY: What is your assessment of the situation in the Valley?
Girish Chandra Saxena: The situation is both serious and messy, though we have had very many notable successes. We have increased the pressure on the militants and contained the situation on the ground. But their (militants) numbers are very large, and a lot of weapons are available to them, so they have considerable capabilities to make strikes. And yet the militants have not been able to change the situation on the ground. This has set them thinking. They are nowhere near their objective, and that is what has made them consider whether they should change course.

Q: Do you have evidence of this change of attitude? The militants including JKLF chief Javed Mir, still talk of intensifying their attacks.
A: Yes, they can keep on striking, but there is a limit to what they can withstand. Their offensive is not hurting us very much, but they keep losing a large number of people. We have killed nearly 400 militants this year, and arrested over a thousand. The militants have now begun to realise that it's going to be a long and bloody affair. There is no way they can get the better of the security forces

Q: But the administration's excesses is responsible for drawing more and more youths into the militants' fold. What is being done about this?
A: There have been incidents of excessive use of force, or some stupid person humiliating somebody or putting fire to something...

Q: Putting fire to entire settlements in Handwara, Sopore and Sangrama. Do you think these are "stray incidents"?
A: I am not saying that it has not happened, and we have instituted enquiries to identify the culprits. But many times, they (the militants) have been responsible for the fires, and are putting the blame on the security forces.

Q: Do you believe that the militants are destroying their own houses and wiping out entire colonies, like Noor Bagh and Kawdara?
A: They don't set fire to their own houses as such... We are enquiring into such incidents. Wherever there is evidence that some of our chaps may have been involved, we have agreed to pay compensation.

Q: Doesn't the Disturbed Areas Act permit security personnel to destroy or set fire to militant hideouts?
A: No, it certainly doesn't. Hideouts are not shops and houses. Hideouts are entrenched positions, or bunkers, or structures which are being used for firing at the police.

Q: In Srinagar and other parts of the Valley, houses and shops are being used to fire at the security forces. Are you admitting then that hideouts can be destroyed?
A: No, sometimes the militants are setting fire to these places and blaming the security personnel. Why do you say it cannot be the work of the militants? Of course, we are saying it could well be our chaps also. We cannot prejudge the enquiry report which is coming out in the next few days.

Q: Is it the Government of India's latest strategy to burn down the place to weed out militants?
A: How can it be? Why are we paying compensation and why are we instituting an enquiry? How can it be a course of policy when it is really setting you back?

Q: The people believe that the security forces are doing this to break their backbone...
A: No, it's not true. Because in a society and polity that we have in India, there is no way that an administration can think of tyrannising the people into submission.

Q: In the rest of India that might be the case, but in Kashmir, it seems very different...
A: No, it can't be different. Because if that was the case, we would not give compensation. We would just keep a stiff upper lip and say, 'No, no, it's the militants that did it'. We really feel for the people and we do want to give them relief. And you can't allow your men to burn the place down and then open up the treasury. Moreover, this gives us no advantage. It has set us back. Our effort to woo the people suffers by such incidents. So why should that be a policy? And in case, some fires were started by the security people, this is a very crude and foolish action on their part.

Q: Have you as the Governor tried to ensure that more places are not set on fire?
A: It is my effort. I have been telling my people that we should not allow the militants to bring about a situation where such things become possible.

Q: But are you saying that the militants set Handwara, Sopore, Noor Bagh on fire?
A: I am not prejudging the situation. You see, in such a

JAGDISH YADAV

The situation may appear to be hopeless when you see one side of it, or judge it at a particular moment of time. But there are many hopeful signs also wide action, what happened is that hundreds of thousands of rounds were fired in Handwara and Sopore. Some people (of the security forces) are lying dead, some of your comrades are lying injured, blood is rushing to your head. Unless you are very disciplined and the officer's leadership is effective, you can end up by reacting foolishly. It is our effort to contain this. And that is why I have been addressing not only senior officers, but officers at the level of commandants as well. To tell them that we have to ensure that the people get the message and are convinced of our sincerity that we are not fighting them. We are not only fighting the militants, we are fighting the terrorists, and that also is a temporary thing. It's not a fight to the finish. We should not look at them as enemies.

Q: But as things stand, the people are being crushed between the militants and the military. They feel that the security forces are perpetrating excesses...

A: Unfortunately, they do get caught in between But despite what you've heard—people come and meet me too—the masses are fed up with the militants. They are not too happy with what the security forces are doing, but they want normalcy to return. They are putting pressure on the militants, saying, 'Look, you have been able to achieve nothing. You have caused us this economic hardship, and we don't see any light at the end of the tunnel. For God's sake do something or give up'. Now, that kind of mood is there, and we would be able to build upon this mood if we could contain the resentment of the people against the security forces. In short, we really need to get our act together and do things according to law as far as possible.

Q: But the situation seems rather hopeless. Are you going to allow it to continue like this?

A: The situation may appear to be hopeless when you see one side of it, or judge it at a particular moment of time. But there are many hopeful signs also.

Q: Could you be more specific?

A: I am not going into the details, but even the militants are keen to change things. If we keep the door open and if we are willing to consider fulfilling their aspirations, then the militants have indicated that they would be ready to come more than halfway to respond. And, as I told you earlier, people are fed up with the militants They have begun to realise that we want to help, it is the militants and the bank employees who are in the way. There is a change in the mood of the people, and a section of the militants have begun re-thinking their strategy If the incidents of fire hadn't happened, people would have come out on the streets against the militants.

We can't control the situation by resorting to strong measures only. That is only meant to create a situation where other meaningful things are possible. In the final analysis, it is the people who matter and we will have to reason with them I am certain that the gun alone cannot decide the future.

Q: The present government sometimes gives the impression that the Kashmir problem has ceased to matter for them...

A: That is not the case. Kashmir is very high in their agenda. Not only the government, but the whole country is concerned. I must say we are very sincere to have the people on our side, and there is no intention to subjugate them militarily, or through fear. That just would not work. It would be the most foolish thing to try. ●

Chilling realism

Does College Girl exploit a true life happening for commercial gains?

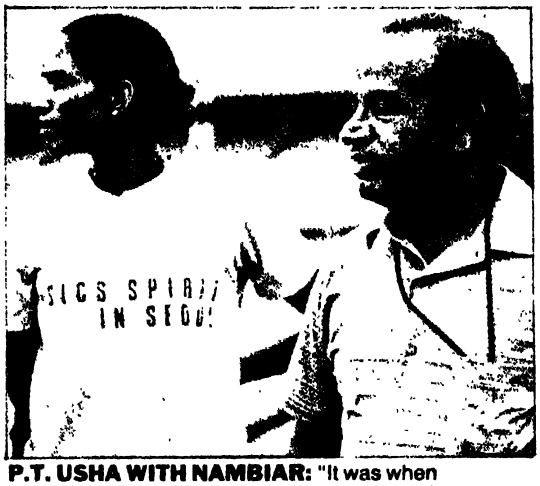
There is allround condemnation for the Hindi film, College Girl. Critics have blasted the film, social and women's groups are clamouring for a ban on it and political leaders have joined the chorus.

College Girl, claim its makers, is based on a 'true to life' incident. The reference, obviously, is to the gang rape about a year back of a girl student of Bombay's once-prestigious Elphinstone College. Certain VIP students with high political connections were involved in the outrage, and the college authorities initially tried to hush up the affair. Fortunately, the media as well as social and women's organisations protested vigorously. Finally, one of the students was rusticated but police investigation is still dragging on.

The film, according to its critics, is not about a rape case in a college. It seeks to exploit the incident, projects a perverted view of college life and girl students and its main theme is titillation.



Some people have even questioned the wisdom of making a film based on a controversial, true life happening. This argument is not valid. Human tragedies, individual or mass, all over the world have always lent themselves to be written about and then filmed. American author Truman Capote immortalised the killing of the Clutter family in his famous book, In Cold Blood. The movie, based on the book, was chilling in its realism.

Usha's hurdle

Suresh Menon in Indian Express magazine has several interesting points to make in his piece Pity Usha. Would she have performed better by going over to the West and training there? Though making a mark in the 400 metres hurdles, why didn't she concentrate on this but made to run in too many events?

Menon's comments on the Usha-Nambiar relationship are revealing. "It was when Nambiar crossed the line that separates a well-wisher from a professional coach that the trouble began. It took, for instance, Edwin Moses at Los Angeles to point out to Usha the discrepancy in the number of strides between hurdles that might have cost her a medal. Clearly, Nambiar was not trained to notice such things. He also lacked the confidence to tell Usha where her priorities lay with regard to the number of events she would be asked to participate. At best he was a trainer, with a stop clock in one hand and a whistle in the other, timing sprints and noting them down. He lacked the strength to tell Usha that he was of limited use to her, and that she would have to move on to something bigger if she had to keep her date with destiny.

That is the tragedy of both Usha and Nambiar. She won medals by the dozens, yet was a failure by international standards. As Menon puts it, "As a nation which could not look after its best athlete, we should all hang our heads in shame."

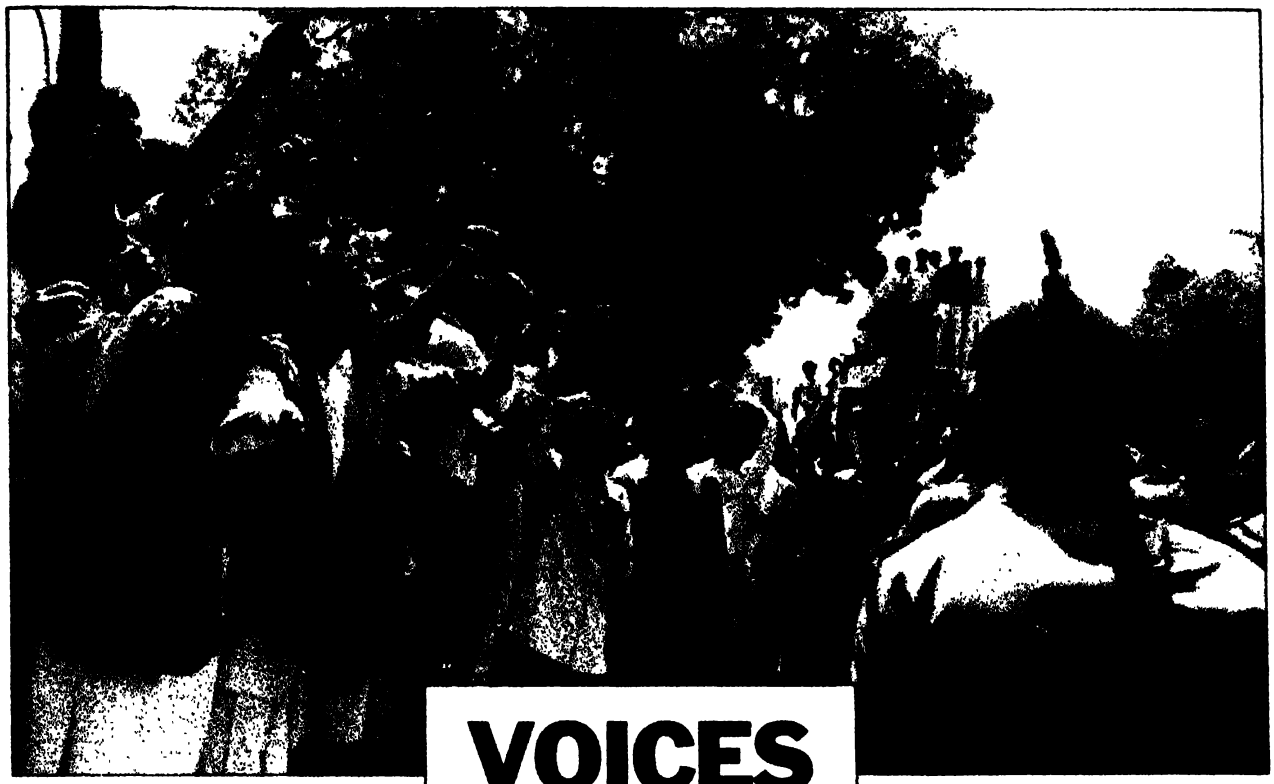
M.J. AKBAR: He covered more communal riots than anyone else in the business. And he wrote with pain, precision and passion

Silence speaks



M.J. Akbar was never an ivory tower editor. Functioning more as a reporter-editor, he covered more communal riots than any one else in the business. And he wrote with pain, precision and passion.

The young Congress MP, thank heavens, has not lost his eye for details on his reporting skills. His Byline column is generally devoted to V.P. Singh bashing. But The Bonfires of the Heart: Notes From the Shadows of Ayodhya is vintage Akbar.

He writes once again on communal killings, this time at Kanje Man village near Ayodhya. The carnage is horrifying and though the official figures listed only 37 as killed, the actual toll was much higher. The massacre was the work of trishul-waving cadres of Hindu militants egged on by the BJP-RSS-VHP-Bajrang Dal fanatics after a Dusserah procession had been stoned by some irresponsible miscreants.

The retaliation was terrible, ghastly. Among the dead was a young man, who was doused with kerosene and torched in the presence of his aged father. "Those who do not weep haunt you more," writes Akbar. "A frail, bearded, gaunt, middle-aged labourer of the fields, his body rib streaked, his face hard, taut, standing in your way as you step across another cluster of burnt rubble, his hands fully outstretched and his palms cupped to hold black, burnt wheat. He says nothing, you say nothing."

Can anyone say anything? ●

GUESS WHO IS COMING TO DINNER?

Gandhi with Khushwant and Rahul Singh: pulling surprises

He keeps doing the most surprising things. When Rajiv Gandhi is not firing chief ministers or backtracking on Mandal, he spends his time astounding his friends.

Two weeks ago, it was the turn of Rahul Singh, the Doon-Cambridge contemporary of the former Prime Minister and a distinguished journalist in his own right. (Singh has edited the Readers' Digest and The Sunday Observer in his time.)

In Delhi to celebrate his 50th birthday, Singh left a message at 10 Janpath for Rajiv, informing him that there would be a party at his father's (Khushwant Singh) flat and thought nothing more of it.

Then, just as the festivities were getting under way, Singh got a call from the Congress president's office. Rajiv would attend, but he would stay for only half-an-hour.

In the event, he stayed for over two hours, mingled easily with the guests and received the attentions of a steady stream of female admirers. But the most touching moment came when Khushwant Singh told him, "You are the only member of your family who had never been to my house. And now you've come."

Then, as he always does, the Sardar said good night to his son's guests and went off to bed—at 9.30 pm.

Says Rahul Singh: "I never thought he'd come. I left the message only because Camellia Panjabi, who was with us at Cambridge, insisted. But he surprised us all."

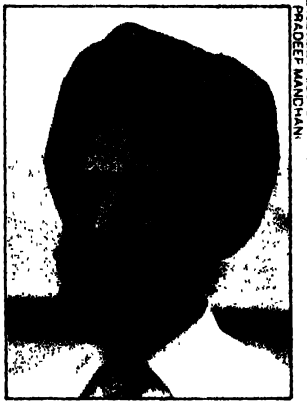
CAMERA, LIGHTS, NACHAPPA!

It is a matter of some dispute as to why Ashwini Nachappa has been chosen as the subject of a feature film—the first to be made on a sportsperson in the country. Is it because Nachappa's colourful one-piece track suits and her poor man's-Flo-Jo image make for interesting viewing?

Or is it because she is seen as the deserving successor to P.T. Usha's throne?

Whatever the answer to that one, newspaper magnate Ramoji Rao (of Eenadu fame) has chosen Nachappa to star in his forthcoming Telugu film, to be made at an estimated cost of Rs 35 lakhs. The movie, depicts Ashwini's gruelling struggle to make it to the top.

If Ashwini sizzles on the screen just as much as she does on the track, then the film should make for compulsive viewing.



Ashwini Nachappa: now on celluloid

THE ARMY KNOWS BEST

While everybody decried the abysmal performance of India at the recently-concluded Asian Games in Beijing, it was left to Milkha Singh to come up with a way out of the morass Indian athletics finds itself in.

According to the

PRADEEP MANDHAN

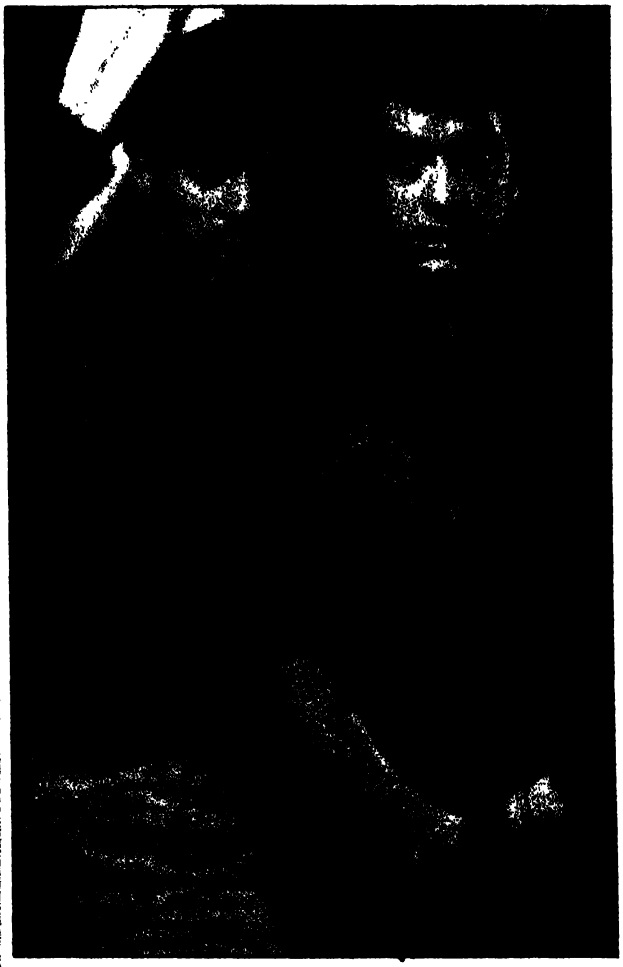
Milkha Singh: ingenious suggestion

Flying Sikh, who'd broken the world record in the 400 metres in the Rome Olympics (1960), clocking 45.6 seconds, the situation could only be set right if the army was asked to take over the running of all sports federations in the country. Of course, this should only be done after the sports bodies had been consulted and a consensus evolved, clarified Singh.

Once military discipline was imposed on all athletes, said the former track star, standards would improve miraculously. And we'd no longer be the eternal losers at international sports meets.

MAD AS A HATTER

The art of managing contradictions has landed the Prime Minister in trouble. For, citing the various contradictory statements of the Raja on issues such as Punjab, Kashmir and the Mandal Commission, O.P. Saxena, president of the Lawyers Forum for Civil Liberties, has filed a petition against V.P. Singh under the Indian Lunacy Act.



The petitioner recalled that Rani Sita Devi, Singh's wife, had declared in 1952 that her husband was of unsound mind and that he should be restrained from gifting away all the family property. If the Raja's Rani herself was convinced of his lunacy, argued Saxena, there must be something to it.

V.P. Singh: touched in the head?

Hence the court should make arrangements for the medical examination of the Prime Minister to establish the truth once and for all.

Preliminary hearings begin soon. And should provide some laughs, if nothing else.

Aamir and Salman Khan: proving a point

YES, THEY CAN KHAN KHAN

The filmi press made much of the purported rivalry between the two Heartbreak Khans, Aamir and Salman. But it now turns out that there was nothing to the story other than media hoopla. And just to prove that everything is well between them, the Khans have decided to co-star in a film: Raj Kumar (Ghayal) Santoshi's forthcoming release.

The two diminutive Khans play buddy-buddy. And thankfully, Sangeeta Bijlani isn't one of the heroines.

So, with luck, the shooting will progress without incident. And the film prove a top grosser, what with the impressive initial draw of the two teenyboppers.

MIND YOUR LANGUAGE

His massive public relations drive to convince the southern states that he wasn't keen on imposing Hindi doesn't seem to have succeeded too well. And if it did, Mulayam Singh Yadav has managed to ruin the impact by writing official letters to southern governments in his matribhasha.

Not that Kerala chief minister E.K. Nayanar was in the least fazed by this tactic. He promptly sent back the offending document to the Uttar Pradesh CM, on the grounds that nobody could understand what it said.

Mulayam Singh Yadav: the boomerang effect

The covering letter (in both Malayalam and English) said: "If we followed your insistence on using the mother tongue we would have to reply to your letter in Malayalam. But...we consider such insistence on matters of language as narrow and...we know that it will cause inconvenience to the states where Malayalam is not spoken."

In future, Yadav was informed, it would make better sense to avoid Hindi while communicating with non-Hindi speaking states. But will Mulayam Singh oblige?

COMPANIES

Métier, Mettle, and Moves

Birla 3M may have all three, but the future is wide open

Minnesota Mining and Manufacturing. That is what 3M used to be. Today, the Fortune 500 company has moved out of mining and entirely into manufacturing—and marketing, the last more than filling the gap left by mines. US $10 billion (Rs 18,000 crores at current exchange rates) in sales, a product range—from spiffy self-stick note pads to speciality chemicals—of one lakh, 70 divisions, and a management style that is as de rigeur as it can be for course work in international management schools.

But it is a low-key company. So low-key that when it kicked off operations in India two years ago as Birla 3M, a venture with recently deceased industrialist Ashok Birla, it received the customary—though brief—media attention. And then, retreated to do what it does best: work.

The result. End-March 1989: year one, Rs 2.5 crores in five months of operations. End-March 1990: Rs 10 crores. And, says William Scrivens, Birla 3M's managing director, "we believe we can reach Rs 100 crores within five years". In essence, adds Scrivens, "we are a small company here, but it is just the beginning of a company that will address all 3M businesses". A strong assertion—some would even say a trifle overconfident. But the thing is, nobody really disputes it. As elsewhere, the 3M tag is enough to do the trick.

Not just the tag, however, but also the potential. "Confusing" is how a senior Birla 3M executive terms the multinational's product list, all of which the Indian company has access to. And Scrivens, despite saying that in India, "we are essentially selecting products" which have to be "commercially viable", is actually talking about areas that are as money-minting as they are wide. "Communication, power distribution, packaging and health care," says Scrivens, a Briton who was earlier the chief of 3M's Kenya operations. "All priority areas with the government."

The department of telecommunications (DoT) already buys telecom cable connectors from Birla 3M; perhaps it helps to be based in Bangalore, home to two premier DoT operations: the Indian Telephone Industries, and a crucial electronic exchange facility. Power distribution, almost as large an area as power generation (at present levels of demand, worth more than Rs 10,000 crores a year), is on the anvil.

The company manufactures all kinds of tapes—for packaging, insulation, surgical uses, and of course, as that key ingredient in any stationery stock: cello-tape. It is not for nothing, joke 3M executives, that tape means Scotch (like photocopying still means Xerox, and in India, washing powder for clothes means Surf).

More on Scotch tapes: "We may come into the electrical tape products market," says Kishore Rao, Birla 3M's general manager for engineering and production. "It's not on the agenda for the moment, but definitely in the future." When that happens, it could blow the market sky-high. 3M is one of the world's largest manufacturers of audio tapes, both for cassette and spool players. More importantly, 3M pioneered the video tape technology, and is the world's largest manufacturer in this segment. In addition, Birla 3M makes adhesive strips for diapers for all Indian brands, Snuggies, Wraps, the works. (Eighty five per cent of all diapers made in the world use 3M strips.)

The list goes on: protection suits complete with masks and tube breathing units; specialised masks for doctors as well as spray painters; electrodes for high-tech, precise applications such as in ECG, or electro cardiogram machines to monitor heart patients. Not to forget stationery items, the high-profile products that signify 3M worldwide, and now, in India. "We tend to operate in small segments in the market," says Ajay Nanavati, general manager, marketing and development with Birla 3M, in the company's typical, understated bluster style. "But in that segment we have an overwhelming presence."

will be opening up." He adds: "This makes for a very stable company." Perhaps, but India, as any multinational operating here should know by now, is a different ball-game altogether. A market that is as susceptible to demand and supply equations as it is to government policy. "And people talk of encouraging foreign investment and wooing foreign investors," says Rao, the production man. "It's tough—especially for a foreigner—to comprehend, and difficult to reconcile to red tape."

Stationery: only the tip of the 3M-berg

Certainly, if 3M's international business style is anything to go by, especially as a reference point to the company's Indian future. A style which dictates that as the company has such a varied product range, use it in a way that negates stress on any particular product. Says Scrivens: "If a particular market is depressed, another

If Birla 3M unloads even a fraction of the one lakh 3M products it has access to, it could blow the market sky-high

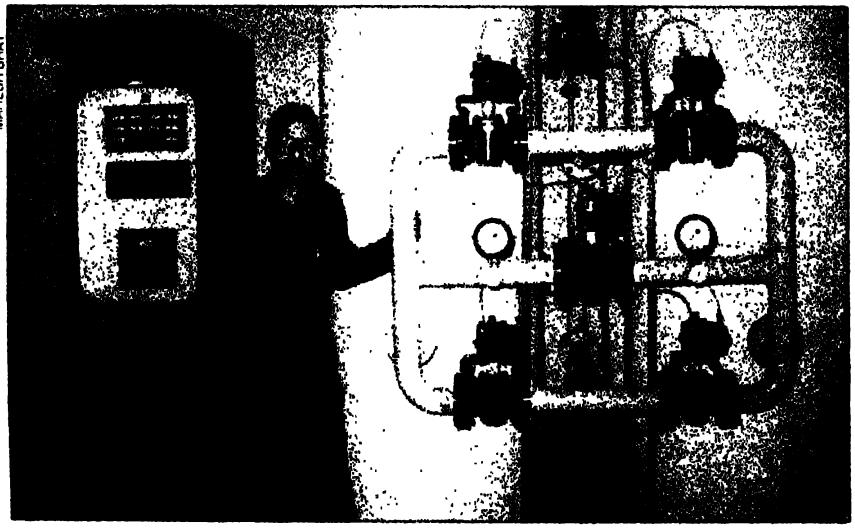
In a way, India is not exactly uncharted territory for 3M. Since the early 1980s, 3M worked the Indian market out of its Asia headquarters in Singapore, supplying speciality chemicals, among other things. (To see 3M scouring pads for kitchen use, and Scotchgard, the cleanser which claims to wipe off the most stubborn stains—now available through Birla 3M—in up-market, urban households was not an entirely unheard of phenomenon, brought back in bagfulls from trips abroad. Ditto with Post-its and rolls of cello-tape.)

"The rationale to set up a local unit," says Nanavati, "was to service the consumer, expand in terms of product range and in terms of geographic presence, as well. It strengthened our sales and marketing efforts."

MAHESH BHAT

Nanavati: "we have an overwhelming presence" in a market segment

And formed a link with Ashok Birla. Not that other top names were not interested. The would-have-beens, culled from the grapevine, read like a who's who of India's corporate kettle: Vijay Mallya, Lalit Mohan Thapar, the house of Kirloskars and pharmaceutical heavyweight Ranbaxy, among others.



3M holds 40 per cent equity in the Indian venture, which accounted for an initial investment of Rs 12 crores. This is contrary to the US company's usual practice to go in for majority stakes. Then again, it keeps the company within the government's Foreign Exchange Regulation Act boundaries, and if PepsiCo can stick by it, so can we, appears to be the 3M logic. After all, the Indian market is too large to be ignored. So much so, that Birla 3M has been accorded subsidiary status, despite technically being an affiliated venture. Ashok's Zenith group—a little cash-strapped right now—holds 24 per cent of the equity, with other group companies accounting for 16 per cent more.

The remaining 20 per cent will be handed over to the public in a share issue later this year. (The public issue is already delayed. Initially slated for June 1988, the launch was later pushed to spring this year, to coincide with Birla 3M formally opening its Keonics City plant in the outskirts of Bangalore. As of now, the launch date appears to be wide open, with Indian share markets in a wild roller-coaster mood, too many economic imponderables, and a primary—or new issue—market in a trough. The Birla 3M issue will perhaps hinge on how equity offerings from other companies do, say stock market analysts.)

Ashok's tragic death has not dulled the company's link with its Birla parent...or 3M International

Rao: "difficult to reconcile to red tape"

MAHESH BHAT

Perhaps 3M felt a little reassured when Ashok offered them management control: hence, Scrivens' presence in India, a rarity when a business house is in the picture. 3M executives acknowledge Ashok's professional outlook, a simple—and laudable—case of recognising the fact that people who know the business should be left to run it. Also, they acknowledge that Ashok's drive helped. "Ashok Birla was closely associated with the project," says Rao. "Birla 3M was his pet project. His greatest wish was to see it become a reality (Ashok, in numerous press interviews, said that he expected Birla 3M to become one of the star performers of his group). It was very, very unfortunate that he died in the crash (in the 14 February Airbus A320 accident, while on his way to Bangalore to receive 3M International chairman Allen Jacobson for the formal opening of the factory)."

Ashok's tragic death has not dulled the company's link with its Birla parent. "Though 3M is involved in the technical and management part of it," continues Rao, "on the Indian side we are drawing on their (the Birlas') entrepreneurial zeal, drawing on the Birlas' resources—particularly with government agencies." He adds: "Now we are glad that his son (Yashovardhan) is involved as chairman of the company (Birla 3M) and to that extent, Ashok Birla's spirit continues."

If there is still a close link with the Birlas, the link with US parent 3M is equally close. For starters, 3M has management control—Jacobson insisted on it, and Ashok agreed—and the working relationship Birla 3M shares with 3M is unusual for multinational outfits in India. "Our relationship has been outstanding," says Nanavati, Birla 3M's marketing man, "and they have helped us get off the ground." For instance, say company officials, more than 60 3M International staffers have visited India this year to review work and help develop the Indian venture's business plans. In turn, Birla 3M executives have winged their way to the US parent's Minnesota headquarters and Asian hubs for training.

The result, say Birla 3M executives, is an environment that is uniquely American: a laid-back, approachable style, first names; on the other hand, slip up on work and hell begins to seem like a very pleasant alternative. "We often have people wanting to join us, who tell us" says Rao, "'we have heard a lot about the work environment and like to be a part of it.'" Perhaps, as a place where work is appreciated first is welcome in a bureaucratically,politically befuddled India. Then again, any company would like to assuage its ego by claiming work environment superiority. Rao's assertion is believable only on one count: the 3M tag, again—the international conglomerate is simply too well known for some of its management magic not to have filtered down to India. "I think we scare our competition," says Rao. "We have a formidable reputation." Give us a break, one might say. Besides, Scrivens' five-year, Rs 100 crore deadline is yet to come true.

Magic or not—and its "indomitable" claims apart—Birla 3M has problems, too. A key one: distribution. Scrivens admits it flatly: "It is a problem in India, (being) in Bangalore, for instance, you don't realise there are certain things available in Bombay and Delhi." This works both ways: while it creates a problem to obtain supplies, it also creates hurdles for getting finished goods out. A major obstacle, says Scrivens, when "there is a lot of regional distribution". This brings out Rao's observation about foreigners finding India a tough workplace—and marketplace - to be in. With terrible communication facilities, unpredictable and costly road transport and an entirely washed up railway service. Both Indian companies, and numerous foreign ones, have found it easier to just put their heads down and take things as they come, to make the best of a frequently unnerving situation. If Birla 3M neglects to follow suit, it is in for trouble

Ashok Birla: professional enough to hand over management control

Indian companies, and numerous foreign ones have found it easier to just put their heads down and take things as they come, to make the best of a frequently unnerving situaiton. If Birla 3M neglects to follow suit, it is in for trouble

But the 3M-- and now, Birla 3M—strength lies in its ability to adapt to a region's special demands. And, as always, always, to adapt a product to consumer needs. "That's what makes us different from other companies," claims Nanavati. "We know who our customers are," adds Scrivens. "and we work with them to develop and manufacture according to their needs. If you are close to them, you don't need to be high profile."

Fine, Birla 3M has what it takes to get where it wants to. Then again, there are absolutely no givens in business. Same time, same place, five years down the road? ●

"I was made a scapegoat"

Calcutta jute baron Arun Bajoria on his land and FERA scandals, and his jute successes despite an industry slump

Arun Bajoria tries very hard to stay away from controversy. Unfortunately, controversy has a way of finding him. For the past five years, the Calcutta based entrepreneur has blundered his way into scandals—the Rawdon Square land development scam that for a while, even shook up West Bengal's die-hard Marxist government.

Then, he bought a series of jute mills nobody would touch, at a time when the industry was—and still is—going through its worst ever slump. The five mills he picked up all show profits. Strange, at a time when economics dictates that none should. A thriving jute baron at at time when all other barons are a distant memory.

Then, last March, sleuths swooped down on Bajoria, accusing him of Foreign Exchange Regulation Act (FERA) violations, and of holding an unauthorised Swiss bank account.

Bajoria bailed out, expectedly —his political contacts are legion.

This, then,is the man who runs a Rs 500 crore empire—and allegedly holds foreign currency assets worth Rs 35 crores and nobody knows how. No bank loans, either. No chatting up the media. Ever.

Bajoria broke his silence to speak to SUNDAY on various issues. His responses were mostly evasive, some self-congratulatory, and few, insensitive. Excerpts from an exclusive interview.

On why he kept buying jute factories at a time when most owners would gladly be rid of them:
We already owned the Hooghly Mills (since 1957) and that was doing well. Besides, I got the other mills dirt cheap. Say, Gondolpara. I bought that for Rs 2.25 crores plus a Rs 7-8 crore gratuity liability. I bought all the others at similar prices, all within Rs 3-4 crores. It takes about Rs 60-70 crores to set up a unit. The mills were all losing money when I bought them, but then on, they have been showing profits.

On how he managed to show profits given the industry slump:
I would put it down to good personnel management, and a dedicated effort on the part of all concerned. Some of the bigger houses have not been doing too well because they have varied interests. Unlike the Birlas and the Singhanias, I deal solely in jute.

On how he managed to buy all the mills without taking a single bank loan.
The Hooghly Mill was showing profits, and I invested these funds in other units and kept rolling the profits. In the space of three years, starting 1985, I owned Gondolpara, Weaverly, Anglo-India (Lower) and Hukumchand.

On how that is possible as the Hooghly unit does not look like a great profit earner:
Well, that is the way it happened...

On allegations of jute 'juggling' against industrialists:
Speculation is rife in the industry, that is true. But this kind of juggling does not benefit the mill owners in any way. Most of the mills are in the red. If they benefitted from juggling, then surely, they would show profits.

On whether this is how Hooghly managed to show profits:
Hooghly has always showed profits.

On diversification, research, or the lack of these:
The Indian jute industry leaves all research to the government agencies—IJIRA (Indian Jute Industries Research Association). JTRL (Jute Technology Research Laboratory), etc. The industrialists themselves take no interest. We are content to produce conventional jute goods: sacking, carpet backing, etc. The only unit which has tried and succeeded somewhat in diversifying is Champdany, hats off to them. If their performance reflects genuine potential in diversified jute products (decoratives, linens, cloth), then others will surely follow. But that hasn't happened as yet.

On why Bangladesh has a larger share of the international export market:
This is primarily because eleven months a year Bangladesh jute is cheaper than Indian jute. We get only the leftovers of the market. The finished goods we sell at Rs 12,000 a tonne,they sell at Rs 6,000 in the export market. Naturally, we don't stand a chance. Rs 6,000 barely covers our production costs. They are aided by heavy government subsidies. You see, jute is their only foreign exchange earner.

Our exports are mainly to Russia, not because we can compete with Bangladesh but because of the existing trade protocol. Russia buys jute from us irrespective of the price Bangladesh is offering.

On the abysmal living conditions of jute mill workers:
There is very little an industrialist can do about it. It is the workers who are at fault. If there is accommodation for 2,000 people, they bring in another 10,000. They earn rents by sub-letting the quarters. There are khataals(cow sheds) and liquor dens and brothels. The industrialist cannot be expected to clean up that kind of a mess. It is the workers who have to change their mentality.

As for working conditions, the current conditions have existed ever since the British period. Nobody around here bothers about noise or air pollution—it has just been recognised as part and parcel of the industry.

On the degeneration of the once plush mills:
It is all very well when an industry or unit is doing well. We can spend money on it. Likewise, we can't when it is not. If you look at Gondolpara, it is in great shape. As for the others, the previous owners of say, Hukumchand, were the Birlas and if they couldn't manage proper upkeep, how can you point a finger at me?

On whether that is contradictory, as working conditions at the Hooghly unit—the major profit earner—are particularly bad:
The Hooghly unit has always been run this way. And anyway, we can't spend too much on these things.

On the role of the Jute Corp. of India (JCI) to stop speculation, and control the price of raw jute:
JCI does not buy sufficient raw jute to be able to regulate price. It is only when prices fall very low that they buy, and at their price they find it very difficult to dispose of their stock.

Inside a jute factory: "most of the mills are in the red"

On the 1987 Rawdon Square issue, when Bajoria was accused of illegally landing a contract to build a commercial complex on prime Calcutta real estate:
If you really want to know, I was made a scapegoat. I had nothing to do with it. It was a state government move to convert the Rawdon Square park into a multi-storey business and shopping complex, and the construction contract was awarded to one Dr H.K. Sen's company. My cousin Gopal Bajoria, in collaboration with Dr Sen, had undertaken the contract. But they required some financing and Gopal approached me, asking if I was willing to invest about Rs five crores, or at least say I was, because The Statesman was already screaming: "How can a Rs 2,000 company handle a Rs 20 crore project?"

Then, the Congress(I) started demonstrating against the project and it became a political issue. So, though I had not invested a single paisa I was victimised, and false allegations of my having given a bank guarantee were made. I did no such thing.

On his alleged FERA violations, and subsequent arrest on 16 March 1990:
This was also made out to be a big issue because it was politicised. The allegation was that I held accounts in a bank in Geneve, Switzerland. That is all rubbish—pata nahin kahan kahan se aate hain yeh log (I don't know where these people come from). They can slap anything onto anyone.

Anyway, they arrested me on the evening of 16 March and subjected me to every kind of torture and I was forced to give them a 'confession'. But after I was bailed out on 18 March, I contacted the bank, but they said they could do little about it. I had to get a written statement from the bank saying that I did not hold an account there. So, I got in touch with a Geneve lawyer who sorted the mess out somehow. The papers are all with the investigating agencies. •

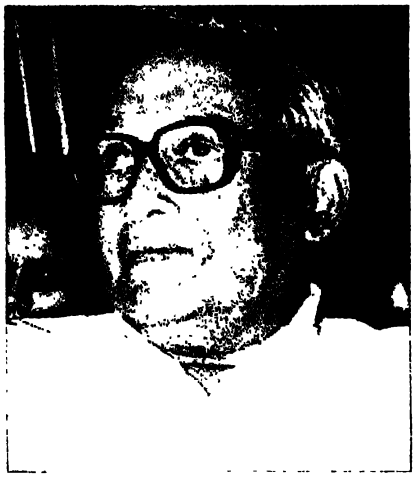
INDUSTRY/ PLANTATIONS



First, the bad news

No way out of a coffee crisis, a few cheers for tea, and some sunshine—barely—for spices and rubber. That is the planters' punch for 1990

It has been almost two months since the United Planters Association of South India (UPASI) met for their 97th annual conference, to share tales of woe. The planters managed some words of praise for the tea industry, a mixed bag of blessings for rubber and spices, and almost nothing but bad times ahead for the coffee sector.

The assessment still holds true. The organisers laid on an international coffee convention before the UPASI show, and paraded the executive director of the International Coffee Organisation (ICO)—the coffee world's De Beers—A.F. Beltrao, as a big name draw. Only, Beltrao dropped a bombshell India is still reeling from. He announced that the organisation was trying to rope in Soviet Bloc countries, which basically means that Indian coffee exporters would end up losing their captive—and hugely profitable—markets. Plans are at an advanced stage, said Beltrao. And that was enough to shake people up, no matter that the convention was in Coonoor, in the Nilgiri Hills, and the weather marvellous.

With reason. The USSR, for example, buys 55,000 tonnes of green, or uncured coffee from the Indian Coffee Board, plus 6,000 tonnes of instant coffee every year. Poland is another major buyer, picking up anything between 15,000 to 20,000 tonnes a year. India's trade protocol with these nations, and others in the Soviet ambit, is what keeps the trade going. Because, India cannot match prices that its competitors—Brazil and Colombia, among others—offer, and the only way it can cash in is by hanging on to the Eastern Bloc trade agreements. But East Germany does not exist any more. And if others find that international trade organisations are opening their doors to them, then the first thing to be dumped will be the higher-priced imports from India, rupee trade or not. And, as India does not have a seat on the ICO, it lacks the necessary clout to push through with its demands.

Minister of state for commerce A. Shreedharan is not much help

Worse, coffee exports are already dropping. From a high of Rs 370 crores in 1986-87, it slid to Rs 310 crores for 1989-90. This year—thanks to low prices internationally and a worldwide coffee glut, it could drop still further. And if the captive markets pull out, more crores of rupees than the industry would care to count would be lost. The commerce ministry is already going about issuing warnings—"don't put more than half of the production in the Soviet Union's basket," "this is the time for prudence," etc.—but the point is, there are almost no places that India can divert its exports to. At the UPASI conference, it hardly helped much having Union minister of state for commerce Arangil Shreedharan around. The minister—who has come a long way since his days as a plantation labour union leader—hardly said much to assuage fears.

When UPASI president R.K. Krishna Kumar said "the crisis in the coffee industry continues", that was perhaps the understatement of the year as far as coffee producers were concerned. Krishna Kumar, who is also vice chairman of Tata Tea Ltd—the company that is planning to buy out the country's largest coffee plantation firm, Consolidated Coffee Ltd., pending official clearances—has reason to be worried. For his company, and the country, the twist is ironical: the coffee scene has never been worse.

And tea, never better, in spite of myriad problems. In fact, the tea scene can get better still, if promises hold out. The government says it will take a "positive view" on the industry's request that the Centre slash excise, currently at Rs 1.10 for every kilo of tea. And that it is "alive" to the United Liberation Front of Assam-fomented trouble which is giving every tea company with plantations in the state nightmares. Extortion demands that run into crores of rupees, and threats of death if they refuse to pay up, the list goes on. Till now, the Centre, or the Assam administration, has done precious little to solve the crisis. And this seems to be the major bugbear for an industry otherwise buoyed by rising exports—a record Rs 1,000 crores-plus for the year-ended March 1990, and a possibility of doubling it within the next two years, and one of the best crops in recent memory.

The tea industry has more than done its bit, goes the refrain, and it is time the government helped out, too. After all, says the industry, it has responded to the government's request to flood the market with packaged tea, about five million kilos worth, at a low-priced Rs 40 per kilo plus taxes.

Attempts to tackle the Assam militants are washed up, to put it mildly. It is very unlikely that any administration will be able to do anything at all. Shreedharan amounts to practically nothing in the pecking order, finance minister Madhu Dandavate will have to be content with emotional speeches, and Prime Minister V.P Singh, well, that is another story altogether. The tea industry will have to establish its own status quo with them. This is a given. Tata Tea's Krishna Kumar let out the inkling of a plan when he told UPASI delegates about how "insularity has been our chief weakness. ..In public perception, plantations are seen as islands of affluence in the midst of rural poverty". So, get involved in community development. This is way up the militants' street, they have been demanding economic and social parity for Assamese workers on plantations and surrounding areas for months. The industry, obviously, is trying to find its own level, no thanks to government.

On the other hand, the government is trying to help out by easing its pricing policies. It has already withdrawn two informal price control measures. On the other hand, it is not Minister Shreedharan dropped a bombshell of his own, following in international coffee boss Beltrao's footsteps, when he suggested that the government will not object if anyone decides to import tea for value-added exports. If that happens--and tea from Sri Lanka or Kenya is cheaper than the average Indian varieties--domestic producers are in for a rude shock. As it is, the industry is livid that the minister should have made such a statement without consulting them in the first place. Besides, the move could lead to complications which the government may not have considered. For example, when a leading tea exporter such as India enters the world market to buy tea, prices could soar. As a result, the move could easily backfire, with the importer with value-added intentions buying tea at increasingly higher prices.

The coffee and the tea trade were uptight and cheerful in turn. But the rubber growers went home from the UPASI bash, smiling all the way. Shreedharan was not much help to the others but he assured the rubber trade that the commerce ministry is willing to jack up the floor price of rubber at the first opportunity. This would help, as cost of production is fast catching up with returns, and, in the near future could actually outpace the latter. The windfall appears to be purely political in nature. Shreedharan is from Kerala, home to India's rubber plantations. Besides, when this government says it will hike procurement or floor prices, it actually does it, contrary to its usual stand of dithering endlessly.

On the spice front--again, the Kerala factor creeps in--the government expects to step in. The Gulf crisis has knocked off export figures for the spice industry. And clandestine cardamom imports from Sri Lanka have knocked some wind out of the trade's sails. The industry hopes that the Gulf will soon return to normal—though, as most analysts see it, equations there are changed forever—and the "relatively important export region" will be back in its books. However, pepper prices are low, and all gains after last year's disastrous cardamom crop are being eroded because of smuggling.

Quite a planters' punch. And all said and done, nobody wants a repeat. There is simply too much at stake. The UPASI realises it. If the government would only try to understand. •

■ Band on the run

Actually, band on bail. A corporate PR man and his bugler, who allegedly teamed up to play a death-march to Bombay Dyeing chairman Nusli Wadia, are out of judicial custody. Kirti Ambani, cousin to Dhirubhai, chairman of Reliance Industries Ltd, and Arjun Babaria, the meister of an obscure Bombay band, were said to have got together more than a year ago to kill off Wadia, and thus, went the prosecution's argument, remove the biggest thorn in Dhirubhai's side.

Nusli Wadia: music? No thanks

Only, two Reliance employees who earlier swore they recognised Kirti's voice on tape, passing the orders, failed to do so at a recent bail hearing. The judge declared, therefore, that the prosecution's evidence was insubstantial and turned the duo loose on bail. Rumours are flying: did Dhirubhai have a hand in it? And does that explain why two "impeccable" witnesses suddenly lost their power of hearing? The Central Bureau of Investigation says it will keep a close watch on Kirti and the bugler, court order or not. And Wadia, too, is certain to keep a lookout, though a recurrence of paranoia is unlikely. For now, it seems like business as usual. Dirges, anyone?

■ Jokai jokes

No jokes, really. Not with the latest line-up in Jokai India, the one-time money-spinner for non-resident Indian (NRI) businessman Rajendra Sethia, now bankrupt and hurt. It appears that a consortium led by Narayan C. Pohani, a US-based NRI and real estate developer who owns Rossel Estates, has bought into Jokai Holdings Ltd, which has a 74 per cent stake in Jokai India. Pohani, Govind Chandak, another US-NRI real estate developer like Pohani, and P.K. Kaul (yes, you read right, the Kaul, former cabinet secretary and India's ambassador to the US) will be moving onto Jokai India's board. Rossel has undertaken to pay US $ 32 million (about Rs 575 crores at current exchange rates) to Punjab National Bank, which holds the 74 per cent of Jokai India as a pledge; Sethia had handed over control when he went bankrupt.

Rajendra Sethia: in or out?

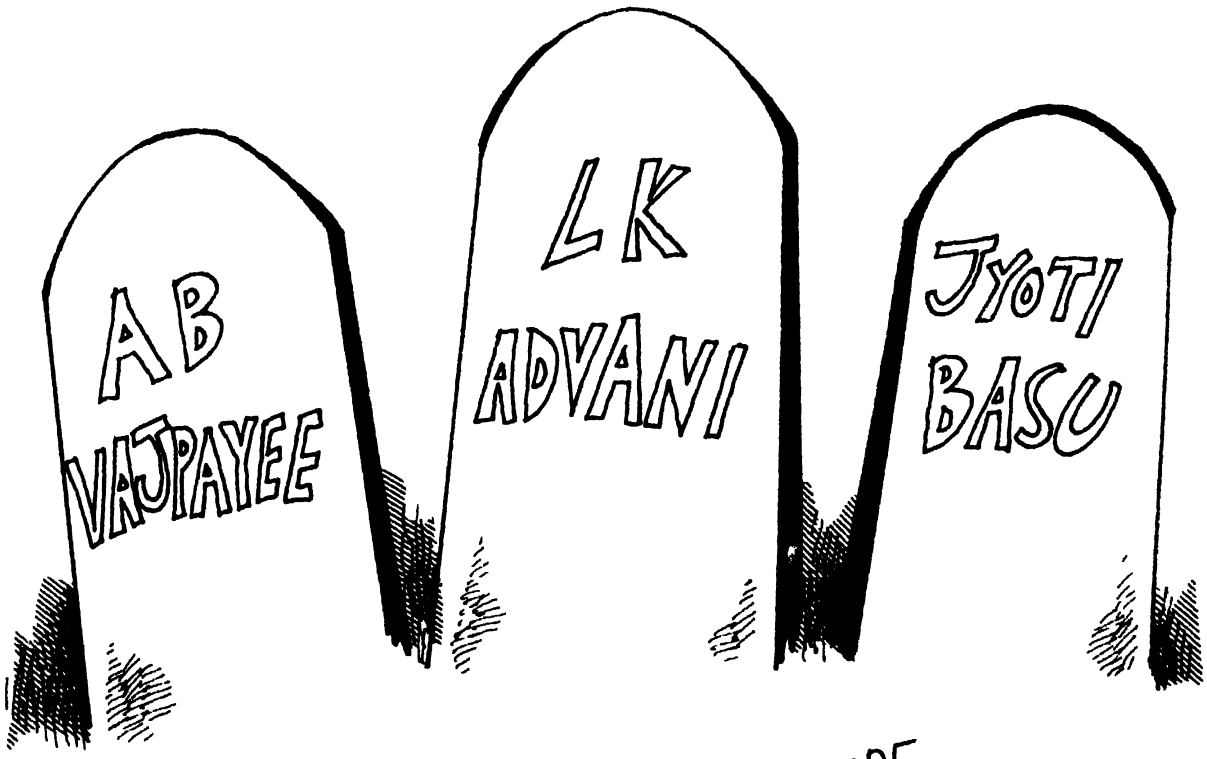
The way is clear, as the Company Law Board has withdrawn restrictions on appointment of directors. The government will nominate some of its own, but the real clout will remain with the consortium bosses. Actually, the real control will be with Pharaoh Holdings Plc, a UK-based company which in turn holds interests in Rossel. Who is what, exactly? It will take some time to work the links out. And, is Sethia really out?

■ Farm on

The way things look—and the industry may not like it, having its thunder stolen—farmers may come to India's economic rescue. Monsoons have been more than good, bountiful, to be exact. The kharif, or winter harvest is set to break records, way past the government's estimate of 95 million tonnes of foodgrains. Everything except oilseeds—thanks to late rains in Gujarat's Saurashtra region—should show bumper gains. For 1990-91, crop estimates are almost at 190 million tonnes, way over the Centre's production targets of 176 million tonnes. The showing will help replenish India's battered stocks, and hopefully, release more in the market. And create a market, thanks to increased agricultural incomes. ●

POLITICIAN OF THE WEEK

George Fernandes



Union minister for railways

And now, a rail hike. Yes, it will help cut subsidies. But it will also help drive prices through the roof. Minister Fernandes says diesel is now too expensive, what with the Gulf crisis. So, he wants a supplementary budget to announce increases in both passenger and freight charges. The first is politically sensitive, as the electorate screams every time fares are hiked; therefore, keep the low fares low and raise tabs on first class and air conditioned travel. Freight charge increases will affect industry and the economy, but who cares. I certainly don't, says Fernandes, I have losses of Rs 100 crores to make up, because you folks have been stopping and burning trains. It isn't really oil-related, is it, minister? Your government wants money, doesn't it? But if you take more of it away, you get less the second time round. Oh, and don't forget inflation.

Express battle

M. Karunanidhi takes on the Indian Express

To the thousands of DMK followers in Tamil Nadu, Murasoli, the Tamil party organ edited by Union minister Murasoli Maran, who is also a nephew of chief minister Karunanidhi, is more than just a newspaper. Every morning, editorial writers with interesting pen-names make impassionate pleas to party workers, spelling out the DMK's stand on numerous burning issues. On 16 October, one of them, writing under the pseudonym 'Sinnakuthoosi', flung an interesting poser at the executive director of the Indian Express at Madras, Manoj Kumar Sonthalia: "Is he willing to commit self-immolation in protest against the Mandal recommendations?" The editorial was a dig at the Express' stand on the Mandal report and the anti-reservation stir – which clearly clashed with the DMK's views on the matter.

Only a couple of days before, Sonthalia had penned a long letter addressed to the Tamil Nadu chief secretary, M.M. Rajendran, complaining that the DMK government was out to cripple the Express Group in the state. The complaint from the Express executive, who is a grandson of proprietor Ramnath Goenka, came in the wake of a series of violent attacks on the vans carrying the daily to the various distribution points across the districts over the last few weeks. Sonthalia also sent copies of his complaint to the powers-that-be in Delhi and had the full text published in the Sunday edition of the Express on 14 October.

Sonthalia's letter had distinct political overtones: he alleged that there was a "political conspiracy inspired by powerful elements in the ruling DMK to cripple physically" the publication of the Indian Express Group of Newspapers in Tamil Nadu and that "certain political elements like the Dravida Kazhagam (DK) and the Pattali Makkal Kazhagam (PMK) and other extremist groups are planning large-scale mob attacks and violence on the offices of the Indian Express and Dinamani (Tamil morninger from the group) at Madras, Madurai and Coimbatore".

More serious perhaps was Sonthalia's accusation that chief minister Karunanidhi was instigating his party workers. Substantiating his charge, the Express chief executive referred to the speech of Karunanidhi on 3 September, in which the chief minister came down heavily on the paper without actually naming it.

In all, Sonthalia listed around ten instances where his paper came under attack from the DMK and its allies—directly and indirectly. On 4 September, for instance, volunteers of the PMK led by its founder president, S. Ramdoss, burnt copies of Indian Express in front of the paper's office in Madras and shouted slogans against Goenka and editor Arun Shourie. "Down with the newspaper of shameless Brahmins, down with the blackleg newspaper," the agitators shouted. On 2 October, chief minister Karunanidhi charged the English newspaper with being anti-Mandal and exaggerating the anti-reservation agitation reports. The very next day, PMK volunteers stopped a van carrying Indian Express and Dinamani at Madurantakam, about 60 kms south of Madras, and burnt over 12,000 copies of the dailies on the highway.

Two more vans of the Express were damaged on 10 and 12 October. "The pattern is clear. Every day the attack takes place in a particular area. The police officials who have been assigned to protect stand as onlookers, as, according to them, they are outnumbered by the violent mob. Our complaints and FIRs have met with no response," Sonthalia said.

The Express executive went on to allege that police officials at the district level were "tight-lipped" about why they could not stop the attacks on Indian Express vans. "The sympathetic ones indicate that they are helpless as the attacks are centrally monitored by ruling party circles and, therefore, they could do precious little in the matter." Which meant that even though the attackers identified themselves as DK-PMK volunteers, the whole episode was being masterminded by the DMK leadership in Madras.

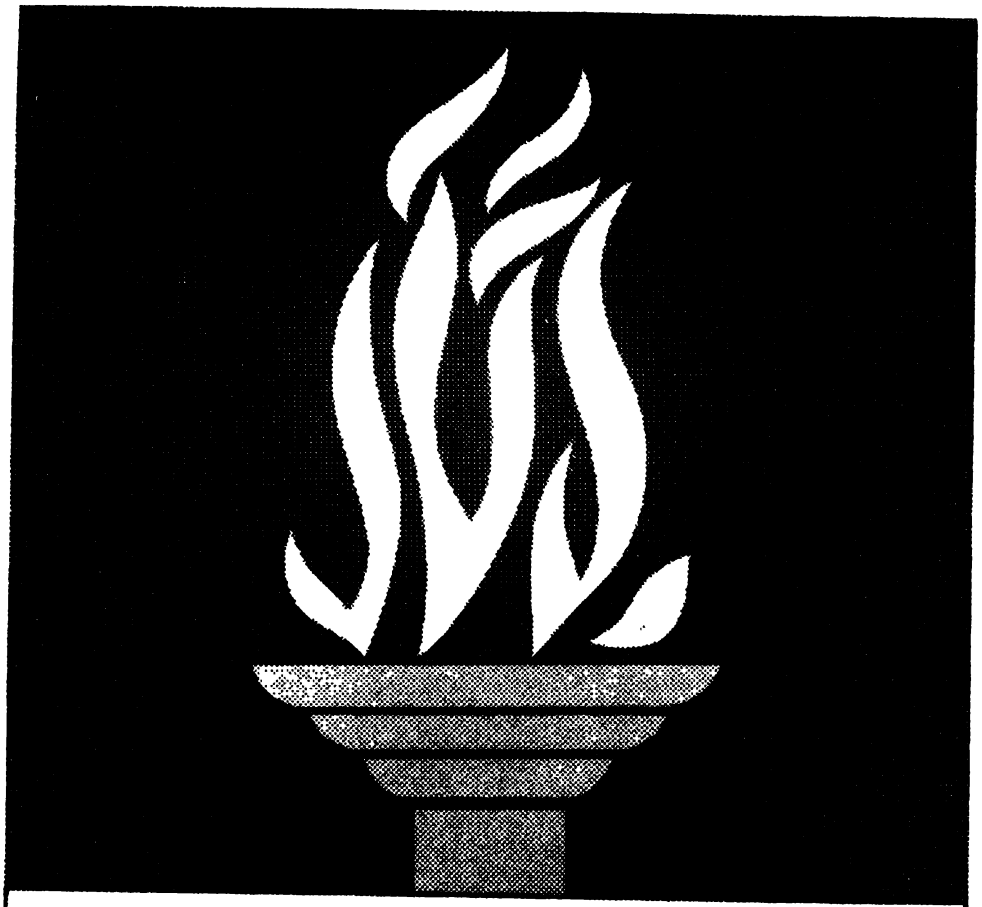
In fact, during one of the attacks, the DMK legislator from Tindivanam had personally led the violent mob, giving credence to the Express' allegation that the ruling party was merely using the DK and PMK as fronts for attacking the newspaper.

While the DK and the PMK were angry with the Express for siding with the anti-reservationists, the DMK had its own reason for being hostile to Goenka's outfit. Of late, the Indian Express has been quite sympathetic to the AIADMK general secretary, Jayalalitha, the arch-rival of chief minister Karunanidhi, and even frontpaged an interview with her on 4 October. The newspaper also gave an excellent coverage to the 7 October AIADMK rally in Madras, held to unveil an MGR statue. "AIADMK rally does MGR proud," the Express headline screamed. "Significant is the fact that the state government banned, the very day after the rally, all state government advertisements to the publications of the group," Sonthalia alleged in his letter.

The Express alleged that the DMK was using the DK and the PMK as fronts for attacking the paper's vans

Chief minister Karunanidhi reacted sharply to Sonthalia's charges. The same day (14 October) the Express carried Sonthalia's letter, Karunanidhi issued a statement denying that the DMK regime had anything to do with the attacks on the newspaper and its property. The CM clarified that even though he had openly criticised the policy of the paper, at no point of time had he either advocated violence against the morninger, or encouraged hooliganism against the media. The attacks on the paper were "only because of those who were really affected or agitated over the publication and the move of the Indian Express against the interests of the backward classes and Scheduled Castes. Without realising this, there is no use in finding fault with the DMK rule", argued the DMK chief.

The war of words continued with the Express publishing a rejoinder from Sonthalia. It said: "The laboured statement of the chief minister only goes to show that he justifies the acts of vandalism against Indian Express as the legitimate reaction of the oppressed classes, angered by the campaign of the paper against the Mandal Commission Report. To that extent, the chief minister has admitted the charge of Indian Express that the DMK government is hostile to the paper." Sonthalia also clarified that the Express always advocated peaceful agitations against the Mandal report.



Even as the trading of charges continued, two more vans of the Express were burnt in Madras on 15 October. Perturbed by this raging battle, Union home minister Mufti Mohammad Sayeed sent a terse note addressed to Karunanidhi's office saying that adequate security should be provided for the Indian Express property in Tamil Nadu. Said an Express staffer: "We also hear that Delhi has told Karunanidhi that it would not be in the best of his interests to rub us the wrong way. We hope now there will be a change of attitude on the part of the DMK leadership."

And the change came a bit too early than expected. The Tamil Nadu secretariat sent feelers to the Express in Madras, indicating that the chief minister would like to bury the hatchet. Said Sonthalia: "There were no more attacks on Indian Express vans, though some papers were set on fire in one incident." And, the ban on handing out advertisements to the Express Group was lifted. What is more, in a gesture of goodwill, the Tamil Nadu government okayed the paper's request for installing a printing press—something which was pending for quite sometime now.

The battle is clearly over, but for how long will the truce last? •

Black Diwali

The nation had nothing to celebrate this year

I write this on the morning of the festival I most enjoy celebrating. But there are going to be no diyas lit this evening round my house. I shan't hear the crackle of the phool-jhari or the rattle of the patakas bursting in a brass bucket, nor the whoosh of the 'rocket' nor the delighted whoops of my children as the anaar goes up in a cascade of sparkles. For, my teenagers have decreed that ours is to be a black Diwali, because and I quote from a handbill they have written, had printed and spent much of last week distributing at street-corners and the market of the colony we live in (that is, when they have not been seeing the insides of the Parliament Street Police Station)—

> "At a time like this, when the families of the martyred students are steeped in sorrow and the whole country is facing a crisis, does your conscience allow any form of celebration? The triumph of good over evil is yet to take place. The light of justice is yet to shine. Don't mock yourself by celebrating the Festival of Lights this year."

It was not like this last Diwali—remember?

Diwali fell last October just as the election process was getting into full swing. A Brave New World, we were told, was being put together, a new politics of coalition to replace the tired tyranny of one-party domination. Former land donors of the Bhoodan Movement began coalescing to "electoral adjustments" with the BJP. Communists beamed benevolently at communalists. Caste-neutral socialists discovered the congenial company of caste-rooted social engineers. 'Values' and 'issues' were all set to replace the 'personality cult' as the centre-piece of our political life.

The Congress was comfortably complacent that it would get a renewed mandate. It was, therefore, a time for celebration, a time for the lighting of diyas, a time for putting on new raiments, for stuffing your mouths with pedas —and filling your hearts with hope.

In a year it has come to this—this Black Diwali!

For what can they do in Kashmir but remember that where last October the golden Chinars were gazed upon by more tourists than ever before, the falling leaves fall now only upon the helmets of sullen jawans and the Kalashnikovs cocked in the arms of angry men, hatred smouldering in their eyes?

And what can they do in Himachal but mourn the dozens of young men killed in caste clashes and police firing as the NF government they returned to Delhi—in replacement of the Congress —and the BJP government they returned to Shimla—in replacement of the Congress—gnash their teeth at each other and young men die over reservation, raths, and Ram Janmabhoomi?

DELHI: The darkness of Diwali is dark and thick. Monica Chaddha is dead and Rajeev Goswami (below) struggles for life at the Safdarjung Hospital. What is there to celebrate?

And what is there to celebrate in Punjab where, at this time last year, over half the police stations in the State had reported no incidents of terrorism in the previous 24 months—and now find every inch of the state quite as much the prey of murderous fanatics as only the two and a half districts bordering Pakistan were last Diwali?

And who can celebrate Diwali in Haryana? The contrast with last October is too painful. For, last year, the Tau was the worshipped patriarch. At his gnarled feet gathered the acolytes - the V.P. Singhs and the Mulayam Singhs, the Chimanbhais and the Laloo Prasads. "Oh, Master," quoth they, "teach us how to cobble ourselves together—for the Manzil beckons and we needs must have ourselves a merry Diwali."

And the Tau showed them. And for his pains spends this Diwali alone on his khatiya, humiliated by the party he brought into being, kicked out of the Cabinet he wrought with all his artistry, self-exiled from the Lok Sabha he delectably crafted after his fashion, disinherited even from his ludli bachcha. It would take a Sophocles to do justice to the epic tragedy!

Meanwhile, in Rajasthan, the Harijans of Chittorgarh rake among the ashes to retrieve, if they can, one uncharred strip of cloth for themselves, one unburnt toy for their children, one undamaged cooking-pot for their wives—from what was once their jhonpdi, humble, modest but theirs Fortunately, their community television set was also reduced to cinders—so they have been saved the agony of listening to the Prime Minister go whinnying on about how social justice means "every hut must be a home"

And in Delhi the darkness at Diwali is deep and thick. Monica Chaddha—all of 19 Diwalis old—is dead and Rajeev Goswami struggles for life in the burns unit of the Safdarjung Hospital. What is there to celebrate?

In UP's Gonda district, terrified Muslim families tell tales of a Janata Dal MP--a true buddy of the chief minister's, moreover—and Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP) activists—with intriguing links to Delhi (get the details from Vishwa Bandhu, the income tax officer sacked by Madhu Dandavate for presenting a tax-bill to the VHP: by the time you read this he would have started polishing shoes outside the finance minister's residence to keep his family in dal and roti since he has been denied all pay since that day six months ago when he told the VHP to pay up—or else!)—coming together from opposite directions to find common cause in raising tension to a pitch where carnage, mayhem and cold-blooded cruelty inevitably follow. Not since 1947—not even in 1980 when chief minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh let Moradabad burn—has communal harmony in the largest state of our Union been as brittle as it is today Are we to light our diyas at the funeral pyres of the victims?

And, in Bihar, transport is at a standstill. No, not because of the usual reason that some Transport Officer has gone off to have a beedi with a well-met caste-mate, but because, in every mofussil town, truck drivers are being pre-emptorily stopped by rampaging gangs and asked to reveal their caste. If the caste is right, the truck driver is allowed to proceed. If the caste is wrong, he is dragooned out of his truck and belaboured to a pulp. The lucky ones who are allowed to go forward are, in turn, turned into pulp when they unwittingly enter an area controlled by the 'other' side. Candles anyone? To light from the forward end or the backward? Or, possibly at both ends for the country to melt like a wax-work?

In Bengal, democracy acquires a new dimension as Congress youth leader Mamata Banerjee (never forgiven for having thrammed VP's brand new Tau, Somnath Chatterjee in the Diamond Harbour constituency in 1984) is beaten unconscious for protesting the excesses and atrocities of the world's last remaining Stalingrad. Patakas anyone?

And in Assam, it is a football Asiad: tribals vs non-tribals, Assamese vs Bengalis, minorities vs the majority, thugs vs Marwaris, the ruling party vs its own students' wing, the Brahmaputra vs the Barak, the Assam Police vs the Nagaland Police, the ULFA, vs Everyone Else – and, of course, The Greatest Show on earth, chief minister Mahanta vs home minister Phukan. Whose victory are we to celebrate? Ram's? Or Ravan's?

V.P. SINGH: Not since 1947—not even in 1980 when he let Moradabad burn as the chief minister of UP—has the communal harmony been as brittle as it is today

Across central India, the games continue—with the chief minister of Orissa falling off his bicycle when he is not up to persecuting his predecessor (which is almost all the time) or railing at the chicanery of the Centre's policies on reservations or plotting the downfall of the man he made Prime Minister. In Madhya Pradesh, the Janata Dal sits stunned in bemused silence as BJP chief minister Sunderlal Patwa continues his antics—notwithstanding the occasional rap on the knuckles from Atal Behari Vajpayee—and the rathyatra rolls on. And betimes, in Gujarat, ministers of the state government (the saffron ones rather more than the mixed-dye JD types)—particularly the one to whom the health of the state (if not the condition of its soul) has been entrusted—instigate, abet and even, it is alleged, participate in the ongoing revenge on the Mahmood of Ghazni.

Such comfort as there is comes only from the Deccan. Maharashtra—even under the wafer-thin majority of the Congress and despite the snarling of the Shiv Sena and its conspiracies with the BJP/RSS—is at peace. In Andhra Pradesh, NTR (offscreen) provides much-needed comic relief for in his guise as Vishwamitra he backs Advani's chariot and as National Front chairman condemns it! And in Karnataka, we have a value-based Governor who, on the authority of his value-based instructions, has established the impeccable democratic credentials for which he himself and his leader are renowned (for this Governor is no neutral representative of an Olympian President but a minor party hack out to prove to his Prime Minister that an Upapradhan mantri is not needed for the Dirty Tricks Department to function). If you want to let off a cracker this Diwali, the only place to do it in is Maharashtra, Andhra Pradesh or Karnataka. Not surprisingly, all three are Congress strongholds!

But as we dip down from the Deccan plateau to the palm-fringed coasts of Kerala and Tamil Nadu, the tale of woe begins again as Nayanar threatens to tell it all in Malayalam while returning unread to Mulayam Singh Yadav (hereinafter referred to as Malayalam Singh Yadav) the UP CM's letter penned in Hindi (actually in Etahwese—but Mulayam knows not the difference) begging the northern smoothie to desist from converting the three-language formula into a Tower of Babel. No Diwali greetings from Nayanar to Mulayam this year—for what language is he to send them in?

And in Tamil Nadu, Deepavali is snuffed out as the Tigers show their stripes, Mandal revives caste-baiting and Karunanidhi finally discovers an Aryan hero in V.P. Singh: a touching Odd Couple, both of whom know that the last election they won is the last they are ever going to win! So what have they to celebrate?

And in the country as a whole, Diwali is observed by motorists shelling out of Gulf surcharge for the pleasure of waiting in hour-long queues, the Mandal Commission being deftly substituted by the Mandela Omission, the right to Work being translated into a constitutionally-guaranteed Right to Unemployment and the biggest harvest in our history producing the highest rise in prices in a decade. Today's newspapers report that one Shri O.P. Saxena has filed a plaint against the Prime Minister under the Lunacy Act!

No matter. For we Tamils traditionally light our diyas again at the Festival of Kartikeya at the beginning of December. And we keep our fireworks in stock to celebrate on that day the birth of Lord Subramania—by which time, by the look of things, this ghastly era of V.P. Singh should ground to an end:

Jab tak suraj chand rahega
VP thoo badnam rahega!

Let us then thank a benign Providence for ensuring that we have to stomach only one black Diwali, not endure another four more! And to comfort the Raja of Manda as his mahal crumbles, this column offers him its only Diwali gift of the season: a little lullaby specially composed for the Aashiqui:

Voton ki zaroorat hai jaise
Kursee ke liye
Bas ik Mandal chahiye
V.P. Singh ke liye!

Happy Diwali 1991! ●

Courting perfection

Davis Cup ace Naresh Kumar runs a new, 'tough' tennis training camp

Practice makes perfect. And coaching camps, even when they last only a fortnight, go a long way towards improving expertise on the tennis courts. Especially, when they are run by former Davis Cup ace Naresh Kumar in collaboration with Harry Hopman/Saddlebrook International Tennis, the coaching programme which has benefited such greats of the game as John McEnroe, Vitas Gerulaitis, Andrea Jaeger, Ramesh Krishnan and the new wonder girl Jennifer Capriati.

It was left to Naresh Kumar to take the initiative on one of his visits to the Florida Hopman centre. And Lucy Hopman, now in charge of affairs, readily fell in with the idea of a coaching camp in India for junior-level players. Sponsorship came from Power (Bata), with Kumar making good the shortfall and two coaches came down to the Delhi Lawn Tennis Association from Florida to put Indian 12-17-year-olds through their paces. The Hopman camp was on.

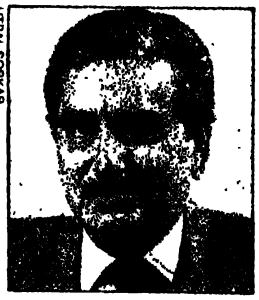
In attendance were junior top-ranking players from all the state associations, including such potential champions as Sandip Kirtane, Anand Sukumar and Gaurav Natekar—formerly of Britannia Amritraj Tennis (BAT) —and sundry Sports Authority of India (SAI) coaches who were slated to learn a new trick or two watching Rick Crockette and Scott Brook in action.

The regimen laid out was strict. Two and a half hours of tennis every morning and afternoon, interspersed with work-outs, which included stomach-strengthening exercises, sprints and stretching exercises. Four players were assigned to each of the nine courts (both clay and grass), and closely-supervised tennis followed, with special attention being paid to drills. Said Leander Paes, the Junior Wimbledon champ, just back from the Beijing Asiad: "From the moment you step on the court here, there's no fooling around."

Agrees Naresh Kumar, the moving spirit behind the entire exercise: "In all, we have about 105 dozen balls in play. These boys and girls will have hit more balls in a fortnight than they have in the last six months. Some of the participants come from such small towns as Badaun and Meerut and have made spectacular progress." Special attention was paid to ensure that the players had the best of food, fresh juice and milk. And, in keeping with the no-cutting-on costs attitude, they were paid first class fare to and fro.

Kumar agrees that such on again-off again efforts, however, are not enough to make a substantial difference.Hence, the decision to hold four such camps every year from now on. This, says the former tennis ace, along with the coaching exercise mounted by the local associations, will go a long way towards improving standards.

Crockette and Brook, the Hopman coaches, are convinced that the camp will be a "positive experience", exposing the kids, as it does, to international standards. What Indian juniors lack in stamina and skill, say the coaches, they more than make up in enthusiasm: "They have some of the best attitudes we have seen."



But, the pick of the lot at the camp was, without a doubt, Leander Paes, on the courts to improve his game after his long lay-off from the circuit, thanks to the controversial BAT decision not to expose him at the international level. Paes, however, has nothing but positive things to say about the BAT experience: "It's been great for me for the last four and a half years. I left only because it was time for me to move on to something else."

And in two weeks, it was time for the participants to move on. With luck, they left as better players. ●

And now, Bangla rock!

Say it loud, I'm Bengali and proud

R NEUSCHUL

The Joi Bangla band: playing the music of the third generation Bengali brought up in the West

Move over Disco bhangra, Bangla rock is here. And the kids on the block are rocking, rapping and moonwalking to the sound of the Nineties: sitar, synthesiser, Kishore Kumar film songs, ghazals, qawwalis and baul songs fused into a sound that's the latest from the East End of London. A music that's funky, strongly political and is to East Enders what rap was to Black New Yorkers in Harlem. This is a voice that is demanding racial equality and basic human rights, not at rallies and demonstrations but at night clubs, discotheques and open-air concerts. And even the Whites are rocking to the beat which tells what it's like being coloured in Britain.

But the sound, evolved by such groups as Joi Bangla Sound, is primarily aimed at evoking the racial pride of the Bangladeshi immigrants in England. Explains Mark (Mahmuddin) of Joi Bangla Sound: "Bangladeshi kids in the East End have nothing to look forward to. It's a depressing scene of racist attacks and homelessness. The country of their origin is painted as one ravished by poverty, corruption and yearly floods. We want them to be proud of their culture, tell them they come from a country of poets, writers and musicians. And we want to bring it to them in a language they understand."

The rock group evolved from the Joi Bangla Bangladeshi youth movement, which took an active part in community work and the anti-racism campaign. Somewhere along the line, the members realised that they'd have a greater impact on their target audience if they resorted to music. Hence: Bangla rock. Says Mark: "We thought we'd bring the message to the people through music. These kids have been brought up in the West and want to be part of the mainstream. This music gives them something to identify with: it's modern and at the same time, it tells them something about their roots as well."

The moving spirit of the band, however, is Haroon (24), who along with his younger brother Farooq, dreams up most of the arrangements. Haroon maintains that he doesn't want to do the Asian for the Asians stuff. Instead, he'd rather go mainstream, bringing his group's music to everybody—both Black and White. "We don't want to be a Flash in the Pan Bros kind of band, with one hit and one video and out," he says. "We want to stay. We hope to be the next Soul to Soul."

Describing themselves as more a sound system than a band, Haroon and his group have appeared at nightclubs like the Hippodrome and Limelight in the West End, have played at shows in Cardiff, Liverpool and Leicester and everywhere the response has been quite terrific, with such numbers as Funky Asian and Taj Mahouse which have rap, rock and jazz combined keeping teenagers on their toes at every gig. The band which started off by blending Bengali music has now got proficient enough in mixing various sounds, ranging from reggae, rap and West Asian music and promises Haroon: "Our first album (soon to be released) will be a mixture of the East and West."

Not for these rockers the pandering to stereotypes of the Disco bhangra bands. Hence the absence of the jazzy sequinned outfits and the usual razmatazz. Says Mark, who is half Irish: "We'd like to be ourselves. We couldn't appear in all those glitzy outfits because that's just not us. When we cut our album, we'll do it the way we like to. We'd like people to accept us this way and I think they do." The attitude is a trifle reminiscent of singers Tanita Tikaram and Sinead O'Connor both of whom have refused to go girlie for the benefit of the record companies. But if the reaction of the crowd that turns up at the Hippodrome is anything to go by, their fans don't mind in the least. And Haroon and Mark are well on the way to becoming the idols of teenyboppers.

But their appeal to the serious music lover is just as potent. For their lyrics don't talk of romance, eternal love, green fields and the full moon. Instead the content is fiercely political:

The time has come
For us to live as one
White or Black
There's no gap.

Thus Haroon sings while the funkiest blend of Asian music plays in the background. "I think the youngsters are beginning to stir," he says. "Today the kids in the East End aren't the same as their fathers were. They're not going to sit around and get beaten up. They're here to fight."

And to make music. For, with the success of Mark and his men, other Bangla rock groups have come into being, most prominent among them Joi Bangla Band. The uncannily similar name because both groups originated from the Joi Bangla youth movement. Though the group has performed on television and in community functions, it lacks the sophistication of the pioneers. But the group is not short on enthusiasm. Says Ansar Ahmed, one of the lead singers: "The average age is about 17 with the youngest kid being only 11. All of them write their own rap."

SHRABANI BASU

Teenagers waiting to enter London's Hippodrome disco: Bangla rock is catching on Their music, however, is not the regular East-West fusion stuff. Instead they use only Western instruments: keyboards, drums and electronic guitars. Explains Ahmed: "The fact that we are Bengali comes through from our music, but we are playing the stuff we understand: contemporary music. It is the music of the second and third generation Bengali brought up in the West."

But in the end, Bangla rock's greatest contribution has been to inculcate racial pride in the Bangladeshi kids and provide them with role models they could emulate and even look up to. Says Ahmed: "Both Indian and Pakistani kids in the West have their film and cricket heroes. Only the Bangladeshis had nothing. We are trying to give them something they can feel proud about."

Ansar Ahmed's rap has the same element of pride:

Lost, but I know what I'm looking for
And if I don't find out the answer
For—the problem of colour and race
Cause of the colour of my face
There are people who would ignore me
They wouldn't talk to me
And I wouldn't find what I'm looking for

I'm looking for love, peace and harmony
Between man and man
I wonder if I can
I can stand up in a crowd
And say that I'm proud
To be a Bengali

And it is this pride that carries Bangla rock groups through, even though they have no rich promoters, no nifty studios and have to practise in community centres or their own sitting rooms. But it all seems worth it when their music gets the East End on the move. ●

Jashan passion

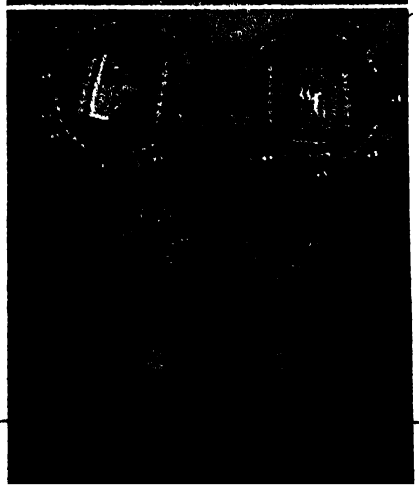
Abu Jani and Sandeep Khosla are India's hottest designers

In the beginning there was nothing to indicate that Sandeep Khosla and Abu Jani were anything special. While Khosla spent his time dressing Delhi's socialites, Jani's creativity was devoted to designing for the occasional model and the rare fashion show. Their clothes were put together with care, but lacked that extra something that transforms good craftsmanship to haute couture.

Nobody was more dissatisfied with the state of affairs than the designers themselves. And when they discussed their fashion passion at their first meeting at a Bombay party, they realised that they could do wonders together; with a little help from India's traditional arts and crafts. It didn't take long for the duo to get started: in 1987 they launched their white on white khadi collection, with art stitched in from collar to cuff. Fulsome praise from patrons followed while the clothes proved a runaway hit on Bombay's fashion scene. Under the brand name Jashan the duo began exhibiting at the Bombay boutique Ensemble, where their crushed silk look created a sensation of sorts.

Heartened by this success, the duo went in for further innovation. "We were the first ones," says a proud Sandeep, "to develop the regular Gujarat mirror work into something really glamorous using kutchi with gold and silver zardosi." The line was displayed at Joseph's in London, and pop star Tina Turner was among the international celebrities who bought one of the scarves in the collection.

Khosla and Jani got even more adventurous in time, taking small pieces of glass, cut into various shapes and sizes, and embroidering with them. Says Jani: "We inserted these pieces into our outfits in such a way that you could even dry-clean them and nothing would go wrong." Their best-known such effort was the Radha Krishan jodi. But the partners soon realised that it didn't make commercial sense to make just two or three outfits of a kind, as they proved to be prohibitively expensive. And not too many people could afford them at those prices.



Jani and Khosla: working a new ethnic-wear wave

"So," says Jani, "we decided to create looks, not just one piece. We embroidered these miniatures as necklaces, we had it on the collar and the sleeves. We took them even at the back, stitched as if it were a broken mala, falling over the woman's back."

That was in the winter of '89. Soon after they launched their line of kilim zardozi jackets-inspired by Afghanistani outfits—in earthy browns and oranges. By then they had left Ensemble, preferring to sell their own stuff. Says Khosla diplomatically: "The arrangement was not working out." Jani is slightly more forthcoming, though just as cryptic: "There was too much borrowing."

A kurta design sample: drawing on history

Out of the glitzy Ensemble interior, the duo launched the double dupatta, the double sari (worn with one pallav over each shoulder) and jackets replete with hand-rolled threads, in dark maroon and black, the colours worn by Mehmoni women. Says Sunita Pitamber, high priestess of jewellery design: "They really proved themselves. I introduced them to my friends all over the world and everyone of them bought their stuff. They don't mimic and copy, they take ideas from things around them." The duo now display their creations at a boutique provided by Pitamber, and hope to do the same at Beauchamp Place in London (near the fashionable Sloan Street) soon.

Say the designers: "We are tired of the West having an image of India with a begging bowl. We want to show them, in our little way, what our culture is all about. Our clothes have a story, they have something to say."

Yes, but until they introduce an affordable line, only the rich will read their tale. •

Cyrus Merchant/Bombay

There was a time when one was proud to be a Bengali in Bollywood. But the days of Raakhee, Jaya and Sharmila are over.

Bengal is now represented by Moon Moon Sen, who is better known for her activities offscreen than she is for the few films she makes. What nobody can work out is why she shifted to Bombay last year when her career had already packed up. And considering that she has hardly any movies on hand, how does she keep herself occupied?

Rupa Ganguly is marginally more successful—or at least she was before Mahabharat ended. But such is Rupa's reputation in the film city that she makes Moon Moon seem like a Sunday school teacher.

And while Moon Moon at least bothers to tell lies to the film magazines about her happy marriage, Rupa flaunts her affairs with married men.

Good old Shatrughan Sinha. A while ago the Bihari scarface declared that he would build a nine-storey office complex in

N. PRASAD

Shatrughan Sinha: immortalising papa

Patna in memory of his father. Everyone was most impressed, though some people wondered why the senior Sinha should be immortalised by an office block—why not a temple or a museum instead?

Now, the doubts are of only academic interest. Shatru's megalomania has got the better of him again. The building is 90 per cent complete and it is called—you guessed it—Shatrughan Sinha Movie Tower.

Rekha: back to toy boys

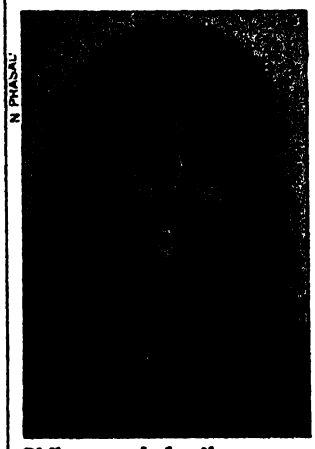
Isn't it amazing how nobody in the film industry has come to Rekha's aid? While the press has given the unfortunate actress a rough ride, many had hoped that the industry would stick by her. After all, it wasn't her fault that Mukesh Aggarwal was manic depressive. He had attempted suicide much before he ever met Rekha—so why blame the poor woman for his death?

But instead, the film industry has ganged up on her. The hot rumour in Bombay concerns her love of toy boys. Remember Sunju Dutt? And how about Shekhar Suman?

Well, the latest gossip is that the dusky temptress is now involved with Salman Khan, the pint-sized, super-brat son of the twice-married scriptwriter Salim. According to Salman's friends, Rekha was planning to tour the US with her transistorised toy boy when Mukesh killed himself.

This may or may not be true but Rekha had already served divorce papers on Mukesh and little Salman is unmarried. So is it anybody else's business what the two of them get up to?

And why try and link Mukesh's tragic death with Salman's gymnastics?



Gulshan Kumar and Anuradha Paudwal are making beautiful music together at the paunchy Punjabi's music company. Gulshan owns the joint and Anuradha is a director. "Ours is a strictly professional relationship," purrs Paudwal demurely.

Who cares, fatties, even if you are having an affair? Even gossip columnists have some standards.

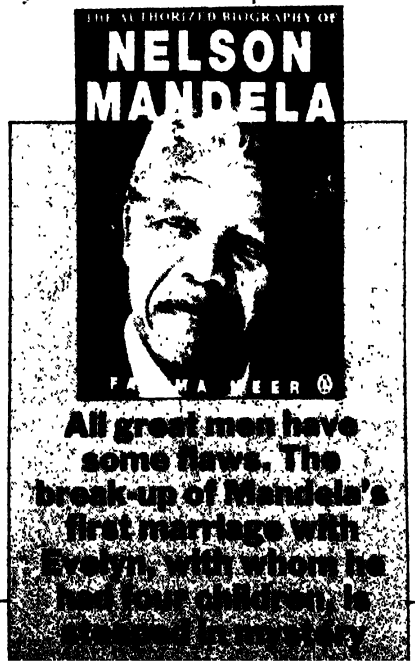
Of sacrifices and legends

The authorised biography of Nelson Mandela says it all

When Nelson Mandela was imprisoned in 1964 at the age of 46, he was a struggling political activist. When he was released more than 25 years later at 71, he had become a symbol of courage and sacrifice, a towering and even legendary figure. Memoirs written by him would be more appropriate and interesting or even better would be a jail diary if he had kept one. To write a biography about such a person is difficult.



Considering this, the author Fatima Meer has done a commendable job. She has painstakingly collected details of his early life by travelling over a thousand kilometres and interviewing various people. This is even more creditable considering the hostile environment of South Africa. Fatima Meer was part of the struggle and she and her husband Ismail Meer were close associates of Nelson Mandela. She got Mandela's permission to write the book, which explains the unusual title Authorised Biography Of Nelson Mandela. Mandela himself spoke to her at length.

His early life and how he came to become a political activist form the first few chapters of the book. To a political reader, his childhood details in South Africa's countryside are boring. His coming to Johannesburg, starting law practice and getting involved in political work are all described in detail. He chose to join the African National Congress. His aversion to Indians was as much as to Whites but was gradually replaced by trust and warmth so much so that his other colleagues did not quite approve of the change.

He was arrested and tried for treason but after five years, he was acquitted in 1961. This period was enough to make him resolute in his mission, but his legal practice suffered a set-back. When Mandela went to Addis Ababa to attend the African Conference in 1962, he was arrested on his return. He was given life imprisonment in 1964. During his years of imprisonment, his family was oppressed and even tortured. He, however, remained undaunted and even his wife did not wilt under pressure. In fact, she reacted by supporting small militant black groups who believe in answering violence with violence. These groups were not part of the African National Congress. Mandela repeatedly tells the author that whenever violence is indulged in it has been forced on them by the various acts of the government.

All great men have some flaws. The break-up of Mandela's first marriage with Evelyn, with whom he had four children, is steeped in mystery. Though the author tries to soft-peddle the issue, the fact remains that Mandela was attracted to other women and his romance with Winnie ended in marriage in 1958. Whether this was inevitable in the wake of the political struggle as the author would have us believe is open to question. The author's description of the romance and marriage betray her subjective adoration of Mandela.

In the trial and prosecution following the arrests on 11 July, 1963, at Rivonia, the charges by the State were familiar—". .the accused deliberately and maliciously plotted and engineered the commission of acts of violence and destruction...the planned purpose thereof was to bring in the Republic of South Africa chaos, disorder and turmoil ..and it was planned by the accused to set up a Provisional Revolutionary Government to take over the administration and control of this country". The defence by Mandela, accused No. 1, was in the highest Gandhian traditions - " .My Lord, I am the first accused...I admit immediately that I was one of the persons who helped to form...I have done whatever I did because of my experience in South Africa on my own proudly-felt African background, and not because of what any outsider might have said.. I did not plan it in a spirit of recklessness nor because I have any love for violence. .a government which uses force to maintain its rule teaches the oppressed to use force to oppose it...I have always regarded myself in the first place, as an African patriot.. I regard the British Parliament as the most democratic institution in the world .We want to be part of the general population and not confined to living in our ghettos...I have cherished the ideal of a democratic and free society ..It is the ideal for which I am prepared to die..."

In the end, the judge, Justice de Wet, sentenced Mandela and his colleagues to life imprisonment and gave reasons why he was not sentencing them to death! The scene outside the court has been recorded for posterity and is again a familiar one--the accused quite happy and contented, their relatives proud and resigned, the police shocked but helpless and the general public admiring and reverential

Indeed, Mandela's long years of incarceration has no parallel and there is no living personality who can claim to equal the privations suffered by him It is therefore natural that he should be looked upon as some sort of a messiah.

In fact, the release of Mandela became synonymous with the removal of apartheid and herein lies the danger. As Mandela has said after his release, there should be no complacency; everything is and remains as unacceptable and discriminatory as before and nothing has really changed ●

The American view

Are we over-sensitive about US scholarship on India?

Drawn by India's complex paradoxes, US scholars have, over the last half-century, taken over the mantle of Percival Spear, Max Mueller, Ibn Batuta and Hsuein Tsang.

Academics and intellectuals from the US have written definitive biographies of Mahatma Gandhi and Nehru, lived for years in Indian villages, translated the most esoteric of Sanskrit and regional literature, analysed the politics of caste in north India and the unravelling of the Congress party, mapped the geography of South Asia, and often predicted the apocalyptic break-up of India. Some have represented the US in the insulated luxury of embassy and aid offices.

FRANCINE FRANKEL

BELIEVED that India was an extraordinary alternative to US society

MYRON WEINER

CONCERNED that Indo-Pak tensions could lead to a major conflict

ROBERT HARDGRAVE

UPSET by Indian accusations that he worked for the CIA

Others have been accused of instigating the assassination of Indian political leaders as CIA saboteurs.

Their work and views have nearly always been decisive in shaping US policy towards India. They have been read by hundreds of South Asians studying at US universities and, for much of the past 50 years, have dominated scholarship on India, including that of Indian academics.

Francine Frankel, slim, patrician, a child of New York city, reached Bombay by ship in 1959, aged 22. "Being very interested and naive, as young people generally are," recalls Frankel, "I wanted to ask the people around Gandhi whether they actually believed in non-violence or had used it as an expedient in the freedom movement. It was a naive question, but the best one I could have asked." Frankel's question took her to Gopinath Dhawan, an ascetic Gandhian professor in Lucknow, and then to interviews with Nehru, Morarji Desai, Vinoba Bhave and others close to Gandhi. Now professor of political science and South Asian studies at the University of Pennsylvania and author of several comprehensive books on Indian agriculture and political economy, Frankel preserves the neatly handwritten notebook which records her first reactions to India.

For Frankel, as for many Americans whose interest dates back to the 1950s, India was both the great hope for democracy amongst the newly-independent nations as well as an extraordinary alternative to their own country. Gandhi's non-violence and Nehru's erudite socialism drew the brightest and most idealistic US intellectuals to India. "Gandhi and Nehru were the good nationalists," recalls

"If you are looking for the heroes of the independence movements, they were it, Gandhi and Nehru."

India remained the shining ideal for US scholars—and for most US policy-makers upto the early 1970s. "India's non-aligned foreign policy attracted a lot of people who were disillusioned with US foreign policy," says Susanne Rudolph. Social democrats like the Rudolphs were drawn to India's experiment in combining state and private industry within democratic politics. Before the rift in US-India relations, notes Francine Frankel, "We felt we were on the side of a noble experiment. That we were supportive of what India was trying to do. The US' good intentions towards India were much more readily accepted in the Nehru era than they are now."

The subsequent disenchantment with India perhaps had as much to do with naive, ethnocentric blueprints of how India should develop as with India's own failures. The 1950s and 1960s were the heydays of "modernisation theory," and US specialists on India posited a grand theory that literacy, mass media, urban population, and industrialisation only needed to be increased to make India a rational, developed democracy. India and the other ex-colonies would then guard against the spread of Soviet-exported Communism.

India failed to comply. Politics did not become secular. Allegiances to caste, region and religion strengthened despite extraordinary growth in "political mobilisation" and industrialisation. Indian politics did not become rational nor issue-oriented.

Frankel was one of the few US scholars who broke early with modernisation theory. "It was a model which defined the way in which India would become modern," says Frankel. "The problem was it didn't work in many ways." The 1970s saw the end of writing on "India as a society undergoing change," notes Frankel. "This was because there were no models left that predicted what the outcome of change would be."

The mid-1970s also saw India becoming a regional power with very real political goals and the ramifications of this were resisted by US scholars used to an India that espoused non-violence and non-alignment. In 1978, a book titled India: An Emergent Power? brought home what US policy-makers had suspected but most academics had been reluctant to accept. "It may come as a surprise to readers of this study to realise that military defence, aspirations for regional and global influence, leadership in the building of a new international economic order, and the gradual curtailment of superpower dominance over world affairs have been central policies of the Government of India since its founding in 1947," Stephen P. Cohen and Richard L. Park, the authors, note in the opening sentence of the book. "The critical role of defence policy in shaping India's relations with its neighbours, as well as with the super, great, and middle powers has not had the same sharp focus for observers abroad that economic and political development have had...Few abroad, including the United States, take India seriously as a world power, and this is a regrettable mistake."

Cohen's book, and others that followed, marked a crucial break in US academic writing on India. "The pendulum has swung from India being a poor, struggling country to viewing it as a major country with a tremendous asymemetry of power in the region," says Maya Chadha, professor of international relations at New Jersey State University.

A major concern of US-South Asia scholars currently is that Indo-Pak tensions will lead to the next regional crisis after the current trouble in the Middle East. Myron Weiner, director of the Center for International Studies, says, "There is a concern that India and Pakistan have not been able to reach a rapprochment after 40 years of independence. Each has severe internal regional conflicts, and each plays in the others' internal weaknesses. This can escalate into a major conflict. As they are well-armed and possess nuclear arsenals, it remains a major concern here."

The Indian government's relations with US scholars—much like relations with the US government—have been increasingly troubled over the years. Stereotypical images of the 'ugly American' have prejudiced Indian officials against scholars who, for the most part, have a very real rapport with India and are virtually always first-rate in their scholarship. And though the Indian government currently bemoans the fact that Pakistan has more friends on Capitol Hill than India, Indian embassy officials have failed to see that US academics have a strong influence in shaping this country's foreign policy.

Relations reached a historic low in 1984 when Robert Hardgrave, professor at the University of Texas, was accused by Indian authorities of having instigated the assassination of Prime Minister Indira Gandhi. Hardgrave, a widely-respected scholar and then consultant to the US State Department, was subjected to the entire rigmarole of investigations by the discredited Thakkar Commission. "The whole thing for me was tremendously painful," recalls Hardgrave. "The book in which I had discussed the question of 'After Mrs Gandhi, who?' was very positive towards India. In four out of 250 pages, I discussed succession, not assassination. Hardgrave notes that he was accused in the Indian press of having prepared secret reports for the US Central Intelligence Agency, even though his research had already been published in May 1984.

India seems different from the outside and the government's continuing hostility to foreign scholars will only result in the loss of complementary interpretations of itself. Worse, the mistrust comes at a time when foreign scholars are becoming more levelheaded in their analyses. And outsiders can sometimes see things that may be hidden to Indians caught up in the difficulties of everyday life. Susanne Rudolph, who drove to India over the Khyber Pass in 1956 and has since educated several generations of American univesity students on Mohandas Gandhi, says that India's mixed economy may soon prove to be the only credible option given the world's disenchantment with both communism and capitalism. That's surely not a common thought in India today. ●

The visit

Mandela misses the cheers in Delhi, but gets a standing ovation in Calcutta

SOLIDARITY

It was a tale of two cities. While Delhi was bureaucratic and devoid of popular warmth in receiving Nelson Mandela, in Calcutta, the enthusiasm was infectious. When Mandela, deputy chief of the African National Congress (ANC) was released by the racist South African regime on 11 February after an incredible 27 years of imprisonment, the government of India announced that the African leader would be given a welcome to remember when he visited India. But when he did come months later on 15 October, Delhi lacked the euphoria that Mandela's visits have evoked elsewhere. Even in Calcutta, a city beset with crippling civic problems, the mood was markedly different. There was an air of expectancy as hundreds of thousands of people lined the ten-kilometre route along which Mandela's motorcade was to pass. And as the convoy of vehicles approached, led by outriders of the Calcutta Police, songs and slogans rent the air. In Calcutta, it seemed, Mandela was on home ground.

Mandela's visit to India was announced as early as April. But unfortunately, little planning and groundwork seem to have been done by the Centre to make it a memorable event. The government had formed an omnibus reception committee, headed by Prime Minister V.P. Singh, around April itself, but nothing came of it in the end. The committee had almost a hundred members, including representatives from all political parties and specialists on African affairs. It was to chalk-out Mandela's programme and ensure an emotional build-up to match the occasion. But despite its enormous size, the committee failed to assert itself, and bureaucrats in the ministry of external affairs (MEA) monopolised all decisions.

Many of the committee members (such as Chandrajit Yadav and Swami Agnivesh) insisted that a large public reception be organised for Mandela either at the Jawaharlal Nehru Stadium (JNS) or at the Ramlila Grounds. But the suggestion was shot down by the bureaucrats who were sceptical about a large turnout.

In a meeting on 6 October, the Indira Gandhi Indoor Stadium, which has a capacity of 20,000 against JNS's 1.3 lakh, was selected as the venue for the public reception. The bureaucrats had argued that it would be impossible to give adequate security cover to Mandela in an open stadium, though he has been given such receptions in many of the frontline African states where the threat to his life is all the more real. The 16 October reception was to be the climax of Mandela's visit. But, unfortunately, entry into the Indira Gandhi stadium was restricted to invitees only, and at no point during his three day-stay in Delhi could the general public come close to the ANC leader.

Besides the immensely disappointing public reception, Mandela's programme was packed with routine, if not inane, functions and appointments. But the government did, however, pull off a surprise on the eve of his visit. Earlier it had been announced that Mandela would be given the prestigious Jamanlal Bajaj award in Calcutta, but just prior to his arrival it was declared that he would be awarded the Bharat Ratna as well. With that, Mandela became the second foreign national after the Pakhtoon leader, Khan Abdul Gaffar Khan, to receive India's highest civilian award.

But more than the Bharat Ratna, Mandela's Delhi visit will be long remembered for his controversial statements on the Mandal Commission recommendations. Mandela was reported to have praised V.P. Singh's decision to introduce job quotas for the backward classes and invited unsavoury comments from the press and the people.

However, it appears, that the National Front government drew Mandela into the unseemly controversy. The MEA had sent a background paper to the ANC headquarters in Johannesburg on the Mandal report which compared the anti-reservation agitation with apartheid in South Africa. The paper gave the impression that the central government was trying to fight deep-rooted prejudices and discriminations based on caste differentiations akin to apartheid.

On the morning of his arrival, when Mandela met V.P. Singh, the issue cropped up in the discussions. It is not clear who brought up the subject, but Mandela was reported to have said: "This (the reservation issue) strikes a sympathetic chord in us."

And that was enough for the government. Though no official communique was issued after the talks between the two leaders, the government's principal information officer leaked Mandela's remark to the press and it was highlighted in the television that evening. Commented Anand Sharma, Congress(I) MP and chairman of the World Youth Action Against Apartheid: "To make a selective leak and plant the discussion between Mandela and the Prime Minister was an act of diplomatic impropr e-ty."

The following day the government persisted in its indiscretion by raising the issue again in a television programme in which Mandela was in conversation with Delhi students. Rajmohan Gandhi, the Janata Dal leader, was the moderator and had, apparently briefed Mandela. It was no coincidence either that most of the participating students had Marxist leanings and when they asked Mandela about the reservations, he went right ahead and supported them.

The TV programme was recorded around noon. And soon afterwards, he met senior newspaper editors and politicians over lunch at Hyderabad House. There he got an inkling of the mess the reservation policy had created: that nearly a hundred students had attempted suicides in protest against the government's decision and large parts of northern India were still being rocked by violent unrest.

At a press conference later that day Mandela tried to make amends. He clarified that the Mandal issue was entirely an internal affair of India and hoped that "India has the wisdom to resolve the matter". But it was more than apparent that this counter statement was a face saving device.

In Calcutta, on the other hand, the ruling Left Front provided lavish spectacles. A welcome to "comrade" Nelson Mandela was perhaps a perfect exercise in image-building, and the Front bathed in the reflected glory of an acknowledged anti-imperialist, a Black freedom fighter unfairly imprisoned for 27 years.

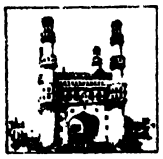
The Left Front leaders had ensured a full house. Crammed inside the Eden Gardens stadium were 75,000 exuberant people, a majority of them members of the SFI and the DYFI, student and youth organisations of the CPI(M). The faithful had their orders: the day's edition of Ganashakti, the party newspaper, had instructed readers when to clap and cheer the ANC leader.

And Mandela did not disappoint. After meandering through a prepared text, peppered with elaborate tributes to Rabindranath Tagore and Subhas Chandra Bose, and expectedly, praise for Calcutta as "a city of revolutionaries," Mandela turned to the crowds. "I want to speak to you from my heart...our people are dying in large numbers...there is an attempt to derail the peace process, but nothing can stand in the way of the people," he said in a stirring display of emotive oratory.

Since 22 July, said Mandela, 5,000 Black South Africans in Natal and Transvaal, all of them innocent men, women and children have been indiscriminately slaughtered by death squads run by the security forces of the government--the National Intelligence Service and the military intelligence. The racist press attributed the killings to tribal vendettas and rivalries among black organisations. "This is not the case," Mandela said firmly.

"Your heroes are our heroes," said Mandela referring to the ties between the freedom movements of both countries and also, the older ties of blood. Fifty one percent of the slaves brought by the Dutch settlers to South Africa in the 17th century were from Bengal. "They played an important role in the development of the Afrikaans language and the development of South African culture. "Their descendants are very much a part of the African National Congress."

Mandela takes back with him the goodwill of the Indian people, and just as important, five million dollars in foreign exchange, a gift from the Centre, as well as an offer from the government he could not refuse. "The government is ready to train ANC workers. Our people need training in economics and international relations," he acknowledged later.



The crowds, chanting "Vi-va Mandela" rose to a man as the strains of "We shall overcome" wafted through the air, and Mandela in a dark suit and an enormous figure next to the diminutive chief minister Jyoti Basu, in a sparkling white dhoti-kurta linked arms and waved. Crackers burst, little flashes of sparkle in the soft evening light and ANC flags waved. The perfectly orchestrated spectacle was marred only by the rumble of boos when the former central minister, Ajit Panja of the Congress(I) praised former Prime Ministers Indira Gandhi and Rajiv Gandhi for their fight against apartheid.

Slowly, the crowds melted away, and the Left Front ministers returned to Writers' Buildings, to tinker with the state's ravaged economy. The party was over. ●

Mass murder

Alleged pro-reservationists burn eighty train passengers to death

ANDHRA PRADESH

It was the worst carnage in the on-going agitations over the Mandal Commission recommendations. While in north India, young men and women committed self-immolation in protest against the Centre's decision to implement the Mandal proposals, pro-reservationists burnt to death 80 odd train passengers, near Hyderabad, early this month.

When the Warangal-bound Kakatiya Fast Passenger, a shuttle between Secunderabad and Warangal, halted at Charlapalli, no one foresaw an impending disaster. Charlapalli, about 30 km from Hyderabad, was the train's first stop on the way to Warangal, and as it pulled to a halt a dozen young men boarded a compartment towards the end of the rake.

The group raised pro-reservation slogans and exhorted the passengers to make the bandh called by the People's War Group (PWG), a militant Maoist organisation, a success.

Soon after the train started, the activities of the gang became sinister. They locked the three exits, began distributing leaflets, and herded the passegers to one end of the coach. While the agitators kept assuring the suspicious passengers that they were protesting against the Supreme Court stay on the implementation of the Mandal report and that the passengers would not be harmed, one of them began to douse the compartment with kerosene. As the train slowed down on the outskirts of Ghatkesar, the next station, the members of the gang began singing "revolutionary songs" and jumped off the train one by one. And the last man did what even a medieval barbarian may have balked at doing: he lit the kerosene-soaked seats of the compartment.

Driven back by the leaping flames, the hapless passengers were trapped inside the burning compartment. The only door that provided exit had a wall of fire before it. Even then, some dared to jump through the fire and save themselves, others threw children out of the windows in the hope that they would survive.

The train ground to a halt when Ghatkesar was only a kilometre away. Fire tenders were rushed to the spot from Lallaguda and Nalagarda and the blaze was put out. But by then about 45 people had perished.

Police and railway officials who supervised the rescue operations found the bodies—especially those of children—charred beyond recognition. The death toll was totted up from the number of skulls recovered.

Mohammad Mahmood, one of the survivors being treated at Hyderabad's Gandhi Hospital, said that there were nearly 150 people inside the compartment. According to his version, the "radicals" had asked the passengers to jump off the train after they set the coach ablaze But while some like Mohammad were lucky, others were not.

A divisional manager of the railways supported the police view that the "radicals" were behind the incident. The Union deputy minister for railways, Ajay Singh, also held the Naxalites responsible for the "inhuman act". Singh promised to hold a departmental enquiry but added that the responsibility of preventing such acts lay with the state government.

Chief minister Chenna Reddy, however, announced in the Assembly the state government's decision to hold a judicial enquiry. He said that leaflets recovered from the surviors did point to the PWG. But there was no way of identifying the culprits, he admitted.

Opposition leaders such as Nageswar Rao (CPI), Venkateswara Rao (CPI-M), Vidyasagar Rao (BJP) and N.T. Rama Rao, the Telugu Desam Party chief, doubt the versions that link the PWG with the incident. On the other hand, some Congressmen also feel that there is more to the incident than meets the eye. They feel that the incident was engineered to give the Congress(I) regime a bad name.

The PWG, for its part, has denied that its activists were in any way involved in the carnage. It has demanded a thorough enquiry, saying that the episode was an attempt to malign the Naxalite movement. The organisation alleges that certain political parties may have hired anti-social elements to commit the crime and were now blaming the Naxalites.

However, despite the PWG's strident protests, the party's name has come to be inextricably linked with the macabre incident and it will be quite a while before it can hope to clear itself. If it is truly innocent, that is. •

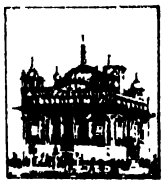
Still going strong

The AIADMK holds a massive rally in Madras

TAMIL NADU

After a long, long time Madras was swept by a pro-AIADMK tide this month. On 7 October, Jayalalitha showed that she still mattered—and in a big way too—when the AIADMK organised a mammoth rally on Anna Road, where Congress(I) president and former Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi was invited to unveil a statue of the late M.G. Ramachandran (MGR), the founder of the AIADMK and former chief minister.



Despite complaints that the "vindictive" DMK government, headed by arch-rival M. Karunanidhi, was doing everything to prevent private bus operators from ferrying enthusiastic AIADMK partymen to participate in the unveiling ceremony, several thousand people turned up in lorries and tractors. Songs from MGR, Jayalalitha films blared on loudspeakers attached to vehicles and soon men, women, and children turned the whole affair into a carnival. The gathering certainly dampened Karunanidhi's spirits, who regaled over the impressive turnout at a rally organised by his own party almost at the same site a few days earlier.

If the DMK rally was massive, the Jayalalitha-Rajiv show was twice as huge. In an impressive speech befitting the gathering, the AIADMK chief drove home the point that it would be futile for her rivals to assume that MGR's party had become a spent force. She pointed out that the turnout was proof enough of the support enjoyed by the AIADMK-Congress(I) alliance. And Karunanidhi now certainly has causes for worry. With the National Front government at the Centre growing unstable by the hour, and a mid-term poll seeming unavoidable, a comeback by the Congress(I) could spell disaster for the DMK. •

Sikhs want an elected government and not an advisory council in Chandigarh

PUNJAB

There are no shortcuts to peace in Punjab, but the purblind government of Prime Minister V.P. Singh is desperately seeking one. Recently, soon after it extended President's Rule in the state by another six months in the face of a strident opposition from the various Akali factions, the Centre announced a package deal to placate the Sikhs. And one of the important decisions it took was regarding the formation of an advisory council made up of representatives from different political parties to advise the state Governor on the administration of the battered state.

Bimal Khalsa feels that the V.P. Singh regime has done little to assuage the feelings of the Sikhs

But politicians are sceptical about its usefulness. "There is no point in setting up a council," says the prominent CPI leader Satyapal Dang, "if it is going to become a fighting shop." Feels Amrinder Singh, a former agriculture minister of Punjab: "The confrontation in Punjab is increasing and this will only aggravate the situation."

The idea of the council was first mooted by the Prime Minister in March, during his trip to Chandigarh. However, what V.P. Singh had suggested at that stage was an advisory committee and not a council. "The committee," the Prime Minister had said then, "would aid the Governor of Punjab in all political developmental issues." But when the formation of the advisory council was announced simultaneously with the extension of President's Rule, it was evident that the body would have statutory rather than executive status. Judging from the circumstances under which the setting up of the council was announced, it was clear that it was conceived as a sop for the people of Punjab who were denied popular rule.

According to the official notification, all MPs from Punjab, and two representatives from each of the nine recognised political parties would be invited to be on the council. S.L. Kapur, chief secretary, Punjab, would be the council's member secretary.

Amrinder Singh, member of the Akali Dal (Badal), is of the opinion that with the wide representation that has been proposed, the council would be able to achieve little. "Can you imagine the Akali Dal (Mann) and the BJP or the Akali Dal (Badal) and the CPI sitting across one table and deciding issues on Punjab" I am sure the council will not be able to reach a consensus on any important issue" he feels.

Bimal Khalsa, a MP from Mann's party agrees with this view. In her opinion, the V.P. Singh government, like the previous Congress(I) regime has done little to mollify the Sikhs. "The government thinks that all Sikhs are terrorists. This latest package announced by them is an attempt to wipe our tears and not solve anything," she says.

The advisory council is merely a shortsighted measure. With the Akali leaders staying away it is unlikely to bring concrete results. But while in existence, it will further curb the powers of the state's Governor, Virendra Verma. •

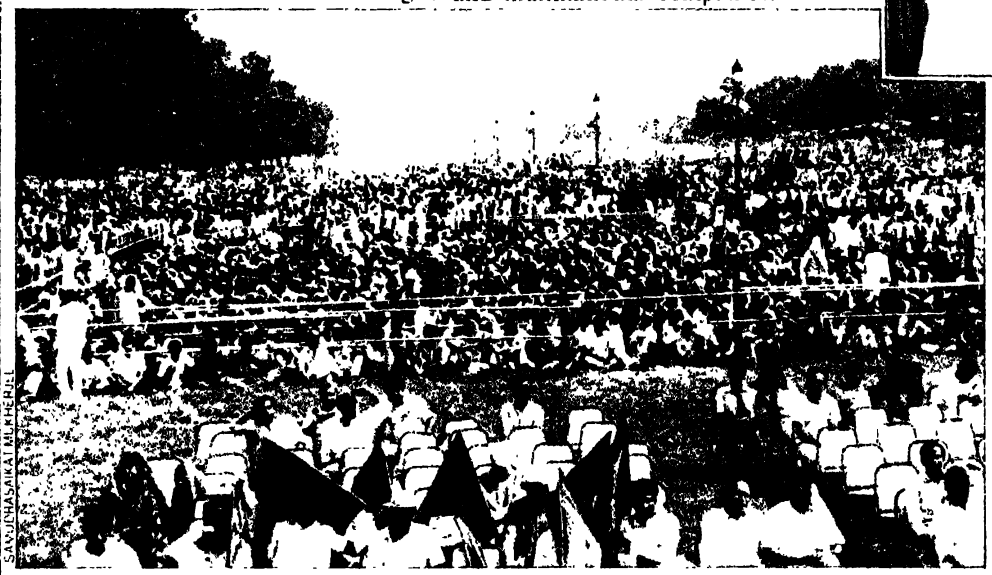
Power to the people

Naxalites catch the administration napping and stage a show of strength in the capital



DELHI

Peasants puffing their hookahs, tribal women with babies slung around their waists, and impoverished khadi-clad youths bubbling with enthusiasm, trickled into the capital on 5 October. They had few belongings: red flags and meagre rations was all they had brought with them for a three-day stay in Delhi. And by 8 October—the day of the Indian People's Front (IPF) rally at the Boat Club—the trickle turned into a torrent, with two lakh rallyists from Bihar, West Bengal and Andhra Pradesh thronging the city.

It was the first major show of strength by the IPF, a mass organisation that has distinct Naxalite leanings and maintains close links with the CPI(ML) faction led by Vinode Mishra. Even the Delhi Police were caught unawares by the huge turnout. "We weren't expecting such a massive crowd and therefore did not divert traffic or anything," a senior police officer told SUNDAY.

The star attractions of the rally were the IPF chief, Nagbhushan Patnaik and the sole IPF MP, Rameshwar Prasad. But it was the charisma of Patnaik, a veteran Naxalite leader and one-time compatriot of the Naxalite ideologue, Charu Mazumdar, that lent the rally a militant aura. All the leaders, including Ram Naresh Ram of the CPI(ML), launched a scathing attack on the National Front government at the Centre for failing to make any significant social changes since it assumed power last November.

"Dam bandho, kam do, varna gaddi chhod do (check price rise, give jobs or else quit office)," chanted the rallyists, waving thousands of red flags, turning the Boat Club lawns crimson. Patnaik blasted all political parties, saying that they were working against the interests of the country. "They can see nothing beyond their narrow political gains," he said. In his hour-long speech, he was particularly acerbic about the National Front's industrial policy which, he felt, mortgaged the country to the World Bank and multinational companies.

The police were caught unawares by the huge IPF rally at the Boat Club (left), which was addressed by the veteran Naxalite leader, Nagbhusan Patnaik (above)

The ageing leader claimed that the IPF was the only party to have sent a delegation to strife-torn Kashmir, while the Centre ended up by appointing Girish Saxena, whose administration was no less notorious than that of Jagmohan, his predecessor. And clarifying his organisation's stand on the Mandal Commission controversy, Ram Naresh Ram said that though the IPF supported reservations, the Centre's move to implement the commission's proposals was a "calculated manoeuvre in the Prime Minister's narrow political game".

As an alternative to the National Front and the Congress(I), the IPF suggested the formation of a broad left confederation to pursue the Marxist goal of "liberating the downtrodden". But the two major left parties—the CPI and the CPI(M)—do not attach much importance to the IPF proposal. But they were cautious not to criticise the IPF openly despite the ideological chasm existing between them. "It is better not to denounce each other," said CPI leader M. Farooqui, while the CPI(M) central committee member Prakash Karat said, "We don't agree with the politics of the IPF."

But the IPF, notwithstanding this rebuff from the larger Marxist outfits, has emerged an emboldened force following the success of its national rally. The activists have pledged to return to their rural bases and build up a campaign against communalism. And with the BJP Ram rath rambling along towards Ayodhya, the IPF might put up obstacles on its way as it enters its areas of influence in north and central Bihar. ●

Poachers' paradise

Ivory smugglers are active in the Simlipal National Park

ORISSA

The Indian elephant continues to be ruthlessly hunted. Last year, there was a lot of cheer in conservationist circles when the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora (CITES) voted to include the African elephant in Appendix I of its schedule of endangered species to halt elephant poaching for ivory. Of the 103 CITES countries, 91 voted for the elephant, and it was believed that the resultant squeeze on the ivory trade would brighten the prospects of the Indian elephant as well.

But the ban has not worked in practice. The international ivory market has not collapsed and the threat to the Indian elephant has not been minimised. And the impudence with which tuskers are felled at Simlipal shows that poachers and ivory smugglers continue to rule the roost.

The Simlipal National Park in Orissa is one of the finest elephant habitats in the country and offers the finest gene pool of species in the wild. But tuskers in Simlipal continue to remain gravely imperilled. At least two recent incidents indicate that ivory hunters are still on the prowl.

In one incident, a joint raid conducted by the officials of the Simlipal Project Tiger, the state-owned SFDC (Simlipal Forest Development Corporation) and the Territorial Forest Division on a poachers' den led to the seizure of a pair of highly symmetrical and magnum-size tusks. Priyakanta Mohanty, assistant field director of the Simlipal Tiger Reserve, led the raiding party and conducted the searches. The 185 cm-long right tusk weighed 33 kg., while the 190-cm long left tusk weighed 31 kg.

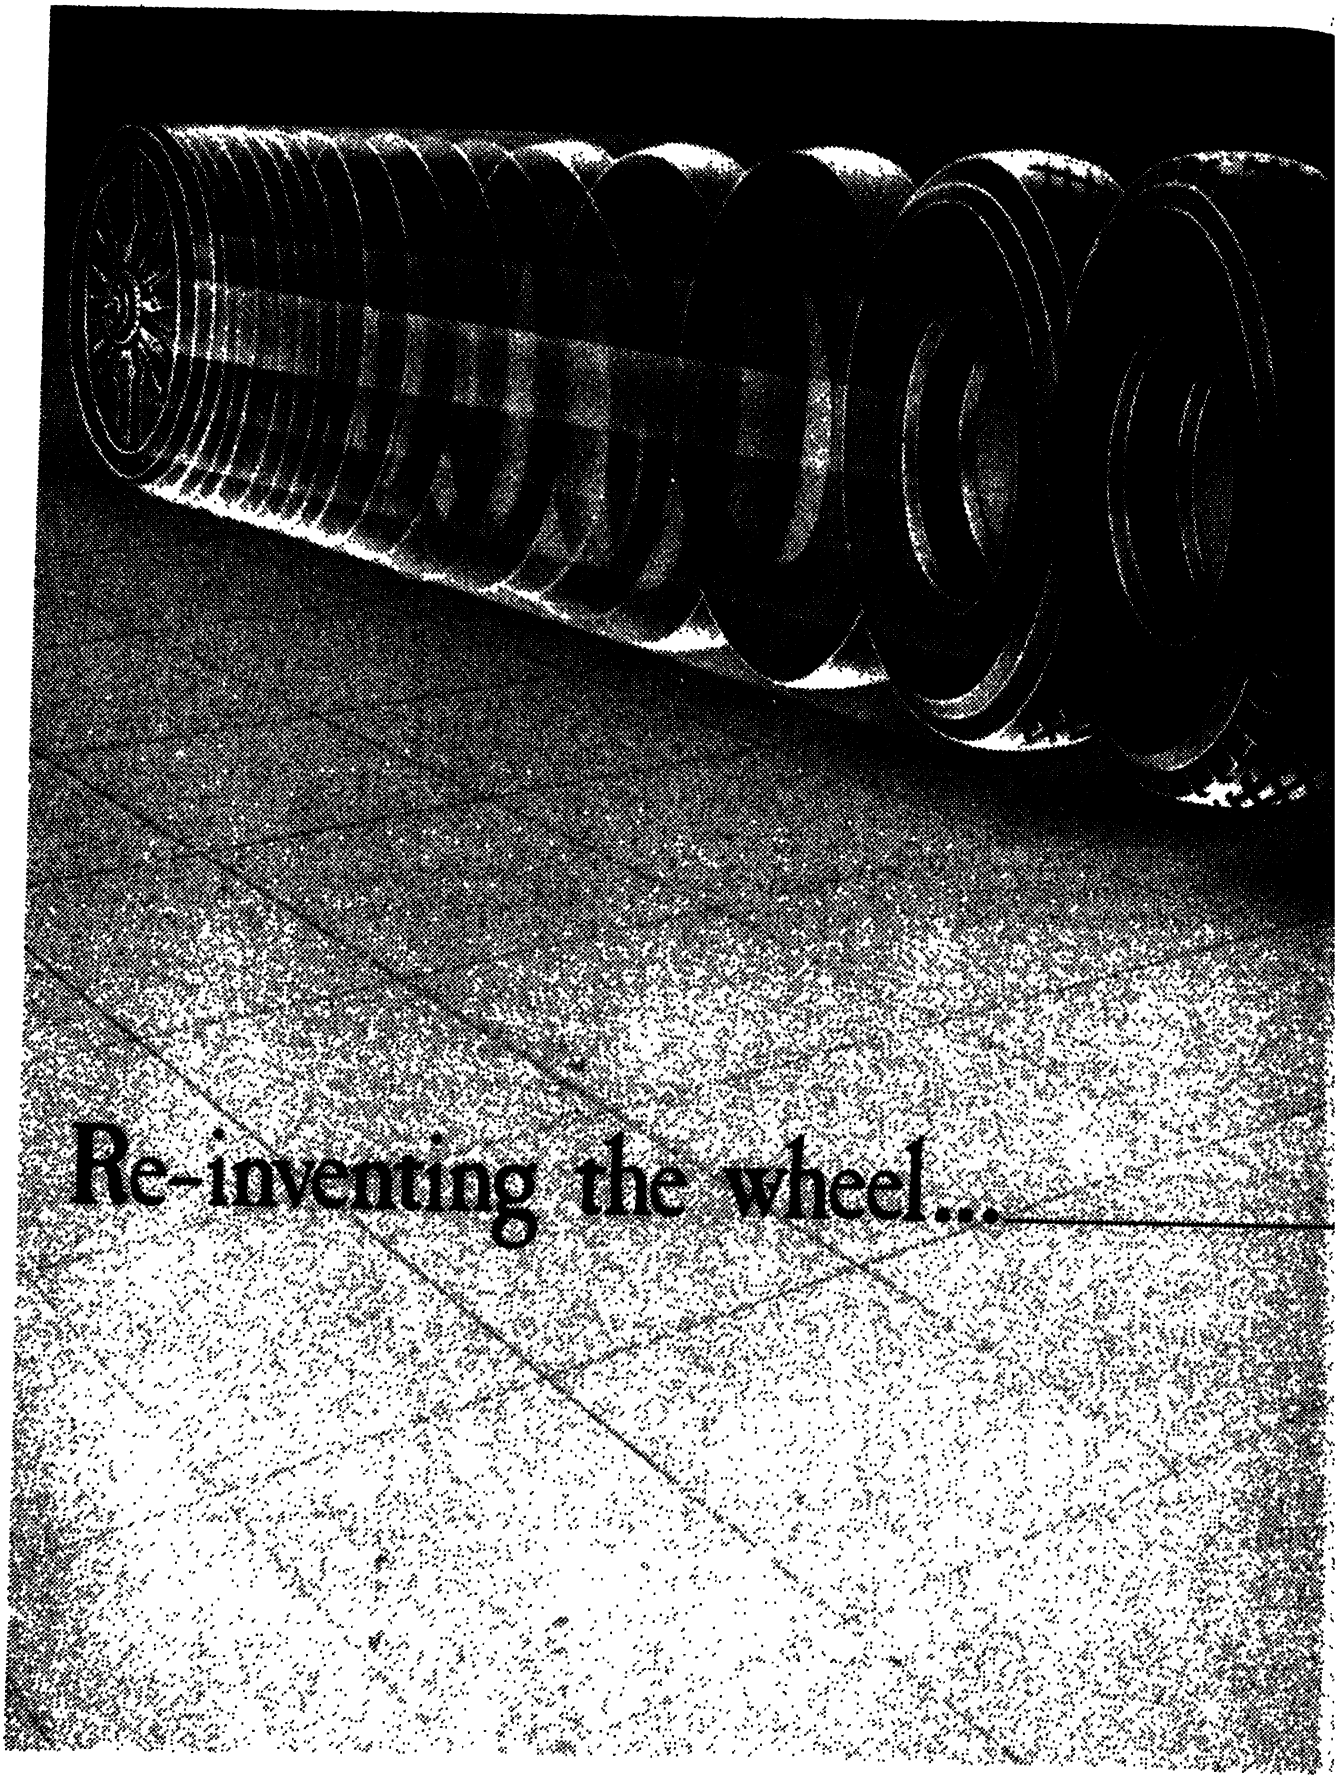
Conservationists believe that 'illegal' ivory sells at a little over Rs 3,000 per kg. So the seized ivory, weighing nearly 63 kg in all, could fetch the smugglers about Rs two lakhs. Suna Singh, a tribal poacher, was arrested by the Project Tiger officials during the raid.

In another incident, a group of nearly one hundred villagers from Dangadiha and Chaturisahi attacked an elephant herd, grazing on the foothills of the Simlipal National Park. The herd comprised two females, one tusker and a calf. Reports say that the villagers showered arrows on the animals, killing one female and injuring the rest. The real target of the villagers was, however, the tusker, which, despite being injured, managed to disappear into the forest. About ten persons were held in connection with this incident.

Giant-size tusks recovered by the police: trapping the trappers AMARENDRA BOSE

This was not the first such instance of an attack on elephants. About a year ago, poachers killed a tusker and carried off the tusks weighing nearly 30 kg. The forest department officials swung into action, arrested eight people and recovered the tusks from them. What was particularly abhorring about this incident was that the poachers had severed the animal's head from the carcass. The reason: they wanted to extract the tusks without causing the slightest damage to them.

The fact is, inter-state gangs of ivory smugglers have found Simlipal to be a convenient place for carrying on their operations. About 65 tribal villages inside the park provide them safe hideouts. In the Eighties, several tuskers were killed by the poachers.



In a bizarre incident on 1 May 1987, at least six pairs of seized tusks, weighing 168 kg, were stolen from the Project Tiger office at Jashipur, on the fringe of the Simlipal forest. A case was registered with the Jashipur police station, but the culprits have not been caught yet.

Elephant poaching is essentially an inter-state activity. Poachers from one state go elsewhere, kill the animals, sell the ivory, and slip back to their home state. This makes the task of the forest officials and the police doubly difficult in tracking down the offenders.

The poachers adopt different techniques for extracting the tusks. Some use saw blades to cut the tusks from the base, others axe the nasal bone and remove the whole tusk. At times they also use boiling lime or acid to loosen the ivory sockets and pull the tusks out easily.

The amount the tribals and the villagers get in the poaching deals is a mere pittance. But as yet there is no indication to suggest that they can be weaned away from the illegal activity as poverty compels them to connive with the smugglers. But conservationists are hopeful. They believe that ban on the ivory trade will give the elephant a fresh lease of life. But certainly a lot remains to be done before that.●

A dream come true

■ For the 35-year-old micro-calligrapher it was a dream come true. Bhaskar Bhowmik, a commercial artist from north Calcutta, earned a place in the Guinness Book Of World Records on 15 September in London for inscribing 689 letters on a single grain of rice.

Bhowmik, who started experimenting with micro-calligraphy out of "sheer fancy", was initially a commercial artist by profession (graduating from the Government Art College in 1977). But his liking for this novel art form soon developed into an obsession. In the past 16 years, not only has he perfected his skill—as the mention in the Guinness Book proves—but has also changed his profession—he is now a professional micro-calligrapher.

The Guinness record is, however, not the only feather in this talented man's cap. He had previously been invited by the Government of India to display his skills at the Festival of India in the US. Recalls Bhowmik, "The Americans showed tremendous interest in my work. They were fascinated by the fact that I was inscribing letters and words on minute objects without the help of magnifying glasses. Their response was most heartening."

Bhowmick is now busy trying to break his own world record by inscribing 900 letters on a single grain of rice.

New status?

■ His heart attack proved to be a blessing in disguise for Lalit Suri, owner of Delhi Mid-Day. Suri was being repeatedly raided by tax officials, when he suffered a massive heart attack. After having undergone surgery at the Escorts Heart Institute in Delhi, Suri left for London for further treatment. Three months later, he has still not recovered and does not seem to have any intention of returning home.

If rumours are to be believed, he is trying to acquire NRI status. What lends credence to the story is the fact that Dr Naresh Trehan,of the Escorts Institute,has been saying that there was no need for Suri to go abroad for treatment in the first place.

So is Suri's extended stay simply an attempt to evade tax officials? Anyway, if he does acquire non-resident Indian status, Delhi could soon have its first NRI-owned newspaper.

Paan and the man

Advani's not the only one on a collision course. So is Laloo Prasad Yadav, though the Bihar chief minister's case is slightly different.

The problem arises from the CM's fondness for paan, which he chews—much like a contented cow—throughout his waking hours. Even when he is riding through the streets of Delhi at breakneck speed, at the head of an impressive cavalcade.

But what happens when Yadav wants to spit some betel juice out? His car, the lead vehicle, comes to a sudden stop, no matter what speed it is travelling at. And the five-six cars behind it come to a screeching halt as well, one bumping into the other in the process.

Until now, the occupants have got off pretty lightly. But surely, Laloo realises that they won't always be so lucky.

Blood is thicker...

They may well be on opposite sides of the political fence, but the Gandhis observe social niceties all right—at least in public.

HEARD IN NEW DELHI'S STREETS

We've gone from the politics of the padayatra to the politics of the rath yatra.

A DISGUSTED CITIZEN

Priyanka and Maneka Gandhi: hugs and kisses

And good manners were much in display at the VIP lounge of the Indira Gandhi International Airport, where Maneka and Priyanka met last week. The environment minister was off on an official visit, while Priyanka had come to receive mother Sonia who was on an incoming flight. The minute Priyanka saw Maneka (who'd arrived earlier), she rushed towards her, and the two fell dramatically into each other's arms. Then it was Feroze Varun's turn to get the treatment, with Priyanka smothering him with affection. The next half-hour was spent in presumably pleasant chit-chat.

But no, Sonia and Maneka Gandhi didn't meet. Sonia's flight landed after Maneka's had taken off.

CHECK-LIST

The little big men of the ministry

■ Subodh Kant Sahay: With Mufti turning into the invisible man, Sahay has become home minister by default. And is enjoying every minute of it, issuing flats on Punjab, Assam, Ayodhya, the Intelligence Bureau (IB) and paramilitary forces. The daily report on the law and order situation is sent to him before the Mufti gets a look-in and the minister of state has the rare privilege of liaising with the PM directly.

■ Anil Shastri: Virtually runs the finance ministry, with such departments as revenue, banking, customs and excise under his direct charge. In such matters, Shastri does not see fit to brief Madhu Dandavate about his decisions. Instead he sends his report directly to the Prime Minister's Office (PMO).

■ Ram Poojan Patel: is an Allahabad buddy of the Prime Minister's and this association is standing him in good stead in the food and civil supplies ministry. He runs the affairs of all corporations and government undertakings and decides on appointments and the grant of licences; leaving Nathu Ram Mirdha with very little to do.

■ Bhajaman Behera: Has gained the most from the on-going battle between the Raja and Orissa chief minister Biju Patnaik. Ever since Patnaik came out openly against V.P. Singh's Mandal initiative, the PM has begun giving Behera—an aspirant for the Orissa chief ministership—more importance in the petroleum ministry in order to build him up as an alternative to Patnaik.

A new alliance?

Both have roughly the same opinion of PM V.P. Singh. Yet they had never met.

So it was something of a surprise when Janata Dal strongman Chandra Shekhar and movie star Amitabh Bachchan met up in Bombay last week.

Shekhar was visiting friends in Juhu Parle Scheme and Bachchan dropped in to see him.

"Where are your parents?" Shekhar asked the star.

"Right here in Bombay," said Bachchan.

"Why are we wasting time sitting here?" said the Janata Dal leader. "Let's go."

Shekhar then hopped into Bachchan's DCM Toyota and drove to Pratiksha—Bachchan's Juhu Parle residence.

He spent half-an-hour with Dr Harivansh Rai Bachchan before returning to his suite at the Ritz Hotel in south Bombay.

A political alliance in the making? "Not at all," says Bachchan. "I have nothing to do with politics any longer. But I must say that I was very impressed by Chandra Shekharji..." ●

What about mummy?

Now that he's got this tremendous response from the public on his Sadbhavna Yatra, Rajiv Gandhi's becoming far more confident in his dealings with the party.

On the way back from his tour of UP, the Congress president was being briefed by party leader Rajendra Kumari Bajpai as to how Deepa Kaul had proved such a brilliant organiser and had ensured that the Ghaziabad leg of his tour was a great success.

Rajiv Gandhi: regaining confidence

Quipped Rajiv: "Yes, but I'd wish she'd convince her mother (Gandhi's grand-aunt Sheila Kaul) to do some work in Rai Bareli as well."

Two is better than one

Nilamani Routray and his minister of state, Maneka Gandhi, shared a rare togetherness last fortnight. No, it wasn't as if the two doughty warriors had finally sorted out their differences, environmental or otherwise. But a government decision that they jointly attend an environment conference in Bangkok, and even share a private assistant (Nilamani Routray's nephew, much to the other Mrs G's chagrin), threw them into close—though involuntary—proximity.

Not before a drama of the absurd was played out in the corridors of power, though.

Initially, PMO sent out an order asking that Gandhi attend the Bangkok conference, as her participation had been specially asked for by the former Norway Prime Minister Mrs Gro Harlem Brundtland. Which was all very well, except that the order had Maneka down as leader of the delegation while her Cabinet minister Routray was a mere member.

As expected, Routray had an apoplectic fit when he saw the order. And promptly charged off to Arun Nehru's to threaten to resign. A Cabinet minister was asked to intercede with PMO to get Routray's griefs redressed.

And sure enough, when the delegation finally left, Maneka had been demoted, while Routray was in command.

HEARD AT THE CONGRESS(I) OFFICE

Maybe V.P. Singh was serious when he said that Rajiv would always be his leader. After all, isn't he doing everything he can to bring Gandhi back?

A PARTY WORKER

Routray: a victory, at last

THERMOMETER

Who's soft on the BJP—and the VHP

■ P. Upendra: The government should be saved at all costs is his credo, and secular credentials be damned. Compromise with the BJP-VHP combine is not as bad a deal as made out by the media, and if it can keep the Raja in power, there's really no harm in it. Upendra is, therefore, running circles around Advani and Vajpayee in an attempt to effect a reconciliation.

■ N.T. Rama Rao: With his interest in mythological mish-mash, it should come as no surprise that the former Andhra Pradesh chief minister is one of the more religious-minded leaders of the National Front. And if there were any doubts about where he stood, his statement, expressing support for the re-location of the Babri Masjid, would have set them to rest.

■ Arun Nehru: While there's no way of substantiating this allegation, most Muslim leaders believe that Arun Nehru was instrumental in getting the locks of the Ram Janmabhoomi temple opened in 1986. But it is beyond dispute that Nehru was among those who insisted on a tie-up with the BJP in the run-up to the last general elections. It now appears that Advani and Co. would be more amenable to supporting the National Front government if Nehru was PM.

■ Chimanbhai Mehta: He believes that everyone should try to bridge the gap between the BJP and the Janata Dal in the national interest. For, if the situation is allowed to deteriorate, the Congress would come back to power. And Rajiv Gandhi's outfit is far greater an evil than the BJP/VHP.

Please, not me!

How can you best blackmail a Union minister?

By asking him to appear on Khula Manch.

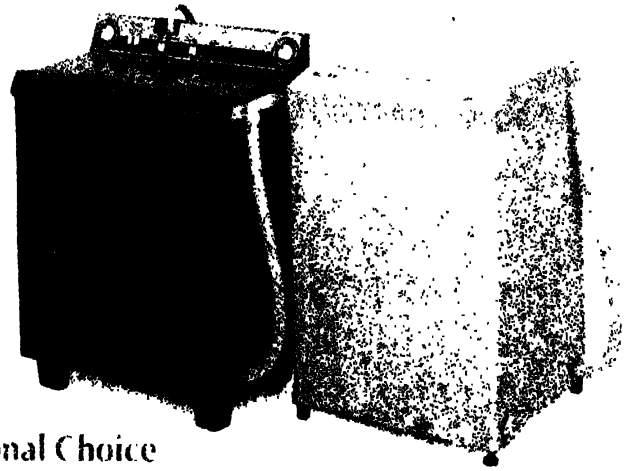
Apparently, now that the programme has become a byword for controversy, none of the ministers is too keen to feature on it. Everytime one of them is approached to go on the air, he stands off asking that the person next in line be asked instead. Even Sharad Yadav and Ram Vilas Paswan, the two most publicity-hungry of central ministers, are leery of appearing on the show, after the disastrous performances of their more media-savvy colleagues.



But that's not all. The organisers have yet another problem. Nobody is too sure who should be asked to represent the home ministry. While none of the viewers, it is thought, will recognise the home minister, it would create too many protocol problems if Subodh Kant Sahay was invited on the show instead. ●

Master of the game

The cover story (Toppling the Raja, 14—20 October) was timely and forthright. It clearly projects that ever since the National Front government came to power, there has been an element of uncertainty about it. Given the present situation, there is no gainsaying the fact that the Prime Minister will continue to enjoy the same credibility. But the rival camp led by Chandra Shekhar is steadily gaining ground. Therefore, V.P. Singh should be on the alert about the dissident factor. For, Chandra Shekhar is a seasoned politician and an old master of the toppling game.

Subhashis Ray, Rourkela (Orissa)

■ Chandra Shekhar is right when he says that the government has done nothing to its credit. The Kashmir and Punjab problems, the price rise and the Bofors scandal are the four issues on which the National Front government was elected to power.

Today, Kashmir is going adrift and in Punjab, terrorism has spread to all the districts of the state. V.P. Singh has also failed to bring to book any of the middlemen involved in the Bofors payoffs. And price rise has not been tackled firmly. All this shows that V.P. Singh has been a failure on almost all fronts

■ The change from a vibrant, aggressive and ideal Young Turk to a cunning and capricious schemer is certainly a trgic metamorphosis. The pity is that we expect too much from the so-called "cleans" and then when things go awry we cry over spilt milk. This has happened in the case of both V.P. Singh and Chandra Shekhar. In Indian politics, there is a yawning gap between perception and practice. V.P. Singh may be honest on many fronts, but morally he is in the wrong. He may be timid, but he is tough as far as obduracy and doggedness are concerned. But it is doubtful whether the situation is going to change for the better with Chandra Shekhar at the helm of affairs

U.S. Iyer, Bangalore (Karnataka)

Chandra Shekhar: waiting in the wings

■ The political philosophy of Chandra Shekhar is diametrically opposed to that of V.P. Singh. It is certain that V.P. Singh no longer has a strong base in the party. And since the country is in deep trouble, the Prime Minister has to devote all his time to the nation and its problems. The chaos let loose by the implementation of the Mandal report needs utmost attention. But Chandra Shekhar, who does not hold any political office, can indulge in his old game of wheeling and dealing. Whereas, the PM has the welfare of the nation as his topmost priority.

R.K. Gulati, Siliguri (West Bengal)

■ In his interview, Chandra Shekhar has thrown light on vital issues of national importance. Morality in politics is a thing of the past. But Chandra Shekhar's adherence to morality and ethics in times of stress and strain is highly admirable. In spite of his drawbacks, he is still a force to be reckoned with.

Shekhar is a man who has some principles and is never afraid to call a spade a spade. He has been bold enough to state that the present government has bungled in almost every sphere. The National Front is plagued with insurmountable problems. Therefore, the prospects are bright for the man from Balia to take over the reins of the nation in this hour of crisis.

Spreading lies

The letter, The other side of Mamata (23—29 September), is patently motivated and has clearly been inspired by persons bent on opposing Mamata Banerjee. The blatant lies the letter abounds in were nailed long back but disciples of Goebbels are apparently tireless. First, the fake degree canard. Her critics, who continue to fear Mamata's growing popularity, sold the baseless story to a Calcutta newspaper. This was picked up by the CPI(M) MP Amal Dutta who won cheap publicity on the strength of the lies for some time. When Mamata confronted the then Lok Sabha Speaker, Balram Jakhar, with her degree certificates the latter announced that he had examined the papers and was satisfied with their genuineness. Mamata had wanted to send the matter to the Privileges Committee of Parliament but the Speaker's announcement ended the controversy.

Mamata : maligned

As for "leading a violent mob of Congress activists to assault the late Jaya Prakash Narayan and to disrupt his meeting," when a Delhi weekly, now defunct, published this second lie about her in February 1986, Mamata complained to the Press Council in March 1986, following which the editor of the weekly apologised for the report.

In the doldrums

The write-up (Out of control, 14—20 October) presents a dismal picture of the economy. The main problem with us is the wide gap that exists between principle and practice.

It is time for us to take a new road before we fall into the ditch. There is an urgent need to change our policies by giving incentives to production, introduction of competition where monopoly exists, putting an end to subsidies in a phased manner, creating more employment opportunities, improving technology to boost exports, introducing administrative reforms to cut down on unproductive expenditure and to prevent money from flowing into the coffers of middlemen, revamping tax laws and also accounting procedures to flush out black money. There cannot be any short cuts—or the waving of a magic wand—for growth, other than hard work

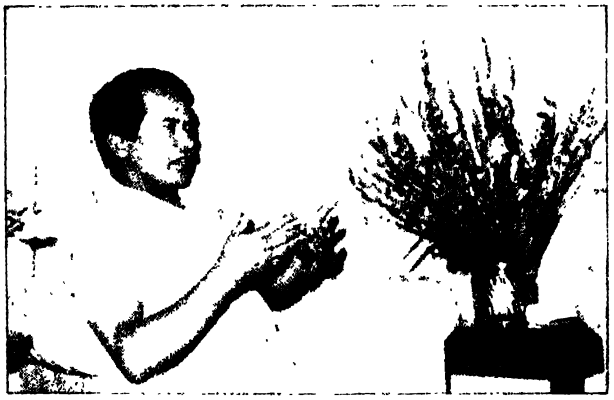
The road to the top

Madhuri Dixit: high hopes

The cover story on Madhuri Dixit (Ek, do, queen, 7—13 October) was really informative. Her performance is improving with every film. And to say that she is the best dancer in the film world is certainly an understatement. In Sailaab, her dance was a perfect blend of innocence and oomph, considering the raunchy number. Madhuri has come of age and she seems all set to stay for good.



Pradeep Jain, Calcutta (West Bengal)

■ Behind Madhuri Dixit's rise lies perseverance and dedication. Her professional attitude to work, her discipline and her effort to put in the best in every sequence got her to where she is. Madhuri is on the road to the top.

Sankar Banerjee, Rourkela (Orissa)

■ Today, Madhuri is undoubtedly the number one actress in Bombay's tinsel world. Her innocent face with a touch of sensuousness is her greatest asset. She made the entire nation dance to the tune of the Ek do teen number in Tezaab. She followed it up with some superb performances in Dil and Sailaab. Now she has graduated from the dance and disappear routine to a more mature and restrained acting. She is truly an incarnation of Meena Kumari, especially in the portrayal of tragic roles.

Dipon Roy, Barrackpore (West Bengal)

Nar Bahadur Bhandari: making a reasonable demand

The language issue

While it is a matter of great concern that foreigners are being given citizenship in Sikkim (The aliens, 23—29 September), but chief minister Nar Bahadur Bhandari's demand for the inclusion of Nepali in the Eighth Schedule of the Constitution is quite reasonable because Indian Nepalese constitute a sizeable 60 lakhs of the population. Bhandari is not pressing his demands with an eye to the vote-bank. In fact, he is voicing the grievances of his people who wants the recognition of their language.

Lakshman Sharma, Kohima (Nagaland)

Rajiv and the Raja

Vinod Mehta in his column (VP blunders again, 21—27 October) has not only been uncharitable but grossly unfair when he tries to find fault with Rajiv Gandhi for messing things up in Karnataka and condemning V.P. Singh in the same breath for imposing President's Rule in that state.

When the Congress high command failed to persuade chief minister Veerendra Patil to step down honourably on health grounds, party president Rajiv Gandhi took the right decision in the interest of the party and the state.

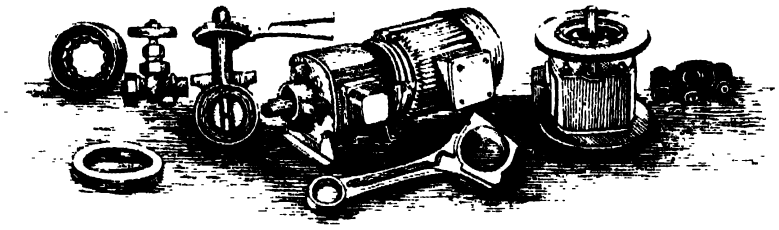
So, how can such a decisive and timely action be called a "screw-up" unless Patil was known to have a majority support. Rajiv's stand has been fully vindicated by subsequent events and the hypocrisy of V.P. Singh stands exposed.

G.M. Singhvi, Calcutta (West Bengal)

Gulf of difference

Contrary to Inder Malhotra's assertion (Hands off the Gulf, 9—15 September), I would like to extend my support to India's stand of not taking too strong a view against Iraq. One must remember at this stage that Iraq is probably the only Gulf country whose policy over Kashmir is in India's favour. And this support is of crucial importance particularly because Pakistan is doing all it can to internationalise the Kashmir issue among the Muslim nations.

Moreover, India's stand on the Gulf dispute in relation to that of the USA is also laudable. By refusing to flatter the Americans,



Indians returning from the Gulf

India has made it amply clear that it does not approve of the US role in the Gulf. What India should do now is to befriend the Third World countries, which would further mitigate the influence of the Americans in this region.

VINOD MEHTA

Incense and myrrh

Will V.P. Singh distribute largesse to partymen and dissident Congress and BJP MPs before 7 November?

When Malcolm Muggeridge was a leader-writer in the Manchester Guardian, he was advised by his editor to occasionally shock and outrage the paper's readers. Such an approach, the editor said, would ensure not only a lively 'Letters to the Editor' column but, more crucially, leaders would actually get read. Common sense and reason, however admirable, make for dull copy.

I wonder if the hand that punched in the first Times of India leader on 25 October was animated by a similar desire to provoke and perturb. The paper, along with most of the English press, can hardly wait for the return of Rajiv, but to argue that the President should have appointed a caretaker Prime Minister between 25 October and 7 November is to tread dangerously close to lunacy. "He (President R. Venkataraman) should have advised Mr Singh to resign before calling on Parliament to meet as quickly as possible to appoint a successor," thundered the Old Lady of Boribundet, conceding at the same time that the measure would be applicable only for "10 to 12 days". Although the paper did not go so far as to name the caretaker, we all know that there is just one candidate for the job—Rajiv Gandhi.

Apparently, in these critical 10 to 12 days, Mr V.P. Singh will be tempted to "distribute largesse in various guises". He could, but I doubt very much if he will. A Cabinet reshuffle or a major expansion 18 hours before the crucial vote in the Lok Sabha is as likely as an Indian victory over Pakistan in hockey. Mandal may have turned the Prime Minister's head, but he is not demented yet. Then, there is the possibility that the value-less V.P. Singh might "indulge in tactics aimed at confounding Members of Parliament". Considering what a cad VP is, I can give no assurances on this one. What would be the honourable thing to do? Should Mr Singh quietly stand up in Parliament, request those for and against him to put up their hands, and if the result goes against him, walk meekly to the slaughter house? The National Front (NF) is being brought down on the twin issues of Ram Janmabhoomi / Babri Masjid and Mandal. Therefore, it is only natural that the motion of confidence to be moved by the NF on 7 November will exploit these two controversies. What is immoral or unfair about such tactics? Indeed, they are eminently sane.

To argue five days before the most concerted assault on the integrity of the Indian state for a ten-day caretaker Prime Minister is to invite bloodshed and civic disorder. The President did not pull 7 November out of a hat. The date was fixed on the assumption that till 30 October, the central government and its MPs will have their hands full monitoring the communal situation and averting violence, particularly in Uttar Pradesh. Given the fact that the determination of the BJP-VHP to perform kar seva in Ayodhya on 30 October has been intensified following the arrest of L.K. Advani, the law and order situation in the country has received a further jolt. Handing over governance to a caretaker Prime Minister in such an incendiary environment is to ensure the weakening of central authority at a time when its full control is vital.

In fact, President Venkataraman must be congratulated for having taken the correct decision with both speed and dignity. Whether it is government at the state level or at the Centre, the only place where majority should be tested is on the floor of the House. Written communications advancing or withdrawing support are useful only to the extent that they lead to a final showdown in the proper forum. Just a few weeks ago, the Governor of Karnataka was lambasted by the Congress and the press for not adhering to this norm.

ASHOK VAHIE

V.P. Singh is not making the slightest effort to disguise or camouflage his tactics in the coming weeks: The martyr of Mandal and the martyr for secularism will come knocking on our doors for votes

Congressmen's fears about horse-trading, a craft at which they are experts, are exaggerated. Doubtless, some crude efforts will be witnessed. However, the apprehension is being articulated at this time for ritual effect rather than out of genuine fear. Mr Devi Lal talks glibly of 80 rural Congress MPs and 30 in the BJP itching to switch allegiance. This is characteristic Chaudhary wishful thinking. Approaches, of course, are inevitable, but chances of success, minimal. The Janata Dal does not have any tycoon godfathers ready to open money bags, and even if it did, the time at its disposal to buy and ensnare is exceedingly short. Those who complain about possible mischief between 25 October and 7 November might like to remember that the Prime Minister had asked the President for three weeks' grace; Mr Venkataraman gave him less than two.

Whatever variation of incense and myrrh Mr V P Singh and his lieutenants offer to the Congress and BJP Members of Parliament, I am prepared to take a small bet that not one MP from either of the two combines will defy the party whip. The Congress crowd can sense power around the corner, while the BJP at this moment is so charged with a sense of mission that it is difficult to contemplate even a minor revolt. If there is going to be any wear and tear, the Janata Dal is the most likely target. A hardcore group of dissidents is openly and furiously chipping away and boasting that V.P. Singh will be dethroned before D-Day. Thus, it is in the interests of the Congress to give Mr Chandra Shekhar and gang as much time as possible to do their dirty work from within.

The 7 November test of strength in the Lok Sabha should turn out to be an anti-climax. No last minute miracles seem to be on the horizon. Irrespective of the precise wording of the government's motion, the 195 Congress and 89 BJP-Shiv Sena MPs will oppose it. Meanwhile, in spite of some initial movement to his side, Mr Chandra Shekhar is looking his old, forlorn self following the desertion of Mr Devi Lal. One or two Chandra Shekhar cronies could conceivably defy the party whip and face expulsion, but otherwise the National Front count in the House should remain steady. So, even though defeat for the government is a foregone conclusion the terms of defeat will have been set by the losing side.

Vishwanath Pratap Singh is not making the slightest effort to disguise or camouflage his tactics in the coming weeks. Revealing one's battle plans before hostilities have begun is generally considered unwise, but the Prime Minister seems oblivious to such dangers. Over-confidence or supreme desperation? It is difficult to tell. The VP challenge hurled at Rajiv Gandhi and L.K. Advani reads thus: "In the highest forum of the land it will be made clear who stands for secularism and values enshrined in our Constitution." The martyr of Mandal and the martyr for secularism will come knocking on our doors soliciting votes. But before that, the question of caretaker will confront us once more.

Again, Mr V P Singh's claims on the job are impressive. First, he has the advantage of incumbency. Second, the country is passing through an explosive stage that is likely to become even more explosive by a deeply divisive election campaign bound to play up on the electorate's communal passions. Alas, there is no way we can avoid the price electoral majority demands of our fledgling democracy, even if it means communal riots in which a couple of hundred lives are lost. However, what we can avoid is unnecessary and short-term change in the command structure of the administration. No doubt when President Venkataraman directs Vishwanath Pratap Singh to take over as caretaker Prime Minister, his role will be defined, the limits clearly stated. Moreover, there are well-established precedents for caretaker governments which V P Singh will not be allowed to violate by the President and an alert public opinion.

We forget at our own peril that 30 October is not a magic day after which the temple mosque dispute will disappear. Chances are it will remain on the boil because Mulayam Singh Yadav is duty-bound to emulate the actions of his counterpart in Bihar and arrest the entire leadership of the BJP as it sets foot in UP. As a result, the election campaign to follow will be conducted against a background of acute communal polarisation. Clearly, the vigilance and the preparedness of the law and order agencies post-kar seva will, if anything, have to be greater.

Never before in the history of the republic has a general election been more unwelcome. The people don't want it; the rank and file of the political parties don't want it; Rajiv Gandhi, L.K. Advani, V.P. Singh, Jyoti Basu don't want it; even the press is reluctant to trudge after politicians on dusty roads listening to tired rhetoric. Yet, we are powerless to prevent it. Even Lord Ram cannot stop the momentum of democracy. Should we rejoice or weep? •

The Times of India, along with most of the English press, can hardly wait for the return of Rajiv Gandhi. When the paper suggested the appointment of a caretaker PM, the candidate it had in mind was obvious.

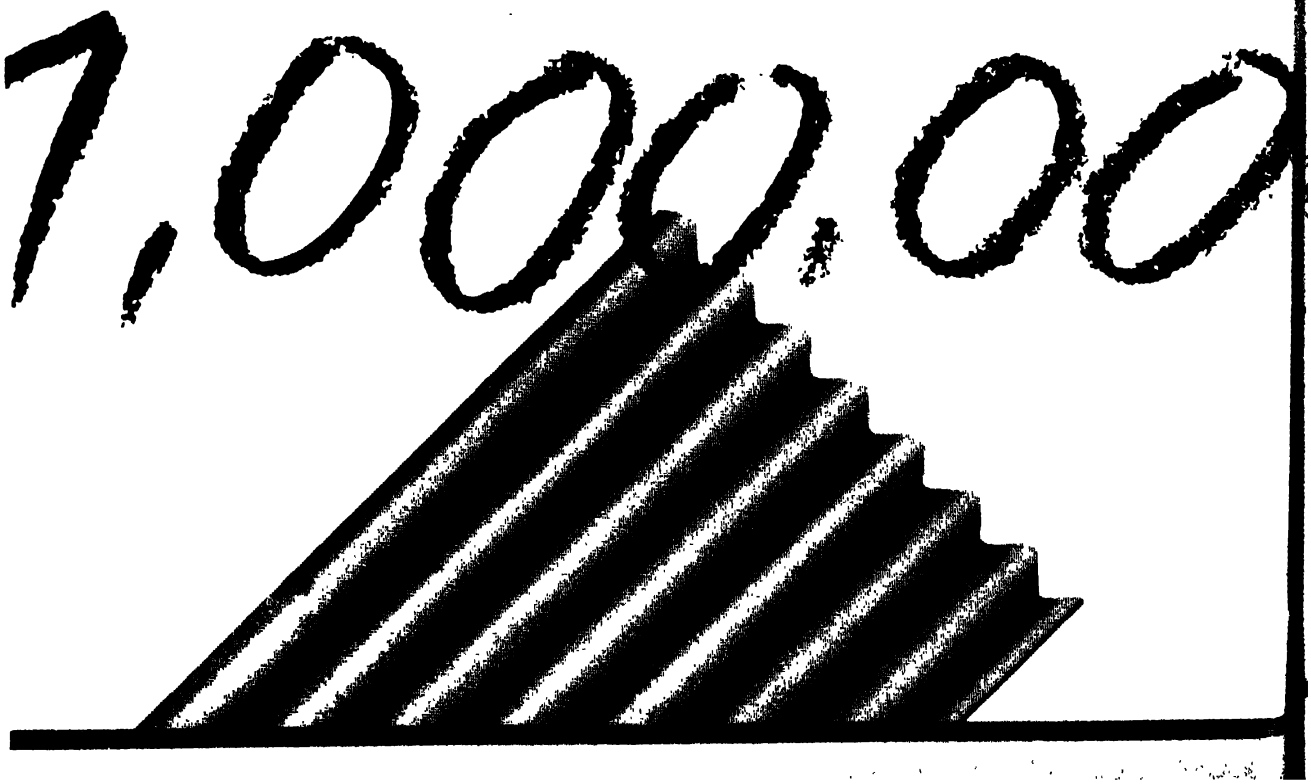
It's a fact that Asbestos Cement Sheets are made of over 90% cement and reinforced with about 10% Chrysotile asbestos a natural fibre with 3-4 times the strength of steel Asbestos being 100% alkali resistant, gets 'locked in' with the cement matrix permanently The chemical bond so formed makes the separation of asbe - stos fibre practically impossible



Asbestos Cement Sheets are pre-fabricated, ready-to-use and have the advantages of both cement and asbestos

As a matter of fact, Asbestos Cement Sheets need no protective coatings or treatment Corrosive industrial pollutants leave them unharmed.

It's inherently resistant to fire, heat, rain and salty coastal air, resulting in a long lasting product. Add to the long life of these sheets, higher coverage efficiency. And you have the most cost-effeciive roofing material

Fact is, Asbestos Cement pipes, sheets, slates and shingles have been used since the turn of the century. And continue to be used all over the world.

Tussle for the temple

Marxists gain control of Hindu places of worship in Kerala

For the devout in Kerala, this has always remained a sore point. Time and again, angry voices have been raised against the state's Devaswom Boards, the government-run outfits that administer the Hindu temples in the Travancore-Cochin belt. Apart from charges of financial impropriety, the general feeling in Kerala is that successive governments have reduced these religious boards to state-run corporations and have used them to accommodate politicians. And, despite its atheistic ideology, the Marxists were as keen to gain control of the temple boards as the previous non-communist regimes.

In 1984, the then Congress(I) chief minister, K. Karunakaran, brought an ordinance which clarified that a "Hindu was one who believed in God and temple worship". The move, though cleverly clothed, was clearly aimed at keeping the Marxists off the temple trusts. At that time, a majority of the Hindu MLAs were Marxists and they were not allowed to contest Devaswom Board elections simply because they refused to swear by God. But the ordinance was allowed to lapse as Karunakaran could not muster enough legislative support.

When the Marxists came to power, they nominated Raman Bhattathiripad, the brother-in-law of the CPI(M) general secretary, E.M.S. Namboodiripad, as president of the all-powerful Travancore Devaswom Board (TDB). Soon, other constituents of the ruling Left Democratic Front (LDF) began clamouring for a place in the temple administration. But their efforts received a temporary setback, when, following a petition filed by the president of the Kerala Hindu Dharma Protection Council, the Kerala High Court squashed the election of a Congress(S) activist—the party is a constituent of the LDF—to the Devaswom Board. In its famous 10 April judgement, the court ruled that only those who believed in God and temple worship were eligible for contesting Devaswom Board elections. It seemed that Marxists would never be able to control Devaswom Boards in future.

But the communists were not willing to take defeat lying down. After a series of debates, it was decided to redefine the term Hindu. A Hindu, according to the Marxists now, was one who was born a Hindu or converted into Hinduism. The Bill, with the identity of the Hindu redefined, was passed by the Kerala Assembly. The stage was set for the entry of the Marxists into the temple boards of the state.

Perturbed by the raging battle to control temple trusts, which by then had been reduced to cesspools of corruption, the Kerala High Court appointed a high-powered commission to go into all aspects of the religious bodies and make recommendations. The commission consisted of eminent persons like V. Ramachandran, the former chief secretary of the state, Radhakrishnan Nair, former special director of the CBI, and A.S. Unni, a chartered accountant. The TDB promptly went in appeal to the Supreme Court against the order of the High Court. In May this year, the Supreme Court dismissed the TDB petition. And, the commission was flooded with complaints against the Devaswom Boards.

The commission was shocked at the extent of corruption in the temples of Kerala. Priests were bought and sold for high sums and the administration did not even bother to maintain proper accounts. The commission members also objected to the way the temples were being politicised. And the people at the helm of the Devaswom Boards, the commission noted, simply shut their eyes to the goings-on. Result: while the Board members lined their pockets, the temples were thoroughly neglected

But this is not the only reason for the sorry state of most of the temples in Kerala. Their income has been adversely affected following a series of land reforms enactments over the years. It really began in 1811 when Col. Munroe, the then Dewan of Travancore, took over the temples of the area. At that time the income of the temples stood at a staggering Rs 4 crores. And as years passed by, the temples gradually lost most of their land and the source of their income to the administration. The final blow came in 1912, when the government by a proclamation took over the responsibility of maintaining and running the places of worship.

After Independence, the government earmarked Rs 51 lakhs towards the Devaswom Boards' expenses. Today, the Marxists are claiming that since the Devaswom Boards are funded by the government, it certainly has a responsibility to discharge. But as Swamy Satyananda Saraswathy, patron of the Kerala Temple Protection Council, pointed out, "Successive governments in the past have taken away temple lands and the present annuity of Rs 51 lakhs fixed 40 years back is peanuts."

And Swamy is not entirely wrong. Since Independence, the temples were deprived of their vast estates. No wonder there was a sharp decline in the number of temples—many of them were abandoned since the temple authorities did not even have the means to carry out the daily rituals. Consider the following statistics: in 1931, there were over 9,000 temples—big and small—in the state. But by 1983, only 1,500 survived. While in other states like neighbouring Tamil Nadu, governments provided protection to the temples, no such thing was done in Kerala ostensibly because it could hurt secular sentiments.

The Nayanar regime feels that since Devaswom Boards are funded by the government, it has a responsibility to discharge

Today, most of the major temples in Kerala have fallen on bad times and have become symbols of material and spiritual exploitation of the faithfuls. Take the instances of the hill temple of Sabarimala, easily the second largest Hindu place of worship after the Tirupati temple in the south, and the famous Guruvayoor temple. During Karunakaran's regime a Christian convert nearly became a member of the Guruvayoor Devaswom. What is more, the temple had become a haven for the crooks and the corrupt: most of the priests were found to be alcoholics, foodstuff meant for the puja were taken out and some employees were even caught smuggling sandalwood from Karnataka using the permit issued to the temple. Guruvayoor has more then 40 elephants, which are used during rituals and festivals: the animals too were mistreated and they were not even given proper and sufficient diet.

The Kerala temple protection committee has also alleged that the grants given by the Guruvayoor Devaswom for the maintenance and renovation of smaller temples under it are being diverted to fund Marxist organisations in the state. It is even rumoured that the LDF government replaced P.N.

Narayanan, chairman of the Guruvayoor Devaswom, because he refused to be a party to the bungling.

The goings-on in other temples of the state is no better and corrupt officials rule the roost. Take the case of the making of the "Golakam" at the Chottanikara Devi temple run by the Cochin Devaswom Board (CDB). (The "Golakam" is the golden image of the deity which covers the idol.) A devotee complained to the police that CDB officials had siphoned off more than 25 gold sovereigns during the making of the "Golakam". Investigation later revealed that copper was mostly used instead of gold.

Time and again the government has pulled up Devaswom officials for irregularities but it didn't really help. In one case, an assistant commissioner of the CDB was suspended when a bundle of currency notes were found in her possession soon after she had gone to supervise hundi collection at the Chottanikara Devi temple. Some time back, cops raided the house of yet another senior Devaswom official and recovered gunnybags full of money. There are allegations that hundi collections, which include gold ornaments apart from the cash, are usually pocketed by Devaswom officials. In January 1990, the Kerala High Court ordered that hundi collections should be made in the presence of three devotees. The Kerala Temple Protection Committee (KTPC) promptly came forward and asked its members to be present during hundi collections throughout the state. Said Govind Bharathan, an advocate of the Kerala High Court who is carrying out a crusade against Devaswom Boards: "After KTPC men joined Devaswom officials in the counting of hundis, the collections have increased almost twice."

Understandably, the Nayanar regime is not very happy with the High Court and have unleashed a vicious campaign against Justice K.S. Paripoornan, the man responsible for taking whatever action has been taken against Devaswom Boards. The government even contemplated taking away jurisdiction of the High Court to audit the accounts of Devaswom Boards and giving it to a district court, where the chances of manipulation were better.

The three-member high-powered commission appointed by the Kerala High Court to go into the affairs of the TDB and the CDB has recommended the depoliticisation of the Devaswom Boards. It has further stressed the need to make the Sabarimala group of temples an autonomous body. The commission also said that only eminent persons and not politicians be appointed to the Devaswom Boards. Said Govind Bharathan: "The Devaswom Boards are being used as dustbins to accommodate disgruntled politicians who are potential threats to ruling parties."

It was also found by the commission that though the principles and procedures laid down for the budget framework were very sound, they were seldom followed. It said that the TDB has been mismanaging its funds in such a way that lakhs of rupees are lost by way of interest. Some time

"Politicians can manage temples"

Raman Bhattathiripad is the brother-in-law of Marxist supremo E.M.S. Namboodiripad. Bhattathiripad had stood as a independent candidate with Marxist support in the last Assembly elections and lost. But when the LDF came to power, he was rewarded with the coveted post of president, Travancore Devaswom Board. The CITU is dead against him as they feel he is being controlled by the RSP union.

SUNDAY: Is it true that because of your relation with Namboodiripad, you got the coveted post?
A: I am a Marxist sympathiser who believes in God and we have our own family temple. I feel I have the right qualification to be the TDB president, as my ancestors have also administered temples.

back, the daughter-in-law of a TDB member got a job as a clerk in a private bank because the board deposited huge sums of money at low interest rates with the bank. The report stressed that the Devaswom Boards' entire emphasis seems to be on new construction rather than on maintenance, mainly because of the contractor-board nexus. The commission has also recommended a ban on recruitments for a period of five years because the Devaswom Boards were already overstaffed.

Sabarimala is the biggest money-spinner of the TDB—it brings in about Rs 11 crores annually and accounts for 60 per cent of its total receipts—but the temple is neck-deep in scandals. Recently, S. Chandrika, commissioner of the Devaswom Board, was suspended because she took her teenage daughter and other members of her family for a pilgrimage to Sabarimala in connection with Choroonu—first feeding of her grandchild. But according to tradition only women past their menstrual periods and young girls who are yet to mature are allowed entry. Asserts Govind Bharathan: "The Marxists are determined to break the age-old customs and traditions which goes with their philosophy that if one temple is destroyed, so much of superstition is eradicated."

Last month, V.S. Madhavan Nair, a close ally of state irrigation minister and RSP strong-man Baby John, was nominated to the TDB. The Kerala High Court passed an injunction against Nair's appointment which, however, the state government cleverly subverted. The Marxists are trying to sell the line that it is trying to gain control of the temple trusts solely because the Devaswom Boards have become a cesspool of corruption. Recently K. Mohanan, former Marxist MP and president of the CITU-led Travancore Devaswom Employees Federation, charged that TDB president Raman Bhattathiripad was inefficient but was sticking to his post of TDB president solely because he happens to be the brother-in-law of party supremo Namboodiripad. Added Mohanan, "The TDB should be dissolved as it is a useless board. Why Bhattathiripad, even God's own son can't clean up this mess." Mohanan further points out that corruption is so rampant in the TDB that the appointments of priests—it is alleged that they do not even know the rituals and slokas—in major temples are controlled by party bigwigs.

(Right) Devotees throng the Sabarimala temple; (above) Govind Bharathan: "The Devaswom Boards are being used as dustbins to accommodate disgruntled politicians"

The LDF government is clearly in a soup. It simply cannot ignore the powerful Hindu organisations in the state, all of whom are dead against the Devaswom Boards. Asked a RSS leader: "Will the government dare to take over the churches and mosques in the state?" They feel that the administration of the temples should be left to the Hindu devotees. Said Leela Thampi, a housewife actively involved with the Hindu cause: "The material and moral corruption prevailing in Kerala temples are shocking. The atheist government should hand over temple administration to Hindu believers at the earliest."

But the Marxist government is in no mood to do so. For, the temples in Kerala are the source of political clout and money. •

Sreedhar Pillay/Trivandrum, Cochin and Guruvayoor

Q: But the CITU and former Marxist MP, Mohanan, has been critical of your performance...
A: I totally deny allegations made by Mohanan. If he has made much statements, the party should take action against him.

Q: There are allegations that TDB is a cesspool of corruption.
A: I don't deny that there is corruption but we have taken action against the erring officials. In fact, one of my aims is to clean up the place before my term expires.

Q: What about the Kerala High Court appointed high-power commission's report which has been quite critical about the functioning of the Sabarimala temple and has also recommended autonomy for it?
A: The TDB would implement the recommendations of the commission that would help improve the functioning of Sabarimala temple. But under no circumstances would we allow the separation of Sabarimala temple from the TDB. Nearly 75 per cent of the temples with poor income under TDB are now receiving financial assistance from the funds available from Sabarimala.

Q: The Hindu organisations and the high-power commission are recommending the de-politicisation of the Devaswom Boards. What are your views on it?
A: The commission's report was not deep and it was hazy. In a democracy there is nothing wrong in a politican managing temples so long as he does a good job. There is no question of handing over temples to Hindu organisations as there are too many of them pulling in different directions.

Politics of opportunism

But for some political commentators, V.P. Singh can do no wrong

The Indian Express editorial of 25 October says it all. A special session of the Lok Sabha has been summoned on 7 November to enable the V.P. Singh government to prove its majority on the floor of the House in view of the withdrawal of the BJP support. The Prime Minister also claimed that the question was not that of sticking to power but of upholding certain principles pertaining to the Constitution, judiciary and secularism.

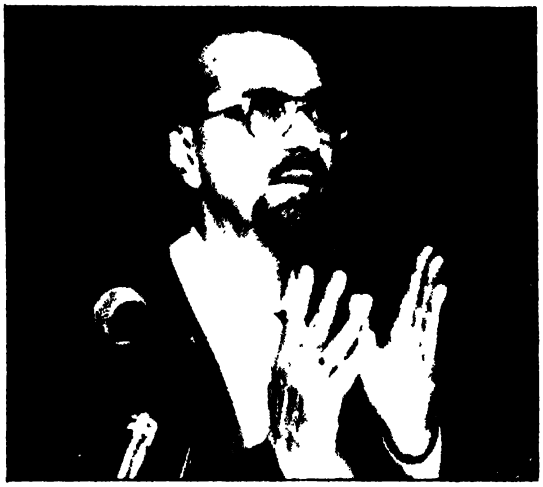
The editorial, "Two Difficulties", exposes the hypocrisy of such moral posturings. "Secularism dictates that for ten months he should do nothing on the Ram Janmabhoomi matter. Suddenly, the same 'secularism' dictates that he should yield to the dictates of secularists like Imam Bukhari...Yesterday, he resigned to vindicate a principle. Today, he says he must stick to the chair to vindicate a principle. Yesterday, his government removed Veerendra Patil's ministry without waiting for a test on the floor of the House. That was principle. Today, he says that all must wait till he tests his strength on the floor of the House. This too is principle."

Such brazen opportunism is indeed appalling. Yet, it goes unnoticed by certain eminent political commentators, particularly Nikhil Chakravartty. Such is his 'hero-worship' of V.P. Singh that he stoops to the level of charging the Congress of being soft towards the BJP and forecasts a Congress-BJP alliance in Parliament.

How can anyone be so blind to reality, that too being so close to the seat of power? Who entered into an opportunistic electoral alliance with the BJP at the time of the last Lok Sabha poll? Who acted as though the Ram Janmabhoomi dispute did not exist at all? Who exploited the alliance with the BJP to stick to power? Who ditched the BJP only to acquire a 'secular' image?

The Congress is perfectly justified not to co-operate with such a self-seeking government. It had repeatedly declared that it would support any government at the Centre without the BJP prop. It organised the highly successful and popular Sadbhavna Yatra to stress communal amity.

Commentators like Chakravartty refuse to see and listen to what is going around them. Such a blinkered approach does no credit to objective journalism.



London fog

Oh, come on, Kuldip Nayar is one of us. How can he be accused of any impropriety in the sad death of the former Chief Justice of India, Sabyasachi Mukharji, in London recently? Hasn't he 'thrown open' the gates of the High Commission to 'everyone' and helped to assuage the wounded feelings of the London-based Sikhs? Hasn't Khushwant Singh come out with statements attacking those who were critical of Nayar and demanded his recall during the course of the enquiry into the death of the Chief Justice?

That was the attitude of the 'elite' press. The Sunday Times of India, which ran a puff story on its front page sometime back, somewhat made up for it with a hard-hitting interview with Mrs Ratna Mukharji, widow of the former Chief Justice, who was with him throughout.

Mrs Mukharji, quite rightly, fears that the truth will not be revealed so long Nayar was in a position to exert influence through his office. He had already orchestrated a "disinformation campaign" to show he was in no way negligent. With external affairs minister Inder Gujral, a close crony of Nayar, in charge, Mrs Mukharji doubts if the promised judicial inquiry would even come through.

The unfortunate lady has disproved the excuses trotted out by the High Commission and there is no reason to disbelieve her. Their foreign visit may have been 'private' in the eyes of the British government, but was very much 'official' for the High Commission. The Indian government had sent a copy of their tour sanction with instructions to take care of them.

Reams are written about English theatre because most of them are produced by ad tycoons. And sycophancy really peaked as Lintas chief Alyque Padamsee's Othello gets ready for its premiere

Who entered into an opportunistic electoral alliance with the BJP? Who exploited the alliance to stick to power? And, who ditched the BJP to acquire a 'secular' image? V.P. Singh, of course

Even the doctors at the governent-run Royal Free Hospital (the High Commission claimed it was one of the best in London)were surprised that a high dignitary like the Chief Justice was brought there which was meant only for social-security card holders. Mrs Mukharji has reiterated that her husband did sit on a wheelchair for seven hours with a drip in his arm. The embassy officials disappeared after bringing the couple to the hospital. Mr Nayar did not provide them with something as basic as a car though Mrs Mukharji had to travel several times between the hospital and her host's flat. Hours after the death of the Chief Justice, Mr Nayar was entertaining friends at the High Commission, with drinks et al.

During his days as a journalist, Nayar was in the habit of accusing anyone and everyone in the government (particularly if it was a Congress government) of real and imaginary cases of negligence. As a member of the value-based team, why doesn't he step down at least when the inquiry into the death of the Chief Justice is on?

Kuldip Nayar was in the habit of accusing everyone in the government of real and imaginary cases of negligence. Now, he should at least step down during the enquiry into the death of the former Chief Justice

More than what Jaya Bachchan had to say on the famous relationships of her husband, I was more taken in by the kind of upbringing she had. It was an open, normal, middle-class childhood

A burning issue

V.P. Singh only hinted at it. But Union minister for textiles, Sharad Yadav, was quite categorical in his public speeches and press interviews. Many of the anti-Mandal young men who had allegedly immolated themselves, had actually been torched by vested interests to provide intensity to the movement.

This is a most serious charge. And then came the news item that Rajeev Goswami, who was the first to set fire to himself in New Delhi, had lodged a police complaint that he was torched by some of his companions. It is a pity that this particular aspect of the Mandal tragedy has not been properly brought out by the national newspapers.

Selling out

Hindi, Marathi, Kannada and other regional theatre groups of Bombay find it difficult to get sponsors for their plays. Not so with the 'prestigious' English theatre. Five-star hotels, liquor makers, shoe shops and other commercial firms rush in with sponsorships even for third-rate sex farces.

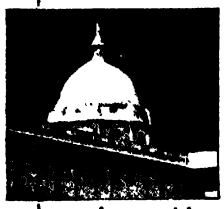
The same goes for media coverage. Reams are written about English productions, their rehearsals exclusively covered, stars interviewed and so on. The main reason seems to be the presence of advertising tycoons as producers. And the English press goes overboard in its coverage of the English theatre because it always 'pays' to prop up the ad tycoons.

Such sycophancy really peaked as Lintas chief Alyque Padamsee's production of Othello gets ready for its premiere. The English press, while using up all the superlatives in their coverage of the rehearsals, went a bit further and came up with long articles on the play's costume designer, set designer and so on.

Simply Jaya

I was very impressed with Jaya Bachchan's I believe in the October issue of Savvy magazine. She is forthright, sincere and interesting. More than what she had to say on the famous relationships of her husband, I was more taken in by the kind of upbringing she had. It was an open, wholesome and normal middle-class childhood and the parents never imposed their decisions on the three daughters. 'We have never ever had a single discussion on their not having a son or us not having a brother.' Her father did not object to her joining the film institute at Pune. So uncomplicated and genuine was the father-daughter relationship, that when the hostel matron objected to her friendship with colleague Bhaskar Choudhary, Jaya wrote to her father that she liked Bhaskar and would like to marry him. Her father wrote back, "It's your decision. I feel you must concentrate on your studies and do what you went there to do and let the rest of your life just follow; not make commitments without seriously thinking what they involve. There is nothing wrong with what you are feeling. These are things that happen in life, phases that human beings go through."

Golden words of advice to thousands of parents who may have to go through similar situations in life.



Happy birthday

I was delighted that most of our leading papers mentioned the 40th birthday of the Peanuts comic strip hero, Charlie Brown. Portrayed as a complete failure and wishy-washy, Charlie, however, is the hero of the comic strip syndicated in more than 2,300 newspapers all over the world and brings his creator, Charles Schulz, a cool 60 million dollars a year. Not bad for the little, round-headed kid, put down and tormented by the other kids. He cannot fly a kite, he cannot pitch a ball, he cannot raise his eye and look at that pretty, red-headed girl. So what? We all love you, Charlie Brown! ●

INDER MALHOTRA

Battered Benazir

What does the outcome of the Pakistani polls mean for India?

Benazir Bhutto's rout in the Pakistani election is truly stunning. Her charge that the poll was rigged massively has yet to be substantiated by convincing and independent evidence but it need not be dismissed out of hand. The rather low turn-out of voters suggests that the infamous ISI might have done a quiet and thorough job of scaring away PPP supporters.

There is no escape for Zardari or his wife. The regime which has been pursuing them since Benazir's dismissal can be depended upon to hound them with redoubled vigour

On the other hand, the US, whose opinion alone matters in this connection, might not take too dim a view of the situation unless the 40-strong team of Western observers can quote chapter and verse to show that there was a large-scale perversion of the democratic process. Benazir's numerous and vocal friends on the Capitol Hill might continue to shout but the US administration institutionally can be expected to resume business as usual with Pakistan.

In any case, with Benazir's crushing defeat and the landslide victory of the Islami Jamhoori Ittehad (IJI), President Ghulam Ishaq Khan and the Pakistani Army, the country's real rulers, have got exactly the political dispensation they want. There is bound to be some tussle over the leadership of the IJI Parliamentary Party, especially because the caretaker Prime Minister, Ghulam Mustafa Jatoi, is loath to lose his chair (even more than the Raja is in this country). He and his supporters are also bound to argue that to reassure minority provinces, it would be better to have a Sindhi Prime Minister. But this plea would not wash especially when the Pakistani President is a Pathan and the army chief a Mohajir from Azamgarh in UP. Anyhow,it is difficult to see how the prime ministership can be denied to Nawaz Sharif,who has delivered Punjab to the reactionary forces and re-established Punjabi supremacy at the Federal Centre.

Rigging or no rigging, one remarkable feature of the Pakistani poll merits close attention, especially by the Indian politicos now preparing for a mid-term election. Almost every veteran politician of the neighbouring country has been booted out by the predominantly youthful Pakistani voters. Khan Wali Khan, one of the most attractive leaders in the subcontinent, is among those who have bitten the dust. The same has been the plight of Air Marshal (retired) Asghar Khan, Nawabzada Nasrullah Khan, Shah Ahmed Noorani and even the formidable Pir of Pagara. On the other hand, Benazir's husband, Asif Zardari, who even her best friends call a "creep", has easily won even from behind bars.

However, there is no escape for Zardari or for his loving wife. For, the regime which has been relentlessly pursuing them since Benazir's dismissal in August can be depended upon to hound them with redoubled vigour. The charges on which Zardari is held in a detention centre entail imprisonment for as many as 17 years.

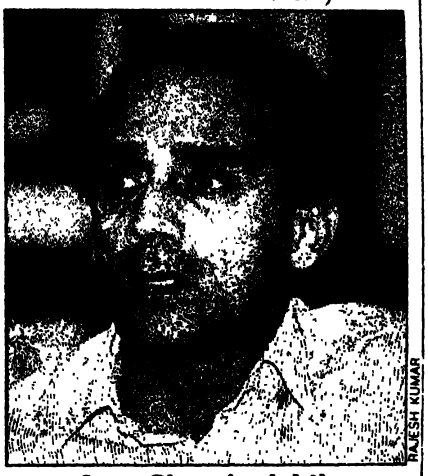
Viewed from New Delhi, the present Pakistani election is a very important landmark in the history of a country which has seldom known stability. Indeed, it has been ruled by the military directly for 25 of the 43 years of its existence and indirectly for the rest of the period. Each of its three elected Prime Ministers was dismissed and one was sent to the gallows after what a former attorney-general of the United States called a "travesty of a trial".

During recent months, Pakistan's internal troubles and tribulations have been acute and the capacity of its polity to cope with these is in serious doubt. The best expectations from the election were that there might be a hung Parliament. But now that a jubilant IJI is in a position to form a government entirely on its own, it is clear that the army-dominated Pakistan is at last able to put its political act together. And, even at the risk of stressing the obvious, it must be added that this is happening at a time when, in a curious reversal of roles, politics in India is at sixes and sevens.

Such is the gravity of the crisis in which V.P. Singh has landed himself and the country that the Pakistani rulers, who are confident that they have got an "opportunity of a lifetime" in Kashmir, are bound to feel much more emboldened than during the last ten months or so.

Unlike Benazir, who allowed herself to rant and rave over Kashmir, often to the point of appearing demented, the IJI rulers of Pakistan would be under no compulsion to advertise their animus against India or their determination to wrest Kashmir from it. They are going to act in a manner that is likely to be both hard-headed and hard-faced. This does not mean that Pakistan, under its new government, would rush into a war. Not by any means. But just as the Pakistani Army even before the voters flocked to the booths had done in Afghanistan, they are almost certain to raise the ante in Kashmir. ●

KHUSHWANT SINGH



Mahatma Shourie

Actually there are two Mahatma Shouries, father and son. Father H.D. Shourie edits Common Cause, which takes up cases of fiscal injustice like unfair pension, sales tax and income tax rules, tenancy laws etc., and has won many spectacular successes for common citizens. The son, Arun, edits the Indian Express and with its proprietor, Seth Ramnath Goenka, has fought and won battles against states and central governments, brought down corrupt chief ministers and sycophantic civil servants, and more than once shaken the throne of Delhi. Arun is the most formidable journalist of our times. The issues he engaged in and the way he fought them are the themes of his compilation of articles, Individuals, Institutions, Processes—How One May Strengthen The Other In India Today (Penguin-Viking). One could sum it up in one question and answer. Why is everything in India going to pieces? Because we have forsaken Gandhi.

No changes in the Constitution, no switching over from the present form of government to the Presidential will make the slightest difference unless the quality of those who run the institutions of governance also change. Writes Shourie, "Any other structure we devise, however radically different it might be from the present one, will be swiftly reduced to the condition to which we have reduced this one as long as we—the people as much as the rulers—continue to conduct ourselves in the manner in which we are doing now."

Arun Shourie rightly believes that a free and fearless press is the greatest bulwark against the tide of corruption that threatens to engulf the country. Successive state and central governments have tried to stifle the press. Gundu Rao had offices of the Deccan Herald and the Indian Express besieged in Bangalore; Jagannath Mishra had the Bihar Press Bill; Farooq Abdullah had the J&K Press Bill; Rajiv Gandhi the Defamation Bill. And we cannot forget the Emergency when Mrs Gandhi gagged the entire press. The main target of the government's ire has been the Indian Express and its aged proprietor, Seth Ramnath Goenka. As many as 235 cases were trumped up against it; attempts were made to force government nominees on its board of directors; banks were ordered to refuse it loans; its electric power was cut off. For many days it was not allowed to publish. When bullying failed to crush the indomitable spirit of Seth Goenka, Mrs Gandhi tried to buy him off. Srichand Hinduja offered to buy it at any price named by the owner. "Have you come on behalf of the Devi?" asked Sethji. "You may draw your own conclusion," replied the Sindhi. Goenka snapped back with a squelcher of the kind for which he is famous, "To kya main apnee gaye apney he haath say kasaaee key ghar pahuncha doon? (you want me to deliver my own cow at the house of the butcher?)"

RAJESH KUMAR

Arun Shourie rightly believes that a free and fearless press is the greatest bulwark against the tide of corruption

Shourie comes down very hard on Indian journalists for not standing up to the government or going to the aid of papers being persecuted by it. The few honourable exceptions are Sri Mulgaonkar, Arun Jaitley, Gurumurthy, and lawyers like Fali Nariman and Ram Jethmalani who fought for press freedom in the law courts. The chief villains of the piece are The Times of India, which bends to every passing wind, and the Ambanis, who treat journalists as purchaseable commodity: if they happily accept favours from state governments, get plots of land at throw-away prices or given flats at low rents, free travel abroad etc., there is no reason why Ambanis, Hindujas, Birlas, Singhanias and Jains should not hire and fire them at their will. Shourie quotes from the life of Shaikh Saadi to sum up the plight of the purchaseable versus the upright:

"It was hot as can be. The great thinker and guide, penniless, in worn-out clothes, sat eating gruel under a tree. At a distance, high on the palanquin on which he was being carried by his attendants, and resplendent in robes that proclaimed his high connections, the court philosopher was on his way home for lunch.

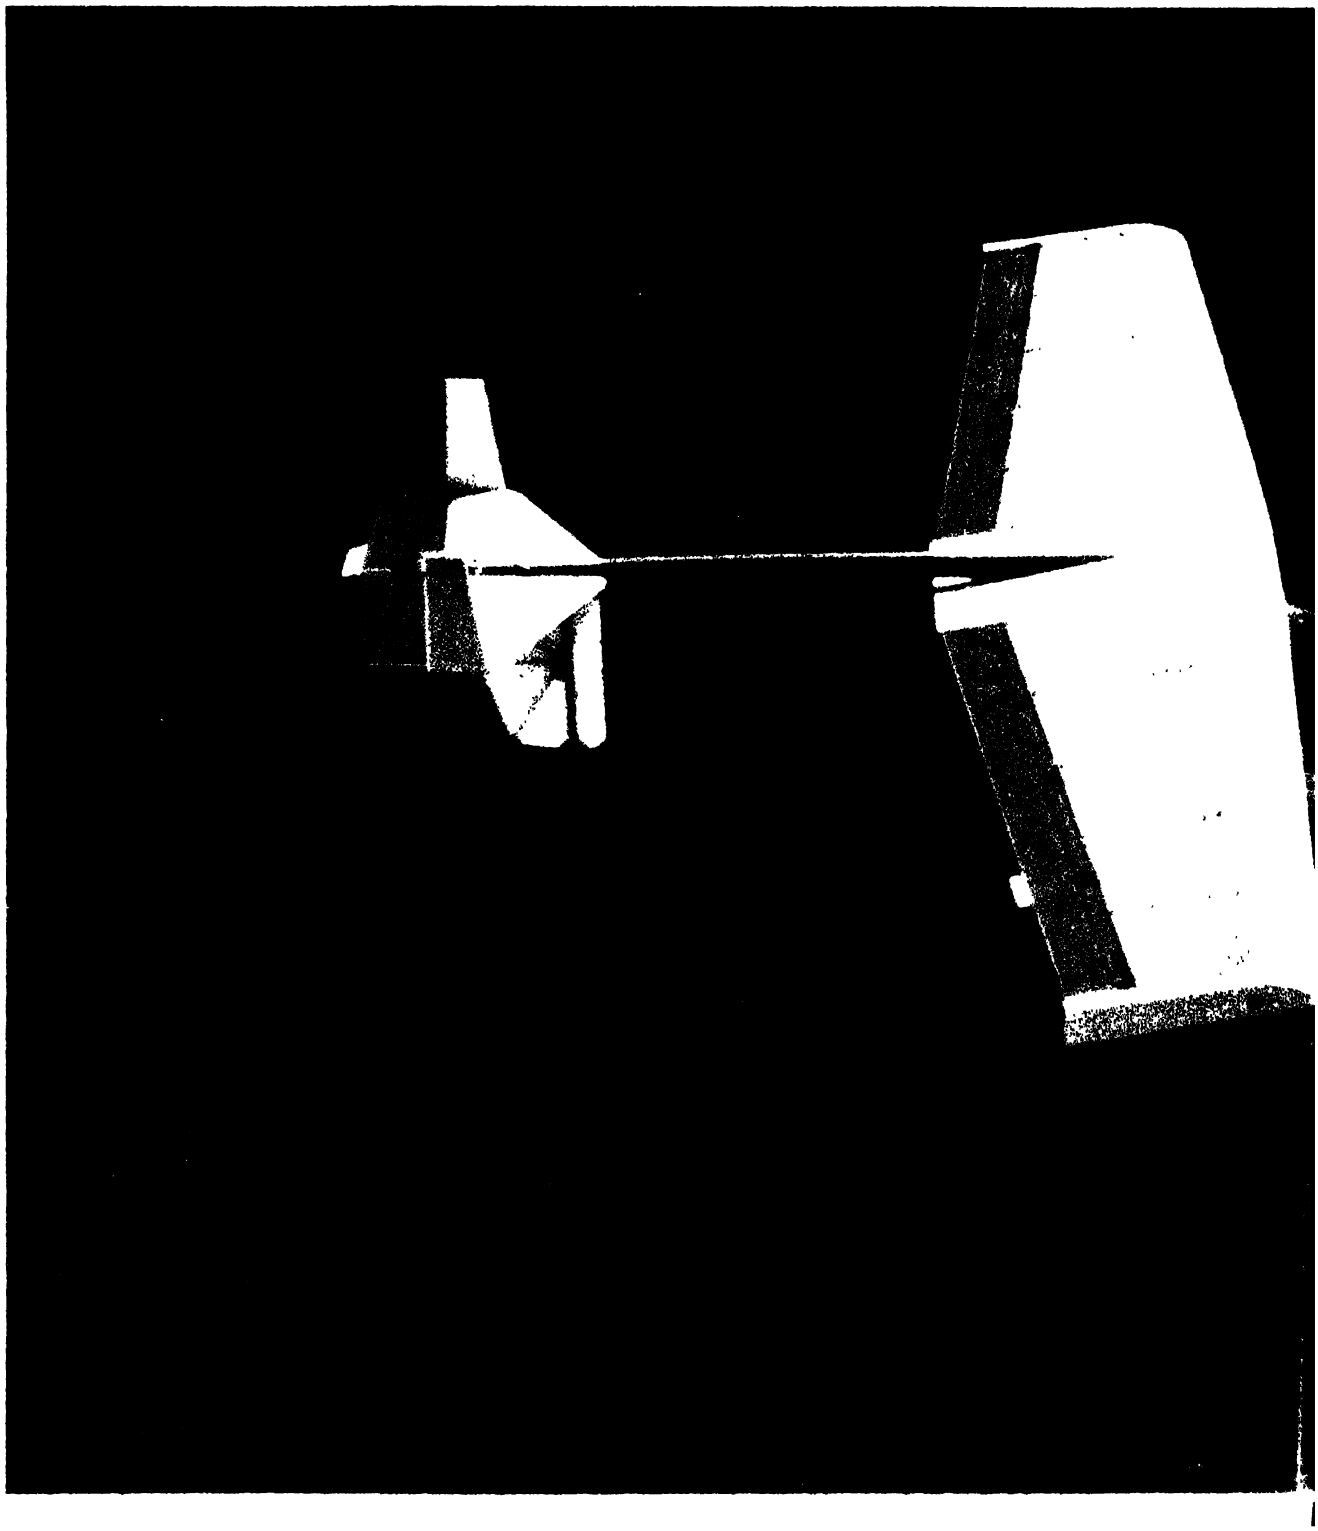
"Who is that, sitting there?" he asked his bearers.

"No one of consequence, your honour, just that fellow who spends his time talking to villagers," they replied.

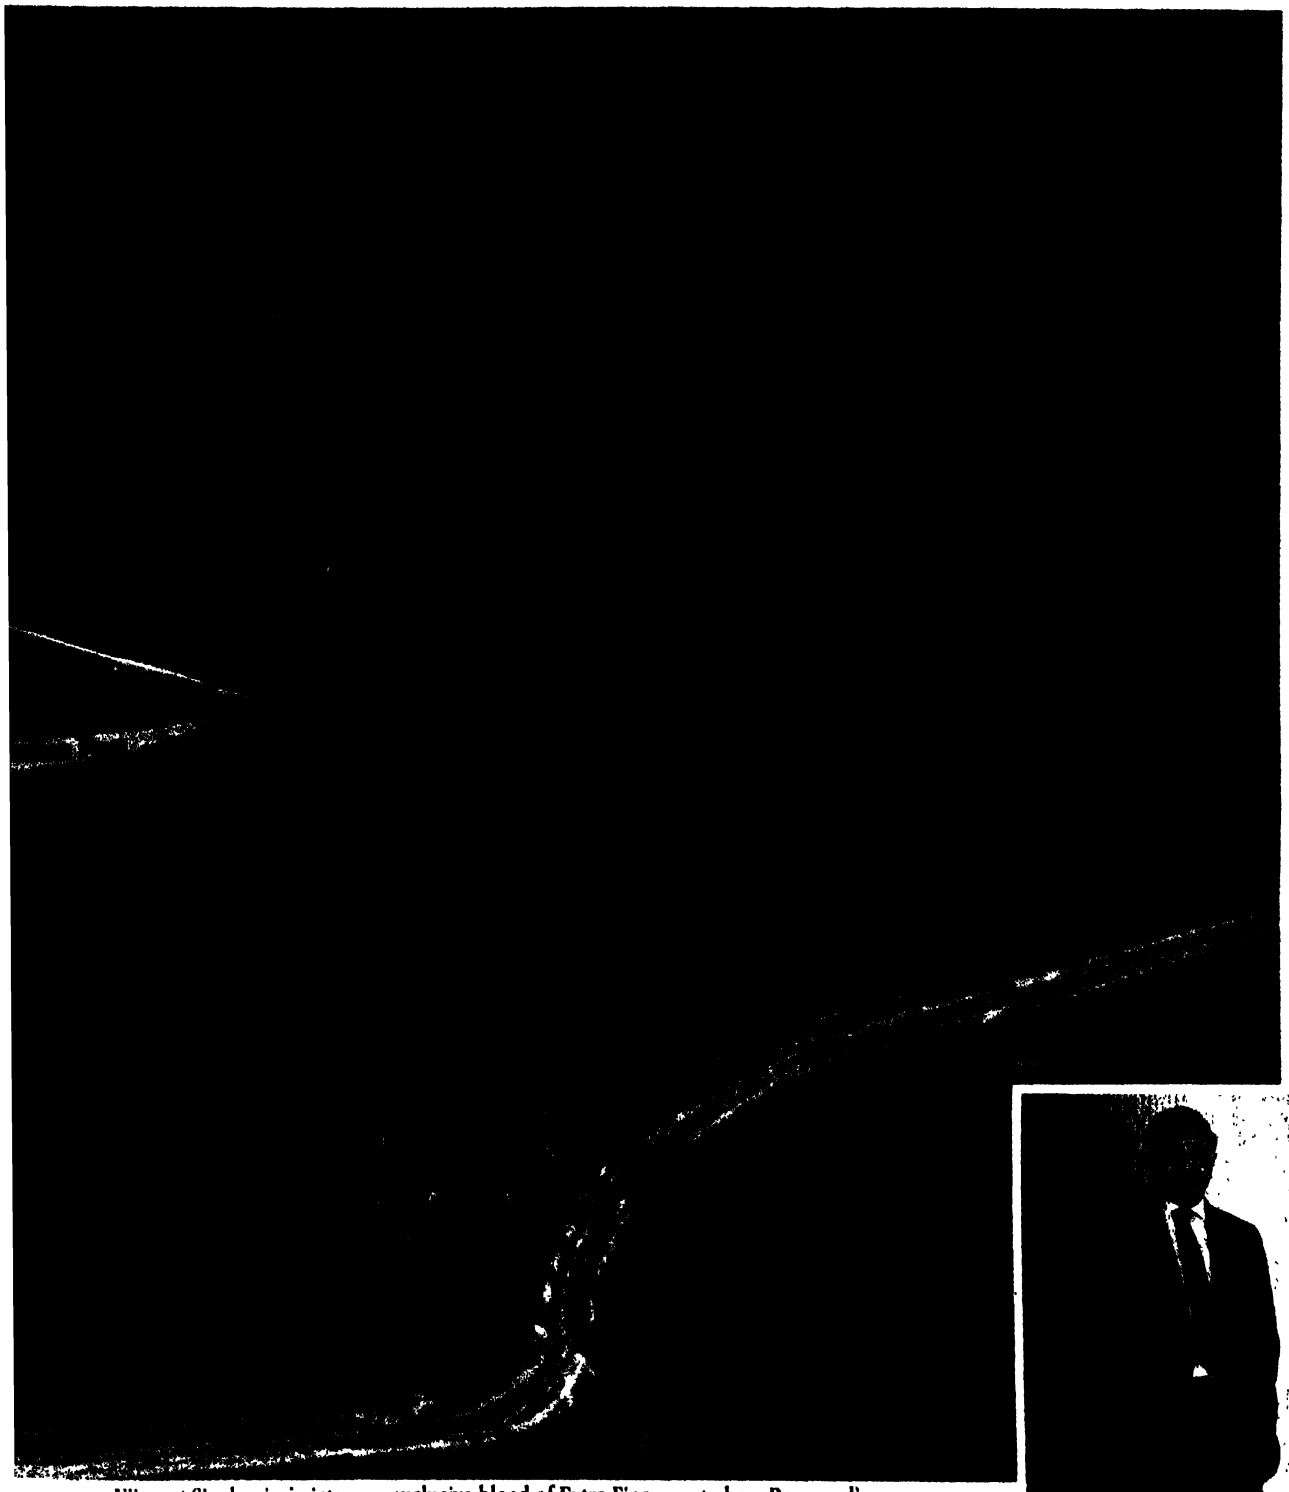
"Carry me to him," the great man ordered.

"What are you doing in this heat?" he asked, recognising the seer as he was lowered.

"Eating gruel "



"What a fool you are," said the court philosopher with a sigh.



"If only you would learn to get along with the king, you wouldn't have to spend the rest of your life eating that wretched gruel."

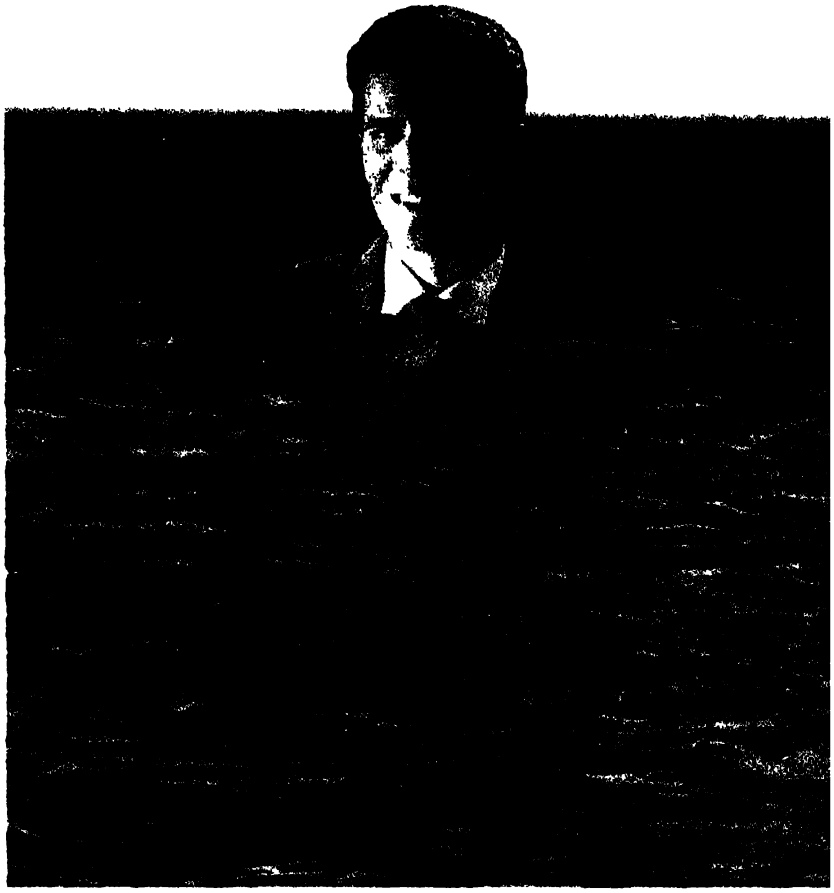
"If only you would learn to eat gruel, my friend," said the teacher, "you wouldn't have to spend the rest of your life trying to get along with the king."

There is lot more in Arun Shourie's compilation which will make the reader ponder over the plight of his country. Why can't we get along with each other? Why are our civil servants so spineless? Why do our trade unions behave like gangs of goondas? Why can't we stand up to the injustice? I have not read another book on the mess that is India which made me think more and bring tears of anger into my eyes. Also some frustration that Arun should give so scintillating a book so drab and forbidding a title as Individuals, Institutions, Processes. Mahatmas rarely bother to wrap their gifts in attractive wrapping paper. Mahatma Shourie is no exception.●

You don't have to set a world flying record in a microlight to be a Raymond's man.

Vijaypat Singhania, aviator, photographer, publisher, industrialist, can't help being a Raymond's man. He's the Chairman of the Company.

His suit: "Microlite", an exclusive blend of Extra Fine Merino Wool.



You don't have to break a world record to be a Raymond's man. For that matter, you don't even have to be a Raymond's man.

...but it helps.

Raymond's

Never say no to life.

THE 'MAKE OR BREAK' TEST FOR A PRODUCT IS NOT ON THE TEST-BED, BUT IN THE UNFORESEEN CIRCUMSTANCES OF REAL LIFE.

When it comes to engineering firsts in industrial electrics and electronics in India, it is Kirloskar Electric which wrote the book almost single-handedly. We've stuck our necks out, burnt our fingers and done things that other companies considered impossible. But there's one particular first that taught us more than any book could: the 3.2 MVA, 11000/605 volts, class 'C' insulated dry type transformer.

In 1983 the Metro Railways in Calcutta, India's one and only underground rail transport system, asked us to design and manufacture a dry type transformer with the highest rating of its kind in the country.

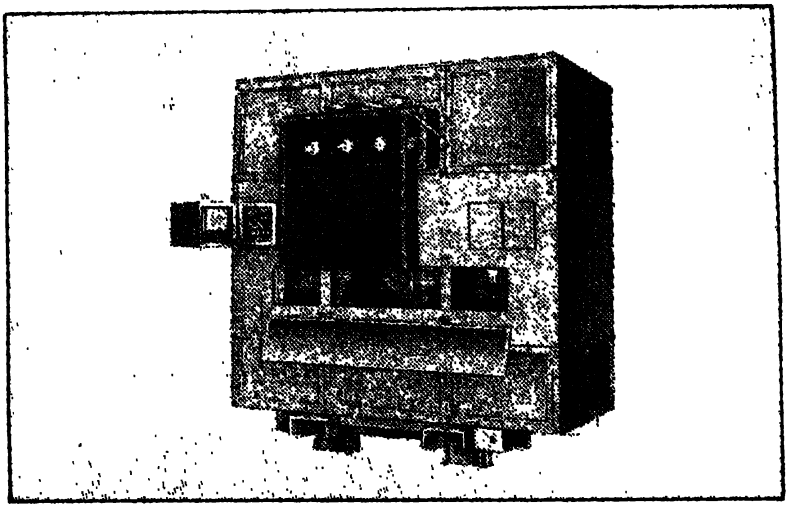
Their brief was succinct: transformers play a critical role in the Metro system. Without them all loco-movement would come to a standstill. The closer a transformer is to a sub-station, the greater the energy savings. So they wanted our transformer located underground. It had to withstand highly fluctuating loads, have the most advanced standard of efficiency, be totally non-inflammable and require minimum maintenance.

Above all, they wanted it to be utterly reliable.

We are past masters at making transformers and delivered the Calcutta Metro order in 1984.

It was at this time that there was a deluge in Calcutta. Our transformer was totally submerged in water for 22 days. When the waters receded, the transformer was encrusted solid with silt and cement.

We brought the transformer back to our factory, cleaned the core coil assembly with water jets and dried it. The cement deposits however had hardened to the point where they could not be removed. Now for the moment of truth. No test in the world demanded that a transformer work after 22 days under water. Would our transformer take such an extraordinary beating and yet continue to function normally?



It did. It came through the ordeal by water by withstanding all high voltage tests successfully. We had not just made a conventional dry type transformer with the highest rating in the country but also with the greatest reliability. However, since the cement deposits on the windings would affect the cooling of coils, we replaced the old transformer with a new one.

But Kirloskar Electric is more than the sum of all the firsts it has earned over the years. We are India's leading industrial electrics and electronics company in the private sector. We make some of the finest standard AC and DC drives, transformers, welding equipment and systems, motorised gear units, equipment for defence, electronic control equipment, CNCs, etc. But the one single reason why we are the prime movers in our field is because the centre of gravity at Kirloskar Electric is the customer. Our hi-tech, engineering expertise, superior quality and reliability are all geared to anticipate and respond to his needs.

RUNNING OUT OF TRICKS

Is this the end for V.P. Singh?

A hollow Prime Minister· a hollow claim of a hollow majority—and an all too solid crisis. As the days inched towards the 7th of November when the National Front government would face a motion of confidence in the Lok Sabha, the only thing that was clear was that when India seemed in danger of being rocked by communal and caste-based violence, the country had no government.

It didn't have to be that way. On Monday, 22 October, Vishwanath Pratap Singh went on television to declare that he was, at last, prepared to stand up for secularism, regardless of the cost to his political career. Political observers interpreted the statement to mean that he would arrest Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) president L.K. Advani and halt his rath yatra. It was the only course open to Singh. All attempts to find a compromise had failed and even if he shirked the responsibility, there was little doubt that UP chief minister Mulayam Singh Yadav would place Advani behind bars once the yatra entered his state.

The Raja's TV address was seen as a grand gesture. It was expected that he would arrest Advani early the next morning, that the BJP would then withdraw support, and the Prime Minister, in turn, would cast himself as a martyr to secularism and submit his resignation.

That scenario was only partly accurate. Yes, Advani was arrested and the BJP did pull the plug on the National Front/Janata Dal government. But strangely, it was the Raja—that self-proclaimed reluctant Prime Minister—who sprung a surprise. Even after the BJP's Atal Behari Vajpayee had formally informed the President that his party was withdrawing support, V.P. Singh decided to cling on.

He told an astonished President R. Venkataraman that he thought he could still prove his majority on the floor of the Lok Sabha and saw no reason to resign. His assertion defied both logic and mathematics and so, to back it up, V.P. Singh's supporters put it about that scores of Congress and BJP members were ready to defect and would risk disqualification from Parliament in an effort to keep the Raja in office.

For a normally shrewd politician, this was a childish claim to make. So was V.P. Singh's other assertion: that he would ask for a vote of confidence on the decision to arrest Advani. The BJP would naturally vote against him but the Congress, terrified of seeming communal, would abstain, giving the government a comfortable majority. Within a day, a Congress spokesman had pointed out that a motion of no-confidence would—according to parliamentary procedure—be taken up before any other motion, including the vote of confidence on the Advani issue. And that the Congress would vote against V.P. Singh in any case—even if it was a motion of confidence.

DEVI LAL

At week's end, the hollow claim of a majority having been exposed, V.P. Singh was singing a different tune. Now, he conceded that he would lose but argued—even more bizarrely—that he was clinging to office because he wanted to bring the arrest of Advani before Parliament. Why, asked an interviewer from The Times of India, did he still talk in terms of majority support? V.P. Singh had his answer ready: "My formulation (to the President that I will prove my majority) was perhaps not a very happy one. But what I really wanted was to present this issue to Parliament."

It was another hollow explanation and concealed the real motive behind the Prime Minister's actions: a determination to keep Chandra Shekhar from succeeding him. That was why he was clinging on to an office that he had no real right to. And that was why India was without a legitimate or effective government during this grave crisis.

For weeks now, an alternative scenario has been making the rounds. It is no secret that Chandra Shekhar, Devi Lal and Mulayam Singh Yadav have little faith in V.P. Singh. Others, such as Ajit Singh, Biju Patnaik and Chimanbhai Patel, have been content to sit on the fence, demonstrating no particular enthusiasm for V.P. Singh. That has left the Prime Minister with the support of the casteists (Ram Vilas Paswan and Sharad Yadav), the Arun Nehru faction (which appears to have run out of options) and assorted political non-entities (George Fernandes, Jaipal Reddy, P. Upendra, Madhu Dandavate, etc.).

Suppose now that the fence-sitters went over to the anti-VP brigade. That would give the dissidents enough MPs to split the party (under the Anti-Defection Act, they need a third) and to form a government with Chandra Shekhar as Prime Minister—with the support of the Congress(I).

The scenario had evoked much speculation even before the BJP withdrew support. With V.P. Singh reduced to a lame duck, it seemed the logical course of action. Except that now there might be no need for a split—the united Janata Dal might well agree to elect Shekhar leader.

V.P. Singh knew that had he resigned after arresting Advani, the President would have asked Rajiv Gandhi, as the leader of the largest party in the House, to try and form a government. Rajiv would have, in all probability, responded that he didn't want the job but would back a Chandra Shekhar-led Janata Dal government. By hanging on, he prevented this from happening. He wanted to lose his vote of confidence and then call elections.

That was what all the talk of "principles" really amounted to.

Predictably, the attention shifted to Shekhar as soon as Vajpayee told the President that the BJP was withdrawing support. Newsmen and MPs thronged the Janata Dal strongman's sprawling government house in Delhi's South Avenue Lane and urged Shekhar to openly call for V.P. Singh's resignation.

RAJESH KUMAR
CHANDRA SHEKHAR

Shekhar was not having any of this. "I do not believe in celebrating the misfortune of others," was all he would say. Did he want to be Prime Minister? Shekhar was too experienced a politician to give a categorical reply.

His supporters, however, suffered from no such compunctions. While their leader confabulated on the telephone with the likes of Mulayam Singh Yadav and Chimanbhai Patel, three of Shekhar's closest aides took on the job of briefing the press. Kamal Morarka, the personable young Bombay industrialist who is also treasurer of the Janata Dal, made it clear that he thought that the President should ask V.P. Singh to prove his majority and not wait for a Lok Sabha session. Harmohan Dhawan, who recently resigned as secretary of the Janata Dal, asked V.P. Singh to step down and Yashwant Sinha, the former IAS officer who functioned as the Janata Dal's most articulate spokesman on TV during the elections, made it clear that he thought that Shekhar would be the next Prime Minister.

In fact, it was not so simple. The vast majority of Janata Dal MPs were still out of town; the party's fence-sitters had still to indicate a preference; Mulayam Singh Yadav refused to take any political decision until after the kar seva in Ayodhya; and Devi Lal was touring Maharashtra.

But when the Tau returned, he did nothing to boost Shekhar's prospects. Recognising that Devi Lal was an unreliable commodity, Singh had done everything possible to win him over. He had been assisted by Ranjit Singh, the Chaudhary's younger son, who has always feared that Chandra Shekhar prefers Om Prakash Chautala, Lal's elder son, to him. The Raja sent a special IAF plane to fetch Devi Lal (leading the Congress to ask why the air force should be used to help settle the Janata Dal's squabbles). Ranjit Singh flew back with his father and persuaded him that V.P. Singh deserved his support.

Early on the morning of Wednesday, 24 October, Lal drove straight from the airport to the Prime Minister's residence at Race Course Road. The two leaders remained closeted for what must have seemed like eternity to Chandra Shekhar. After the meeting, nobody was willing to disclose what had transpired, but obviously the Raja had succeeded in selling his case to the Tau. For, speaking to the media soon after the heart-to-heart, Lal declared his unhappiness at the idea of changing horses in the middle of the race ("Beech raaste mein ghoda nahin badalte").

The Tau, for the moment at least, was on VP's side. But the dissident camp—though disappointed—did not lose heart completely. After all, wasn't the Chaudhary famed for his abrupt volte-faces, executed without the least sign of embarrassment?

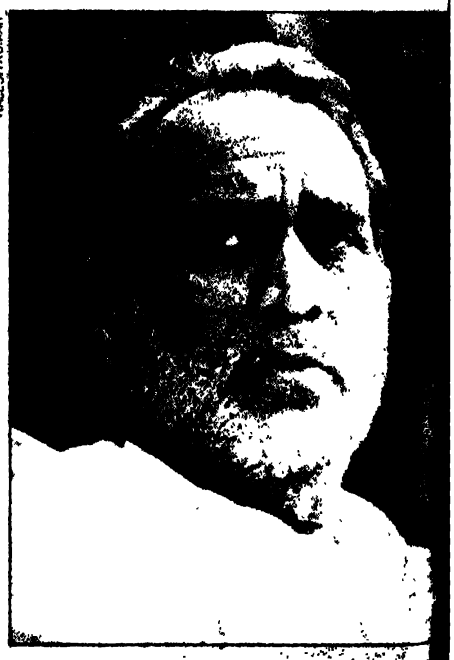
The confidence of the rebels wasn't entirely misplaced. A day later, Lal had changed his stance. Yes, it wasn't politic to change horses when the race was only half-way through, he clarified, but nobody disputed that you could change the rider.

But who would the former deputy prime minister prefer to see in the saddle? The signals that emerged from Lal's Willingdon Crescent residence were confusing, to say the least. Initially, while Chautala had been less than keen on the Raja, Ranjit Singh had convinced the Chaudhary to support V.P. Singh. But now Ranjit indicated, in private conversation at least, that he wasn't averse to the idea of his father having a shot at the prime ministership. Since he appeared to be the current court favourite, political observers took this to mean that Lal was in the fray.

None of the members of the parliamentary party, the argument went, was keen on the Raja continuing at the helm, because of his stated preference for a mid-term poll. The Prime Minister had refused to offer his resignation only because he wished to lose the confidence motion on the floor of the House and recommend its dissolution. In that event, he would lead the party to the next general elections as the caretaker PM and,

Shekhar vs the Raja

It's a battle of personalities, not issues



Obsessive. That's the word which best describes the relationship between the leader of the Janata Dal Parliamentary Party and its chief sulker. And it is this relationship which could well determine whether India goes to the polls yet again in a year's time or the country gets a new Prime Minister and Parliament a new lease of life.

The animus between Chandra Shekhar and his fellow Thakur, the Raja of Manda, goes back to the days when the various opposition parties were being cobbled together to form the Janata Dal. V.P. Singh, for reasons which were then unclear, decided to keep Shekhar out of the power game. Ajit Singh was appointed party president and the veteran Janata leader was told that there was no significant post for him as his party's quota had been exhausted.

One of the reasons advanced for V.P. Singh's decision was that Shekhar, a UP Thakur leader, could threaten the Raja's votebank. Hence, it made political sense to keep him out in the cold. And deprive his supporters of tickets when the parliamentary polls came along. V.P. Singh, never one to miss a trick, did just that, hoping to eclipse Shekhar's political influence.

Shekhar had his revenge, with the 75th birthday rally of Chaudhary Devi Lal at the Boat Club lawns. The bearded Janata leader went all out to project the Tau as the undisputed leader of the Dal and, by extension, a candidate for the prime ministership. As expected, the move went down ill with the Raja, who began attempts to wean away Shekhar's supporters to get his own back.

With great success. VP managed to win the Chaudhary over to his side soon after the election, doing a deal with him to deprive Shekhar of a chance to stand for the post of party leader (read Prime Minister). Shekhar walked out of the meeting with luck, his caste calculations would ensure his comeback, this time with a clear-cut majority.

Unfortunately, none of the other MPs shared this perception. They believed that the Raja's misgovernance and the various crises their party had created had disillusioned the electorate beyond measure. And if elections were held, none of them had much chance of retaining his parliamentary seat. It was, therefore, in their interest to keep the National Front government going, for as long as possible.

And if that meant that VP had to go, so be it.

The Devi Lal camp intended to capitalise on this feeling in its bid for a change of leadership. What made its task easier was the Raja's intense dislike of Chandra Shekhar, who had emerged as one of the contenders. If handing over charge became inevitable, went the Raja's reasoning, then he'd much rather have Devi Lal succeed him than Shekhar. So, if a contest did come about, then the Raja would get his loyalists to vote for the Tau.

Shekhar was not unaware of this, or of the fact that whatever the Chaudhary might say to him in private, he was a very unreliable ally. The Janata leader's supporters, therefore, lobbied with such party stalwarts as Mulayam Singh Yadav, Biju Patnaik, Arun Nehru and Ajit Singh in the hope of winning them over. Gossip in Delhi's political circles had it that Shekhar had managed to win over 40-odd MPs and needed another 20 before he would stake his claim. But any mention of numbers was more than suspect in the highly fluid political situation.

It was easier to speculate how the various leaders—and their factions—would vote if the leadership was contested. It was considered relatively easy to predict which way Mulayam Singh would swing. He'd always been an admirer of Shekhar's and the Raja hadn't exactly endeared himself to him by depriving him of his to head straight for his Bhondsi farmhouse, emerging only to announce that he wouldn't accept any post in the Dal government.

The Raja's suspicions about Shekhar's intentions, however, persisted. And the IB was asked to keep a close watch on his activities, while his telephones were bugged to pre-empt any revolt he might try to stage. Shekhar raised a stink through an interview to The Illustrated Weekly of India, embarrassing the Raja, who prided himself on his "value-based politics".

Hostilities assumed a graver dimension when V.P. Singh transformed himself into the Raja of Mandal. The nationwide stir that followed gave Shekhar his cue. And with the support of Devi Lal, who had by then been sacked by the Prime Minister, dissident activity resumed with greater vigour than ever before.

Shekhar, however, persisted in his refusal to attack the Raja personally. He did everything short of that to discredit him in the public eye. His supporters, including Yashwant Sinha, Harmohan Dhawan and Kamal Morarka, were put on the job. But the Raja proved more than equal to the task, getting the party to pass confidence motions in his favour every time a breath of criticism touched him.

He never forgave Chandra Shekhar, though. And when the BJP finally withdrew support from the National Front government, V.P. Singh wasn't so much concerned about safeguarding his own position as he was about keeping Shekhar out at all costs. Even if he looked unmistakably like a limpet, in the bargain.

Shekhar's stand wasn't very dissimilar, either. His was also a one-point programme, summed up by the acronym ABVP—Anybody But VP. It didn't matter that Devi Lal might well win a fresh election to the post of party leader; as long as the Raja went, all was well with Shekhar.

And in this battle of personalities, nobody was around to rue the fact that the issues had been lost sight of completely.

moment of glory—having Advani arrested before he could enter Uttar Pradesh.

Ajit Singh, true to his image as the flip-flop man of the Janata Dal, began by sending an emissary to every camp, promising his support. But half-way through, he appeared to have given up on the Raja, walking out of the Cabinet Committee on Economic Affairs meeting on the grounds that a government which had lost majority support had no business taking policy decisions.

The industry minister's options were rather limited in the circumstances. He couldn't afford to let Devi Lal become Prime Minister for fear of losing Jat support in western UP. Given a choice between a lowly minister and the PM himself, the Jats would opt for the latter.

That left only Chandra Shekhar, and Ajit sent over his trusted lieutenant Rashid Masood to the rebel leader, to open negotiations.

What complicated matters in Ajit Singh's case, however, were his delusions of grandeur. With some help from Arun Nehru, he was trying hard to emerge as the consensus candidate for the PM's post—or, at the very least, deputy prime minister. Realising the hopelessness of the task, Nehru soon withdrew, but the industry minister wasn't willing to give up quite so easily.

Arun Nehru, along with such camp followers as Arif Mohammad Khan, seemed to have adopted a policy of wait and watch. And it was thought that he would turn whichever way the wind appeared to be blowing. Shekhar loyalists, however, seemed sure of his support, disclosing that the commerce minister would keep his promise of supporting VP on the 7th—and come over to their side the day after.

Meanwhile, the Prime Minister was straining every sinew to effect a compromise: with the dissidents, the BJP and even the Congress. When his exhortations to partymen to unite in this hour of need didn't work, the Raja began talking of developing a secular axis. When observers interpreted this as an SOS to the Congress, V.P. Singh turned all coy and refused to acknowledge that he'd made any such appeal. Then, minister of state for home affairs Subodh Kant Sahay was put on the job of placating the BJP. Sahay sought a meeting with A.B. Vajpayee, while Doordarshan was roped into the task of creating the impression that the Raja was pro-Muslim.

The Intelligence Bureau (IB) report which spoke of Hindu consolidation was partly responsible for the change of strategy. Scared that he would be left with only minority support, V.P. Singh got Doordarshan to clarify that Prophet Mohammad's birthday was not a national holiday and that the Dal government had not given any money to Imam Bukhari for the restoration of

COUNTDOWN ■ To the Raja's worst crisis ever

Monday, 22 October: The Prime Minister goes on television to announce that he is prepared to make the supreme sacrifice in the cause of secularism. The address to the nation is interpreted as the Raja's way of announcing his imminent resignation after the arrest of Advani and the withdrawal of support by the BJP.

Tuesday, 23 October: BJP president L.K. Advani is arrested at 6.30 in the morning at Samastipur. A.B. Vajpayee takes the morning flight to Delhi from Calcutta to consult senior party leaders on the future course of action. At around 10.30 am, Vajpayee calls on the President to deliver a formal letter withdrawing support from the National Front government. The Raja, however, tells Venkataraman that he will prove his majority on the floor of the House and refuses to resign.

Wednesday, 24 October: After consulting senior Janata Dal leaders and his Cabinet colleagues (at the political affairs committee meeting), V.P. Singh asks the President to call an emergency session on 7 November. Venkataraman accedes to the request and issues a communique to this effect. The BJP and the Congress, however, oppose the move to summon the Lok Sabha and insist that the President either dismiss V.P. Singh or he resign of his own accord.

Thursday, 25 October: The JD dissidents gear up to force a fresh election for the party leadership. But Devi Lal—who has been carted back to Delhi by a special IAF plane—comes out in favour of the Raja, putting a damper on their plans. While Chandra Shekhar fobs off persistent newsmen, the Dal severs its links with the BJP in Rajasthan and Gujarat as a retaliatory measure.

Friday, 26 October: Maneka Gandhi's resignation from the council of ministers is rumoured to be the first of a series of such resignations. The dissident

But the time for such ploys was over.

As matters stood, one of several things could happen. The most obvious scenario, of course, was that the Raja would manage to carry the day at the National Front meeting. Once the MPs expressed support in his leadership, VP would go to the Lok Sabha to seek a vote of confidence. With Speaker Rabi Ray insisting on a one-line motion, the PM wouldn't get the opportunity to deliver his spiel on secularism and his commitment to that noble ideal. The motion would go to vote right away.

Assuming that the Raja loses the vote of confidence, as seems inevitable, he will recommend to the President that the House be dissolved. VP will then lead the country into the next parliamentary poll as caretaker PM.

Remaining caretaker Prime Minister is crucial to V.P. Singh's strategy. After Mandal, his best bet is the backward vote—hence the concerted efforts to woo the Bahujan Samaj Party (BSP) president Kanshi Ram—and the Raja knows all too well that he can only get the backwards to vote if he controls the government machinery.

The President, however, is not bound to take the advice of the head of a minority government who has lost the confidence of the Lok Sabha. So, Venkataraman would be well within his rights to call upon the leader of the single largest party, Rajiv Gandhi, to form an alternative government.

Were such an eventuality to arise, the Congress president could exercise either of two options. One, he could accept Venkataraman's offer and form the government, with outside support. About 40 MPs of the Dal (a third to prevent disqualification under the Anti-Defection Act) could well defect to the Congress, if the party promises to give them tickets for the next election.

Gandhi could then ask for a month or so to prove his majority and spend the interim period in bringing the law and order situation in control and winning the confidence of the people. Once things had settled down a trifle, Rajiv could ask that Parliament be dissolved on the grounds that he could function better with a fresh mandate.

The advantage of adopting such a course is that Gandhi would be caretaker Prime Minister when the polls are held and would thus be in control of the electoral process. The disadvantage is that given the current political situation—Mandal Commission, Ram Janmabhoomi, etc.—he would have to take certain tough political decisions, which might spoil his chances at the hustings.

However, the Congress would not consider it expedient to allow fresh elections just yet. For one thing, Gandhi would have to take a stand on Mandal and Ayodhya, instead of waf-camp derives cheer from this, as from the visit of Chandra Shekhar to the President. While Shekhar refuses to divulge what he discussed with Venkataraman, speculation is rife that he had asked the President not to accede to VP's request for a mid-term poll.

Saturday, 27 October: The Janata Dal ministers rally around the Prime Minister, maintaining that the Raja's leadership was not negotiable. The Prime Minister calls MPs to his house for tea and P. Upendra briefs mediamen to the effect that 100 members expressed support for VP's leadership. The dissidents, however, keep up their efforts, with Shekhar hinting at his daily press conference that the 4 November meeting of the National Front would elect a new leader.

Sunday, 28 October: The government cracks down on the kar sevaks, arresting 3,000 people in Ayodhya. The Rajmata of Gwalior, Vijayaraje Scindia, is arrested at Chitrakoot as are several other prominent BJP leaders. The dissidents hold a press conference to clarify that all those who had tea with the PM the day before were not his supporters, and claim that the government was using Doordarshan to spread disinformation. But the situation remains as confused as ever, with both Shekhar and Devi Lal being held out as alternatives to VP.

Monday, 29 October: Ayodhya takes over from the Raja as far as newspaper headlines are concerned, with pitched battles being fought on the streets between kar sevaks and the police, while a red alert is sounded in UP. The Prime Minister, in a significant comedown from his earlier stand, hints that he might step down if the BJP and the VHP agree to abide by the court verdict on Ram Janmabhoomi. But only if one of his men—Madhu Dandavate, for instance—is chosen party leader in his stead.

Vijayaraje Scindia

Tuesday, 30 October: Hindu fundamentalists enter the Ram Janmabhoomi/Babri Masjid complex and damage the disputed structure. They manage to hoist saffron flags atop the domes of the Masjid. Violence breaks out in six states, resulting in at least 35 deaths. V.P. Singh renews his offer to step down "in the interests of the country".

Upendra's poodle

Apply, apply, tell another lie

Television autonomy, it now turns out, was just another contradiction to be managed. And, to the Raja's credit, he's managed to do just that. If Doordarshan was better described as Rajivdarshan during the days of the Congress regime, it has now taken the appearance of the PM's personal propaganda machine.

Thus, when the BJP withdrew support from the National Front government, television news bulletins seemed to take the cue from Dal president S.R. Bommai in treating the episode as a "grave situation" rather than a "crisis". No mention was made of the demand for the Prime Minister's resignation.

This kind of skewed view was well in keeping with the traditions of Mandi House, but what followed made the worst excesses of the Congress fade into insignificance. The national news reported the PM's tea party to which all party MPs had been invited. And the brief of the information and broadcasting minister, P. Upendra, which had that as many as 100 members had expressed support for the Raja, received prominent coverage.

The truth was somewhat different. Only 60-70 MPs had turned up—of which a fair number were Rajya Sabha members—and at the gathering, five dissidents (Chand Ram, Kapil Deo Shastri, Jay Prakash, Purshottam Kaushik and Hemendra Singh) had even asked for the PM's resignation! Of course, P. Upendra conveniently forgot to mention this small matter at the official briefing.

The dissidents held a press conference at the residence of Kalyan Singh Kalvi to give their side of the story. But by then, the damage was done

Disinformation—though bad enough—wasn't all. Upendra, realising only too well that his political well-being lay in the survival of the Raja, pulled out all stops in an attempt to give the PM's image a fresh Teflon coating. Unfortunately, in keeping with the minister's general level of incompetence, the moves were amateurish at best and transparent at worst.

The Prime Minister was hauled on to television every night to address the nation on the grave situation in the country. And in an attempt to disprove the canard that he was the first Prime Minister of India who didn't look you in the eye, VP stared goggle-eyed at viewers while on camera.

Eye contact, however, was all that he achieved. For nobody was buying all that nonsense about a piece of his heart dropping off, etc. And the move to appease Hindu sentiment by talking about his love for Ram and his desire for a temple in the god's honour (though not on the disputed territory) didn't work either.

In the end, V.P. Singh resembled nobody more than Indira Gandhi during the run-up to the Emergency. There were the same nightly addresses to the nation, the same self-righteous harangues to crowds which had the unmistakable air of being rented audiences and the same hunted look when the mask slipped.

There couldn't be a bigger comedown than that.

fling as he has been doing all this while. Also, while the reservation policy may cost the party the backward vote, Mulayam Singh Yadav may well walk away with the Muslims. But if the Dal was to continue in office for another year or so, its bungling would ensure the complete disillusionment of the electorate—and a landslide for the Congress.

That brings us to Rajiv Gandhi's second option. After asking the President for time, the Congress could well approach the rebel faction of the Janata Dal and promise its support if it wanted to form an alternative government. Since none of the Dal MPs wants a mid-term poll, a third could well split to form a new party, which would be supported in office by the Congress.

The contenders for the Prime Minister's post would be Chandra Shekhar and Devi Lal. Left to himself, Rajiv would prefer having the Tau in South Block, as he seems programmed to self-destruct. But at a crunch, he could well support Chandra Shekhar.

This scenario, however, could unfold at the National Front meet itself. If a contest for leadership of the party were to be held, the Raja could lose to either Devi or Shekhar. In such an event, the new leader could well win the vote of confidence, with support from the Congress and the BJP, both of which don't want elections and would support a Janata Dal government, provided it wasn't headed by Vishwanath Pratap Singh.

Alternatively, the Dal could vote in a consensus candidate such as Mulayam Singh Yadav or Biju Patnaik as party leader in the hope that his leadership would be more acceptable. The Raja, however, is very keen that one of his loyalists—Madhu Dandavate is the name mentioned most often in this connection—get elected in his stead. But such an eventuality seems unlikely at the present. Or, as Vajpayee suggests, a national government could be formed at the Centre to tide over these difficult times—though it is difficult to see how the left and the BJP could be part of the same government. But then, contradictions, as the Raja is so fond of saying, exist only to be managed.

The possibilities, then, are immense. As is the uncertainty. The only thing beyond doubt is that this situation cannot last—not if the country is to survive. •

Fall from grace

The rath yatra and its accompanying rhetoric have debunked L. K. Advani's credentials as a national leader

Not very long ago, Lal Krishan Advani was perceived by most educated Indians as one of the tallest figures in our political firmament. He was widely regarded as being erudite, articulate and the very epitome of sobriety; in a word, a model of statesmanship. At one stroke, Mr Advani's rath yatra, its accompanying rhetoric and fanfare, its ultimate objective (which undoubtedly was to construct a temple even if it entailed the demolition of an existing mosque) and his inevitable arrest have together conspired to destroy that perception and debunk Mr Advani's credentials as a national leader, as opposed to a purely sectarian one.

But, it is not Mr Advani's fall from political grace alone that those who conceived the rath yatra have to atone for. The rath yatra and the foremost priority accorded to the construction of the Ram Janmabhoomi temple in the BJP's political agenda have revealed that the party's think-tank is incapable of providing the party with an imaginative platform that affords solutions to the challenges posed to the modern Indian Republic. The BJP has instead chosen to plump for its age-old Hindu revivalist tradition; but in this its latest invocation of that tradition, it has sought recourse to the most irrational paraphernalia.

Consider the elements that together constituted the BJP's travelling road show—a mythological epic, obsolete armoury, such as chariots and trishuls, frenzied communal slogans and yes, even a macabre ritual in which Mr Advani was weighed against blood! By defining its political agenda in terms of its pristine tradition and expressing it in such atavistic and excessively ritualistic terms, the BJP may undoubtedly have earned for itself the plaudits of its faithful hardcore, but it is unlikely that the party would have either endeared itself to its communally more temperate members or won for itself new adherents who may have been attracted by the party's ethos of discipline and consistency, while being repelled by the discord and cacophony in the Janata Dal as also the intellectual confusion and puerile one-upmanship of Rajiv's Congress.

It is difficult to comprehend why the party chose to pull the rug from under the National Front government's feet on an issue as controversial and divisive as the Ram Janmabhoomi movement. Mr Advani's own statements during the course of his rath yatra indicate that there was at least some uneasiness in his mind about the strategy he and his party had embarked upon. His attempted justifications for the strategy are singularly unconvincing.

When Mr Advani first commenced his rath yatra his answer to critics who contended that it would result in communal strife was that, on the contrary, the rath yatra was designed to promote national unity. Conscious that since Lord Ram was a Hindu deity and that accordingly, he would be equating nationalism with Hinduism, Mr Advani took care to mention that all inhabitants of India including Muslims ought to hold Lord Ram in reverence since he was one of the foremost figures of the country's cultural heritage. In other words, Mr Advani would have the nation believe that the essential unity of all its people was founded on the Ramayan.

Mr Advani himself would un-

Conscious that Lord Ram was a Hindu deity and that, accordingly, he would be equating nationalism with Hinduism, Advani took care to mention that everybody, including the Muslims, ought to hold Lord Ram in reverence. In other words, he would have the nation believe that the essential unity of all Indian people was founded on the Ramayan doubtedly admit that there may be dissidents to this view. For one thing, it is eminently reasonable to revere Lord Ram on the basis of his conduct set out in the Ramayan and yet be somewhat sceptical about the fact of his actual existence. Secondly, those imbued with the rationalist spirit may well be of the view that if nationhood consists in a common history, then why seek recourse to events of doubtful historicity and which, in any event, would have occurred in some millenia BC? After all, this country's history is not totally bereft of glorious eras since the Ramayan. Indeed, ancient Indian history is replete with religiously neutral epochs of glory.

Would not, for instance, national unity in the modern Indian Republic, in which pluralistic social and religious life is a fact, be more effectively promoted by recalling the golden period of Kanishka, the Kushan king, the pomp and splendour of the Guptas, the benevolence of Ashoka, the cultural splendour of the Cholas and the great Vijaynagar empire? Surely, it is the prosperity of these golden periods of our ancient civilisation that should be the goal which a destitute country ought to be yearning and striving for.

Appealing to a nation consisting of several insecure minorities on the basis of a religious epic is hardly a prescription for forging unity. In opting for Ram Janmabhoomi, Mr Advani may have at best unleashed an attempt at creating a Hindu consciousness; it is to be doubted, however, whether the movement could have ever generated political unity among Hindu, let alone national unity.

Indeed, Mr Advani is conscious that while the building of a temple at Ayodhya may be unobjectionable so far as the Muslims are concerned, the demolition of a mosque could hardly provoke their enthusiasm, involving as it does a question of competing rights of two religious communities. On the question of competing rights, his answer is that it is incongruous to compare Lord Ram with a foreign adventurer like Babar. But, even Mr Advani cannot be unaware that this argument is misleading. Babar's act of destroying a temple is undoubtedly reprehensible in the extreme, but the mosque that was erected in the place of a temple was not a mosque to commemorate Babar but the founder of Islam. Mr Advani has fought shy of categorically expressing his views as to whether he considers it legitimate to build a temple for a Hindu deity by destroying a mosque built for a Muslim one. Is recourse to Babar's vandalism permitted to rectify a historic wrong? Or, does Mr Advani believe that two wrongs make a right?

Mr Advani, being the intellectual that he is, is conscious of these logial inconsistencies. As the rath yatra progressed through Gujarat and Maharashtra, he invoked that great symbol of national integration—Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel—in support of his movement and its objectives. According to him, the late Sardar had encouraged the construction of a temple at Ayodhya.

Unfortunately for him, Sardar Patel's published letters disclosed no such intention on his part. On the contrary, the Sardar was against the construction of a temple at Ayodhya without the consent of the Muslims. Further, added the Sardar, if the Hindus insisted on building a temple at the site of the mosque without the consent of the Muslims, they would have to be stopped, for according to him, in the modern Indian Republic, law and order had to prevail. It is one of the tragedies of the rath yatra that its inherent indefensibility tripped up even an intellectually unflappable leader like Mr Advani.

Mr Advani's ultimate justification for his rath yatra was that it was a symbolic movement. It represented ultimately, he said, Hindu frustration with persistent Muslim appeasement. This was an admission that the rath yatra may not have been all that he had earlier said in favour of it, but was justifiable as an ultimate expression of Hindu ire. He repeatedly identified the cause of Hindu ire as being the enactment of the Muslim Women's Bill after the Supreme Court's verdict in the Shah Bano case, in which the court recommended that the time had come for the State to enact a uniform civil code as contemplated by our Constitution. This ultimate justification of Mr Advani must surely rank as the least defensible of all his pronouncements in favour of the rath yatra.

On Shah Bano, the Hindus were frustrated, if at all, by a Congress government under Rajiv Gandhi. There surely is a glaring injustice in venting anger on a ten-month old government which the BJP itself sustained in power, for the acts of commission of an earlier government. Mr Advani's arguments pertaining to symbolism amount to saying no more than that on account of their extreme displeasure with the actions of Rajiv's government, Hindus wish to inflict punishment on V.P. Singh's National Front one. Mr Rajiv Gandhi must surely have welcomed such convoluted logic.

Moreover, since the coming to power of the National Front government, the BJP has not once initiated a debate in Parliament or taken any legislative initiative on a uniform civil code. Mr Advani would have been on much stronger ground if he had tested the National Front government on the issue of a uniform civil code and withdrawn support on the failure of the Front to respond on that issue. Indeed, if the BJP was intent on toppling the National Front on a specific issue, it would have been much more prudent for it to have done so on the question of a uniform civil code

As champion of a uniform civil code, Mr Advani could have claimed that the BJP was taking the lead on an issue which enhanced Indian nationhood and promoted national integration. The issue is also in keeping with the needs of a modern Republic. It is devoid of Hindu ritualism and is rational in the extreme. It is religiously neutral, in that, it calls upon the Hindu as much as the Muslim to eschew traditional ways of life in the interests of a new 'national religion' which synthesises the best from all religions in the land.

In addition, Mr Advani may well have secured the support of Muslim reformists anxious to rescue those among their brethren most adversely affected by the rigours of personal law. Most importantly, he would have had the Constitution as well as the views of a full bench of the Supreme Court in his favour.

On Ram Janmabhoomi, Mr V.P. Singh was right, because he upheld the Constitution and the law. Sardar Patel's nationalist mantle fell on V.P. Singh and not on L.K. Advani. On a uniform civil code, the roles may well have been reversed. And, Mr Advani would have been spared the discomfiture of advancing a series of tortuous and misconceived arguments in support of his movement.

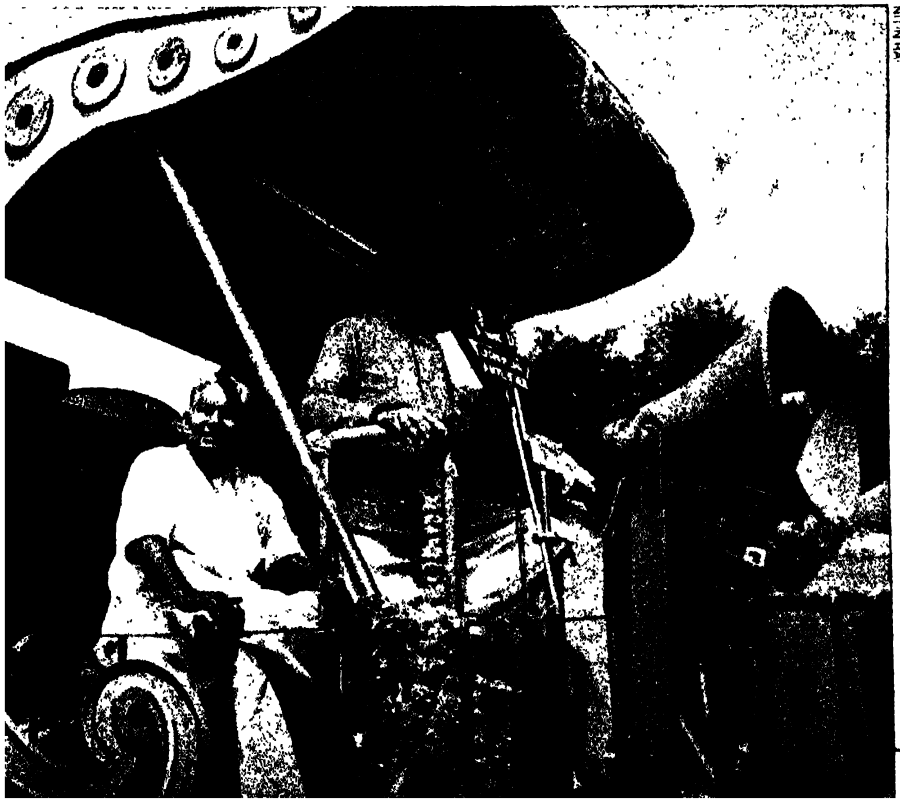
Whatever may have been Mr Advani's compunctions in withdrawing his party's support to the National Front government, the timing of his withdrawal was both ill-advised and unfortunate. Several crucial investigations, initiated by the present regime, into grave offences committed during the earlier Congress rule, had made considerable headway.

The Bofors investigation was on the verge of discovering the actual recipients of the money deposited in Zurich in an account held by AE Services, as also, the beneficiaries of a sixth account in Geneve.

In the St. Kitts investigation, from all accounts, a cast-iron prima facie case had been established by the evidence hitherto collected and had implicated international arms operators, luminaries of a marginal party in India and at least one leading dissident in the Janata Dal itself.

A telephone-tapping scandal of much greater dimension than the earlier one involving Mr Ramakrishna Hegde and implicating a more prominent political figure had been unearthed by the CBI. The Supreme Court was disposing off an important matter pending before it that pertained to an important issue concerning corporate morality and the accountability of public financial institutions and involving a Bombay industrialist well known for his hostility to the present Prime Minister. Several investigations and proceedings, which had been delayed owing to the granting of a stay by one particular bench of the Delhi High Court, were shortly to resume since the period of stay was nearing completion.

The last election was fought on the issue of probity in public life; even the BJP was, undoubtedly, a beneficiary—at least to some extent—of this issue. If V.P. Singh's government fails, the nation will never know the truth in all these matters. Mr Advani and the BJP will be at least partly to blame if only for the timing of their move.



Indeed, the accused in all these investigations being politicians and businessmen of enormous wealth and influence had earlier spared no effort to topple Mr V.P. Singh. All their attempts to cause dissention in the Raja's own party were a dismal failure. They will undoubtedly secretly thank Mr Advani for his well-timed move. Indeed, there are persons within Mr Advani's own party who are sympathetic to these powerful offenders and some of them were in the very forefront of the rath yatra. In the ultimate analysis, the nation might well ponder whether Mr L. K. Advani has not been the unsuspecting tool of a powerful lobby of political and economic offenders for escaping from the clutches of the law.

The BJP, no doubt, will persist in maintaining that its withdrawal from the National Front government was based on a question of principle and was forced upon it. The party's action on Ram Janmabhoomi has, however, highlighted that there exist two political options for all those who profess the Hindu faith, depending on which variant of the creed one pursues.

In its mystical, eclectic and tolerant form, Hinduism is a religion which best coexists with political liberalism, a constitutional democracy and with an exciting laissez faire in thought and action.

On the other hand, in its fundamentalist manifestion, it is politically comparable only with a rigid totalitarianism in which Hindu dogma must prevail over the law and the Constitution. Bal Thackeray at least makes no bones about his contempt for democracy; the BJP too would do well to shed its inhibitions and let the nation know where it really stands. •

L.K. Advani has fought shy of categorically expressing his views as to whether he considers it legitimate to build a temple for a Hindu deity by destroying a mosque. Is recourse to Babar's vandalism permitted to rectify a historic wrong? Or, does Advani believe that two wrongs make a right?

Storming the Masjid

Despite "foolproof" security measures, kar sevaks force their way into the disputed site

It was something he was determined to prevent. During the last fortnight, Uttar Pradesh chief minister Mulayam Singh Yadav did virtually everything he could to prevent the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP) from fulfilling their threat of starting construction of the Ram temple at the disputed Ram Janmabhoomi/Babri Masjid site on 30 October. About 52 companies of police and paramilitary forces had been positioned in and around Ayodhya and closed-circuit cameras monitored the movement of vehicles and men into the temple town. With the unprecedented security measures, the state government may have had reasons to believe that the threats that large numbers of kar sevaks would storm the Babri Masjid/Ram Janmabhoomi complex were empty. But as it turned out, Mulayam Singh Yadav—despite his promises—failed to prevent the dramatic and violent events of 30 October.

At around noon on 30 October, the stormtroopers of the VHP and its cohorts broke into the Babri Masjid. The three domes atop the mosque were damaged and a symbolic saffron cloth was wrapped around the spires embellishing the domes. A part of the outer wall of the masjid was also brought down. The entire operation, executed in just 15 minutes, left everybody baffled, because the general feeling was that even if the VHP demonstrated its strength on the occasion, the kar seva itself wouldn't be allowed at any cost. Even the vice-president of the VHP, S.C. Dixit, who incidentally was the superintendent of police in Faizabad district when the idols were placed in the Babri Masjid on the fateful night of 22 December, 1949, and rose to become the director-general of police in UP, was taken aback by the developments.

The mission was accomplished with the wholehearted support of the local people and the open connivance of the administration and the police, including the paramilitary forces, as was apparent to most onlookers. The first focal point was the two-kilometre long bridge over the Saryu river, which connects Ayodhya with the eastern districts of Gonda, Deoria, Basti, Varanasi and Azamgarh. It was through this point that the majority of the kar sevaks were expected to enter Ayodhya, apart from Raunahi on the Lucknow-Faizabad road. Two companies of paramilitary forces, including the Provincial Armed Constabulary (PAC) and the UP Home Guards, were deployed on the bridge.

The entry of the first group of kar sevaks was checked at around three in the morning. By five am, one bank of the Saryu river was already lined with sadhus and others, who had come for their morning dip in defiance of the curfew. As they raised slogans in favour of the Ram Mandir and against V.P. Singh and Mulayam Singh Yadav, they were spontaneously joined by the drivers of the state transport buses waiting on the bridge to take the arrested kar sevaks away. At around this time, nearly 15,000 kar sevaks, led by young boys and girls in jeans, pullovers and rucksacks who appeared more like trekkers, barged through the security cordon on to the bridge. The forces retreated initially, and let the first batch of a hundred inside. The cops took up positions once again, and after some initial hesitation, resorted to a mild lathi-charge. But a second group of people managed to storm in. They were older people, carrying suitcases and tiffin carriers, and many of them slumped half-way through the bridge in sheer exhaustion. Most of them were pilgrims who had come for the ritualistic parikrama that precedes the Karthik Purnima festival held in Ayodhya at this time of the year. To circumvent the order of the Allahabad High Court not to ban the parikrama in spite of the VHP's programme, the government had imposed indefinite curfew in Ayodhya. But since AIR and Doordarshan bulletins insisted that the parikrama was on, these pilgrims, many of who have even come from faraway places like Jammu and Bhatinda, took the risk of entering Ayodhya.

Of course, the pilgrims who managed to sneak in were openly sympathetic to the VHP cause. Said Shyama Handoo, a 45-year-old lady from Jammu, "I had to leave my home, my comforts in Srinagar after my daughters were assaulted by extremists. My house was looted and so many of my relatives were killed. When I was sent to a transit camp in Jammu, I was sure that I was being punished by Ram for my sins. That is why I have come to atone for them by doing the parikrama. But this government is not giving me a chance to do that even. But if I have to die I'd rather face bullets from Hindus than Muslims." Prabhakar Bhumkar, a Shiv Sainik from Bombay who walks on crutches, trudged all of 150 kms from Gonda to Ayodhya. "I am half gone, but I will lay down my life at Ram's feet and show the world how Hindus are being repressed by their own community," he said. The cops on duty dropped guard and started hanging around the people as they narrated their tales. "Harami ka aulaad (son of a bastard), this Mulayam Singh, making us arrest these people," muttered one UP home guard to another. A fiery young kar sevak from Thane called upon the cops to join them. His rhetoric had an instant effect on a PAC cop who shouted, "Jai Shri Ram". Five other cops joined him, and they all went to the river bank with brass pots to fetch water for the arrested persons. The women constables fell at the ladies' feet and pleaded with them to court arrest.The cops summoned the sadhus to the riverside to clandestinely escort the older men to the temple and enable them to join the kar sevaks. "Arrests? It is all one big farce. We don't have enough jails to house them. We'll take them to the outskirts of Ayodhya and then tell them to escape through the jungles," said a CRPF personnel. A BSF commandant, stationed outside the disputed site, later confirmed that the cops were only following the instructions that had been issued by the district heads: that a lathi-charge should be the ultimate resort, and that in the event of having to fire, the crowds should be given enough time to disperse to a distance of at least two kms.

THE SHOWDOWN

(From far left) Policemen keep vigil in Ayodhya; a television camera monitors people and vehicle movements; and, policemen resorting to a lathi-charge to disperse kar sevaks on 30 October

In the meantime, Faizabad, a town that has generally never reacted violently to happenings in Ayodhya, woke up to the incident in the neighbourhood. Virtually deserted the day before, people were out on the streets on 30 October once the bulk of the police force was despatched to Ayodhya to tackle the alarming situation. They stopped press cars to assure journalists that they would be present at the site for kar seva. According to Shri Krishna Singh, the editor of Hum Aap, there were two reasons for the popular ebullience. "When the canopy covering the shilanyas site was dismantled on the orders of the administration on the night of 23 October, there was a lot of resentment among the people. Even events like Advani's arrest didn't have the kind of emotional impact as this. Secondly, the curfew and the repressive kind of security arrangements strained people's nerves. They are not used to these things here. The last straw was the unofficial ban on the parikrama." Said Swami Hariyacharji of Shree Haridhan Gopal Mandir in Ayodhya, "The indirect ban was a direct hit on Hinduism because this parikrama has been going on from Vedic times. Even sadhus who had nothing to do with the VHP were nabbed by the police. This has turned the tide in favour of the VHP."

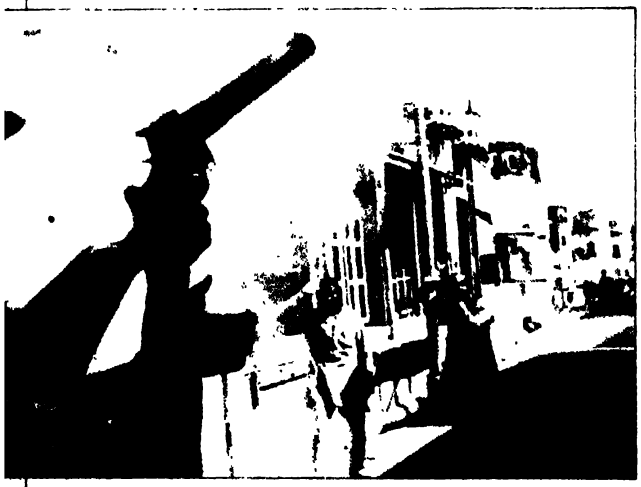
The first encounter between the kar sevaks and the forces took place before the crossing leading to one of Ayodhya's biggest temples, Hanuman Gaddi, near the Anand Bhavan temple. When the people began throwing bricks and stones, the cops first retreated then burst tear gas shells. And the first security ring crumbled when a state transport bus, carrying about 150 sadhus and other kar sevaks, crashed through an iron railing manned by a posse of cops. Baffled onlookers watched the bus storming its way to the site, even as the police belatedly tried to stop it. It was later learnt that this bus, which had been brought to arrest activists who had converged outside the Ashrafi Bhavan temple, some five or six kms away, was literally hijacked by VHP volunteers, the driver thrown out, and one of them, who knew driving, sped away with it. The entire security, which was declared as "foolproof," was reduced to a farce because with eleven close circuit TV cameras installed all over this town, the police heads were obviously aware of every single vehicle's movement. Why weren't orders to take the relevant steps issued to the security forces stationed on this particular route? The last barrier, leading to the temple, crumbled down effortlessly, and the kar sevaks marched into the masjid through every available nook and corner. This lot mainly comprised sadhus from Ayodhya who were thoroughly familiar with the topography of the site.

Inside the masjid there was an exchange of stones between the kar sevaks and the police. Even the Indo-Tibetan Border Force, which was positioned around the shrine and was known for its "non-partisan" credentials, shied away. Soon, the kar sevaks took over the area. Meanwhile, 5,000 more kar sevaks, who'd been stopped at the Anand Bhavan temple crossing, broke through the security ring, and stormed their way to the site. None of them were armed, though some were carrying crowbars and pickaxes.

Nritya Gopal Das, vice-president of the Ram Janmabhoomi Mukti Yagan Samiti, and Ashok Singhal, general secretary of the VHP, were among those who had squatted at the Anand Bhavan crossing. Singhal was reportedly mildly injured in a lathi-charge.



Finally, at noon the deed was done. Presspersons, who had assembled atop a house adjacent to the shrine, had a vantage view of the sadhus clambering up the shrine, shouting slogans and systematically breaking down the domes wth crowbars and axes. Not a single policeman was in sight. By this time, the administration had washed its hands of the show and begged Dixit to come immediately to the site and "control," his men. Dixit reportedly said it was too "late" and instead offered prayers at the shrine.

Dixit, who called an impromptu press conference inside the site, demanded that the government apologise to Hindus for causing "untold suffering" to the community by its "repressive measures". He said, "We will never forgive George Fernandes for cancelling so many trains coming into UP." He added that the episode was a "demonstration of people's power and not mob rule." When asked how he and Ashok Singhal had managed to hoodwink the police and enter Ayodhya, Dixit merely said, "If I disclose the scheme, a lot of senior government officials, who are good friends of mine, will be in trouble." It is reliably learnt that Dixit and Singhal had travelled with the editor of a Hindi daily from Lucknow, whose links with the RSS are well-known, on press passes. The kar sevaks remained in and around the site because Singhal had instructed them to besiege the place for two days, after which he said a further strategy would be chalked out. Although the administration made out that Ayodhya had been sealed and handed over to the army, all that really happened was the force staging a flag-march through the town.

In retrospect, the writing on the wall was clear on 28 October when the state police refused to fire on some 30,000 kar sevaks who had stormed into UP from across the MP border. Instead, the cops reportedly showered rose petals on them. Even before this, kar sevaks SUNDAY had interviewed in and around Ayodhya said their entry was possible only with the help of the police. And many constables candidly admitted that they would not attack devotees of Ram even if this meant losing their jobs. Yadav was fighting a losing battle from the start. As a senior police official said ruefully: "In such a surcharged atmosphere, our men can only play a very limited role."

The Hindu citizens of Faizabad and Ayodhya celebrated on the night of the 30th by lighting crackers and illuminating their homes. Large numbers of people gathered outside the civil hospital in Faizabad to donate blood to those injured in the lathi-charges and the firing. As for the Muslims, not a soul ventured out and the curfew hung like a pall of doom over the areas in which the community lives. With the VHP determined to continue kar seva and the threat of further marches on the mandir/masjid complex, Ayodhya promises to be in the grip of tension for a long while. ●

Quiet confidence

The BJP may go it alone in the event of a snap poll

Despite the arrest of prominent BJP leaders and thousands of kar sevaks as they march towards Ayodhya, an air of quiet confidence pervades the Bharatiya Janata Party's (BJP) national headquarters on New Delhi's Ashoka Road. The sense of frustration over the stalling of Advani's rath yatra has turned into an angry resolve to combat the party's new opponent—Prime Minister V.P. Singh. Here, in the refurbished party headquarters, a gameplan is being meticulously worked out—not just to decide what the party will do on 30 October and the crucial week that follows, but also how it will face the mid-term poll that seems imminent.

Party members point out that the decision to withdraw support to the government was neither sudden nor unilateral. "We had given a clear warning to the government that if Advaniji was arrested, and if the kar seva at Ayodhya was not allowed, we would be constrained to withdraw support," says BJP Parliamentary Party leader, Atal Behari Vajpayee. "As early as 1988, the party's national executive committee had decided in Palampur that the temple must be constructed," affirms party vice-president Sunder Singh Bhandari. "There has never been any ambiguity about the party's stand, every word has been crystal-clear," adds Dr J.K. Jain, an active BJP parliamentarian who shared Advani's rath during its Delhi sojourn. "Our decision to withdraw support was not impulsive. The Janata Dal was not kept in the dark, nor were our plans ambiguous at any stage," he adds. Jain explains that while the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP), the more militant affiliate of the BJP, had earlier scheduled the building of the Ram temple in February, it was only at the Prime Minister's behest that the programme was deferred by four months. "There is no evidence that the PM devoted even four seconds of thought in those four months to the issue," fumes Jain.

The BJP's decision to withdraw support to the National Front may have precipitated the worst political crisis for a ruling party in recent years, but what does it mean for the BJP itself? According to a senior member of the Cabinet, the BJP leadership was strongly divided against the move. Vajpayee, long considered to be a moderate in right-wing politics, repotedly warned his party workers that the decision could lead to a situation where the party's strengh in the House might fall from 86 to eight.

Whatever be the differences within the party, the BJP is adept at projecting a cohesive image of itself to the outside world. But has it overplayed its hand? Unless the political scenario changes drastically—and it well could—the BJP will not risk taking on strange bedfellows this time. In all probability, it will go to the polls alone. "The day we embarked on the rath yatra, we had an inkling that the consequential result would be mid-term elections," states Bhandari. "And the party is prepared for it." Adds party general secretary J.P. Mathur: "The BJP and the Janata Dal have gone too far apart to come together again. It is very possible that we will go it alone; we will not enter into an adjustment with the Congress(I), communist parties, or the Janata Dal led by Mr V.P. Singh. We will see that V.P. Singh is voted out."

Does that mean that the BJP is prepared to enter into an alliance with the Janata Dal, if there is a change in the leadership? "This is a hypothetical question," retorts Jain. "For the BJP, it is not the person but the policies that matter. If another leader takes a sensible course, we are not averse to changing our stand." Even Vajpayee, who has openly called for a mid-term poll, admits that he has done so only because there seems no other way to resolve the present crisis.

Vajpayee addressing a press conference: Long considered to be a moderate in right-wing politics, he reportedly told his partymen that the decision to withdraw support could bring down the BJP's strength in the House. But now he promises a big deal

The BJP is confident that it will be able to project itself as the only alternative to both the Congress(I) and the Janata Dal. "Unlike other political parties, we are quite modest while making public assertions," claims J.K. Jain. "But I would not be surprised if in the next election, Advani becomes the Prime Minister of this country."

While most BJP leaders are quick to declare that they have no fear of triangular contests others admit that it may not be smooth sailing. While both the Congress(I) and the Janata Dal are "tested failures", the BJP still has a chance, as it has never been in power. Even though "bad memories" of the Congress(I) rule persist, the party still commands a stable image to its advantage. On the other hand, the Janata Dal's dismal performance is balanced by the formidable caste combination it has worked out by virtue of the Mandal report. The BJP's strength lies in its "firm and forthright leadership," but this advantage is somewhat negated by the antipathy the Muslims have towards the party. "It all depends on who pushes whom to decide," says a senior BJP worker. "Certainly, there is a mass mobilisation on the mandir issue all over the country. That, and the repressive measures being used in Uttar Pradesh and Bihar will bring our party into focus, overcoming the caste factor."

A BJP leader says, "The yatra's sword-wielding hoodlums are no less dangerous than the Kashmiri youth shouting for azaadi"

The biggest challenge facing the BJP is not a revolt within its ranks but the task of convincing the electorate that it offers more than a Hindu theocratic state. Already, large advertisements have begun to appear in the press, explaining the party's stand, and underlining the present government's failure to deliver the goods. Overnight, the BJP catchword, "Hindutva", has been replaced by the more appealing, but ambiguous, "nationalism". "What does secularism mean?" asks one BJP ad, and goes on to say, "The BJP is deeply distressed at the disinformation campaign charging it of (sic) inciting communal passions."

The BJP leaders refuse to admit that they are abetting the rise of religious fanaticism that surfaced during the rath yatra. "The yatra's sword-wielding hoodlums were no less dangerous than the Kashmiri youth shouting for azaadi," admits a senior political leader. Yet, the party believes "the rath yatra gave a healing touch to an emotionally disturbed society." It claims that "the fact that there were no incidents of violence along the way is proof of the binding force of Hinduism and its message of unity."

The BJP ledership is overwhelmed by the response to the Bharat Bandh which the party called following Advani's arrest. But the success of the bandh may well have been due to fear, rather than the BJP's popularity. "The BJP cadre in most of the states where the bandh was a success (like in Andhra Pradesh and Karnataka) has never been enough to terrify the people, like the Naxals and the communists," argues a party leader. Given the political atmosphere in most states, much will depend on whether the BJP can provide the right political leadership, put up acceptable candidates and create an effective infrastructre for the elections. "In our case, the cadre is the basic strength, not caste," declares a party worker. He claims that during the past one month, the chief ministers of UP and Bihar, because of their repressive measures, have helped bring the people close to the party.

But being the cadre-based, disciplined party it is, the BJP may well take the electoral drubbing that political pundits forecast for it in its stride. At the moment, however, the party exudes confidene, knowing that its cadre-strength is growing by the hour, fuelled by the dangerous passions of majority communalism. ●

Moments of solitude

How Advani spends his days in confinement

Amidst hectic packing as they prepared to leave for Delhi, Pratibha Thadani, daughter of BJP leader L.K. Advani, spared some time to talk about her meeting with her father on 26 October at the fortressed guest house in Massanjore, Bihar.

"We didn't talk politics," says Pratibha, "we were concerned about his health." Moreover, she and her husband Kailash weren't allowed any privacy. "We spoke in Sindhi whenever we had something personal to discuss," the Thadanis say.

The drama of Advani's arrest was quite chaotic, says Pratibha. For example, the district magistrate was asked to make arrangements in Massanjore a few hours before the arrest. "There was no water on the first day," she says. And although Advani had a telephone, the calls were probably tapped and the leader had not spoken to politicians. Except for Laloo, of course—the CM who had arrested him. And the Prime Minister hadn't spoken to the country's most celebrated prisoner. "Not even a courtesy call," says Pratibha.

Ironically, Advani gets his newspaper at 1 pm and whiles away his time by watching television. "He believes that the PM is misusing the electronic media by not giving the BJP or the Congress(I) the chance to air their views," Pratibha says. "And his major apprehension is whether he will be allowed to attend the special session of the Lok Sabha on 7 November."

Apart from pondering over his immediate future, Advani has found time to catch up on his reading. Evidently his daughter took with her two novels by Sidney Sheldon as well as some chocolates. "He refused the VCR, though he is quite a video addict. He enjoys classics and political movies," says the dutiful daughter. "Of course he is also sleeping overtime."

And Kailash does not hide his pride: "As a father-in-law he is the best—very understanding and open to others' views." As this scribe prepares to leave, Kailash stumbles, and a glass breaks. Pratibha hurries to clean the mess. Her husband smiles. "It is a good omen," he observes. And we all hope it is—for him and for the country. ●

Suicide fever

What led so many students to burn themselves in protest against the Mandal report?

Outside the burns ward of Safdarjung Hospital, sit groups of parents huddled together, patiently waiting for some news of their children, all of whom had torched themselves in protest against the government's decision to implement the recommendations of the Mandal Commission. A mute testimony to the mindless, anti-Mandal frenzy that is currently sweeping north India.

So far, an astounding 160 people have attempted to commit suicide in north India between 19 September to 16 October. All of them were below the age of 25, and most of them were students who were expressing their anger at the government's policy of reservation. What's more shocking is that nearly all the desperados chose to set themselves on fire in full public view.

In Delhi itself, there have been 17 self-immolation attempts in just 26 days. Seven of them died: a toll that will undoubtedly go higher as more and more students find themselves drawn into an agitation that has captured the imagination of the people, an issue that makes headlines in newspapers almost every day.

The "suicide fever", as it came to be popularly known, struck every corner of north India—from the remote hamlets to the big towns, from Hoshiarpur in Punjab and Jaunpur in Uttar Pradesh to the capital cities of Patna and Lucknow. And, in almost all the cases the victims came from lower middle class families, were studying in government schools and district colleges or were unemployed and desperate for a job.

Even elitist Delhi was hit by the anti-Mandal wave. But while prestigious colleges in posh areas like St Stephen's,

RAJESH KUMAR

Rajeev Goswami in hospital

Hindu and Miranda took the lead in organising demonstrations, those who resorted to the extreme act were mostly products of either government schools in lower middle class colonies or of what is known as the "lower rung of colleges"—like Deshbandhu and Dayal Singh College.

Monica Chadha, a 19-year-old class XII student of a government school, set herself aflame in her one-room home in Greater Kailash when her parents and four sisters were attending an anti-Mandal meeting in the neighbourhood. Surinder Chauhan, a 24-year-old part-time student in Dayal Singh College, burnt himself to death in front of dozens of eye-witnesses outside his home in Kidwai Nagar. Chetan Gautam, a 14-year-old student of a government school in Shakarpur, a congested colony in East Delhi, succumbed to his burn injuries in hospital. The list could go on.

"It is students from this category—middle class—who feel the psychological impact of such a movement They are the street-fighters while the others are theoreticians. I will change my entire perspective on the issue the day a student from St Stephen's or Hindu feels compelled to commit suicide in such a heinous way," said Ashish Nandy, fellow at the Centre for the Study of Developing Societies. He added, "The issues involved are larger than the Mandal Commission. There is a sense of frustration and anger at the system, a feeling that the system has given them the false hope that education will give them better jobs." Elaborated eminent sociologist Veena Das of the Delhi School of Sociology, "There is a tremendous sense of betrayal by the state, even though the students have probably not calculated how many jobs and promotions the Mandal Commission would mean. This kind of a desperate action will, therefore, not take place amongst the really poor or the elite."

SHOOTER

It all began on 19 September when Rajeev Goswami, a third year student of Deshbandhu College, set himself ablaze in front of a crowd which included reporters and policemen. That was the beginning: what followed was a spate of attempted self-immolations in the capital and elsewhere. And while some preferred to display their emotions in public, others burnt themselves to death quietly.

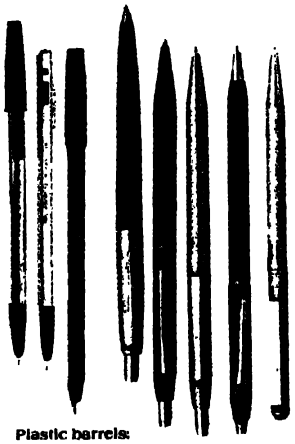
In all the cases, the students left behind suicide notes, some of which make interesting reading. Many even bordered on the melodramatic: like Surinder Chauhan's passionate appeal in hospital: "Agar mujhe pani mil jaaye to mein Mandal ayog ke khilaf bolna chahta hoon (I want a glass of water to speak against the Mandal Commission)." Some were vitriolic—like Sushil Kumar, a class X student of a government school in Pipli, who wrote: "Aur in sab ka zimmedar, tu hai VP tu (You are the only one responsible for this mess, VP)."

Others were aware that they were not doing the right thing. Sandeep Sharma, a student from Jammu who died instanteneously, wrote in his parting note: "Self-immolation is not good but I am doing this to inspire others." As Veena Das put it, "Every movement looks for its martyrs and some people—in this case, middle class students—are forced to become martyrs." Added Brinda Karat of the Janwadi Mahila Samiti, "These children have actually become martyrs of their struggle. And ironically, this is precisely what has also negated their struggle."

Brinda Karat is not entirely wrong. Since Rajeev Goswami's attempted suicide, protests and demonstrations against the Mandal report have virtually stopped. Public attention now centres around the victims, many of whom are battling for life in hospitals and nursing homes. The AIIMS-Safdarjung crossing in Delhi has been renamed Qurbani Chowk and students have even put up a board with the names of those who have committed suicide in protest against Mandal. The result is that the focus of the agitation has been completely lost. The spontaneous outburst of anger has given way to the glorification of self-immolation.



For most women's organisations, the episode is reminiscent of the sati incident. Said Karat, "It is the same kind of glorification. In sati, a woman is made to feel guilty for not dying. This is the same thing. You are creating an atmosphere where this kind of ghastly act is being glorified. And, even sati at one level is voluntary,isn't it?"

And everybody associated with the Mandal stir seems to have contributed to what Karat termed as "creating a conducive atmosphere for immolation". Even the parents. Take this incident. A family from Ludhiana came rushing to the Safdarjung Hospital, asking where Rajeev Goswami's father was. "We want to pay our respects to him," said the woman. And

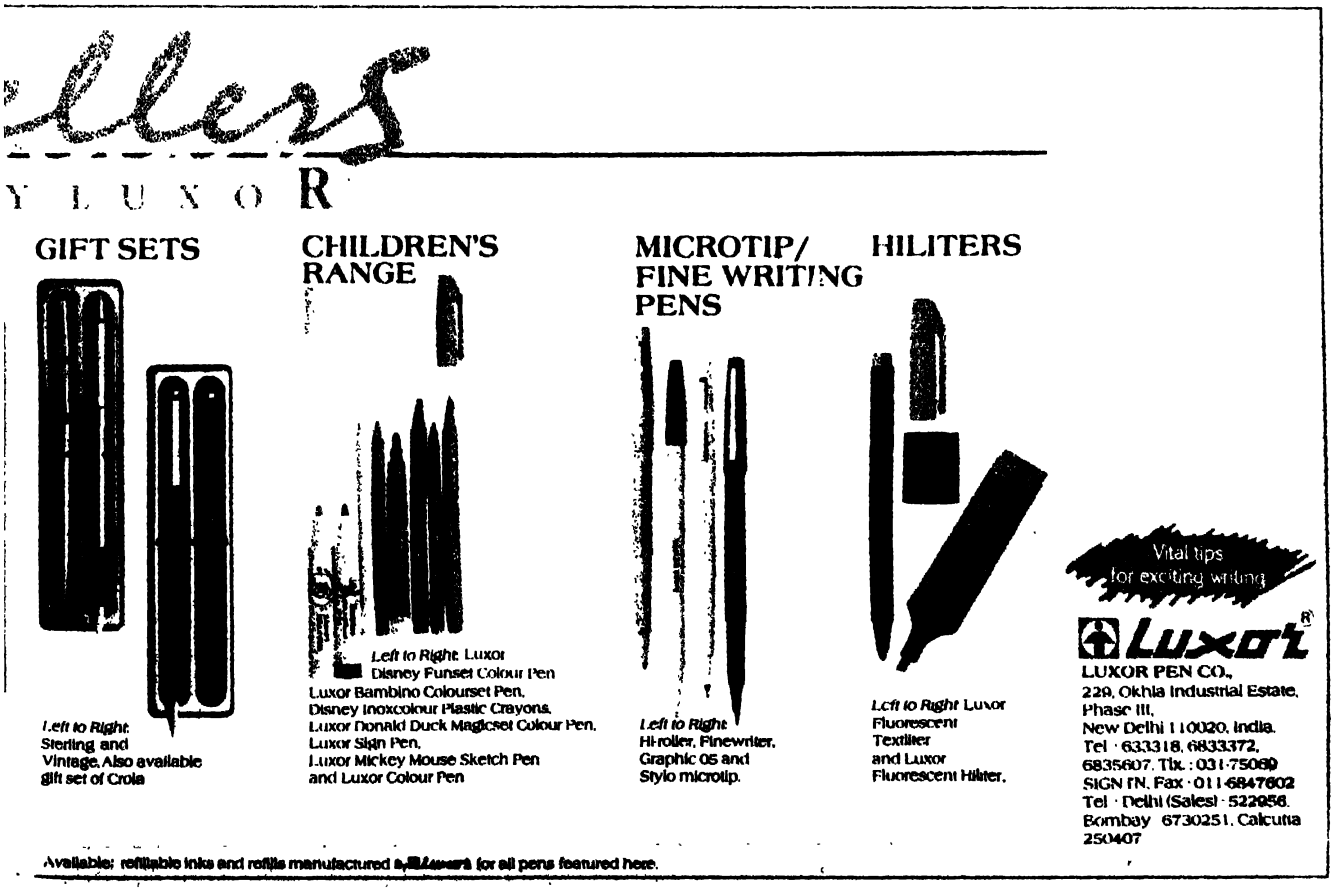
SHOOTER



Since Rajeev Goswami's attempted suicide, the spontaneous outburst of anger against the Mandal report has given way to the glorification of self-immolation after they traced Madan Lal Goswami, a clerk in the postal department, he was showered with praises. Watching on was K. Chadha, whose 19-year-old daughter Monica was also admitted with 90 per cent burns. The conversation now turned to glorifying the acts of their children. Monica's father even agreed to a student's suggestion that there should be a "rose garden" outside the burns ward of the hospital in the memory of everybody who has committed self-immolation. "We have only one request. That you take the first plant and get sister Monica to touch it," said the enthusiastic student and her father nodded in approval saying, "It's always a good idea to plant trees." "There is something definitely wrong when a student takes a photograph of a person burning rather than rescue him," said Nandy, referring to the pictures published in the media of Rajeev Goswami in flames surrounded by his fellow-students. "All the teachers and students are responsible for Rajeev's plight," Nandy added. Das was even more critical. "After all, let us not forget that burning has been used in Delhi for murder ever since 1984. It is not new."

While north India is still reeling under the impact of an agitation that has already taken many lives and which shows no signs of abating, instances of violence have increased since the immolation deaths. The students have become aggressive, venting their fury on everyone. Shukla, who has been pasting posters in the capital for the last 25 years, was beaten up by students who threatened to kill him the next time he was seen with a pro-Mandal poster. "They even broke my cycle. I have never seen anything like this," said a shaken Shukla.

Many people feel that such incidents are only an expression of the frustration that has already set in amongst the agitators. And it's only natural. For, the anti-Mandal stir today has lost its relevance and direction. The focus of attention now is no longer on the controversial recommendation of the Mandal Commission, but the scores of youths battling for life in the hospitals throughout the country. ●

SWEET MUSIC

The news would, perhaps, have made a bigger splash if the Congress(I) had been in power. But that didn't detract from the fact that eminent Carnatic vocalist M.S. Subbulakshmi was a deserving recepient of the Indira Gandhi Award for National Integration, instituted by the Congress in its centenary year (1985).

Former external affairs minister P.V. Narasimha Rao, chairman of the advisory committee, announced that the award would be given to the singer in recognition of her outstanding work in promoting national integration and understanding.

And that Congress president Rajiv Gandhi would do the honours by her on 31 October, Mrs Gandhi's death anniversary.

THE MACE OF LORD HANUMAN

He is either the eternal optimist or a glutton for punishment. For, after all the problems about the historical authenticity or otherwise of Tipu Sultan, Sanjay Khan plans to make yet more serials for Doordarshan.

While Akbar-i-Azam is still in the conceptualisation stage, the script for Jai Hanuman is already in the works. And if Khan has his way, the 26-part serial, with 45-minute episodes, will be ready in a year's time, with special effects by the San Francisco-based Industrial Light and Magic Company, which has worked on Steven Spielberg's blockbusters.

Sanjay Khan: glutton for punishment?

Says Khan: "Hanuman is a child's delight. He is the Indian Superman born centuries before the American Superman. The serial will narrate the Hanuman lore before he became a bhakt of Ram. The search is on for a newcomer in his early 20s—someone who is 6'1" with a 44" chest and large expressive eyes."

Yes, thank goodness, that does rule out Sanjay Khan.

Sunil Dutt: strategic retreat

FIGHTING FIT

Sometimes discretion is the better part of valour. Ask Sunil Dutt, Congress(I) MP from Bombay North-west.

During the Shiv Sena-sponsored bandh in Bombay on 24 October, Dutt decided to tour his constituency to get first-hand information about the law and order situation.

Things didn't seem too good, when the MP saw two youngsters on a scooter being pushed around by supporters of the bandh. Dutt immediately rushed to the rescue of the duo.

Only to become the target of the crowd himself. Shifting their attentions to the former film star, the people began throwing their fists around. Dutt managed to evade most of the blows, but one of them found its target: the member's lip, which began bleeding profusely. The window panes of his car were smashed by the mob, which was by now in a real frenzy.

Dutt hurriedly withdrew from the scene, he says, to prevent further deterioration of the law and order situation.

And lived to fight another day.

FRENCH WINTER

It's going to be a French winter for Indo-Anglian writer Upamanyu Chatterjee. For, the author of An English August will be married to a Paris-based student of political science, Anne Vaugier, this November.

The couple met in Delhi, where the lady was studying Hindi, and it didn't take long for true love to blossom. The marriage will be a simple registration ceremony, after which Chatterjee will go back to his duties as an IAS officer.

But, obviously, courtship cares haven't kept Chatterjee from working on his next book. Though, in the best traditions of the bureaucracy, he is very tight-lipped about the work. "It's about life," he says cryptically. Adding somewhat mysteriously that the protagonist is someone who goes through a series of bizarre experiences before being set free.

And no, Anne doesn't feature.

Arif Mohammad Khan: caught out?

LIAR!

[redacted] National Front ministers continue to have rotten luck on Khula Manch. The latest victim is Arif Mohammad Khan, Union minister for civil aviation.

Questioned on the evacuation of Gulf Indians, Khan had replied that "not a single paisa was charged from a single evacuee by the airlines (Air India)".

Not quite, retorted C.L. Anto, coordinator of the United Action Committee for Kuwait Evacuees. Said Anto: "I would categorically state that at least 5,000 evacuees paid for their passage after selling their valuables which they managed to retrieve while fleeing Kuwait.

Those who had no means of raising funds for their passage were forced to sign bonds."

While countries such as Bangladesh and Pakistan evacuated their citizens free of cost, Anto continued, Air India fleeced Indians by charging them Rs 9,036 for their passage.

The conclusion: Arif Mohammad should apologise to the Indian people for lying on television.

Preferably on prime time.

The comeback man of Indian cricket is back in the news. No, he hasn't made it to the Test team yet again. This time, it's a cricket coaching video—in Hindi no less—which has done the trick.

Titled Cricket With Mohinder Amarnath, the video depicts how one can best improve one's skills at batting, bowling, fielding and wicket-keeping, with demonstrations by such stalwarts as Sunil Gavaskar, Kapil Dev, Ravi Shastri, Mohammad Azharuddin, Syed Kirmani and, of course, Mohinder himself.

Mohinder Amarnath: an alternative career

The project took two years to complete and, says Amarnath, "required plenty of skill, patience and months and months of editing. It has also been a very costly venture both in terms of time and money."

But this doesn't mean that Amarnath's cricketing ambitions are dead. He hopes to make it to the Indian team again as it "isn't too difficult".

So what if he's on the wrong side of 30? •

WASHOUT!

The double-wicket Pepsi tournament was a disaster

The prize money—a whopping £12,000 for the winning pair—was by no means unattractive. The lineup of players, too, was impressive—Desmond Haynes, Malcolm Marshall, Gordon Greenidge and Carl Hooper from the West Indies, Imran Khan and Mudassar Nazar from Pakistan, Richard Hadlee and Lance Cairns from New Zealand, and from India there was the redoubtable pairs of Kapil Dev and Sachin Tendulkar, and Ravi Shastri and Azharuddin. The media hype that preceeded the double-wicket cricket tournament promised fans country-wide that "it would be a once in a lifetime show". But what started with a bang ended in a whimper—leaving the organisers, Procam, and its sponsors, Pepsi, deep in the red.

First, rains played havoc with the tournament—the competition was scheduled to be held over two days—12 and 13 October—at Bombay's Wankhede Stadium. But a nagging downpour on Saturday the 13th forced the organisers to postpone the second—and the most exciting—leg of the game to Sunday. Imran Khan and Richard Hadlee walked off, pleading prior engagements elsewhere. But more important was the fact that though most of the world's leading cricketers had assembled at Bombay, the idea of a double-wicket tournament just didn't enthuse the spectators. On both the days, hardly 4,000 fans turned out at the 44,000 capacity stadium to watch the proceedings, which was a lacklustre affair in the absence of the crucial competitive edge. And when Kapil Dev and Sachin Tendulkar lifted the Pepsi trophy, there were hardly 1,000 spectators to cheer them.

"Well there are ups and downs in life. The rains made this a definite downer" said Anil Singh, director of Procam Inc. But Anil had spared no efforts to make the tournament a grand success. And he was not lacking in exprience either. Anil—who is a tennis ace himself—and his brother Vivek Singh have been organising international tennis competitions in the country. They first thought of staging the double-wicket tournament more than a year back and began looking for a sponsor. "Initially I approached Reliance," recalled Anil Singh, "but they had foreign exchange problems. So I began looking for a multinational concern. I got in touch with Pepsi and they accepted my proposal."

The hunt for a sponsor over, Anil Singh got on the job of contacting the players. And with the help of his friend Ravi Shastri, Anil was able to rope in the best players of the world. He even got Doordarshan to telecast the event live for two days. But as luck would have it, the idea flopped badly. Today, Anil is a disappointed man, but he is not disheartened: "Sure we lost money but that does not mean it did not work because the idea was a gimmick. It was not serious cricket."

But most of those who watched the cricketers in action felt otherwise. Former Indian cricket captain Ajit Wadekar said: "Double-wicket may be another form of innovative cricket, but I don't think it will work."

Though Anil Singh is yet to work out the exact amount, there is no doubt that the Pepsi trophy was a financial disaster. Pepsi shelled out as much as £55,000. Doordarshan had to be paid $7,000 and the cost for hiring the stadium was around Rs 5 lakhs. Moreover, all the players were given the best of treatment, and the opening ceremony was a glittering affair.

Kapil Dev and Sachin Tendulkar: the winning pair

The set-back notwithstanding, Anil Singh is confident that double-wicket tournaments are here to stay. "I may have lost heavily, but I can assure you that Pepsi cup will be an annual event. The rains let us down this time, but next year it's going to be a success," he said. Meanwhile, Procam is also thinking in terms of staging a tennis competition where players like Jimmy Connors will take part. Said Anil Singh: "Procam believes that sporting events should be innovative and different."

But going by the Pepsi trophy fiasco, isn't the Procam director being a little too optimistic. •

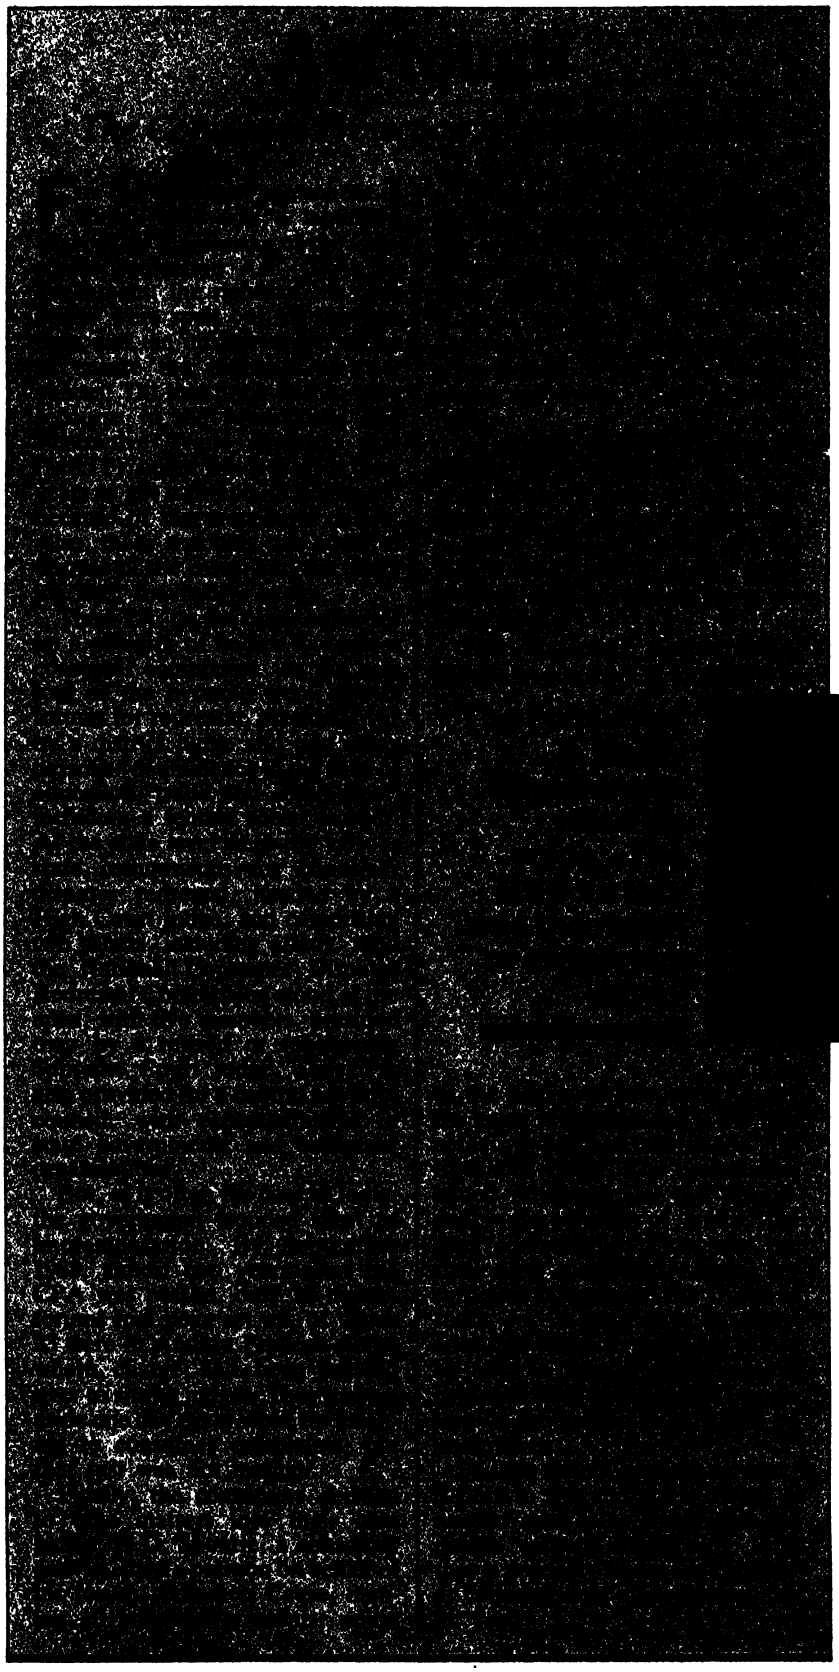
FIGHT BACK!

Indian consumer organisations take on manufacturers and dealers—but there is a long way to go

AMIT DUTTA

Whether it is at a departmental store...

...or a small grocery shop, consumers can be duped



GAUTAM PATOLE

• Kothari Medical Centre, Calcutta. Radharani Agarwal, suffering from an intestinal obstruction, is administered a drip. But within minutes her condition deteriorates seriously. A member of the family happens to look at the bottle, and finds a fungal growth inside it. The nurse is summoned and the drip stopped immediately. The Agarwals file a complaint with Consumers Unity and Trust Society (CUTS) which takes the case to the Consumer Disputes Redressal Commission, West Bengal. On 7 August, the commission directs Albert David Ltd to stop selling its dextrose intravenous drips of the batch number OAO 12B.

• Vidyasagar, a handicapped businessman of Gulbarga, Karnataka, works from home with the help of two telephone connections. He omits to pay a bill amounting to Rs 5,263 for one connection. And the telephone department promptly disconnects both his numbers. Vidyasagar files a case with the Gulbarga district consumer forum, and the forum rules in his favour. The department goes and appeals to the state consumer commission. Justice Desai orders that reconnection charges for one telephone should be refunded and Rs 1,000 be paid to Vidyasagar as compensation for the inconvenience caused.

• In April 1988, A.V. Lokendra Rao, a chartered accountant, takes out a life insurance policy of Rs one lakh, naming his wife as beneficiary in a double benefit scheme. Two days later, he dies of a cardiac arrest in a Bangalore nursing home. Life Insurance Corporation (LIC) refuses to pay up, claiming that the deceased had given inaccurate answers in his application. Rao's widow, Uma Devi, appeals to the State Commission Forum for consumer rights, but the LIC contends that forum has no jurisdiction as the case does not relate to consumer rights. The commission disagrees, ruling that LIC falls in the category of a consumer service, and orders the company to pay Uma Devi Rs two lakhs, plus interest at the rate of 18 per cent from the date of entitlement.

Consumerism is catching. And, going by the shopping list of our burgeoning middle-class, it has certainly caught on in India. Cars, TVs, videos, refrigerators, readymade garments, designerwear, soaps, perfumes...the list is as endless as the brands. All of them sell, indicating that the consumer boom has come to India for good.

And with it has come consumer consciousness. No longer do people walk into a departmental store and buy the first tube of toothpaste that catches their eye. They have their preferences, more often than not formed by television commercials, and they will not be fobbed off with anything else.

But this is only part of the story. Far more important is the increase in the consumer's awareness of his rights—and his willingness to fight for them. Which accounts for the increasing number of consumer societies in the country, some 400-odd at the last count. The more important among them—CUTS, the Karnataka Forum for the Promotion of Consumer Actions, Common Cause, Voluntary Organisation in the Interest of Consumer Education (VOICE) and the Consumer Guidance Society—are situated in major cities, indicating that the movement for consumer rights is mainly an urban phenomenon. But the level of involvement is impressive, nonetheless. Says H.D. Shourie, director, Common Cause: "The consumer is finally beginning to raise his voice. I get at least 20 to 30 letters every day from consumers. The BVO (brominated vegetable oils) victory was largely a result of a vigorous drive by a consumer rights forum which forced the MRTPC (Monopolics and Restrictive Trade Practices Commission) to take quick steps and ban the drink."

NITIN RA

H.D. Shourie, director, Common Cause

Pradeep Mehta, general secretary, CUTS, maintains that consumer consciousness increased only after the passing of the Consumer Protection Act (CPA) in 1986. "That was the turning point," he says. "Consciousness came about after legal rights were granted, unlike the Western countries where consciousness compelled more rights." S.R. Khanna of VOICE agrees that things improved after CPA, but according to him what is needed is consumer representation on such government bodies, where business interests are represented. "The Central Commission for Food Standards (CCFS) is one instance where such representation has helped enormously," says Khanna. "The entire question of BVO in soft drinks was first brought up in CCFS. Consumers have to constantly tackle the industrial lobby and representation is the effective answer."

While it is true that for every complaint filed, there are three others that go unreported, there is no denying that the consumer movement had notched up several successes in recent years. Common Cause, for instance, scored a major triumph when it managed to wangle a government notification banning the use of the catchphrase "local taxes extra" which was used by dealers to manipulate prices. From November onwards, all products will have to carry the maximum price with "all taxes inclusive" printed prominently on the outside.

One of the more interesting cases currently pending in the state commission, Bangalore, relates to the Sandoz chappals sold by Bata India Ltd. R. Ramachandra, a Bangalore schoolmaster, bought a pair, and after three months developed white patches on his feet. His doctor maintained that the chemical compound used in the PVC (poly vinyl chloride) of the inner sole was the cause of the problem. Ramachandra immediately complained to the Bata showroom where he bought the pair and exchanged his chappals for a pair of leather sandals.

But he was not satisfied with that. He wrote to Bata's managing director in Calcutta detailing the 'case history'. And received a reply, which said that his complaint was unusual, but assured him that a doctor would be sent to examine him. Says Ramachandra: "A sales assistant came and took me to a clinic where the doctor said that the skin had been affected by the chappals. But Bata still showed negligence."

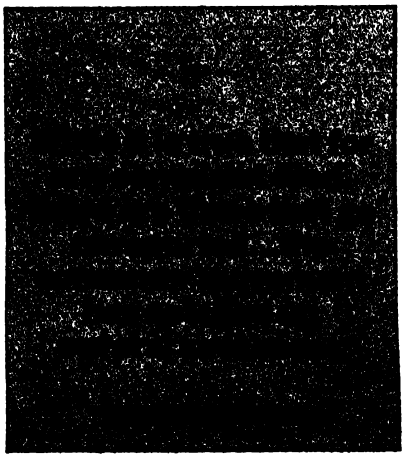
The irate schoolmaster then filed a complaint with the forum for consumer rights. Bata wrote to the National Commission to say: "Vitiligo (Ramachandra's skin problem) is not caused by PVC. The complaint did not undergo further tests and after almost two years he has filed this complaint which is motivated, frivolous and baseless."

The question has yet to be decided, but if Ramachandra does win damages, his could yet be a landmark case.

However, it is not as if every complaint receives similar treatment. A. Srinivas Murthy, for example, filed a complaint against the Bangalore Development Authority (BDA) for not eliminating the menace of stray dogs. He had been bitten by a stray dog, he said, and he did not know whether it was rabid or not. Wrote Murthy, in his complaint: "It is the duty of the BDA towards the taxpayer to clear the streets of stray dogs." Since it had not, and he could well develop rabies anytime over the next ten years, the BDA should give him Rs two lakhs as compensation, "one lakh each to get my two daughters married".

Justice Desai, chairman of the state-level forum for consumer rights, maintained, however, that the BDA did not come under the service sector. "I just threw the case out of the window," says Desai. But Murthy is undeterred, and plans to take his complaint to the National Commission in Delhi.

But there is still a long way to go before the consumer movement can come into its own in India. For, it is mainly restricted to the major cities. In Calcutta, CUTS is trying to create greater awareness in such West Bengal districts as Purulia and Siliguri, but it will be a while before the initiative makes a tangible difference.



What makes things even more difficult for consumer organisations is the indifference of the average consumer. They may fume, rave and rant when landed with an inferior product, but only two out of ten will take the trouble to go to a conusmer rights group and lodge a complaint, or follow up the case until their grievances are redressed. Says Justice Desai: "It is evident that awareness of their rights is increasing among the consumers, but it is not enough. Though with the consumer forums relief is available in three months, not many people are coming forward to file cases, mainly because of indifference and lethargy."

Consumer rights organisations tackle the problem in their own way. CUTS, for example, announced cash prices for telephones which have been "dead" for the longest period of time, and a rubbish heap photo contest to

AMIT DUTTA

Consumer binge, yes. But you need laws too drum up public consciousness and create more civic awareness. The Consumer Guidance Society (CGS) of India observed Consumer Week from 15-21 March, 1990, with its branches in Bombay, Dandeli in Karnataka Goa, Hyderabad, Kottayam, Pune and Trichur pitching in for good measure.

Increasing consumer consciousness is relatively easy. What is not is managing the finances. Consumer rights organisations have of necessity to do without big business and government funding. And private funds are never enough to finance all the battles that such societies have to wage to justify their existence. The CGS, for instance, has a corpus fund of Rs 5,000 and its current bank balance is a dismal Rs 2,000. With this kind of paltry money behind it, the organisation plans to agitate not just for improving the quality of goods but also for such issues as the depletion of the ozone layer, against toxic waste dumping and the marketing of dangerous drugs and pesticides in the Third World. Despite the constraints, the society does manage to accomplish a great deal. Recently, it tested samples of various food products and discovered that 15 per cent of the tea samples, 46 per cent of the turmeric powder and 40 per cent of the chilly powder samples were adulterated.

Pushpa Motwani, the CGS chairman, maintains that their task is made more difficult by the fact that laws exist mostly on paper. "We have agencies like the FDA (Food and Drug Administration) and the Legal Metrology (weights and measures), but they are not doing their job. Even when they get a complaint they do nothing about it. Even the bureau of Indian standards in New Delhi is not interested. The ISI Indian Standard Institution mark, which is supposed to be a mark of excellence, means nothing these days." Motwani gives two examples. The CGS received information that Britannia Industries Ltd was making biscuits in unhygienic conditions. The society stormed the factory premises and found swarms of flies all over the vats of cream and dough, with nobody in the least perturbed about it. The biscuit pack caried the ISI mark. The CGS went back to the ISI, which had no answer.

In 1989, there were numerous complaints that the Prestige pressure cooker was badly designed and there were several instances of it exploding in the face of housewives. The CGS took up the matter and the manufacturers admitted that the design was faulty, and redesigned the product.

In Jamshedpur, the Bihar Federation of Consumer Organisations, has done creditable work, setting up a food testing laboratory in 1988, which has led to a sharp decline in the adulteration of food products. The society, with Bejon Misra as president, also conducts classes on consumer education among such ladies organisations as AIWC (All India Women's Conference).

The Association for Consumer Action Safety and Health (ACAASH), founded by Dr R.K. Anand in July 1985, concentrates on problems relating to pharmaceuticals and child health. The organisation, which was associated with the breast-feeding projects initiated by UNICEF, is now fighting for a ban on drugs such as Chloromicetin and Cryptomycin.

But, obviously, the efforts of consumer rights organisation are not enough to prevent such tragedies as befell the Behala oil victims. In June 1988, all those who consumed adulterated rapeseed oil bought from a ration shop in Behala, Calcutta, soon developed a nervous disorder which meant partial paralysis in most cases. Today, most of the victims have yet to get their share of the Rs 18 lakhs sanctioned for them as compensation, and their monthly payments have been stopped for the last three months or so. CUTS has been a help, says Barsed Ali, who had formed the Patients Welfare Committee after the tragedy, but things will never be the same again for the victims.

It is cases such as these which lead to disillusionment among the average consumer and feed the belief that consumer organisations are only an eyewash. Says Lt Col H.S. Sarin, a resident of Kharagpur: "I don't think there is anything like the consumer consciousness movement here. Things which have been banned are easily available. Retailers put stickers on maximum price and say 'yeh hamara price hain'. Everyone is just indifferent."

While that may well be an extreme view, plenty needs to be done to get the consumer rights movement going full speed ahead. And the efforts of the International Organisation of Consumers Union (IOCU) will help in this direction. The IOCU has decided to concentrate its attention on India, Indonesia and Malaysia over the next three years. Says Dr Martin Abraham, the head of IOCU's information and research division: "We would like to see an all-India consumers cell. Once we set the modalities up, India is to get a proper system of information going that will ensure that the consumer is not fooled by sub-standard products. Periodicals will take up specific issues and devise better ways to help the consumer. There will also be strong cells to take up consumer issues. This is part of what we call networking."

Grants will be given for support and training and various workshops held for young consumers to enable them to distinguish between good and bad products and teach them to stand up for their rights.

And never ever give up the fight •

ECONOMY

If they go

In the event the government collapses, the economy will, too. Actually, it might collapse anyway

Yes, this is a warning. A warning for the industry, the people and the economy. Now, it hardly matters whether Prime Minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh loses his leadership, or actually retains it. What matters is that in any event, government in New Delhi will change, and if not the government, certainly its thinking. And if not its thinking, then certainly some of its ministers. They happen to be in key places. And they, in their individual capacities as well as in tandem, decide India's economic future.

A future which is scary, no matter that foodgrain production in 1990-91 is expected to wipe out the drought-stricken nightmares from three years ago. And no matter that industrial production is on the upswing, or that exports are rising or, that revenue collections are increasing.

What does matter is that the government has stopped caring, policy decisions on anything but bare survival have come to a complete standstill (except for the clearance of certain projects in the perverse hope of election funds). And what does matter is that policy—or should one say the absence of policy—as it stands today is mostly going to change. This is truly frightening.

What follows is a checklist of the National Front government's key economic ministers—even those who indirectly have a bearing on the economy—their ministries, responsibilities and performances. And how, even if they manage to hang on to their seats, the way things are going to be.

This is also about two key players, who are not in government, but could soon be. In that case, the term "economic mayhem" will seem like an understatement.

VISHWANATH PRATAP SINGH

Responsibilities: Prime Minister (?), Planning, Electronics, Human Resource Development, Science & Technology, Ocean Development.

Background: A Raja by default, born Allahabad in 1931. Studied to get BA, BSC and LLB degrees and says he would have become a nuclear scientist if he had not felt a political pull. Had nothing going for him except Sanjay Gandhi's largesse, and later, from his mother Indira and brother Rajiv.

Performance: As minister of state for commerce and civil supplies in 1983-84, he was just average. Came into his own as Union finance minister in January 1985, a portfolio he held till 1987. Rajiv Gandhi's premier liberalisation man: brought in foreign investment, opened up industry, tried to streamline taxation formalities, brought in revenue and thought he could cut back on deficit.

Has simply fallen apart as PM. The Prime Ministership is another story altogether, but his performance with the economic responsibilities he holds has been, simply put, disastrous. The Planning Commission is a mess, with Rama Krishna Hegde sacked, intellectuals still holding fort, and no sign of the Eighth Plan (1990-95) with the first year of the Plan period viewing an uneasy economic sunset. Has done nothing at all as minister responsible for Human resource development. Science & technology receives bare government support, rockets keep falling out of the sky and satellites pack up in space. As far as ocean development goes, a bit of oil, no minerals, and a lot of archaeological artefacts.

Future: He could go and he could stay, but whatever the Raja has touched will stay finished for a long time to come. The next PM could have a big job on his hands. He could, for example, begin by getting the Eighth Plan going. On the other hand: an extended Plan holiday.

Responsibilities: Union minister for finance.

Background: The 69-year-old finance minister is another nuclear physics enthusiast. In fact, he taught the subject (hence, professor Dandavate) from Independence to 1972 at the Siddarth College of Arts & Sciences, Bombay. Has written books: Evolution of Socialist Policies, Gandhiji's Impact on Socialist Thinking, Three Decades of Indian Communism, Kashmir—A Test case for Secularism, Marx and Gandhi.

Performance: First, he must not be too happy about the books he wrote: socialism is dead, Karl Marx has been reduced to a misunderstood and maligned character with relevance in Victorian England and early 1900s Europe, but today's world has no place for him.

Neither does India. As minister of railways in the Janata regime, he handled his portfolio correctly for two years between 1977-79. Then, he left with the Janata factions and returned to socialist preaching. His tenure as finance minister this time round has been filled with hopes and disasters. Earlier, when Dandavate said he cared about the economy, people believed him. He still might, but nobody believes him anymore. Banks have not received autonomy, and neither have financial institutions. The Reserve Bank of India is shouting itself hoarse about the country going down the drain, the minister does not seem to hear He is thinking about renegotiating loans, about getting new ones, and trying to tell the public that they need to tighten their belts. He may not even have much power anymore, with deputy Anil Shastri hogging the limelight, and secretary Bimal Jalan running himself ragged trying to keep India solvent. The real deficit this year could be as much as Rs 15,000 crores.

Future: If India stays solvent, it will be the miracle of the 1990s. Recession could strike as early as next year, and the next finance minister (it could still be Dandavate, but it will have to be a different Dandavate) will inherit an impossible situation. The promised long term fiscal policy is out in the cold, nobody is even talking about it. All everyone talks about is inflation, and more inflation. The future is bleak.

ARUN NEHRU

Responsibilities: Union minister for commerce and tourism

Background: When the BA honours student from Lucknow took to running paint company Jenson & Nicholson in 1979, he ran it well, when he took to politics, he took to it like he had been born for it. The portly 46-year-old rose to become chief fund-raiser for the Congress(I).

Performance: In retrospect, he should have stuck to the Congress(I). He was an efficient minister of state for power in 1985, and even now, as Union commerce minister, he is said to have run his ministry excellently. He initiated new tax incentives for exporters and gave the practice of value-added exports a new dimension. Hi-tech imports were his idea, too. As tourism minister, however, he seemed to think that foreign junkets were his prerogative, and holidays abroad were mistakenly thought to be tourism promotion ventures. Now he has stopped working, and gone back to doing what he does best: play politics. Numerous analysts say he is finished as a politico, but with Nehru, one never knows.

Future: Exports will go up, there is no doubt about that. A new minister and a new government will be forced to plug the exports sector as it is a way out of the deficit and balance of payments mess. However, imports will continue, possibly in larger quantities, as after a point, even value-added has its limitations. As far as tourism is concerned, it is expected to be a bit of a disaster. 1991 has been sold worldwide as the Visit India Year. With the way things are: very few tourists, except hardy Britons and the French, are likely to come anywhere near South Asia. Tour group cancellations have already begun, but hotels keep going up. Unless the socio-political situation mends itself fast, tourism, a Rs 2,000 crore foreign exchange earner, is going to be washed up. No tourism minister can avoid it.

ARIF MOHAMMAD KHAN

Responsibilities: Union minister for energy and civil aviation

Background: Trained to be a lawyer, he should have stayed one. Not that the Bulandshar-born minister is bad at what he does. And, he has principles, though they are sometimes clouded by the fact that he is an unabashed Arun Nehru groupie, and is likely to go any way his portly colleague does.

RAJESH KUMAR

Performance: On the surface, very good. He took over as minister of state for power in 1985 after Nehru moved on, and earlier he made an efficient minister for industry and company affairs (January-September, 1985), and energy (1984). In his new incarnation, has single-handedly done the most for the power sector than anyone else, ever. Brought in privatisation of power, realising that the state cannot possibly handle the demand. Made investment modalities easier. Helped stock market prices of power companies shoot up. Has got all the big names—Tata, Birla, Ambani, Modi, Thapar—keen on private power.

Civil aviation went beautifully till an Airbus A320 crashed in Bangalore last February. Then the planes were grounded, and so were Arif's aviation plans, as the Raja stubbornly refused to let them back in the sky. Arif, however, managed to initiate new measures in this area, too, by helping kick off India's private air taxi services, which has made executive travel a lot easier, at least in South India, where most of these new airlines operate. But Vayudoot and Indian Airlines are in a mess, and if Air India does not pull out of its Gulf evacuation expenses, it could follow suit.

Future: As far as power goes, any administration or minister will have to stick to privatisation. There is simply no other way. But it would help if all rules are put down on paper, state electricity boards learn to cooperate with private operators, and private operators, in turn, realise that their investment will have to gestate for years before profits show up. A bugbear will be power distribution and payments from electricity boards, who never pay up for power bought because their customers do not pay up, either.

With civil aviation, it is all over and out. Vayudoot is a goner. Indian Airlines is a goner, and by the time it gets the A320s in the sky, the airline will require still more planes. Passengers will continue to be harassed, and there is no way out. Air India is an imponderable, as boss Subhash Gupte happens to be a thinking man, and could straighten things out. Air taxis are likely to prosper.

AJIT SINGH

Responsibilities: Union minister for industry

Background: Son of deceased Jat chieftain Charan Singh. Studied to be a computer engineer and was one with the Big Blue—IBM Corp. of the US. Has a rural background but prefers to think like a US business school graduate, and run his ministry like one.

Performance: At IBM, great. At the ministry of industry, aggressively hopeful. Singh kicked off his term as minister with a bang: lot of talk about liberalisation which had industry reeling, an effect which intensified after the Union budget for 1990-91. He unvelled a radical—for India, or course—investment plan: foreign investment in key areas allowed, within FERA limits, but that was expected. Investment norms to be simplified, with paperwork to be cut and bureaucratic interference reduced. Endless benefits to the small and medium-scale sectors. The stage was set for a new era—or so it seemed—and the Raja, Nehru, Arif and Dandavate all seemed hell-bent on backing the policy.

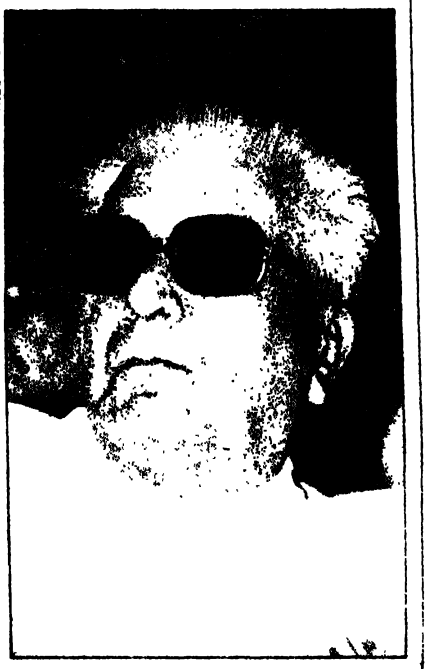
Only, things fell apart—industry did not, and growth rate keeps growing. The industrial policy was lambasted by socialists, and till date, the policy has not been cleared, and new investment norms are as vague as ever. Files are not being cleared, and the few that are, have an orientation to possible election funding. Singh lost his footing after the Raja clamped down on the policy—the 1985 Raja would never have done it. And in the process, so did possibly the most innovative and clear-headed man in the government's economic policy-making scene: special secretary at the PMO, Montek Singh Ahluwalia.

Future: Ajit Singh appears to have sealed his fate. If he manages to stay on, his industrial policy may yet see the light of day, as it is a way out of a recession. On the other hand, recession may kill it. It is not clear if Montek is going to stay on with a change in government, or at least a reshuffling of ministers. The Oxford educated, ex-World Bank economist is far too valuable to lose—he did survive the Rajiv-Raja transition—but with the way things are now, nothing is certain. Industry is entirely on its own.



DEVI LAL

Responsibilities: Coming back to power

Background: Nasty. Blasted his way into Jat politics after Charan Singh's death, took over Haryana, and then, tried to take over India. Quite possibly, the high school dropout—he dropped out, moved by Mahatma Gandhi's call to kick imperialists out—is one of the most destructive forces in Indian politics and the economy.

Performance: As former deputy Prime Minister, sullen. As former agriculture minister, disastrous. He did get a lot of benefits for farmers: Devi Lal was instrumental in getting crop procurement prices raised, and a large amount of fertilizer subsidies continued. But there was the near-crazed ploy to waive farm loans. Earlier, it was to be as much as Rs 14,000 crores worth. But Lal gradually realised that it would wipe out the treasury, and consented to have it reduced to Rs 3,000 crores or so for the current financial year. Then, before he could do more damage, he was sacked by the Raja.

Future: He could be back. Then, he will run down big business, back farmers, try to step up loan waivers, doling out largesse from near-empty coffers while India slides down the waste-disposal chute. Fortunately, he may not have much money to play around with. But he will try to get the cow-belt farmers' lobbies strongly behind him, and for that, he will try practically anything. Agriculture will prosper despite Devi Lal. After all, he is not responsible for bountiful Monsoons. For this sector, 1990-91 looks set to be the most hopeful year in decades, and foodgrain targets are set to be broken. Agriculture may yet lift India's economic hopes, backing industry with increased purchasing power, and people with enough grain to fill up buffer stocks to the brim. Only if Devi Lal stayed put where he belongs: village Chautala, district Sirsa, Haryana.

CHANDRA SHEKHAR

Responsibilities: Coming back to power.

Background: Misguided socialist, and a PM wannabe for years. The 63-year-old firebrand manipulator has compromised on power till now—the Raja's becoming PM last year is the most recent example. But things may be changing: Chandra Shekhar has said often enough that he is "willing" to accept the challenges that being PM brings.

Performance: Has run down everything anybody has ever done, except whatever he has done. He ran down the government when the Raja gypped him to become PM, though he kept silent about the person who made it possible for V.P. Singh: Devi Lal. Then, with the advent of the new industrial policy proposals, he found a new focus. He ran down the policy, Ajit Singh, Montek Singh Ahluwalia, and anyone else who dared say how good liberalisation would be for India. He also ran down multi-national companies, complained bitterly about their ambitions which would only stop at the economic conquest of the Third World, and accused the government of trying to sell India down the drain. PepsiCo's entry came in for special mention. As did favours shown to big business houses, no matter that at least some of them are very close to his heart. He ran down the policy, saying that the small-scale sector would get nothing from it, no matter that they would get maximum benefits.

As usual, Chandra Shekhar had it all wrong. He read the policy documents totally. But he stood his ground, and perhaps felt a sense of victory when the Raja backtracked on the policy.

Future: Bleak for big business, except the favoured few, which is the way of all politics. Totally bleak for multi-national companies (and here, railways minister—if he still is—George Fernandes will lend a hand), and a return to the license-permit raj with gusto. If Chandra Shekhar becomes PM, the sun will shine only on his side of the worldview. He will refuse to see reality, not just the economic one, and will ride hard on dissenters. He will try to bully the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, not realising that a lot of India has been built on loans from these agencies. He will not realise that debt is a problem mainly because government expenditure is not being slashed. Cross your fingers. ●

BELT-TIGHTENING

Forget it

This seems to be the customs board's attitude to austerity

On 30 October, the eyes of the country were fixed on Ayodhya to see what Vishwa Hindu Parishad activists managed to achieve. But at the Collectorate Building at ITO, in central New Delhi, the hot topic of discussion was tariff, and the disputes about the classification of items. In attendance were collectors and principal collectors from as far away as Madras, Calcutta, Visakhapatnam, Bangalore, Cochin, Kandla, Goa, Bombay and its nearby port, Nava Sheva.

This, despite the fact that home ministry directives insist that senior officials of the Government of India remain at their bases at a time when the law and order situation in the country is at an abysmal low. And when the finance ministry has sent out a directive (see copy of letter) asking departmental heads to "mop up every available savings, however small they are". This, in order to implement the ten per cent cut imposed on expenditure to be incurred during the remaining fiscal months of 1990-91. The conference seemed a little unnecessary, as it was more a burcaucratic bash—as most of these meetings are—than a problem-solving session. But, it did seem to be in tune with the agenda of the Central Board of Customs and Excise (CBCE). For, over the months of January-August 1990, zonal conferences had been held in some pleasant locale or the other. In style. An example. The expenses incurred for one such gathering, for one such person, came to Rs 28,288 for his air fare alone. With that, the gentleman could have flown half-way around the world. His travelling allowances came to a more modest Rs 2,706. (Rumours in CBCE circles have it that S. Mukhopadhyay, now officiating as principal collector, Delhi, with additional charge of Allahabad, was carried along for every such jamboree, as he was considered to be close to the Indian Express lobby and Bhure Lal, joint secretary at the Prime Minister's Office and a top Raid Raj raider.)

Whatever the truth of that matter, wasteful expenditure seems to be the order of the day with the CBCE. One of the board's more controversial enterprises was the party it threw in honour of T.P. Hayes, secretary of the International Customs Cooperation Council at the swank Club de France, Maurya Sheraton Hotel, New Delhi. Hayes was in India in connection with the International Cargo Agents Meeting organised by Air India. And though the board was not playing host to him, it decided to honour Hayes with a party, anyway. And, for reasons that baffled most observers, A.K. Pandey, who was handed the responsibility of making the arrangements, chose Maurya Sheraton rather than a state-run India Tourism Development Corp. hotel—the usual practice for government functions—as the venue. The choice seemed particularly unfortunate in view of the fact that ITC Ltd. which owns Maurya, a part of its Welcomgroup chain, owes the government a massive Rs 80.30 crores in excise dues—which ITC disputes—and the case was up for adjudication.

A copy of the finance ministry directive: austerity drive

R THIAGARAJAN
FINANCIAL ADVISER

Ministry of Finance
Department of Revenue
New Delhi
Dated the 26 Sept 1990.

Dear Shri

You must have already received the instructions regarding the cut of 10% imposed by Government on the balance of expenditure to be incurred during the remaining months of 1990-91 out of the sanctioned budget estimates. As a corollary to this it is absolutely essential that you personally look into various items of expenditure to be incurred by your department from now on and impose necessary austerity measures including control over travel expenses and office expenses. Necessary instructions may be issued to your field offices. It would be necessary to map up every available savings however small they are in order to gear up our efforts to work to the cuts. I would further request you to have a monitoring system for the purpose of ensuring that the Government's directions in this regard are carried out.

Yours sincerely,

Members of the board are mostly defiant in the face of criticism. Their defence is that the arrangements were made within the budget allocated by the government. And that the Maurya seemed the ideal location in view of the fact that Hayes was staying at the adjoining Taj Palace Intercontinental and had only to walk across for lunch.

Not everyone, however, took a lenient view. Revenue secretary R.L. Mishra, expenditure secretary M. Geethakrishnan and finance secretary Bimal Jalan, all of whom were invited, chose to stay away, perhaps preferring good grace to gluttony. Officers of the Indian Revenue Service, however, obedient to the summons of K.L. Rekhi, chairman of the CBCE, turned up in full force.

Far more serious than charges of frolicking, however, are the charges that the board is behaving lackadaisically. For example, there are a number of vacancies in the customs and excise collectorates. Among them, the posts of principal collector, Allahabad, principal collector customs, Bombay and principal collector central excise, Bombay. Senior officials were given additional charge to take care of day to day affairs, but the posts are still vacant.

Another controversy: the ITC excise case. The company had been served a show cause notice in 1984 about the dues it owed the government as central excise. ITC filed a case disputing government claims in the Calcutta High Court and then, went in appeal to a division bench. The courts, however, advised the company to go to the proper authority, the collector of appeals. The case was then put up for adjudication again with Lajja Ram, collector judicial, officiating.

The amount owed to the government is in some dispute. Going by the assessable value, the dues came to Rs 10-11 crores, but if the amount was computed on the basis of duty-cum-price, the sum went up sharply. There is a fair chance, say observers,that ITC will manage to get the amount reduced, and this, in turn, has led to rumours of double dealing.

Meanwhile, the jamborees are expected to continue, with the north zone conference in Dehradun being the next in line. Scheduled to be held on 12-13 November, the meet will be attended by the chairman of the CBCE and the collectors, excise and judicial, of the north zone. Expenses—and the government's austerity drive—be damned. Besides, Mussourie is less than an hour's drive away. ●

Mohammad Khan: optimistic in the face of adversity

1.5 crores a year account in October. And shifted to rival agency Ambience,- which turns out ads as nifty as Enterprise's. The reason: ad industry insiders say the falling out—after Enterprise actually helped increase Vadilal's sales manifold—had to do with three ad films Enterprise did for the ice cream company. The films, released on TV last January, received such a disastrous market response that Vadilal ordered them scrapped after a couple of weeks, say sources. The loss of investment for Vadilal: almost Rs 20 lakhs. Enterprise was asked to make another film to make amends. After all, Vadilal and Enterprise did make a good team. But this ad too was rejected by Vadilal. The Ahmedabad-based company, say insiders, decided that enough was enough, and that it was time to move accounts to another agency.

This comes at a bad time for Enterprise: two top creative whizzes and a senior client servicing executive have left the agency, and the Vadilal shock is sure to shake up the agency. But Khan is optimistic. One of Indian advertising's most respected names, he didn't start Enterprise to lose.

Very low. That's Pawan Hans Ltd for you. The government-run helicopter service organisation is battling crippling losses, crippled machines—its fleet of Westland and Dauphin helicopters are perennially trouble-prone—and the loss of image from three fatal crashes. The reason why agencies—mostly government organisations such as the Oil & Natural Gas Commission and the Jammu & Kashmir and Sikkim tourism corporations, among others use it -- is because no one else has a chopper fleet on offer. Now, Pawan Hans has a brand new managing director, Air Commodore C.M. Singla, an air force veteran with 6,000 hours of helicopter flying time behind him. Singla has flown 11 different kinds of choppers, has been a flight instructor, and still holds a pilot's license. Impressive, as public sector chief executives in India tend to have absolutely no backgrounds for their jobs. However, Singla has his work cut out for him. The way things are at Pawans Hans, it requires a lot more than piloting proficiency to keep it in the air.

A tea executive takes on the ULFA

• Fight back. That seems to be T.C. Bordoloi's idea of life. Manager of the McLeod Russel Group's Hunwal Tea Estate near Jorhat, Upper Assam, Bordoloi told United Liberation Front of Assam (ULFA) militants that he would not pay up the Rs 15 lakhs they demanded from him as "donation". Donation, these days, is the ULFA catch-phrase for extortion, and they have over the past two months or so, mopped up more than Rs one crore from various tea companies. Bordoloi's stand should stir the ULFA up a bit.

■ Without feathers

Executives at Agritech Hatcheries and Foods Ltd must surely be wishing it was that way. The Ahmednagar, Maharashtra-based poultry products company thought they had a feather in its cap when they went to market for a Rs 1.8 crore public issue. It was to partly finance a Rs 9.8 crore project to use hi-tech slaughtering machines, which can butcher 29 lakh broiler birds a year, or a fast-paced five a minute. Only, Agritech's plans ruffled the feathers of the Jain community, and even political organisations such as the Shiv Sena, the Vishwa Hindu Parishad and the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh. All of them have raised objections against the project going ahead. Pervez and Vispy Damania, the project's promoters, claim that their hi-tech plans would make it the largest. fully-integrated broiler farm in India. Tell the opposition that: they hate using the word "farm" for the project. "Slaughterhouse," they say, would be more like it. The Damanias are all aflutter with concern—their necks are on the line. •

Speak German?

India should, if it wants to talk the unified-Germany way

On 3 October, after a separation of more than 45 years, the two halves of Germany were re-united. The reunification of Germany is an event of momentous significance in world history as with one stroke of international diplomacy, a 78 million strong nation has emerged within the heart of Europe. Given the legendary German characteristics of organisational ability, technical proficiency and discipline, it is only a matter of time before united Germany emerges as the most prosperous nation in Europe and possibly, the world.

For India's perpetually growing can't-be-done school of political scientists and woefully deficient politicians, the lesson of the reunification of the poles-apart Germany is that if people dream impossible dreams, they often realise them. Hence, the importance of pursuing lofty ambitions. For, a year ago, who would have thought that Germany, which seemed to have been irrevocably rent asunder by the greatest armed conflict in human history could ever be re-united? But the impossible has happened because successive governments in Bonn kept alive this hope and vision.

Yet, the reunification of Germany would never have been realised but for the economic miracle of the Federal Republic of Germany (i.e.West Germany). In the final analysis, it was the sheer affluence of FRG which prompted the citizens of the German Democratic Republic, (GDR) or East Germany, to abandon the false gods of Marxist socialism which provided neither bread nor freedom on the same scale of abundance. A healthy respect for the proven laws of economics, an appropriate economic development model and a purposeful leadership enabled war-shattered FRG to transform itself into the most affluent society in contemporary Europe with a per capita income of Rs 2.31 lakhs, twice that of its former, eastern half.

This is the second lesson of the German reunification—that economics is more important than politics. Or rather, that the primary goal of politics should be economics, to raise the standard of living of the populace Yet, in the perverse world of Indian politics, the material well-being of the nation's ill-fed, ill-clothed and ill-housed population comes way down the list of priorities, after abstruse objectives such as national self-reliance, unity and integrity, self-respect etc.

So, for our disputable tribe of economists and social scientists, the lesson of German reunification is: stop messing around with the economy and don't play around with the proven laws of economics. Which means dismantling the inefficient resource-hungry public sector and leaving business to businessmen, without interference from business-illiterate bureaucrats. As FRG's economic miracle demonstrates, the function of government is to maintain law and order, build sound education and health-care systems and encourage businessmen to give off their best. The GDR tried it the other way round, and its accession to FRG is an admission of a grave error of judgment.

The Germanys broke down the wall to go capitalism's way. India should, too

The third and perhaps most significant lesson of German reunification is that it has laid to rest the ghost of egalitarian socialism (a.k.a. communism) which has haunted the developing nations of the third world—and India in particular—for over four decades.

In the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe the inevitable future is writ large on walls. But is India's new generation of ill-educated, divisive, parish-pump politicians and pedantic, India-is-a-unique-case intellectuals be able to read, and more importantly, comprehend it? I doubt it. ●

Trouble at the top

Why is the government hostile towards Doordarshan chief Shiv Sharma?

For a government that cries itself hoarse about safeguarding the sanctity of such institutions as the CAG and the UPSC, this was hardly credible behaviour. And to director-general (DG) of Doordarshan Shiv Sharma's credit, he didn't stand for it, either.

Of course, if the government had had its way, Sharma wouldn't have been at the helm of Doordarshan today. For, even one year after the UPSC recommended that his appointment as DG be regularised, the V.P. Singh regime continued to sit tight over his papers. No, he wasn't fired or asked to proceed on leave. But the government continued to give him ad hoc extensions, without assigning any reasons for the delay in appointing him on a regular basis.

Finally, just when it seemed that this was the way things were going to proceed until the end of his term, Shiv Sharma received a letter from the information and broadcasting ministry, informing him that he was to be relieved of his duties as Doordarshan chief and that his services would be utilised in getting Prasar Bharati going instead.

For Sharma, who had been quite foxed by the government's attitude ever since the UPSC recommended his name as the best candidate for the DG's post, this was the last straw. He got his advocates Lalit Bhasin and G. Ramaswamy on the job and appealed to the Central Administrative Tribunal (CAT) for relief. Their argument was simple: UPSC had followed all the required procedures before choosing Sharma over the two other IAS candidates and the government should either regularise his appointment or assign reasons for not doing so. And it certainly couldn't unilaterally decide that his services as DG, Doordarshan, were no longer required.

The CAT, with Justices Karta and Chakravorty presiding, gave a stay order to Sharma, asking that status quo ante be restored. This meant that Sharma would continue as DG, until the next hearing which was scheduled for 22 October.

While Sharma treated this as a major victory, ministry sources maintained that the case was yet to be decided and that the government would present its case on the day of the hearing.

The argument that attorney-general Soli Sorabjee presented to the principal bench on the 22nd was that Sharma had been ill for a long period of time—he'd been in hospital after a major operation—and that the minister had not had the opportunity to evaluate his performance. Hence, his appointment had not been regularised. The attorney-general further contended that the appointment committee of the Cabinet had not had the time to process Sharma's appointment. But the argument didn't wash because his appointment had been passed by the previous regime and there was no reason why the entire process had to be repeated.

The tribunal, however, failed to give a final order, fixing 1 November as the date of the next hearing. Until then, Sharma continues as the DG—recording the Prime Minister's ever-increasing addresses to the nation among other things—and status quo ante prevails, in accordance with the court's order.

But why the animus against Shiv Sharma? While no one is willing to go on the record, the general consensus appears to be that the government wants a more pliable man at the helm of affairs in Doordarshan at a time when the political situation in the country is so unstable. And Sharma didn't fit the bill.

Also, the coverage of the anti-reservation stir didn't improve matters either. Shots of the police firing on students were considered inappropriate and Sharma, by virtue of being DG, had to take the rap. The government, it is rumoured, had decided then that Sharma had to go.

But Sharma remains—if only for the time being. For, only the next CAT hearing will decide his fate, one way or the other. And also whether Doordarshan autonomy will remain just another meaningless catch-phrase. •

ASHOK VAIRE

Benazir bites the dust

And General Zia's ghost has the last laugh in Pakistan's general election

The Pakistani dictator General Zia-ul Haq might have been killed in a mysterious air crash two years ago, but his spirit lives on. Benazir Bhutto's biggest mistake was not to acknowledge it. When she became Prime Minister in December 1988, she saw it as a personal triumph and a vindication of her decade-long struggle against the Zia establishment.

Benazir thought that Zia was defeated in death and that she had succeeded in fulfilling the oath she had taken after General Zia had hanged her father and the first democratically-elected PM of the country, Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, in the early morning hours of 4 April, 1979. She perhaps believed that as a Bhutto, and the heir of Pakistani democracy, she had finally come home to roost.

But it was an uneasy perch. Blinded by the illusion of power, Benazir failed to see Zia's ghost looming over the Pakistani polity. And her triumph was ground to dust in a bare 20 months. Zia's successor, President Ghulam Ishaq Khan, had her deposed; her arch-rival, Ghulam Mustafa Jatoi, was installed as caretaker PM; special tribunals were set up to process the charges of corruption against Benazir and her ministers while her husband, Asif Zardari, was flung behind bars. Benazir took to the dusty roads of Pakistan, campaigning for her return to power. She toured the length and breadth of the country, rallying her supporters to stand up to the establishment and its chief custodian, President Ghulam Ishaq Khan. She felt that elections would return her to power and humiliate her enemies. Only, nothing like that happened.

In the 24 October general elections, the Pakistani electorate did not give her another chance. The people had made history of sorts by electing her in 1988. Now, they unmade it. A travel-weary Benazir trudged back from her home constituency, Larkana in Sindh province, to Karachi, while broadcasts spoke of a total rout of her People's Democratic Alliance (PDA). The next day's newspapers made banner headlines of the Islamic Jamhooree Ittehad (IJI) victory. The Zia proteges were back, grinning in triumph out of newspaper front pages. They had won a decisive 105 seats of the 207 general seats. Not Benazir, but Zia's heir, President Ghulam Ishaq Khan, had been vindicated. The institutions and leaders created by the dead dictator had emerged victorious.

THE ZIA LEGACY

Benazir's biggest mistake was that she failed to see Zia's ghost looming over the Pakistani polity. And the electorate did not give her another chance in the 24 October general elections

Pakistan's political commentators make a curious distinction. They talk of a "government" and a "political government". The two in Pakistan are not one but distinct entities. The government, or the "establishment" as it is sometimes called, is as old as Pakistan and General Zia, during his 11-year rule, ensured that its effective control passed onto the military. Internal security, foreign affairs and major fiscal decisions all came to be handled by the military and its minions in the upper echelons of the bureaucracy. By the mid-1980s, Gen. Zia was confident that the military had acquired a total monopoly over real power in Pakistan.

Civilian politicians were at best performers, carrying out the perfunctory functions of government. The "political government" could go through all the motions of governing, issue statements and pass legislation. But the system ensured that it was the military that took decisions on key issues, told the politicians what to say and determined what legislation was desirable.

General Zia also had the foresight to groom a small group of leaders who could be entrusted with the task of preserving the system he had created. Of this group, four people have gained prominence. The first was a small-time Sindhi politician, Mohammad Khan Junejo, who was hoisted to the prime ministership by Zia after the partyless polls of 1985. Junejo fell out with Zia on the Afghan issue: Junejo wanted Pakistan to sign the Geneva Accord on Afghanistan, while Zia refused. In the end, Junejo had to go. As one commentator put it: "Junejo stumbled into history and stumbled out of it."

GHULAM MUSTAFA JATOI

He was an ardent follower of Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, but deserted Benazir some years ago. He was appointed caretaker PM after Benazir's dismissal

The other three Zia promotees have been more successful. Of them, the most powerful, currently, is Ghulam Ishaq Khan, whom Zia appointed Speaker of the Assembly and who automatically became President after the dictator was killed. Ishaq Khan is the frontman of the military and completely faithful to the ideals of his mentor. He, more than any civilian, is determined to ensure that the Zia system prevails.

His chief politician-ally is Ghulam Mustafa Jatoi, the caretaker Prime Minister appointed after Benazir's dismissal on 6 August. Jatoi was an ardent follower of Benazir's father, but fell out with her some years ago. Why he signed up with the Zia league is not entirely clear, but it is common knowledge that Zia intervened when his son was hauled up for gunning down eight policemen in Sindh. Since then, Jatoi has been a Zia fan and never stops publicly mentioning how the dictator had repeatedly offered him the prime ministership.

The last, and probably the most critical, member of this coterie is the Punjab strongman Mian Nawaz Sharif, who till ten years ago was a small-time trader. Zia and then the Pakistani Inter Services Intelligence (ISI), which is Pakistan's most powerful intelligence agency, actively promoted Sharif, who is today counted among the country's top ten industrialists. Sharif, unlike the other Zia creations, has succeeded in building up a formidable political constituency for himself in Punjab, which is ironic considering that he is actually a Kashmiri.

At any rate, while he was Punjab chief minister, he successfully projected himself as the champion of the province and implemented a number of projects for its improvement. Today, he is the undisputed leader of the powerful alliance, the Islamic Jamhooree Ittehad.

By all rights, Nawaz Sharif should have automatically become Prime Minister following the IJI's October 1990 electoral triumph. But Jatoi, who is a political lightweight, because of his connections and propensity to fall in line without a murmur, is considered the front-runner for the top political job.

All these men, save Junejo, are now back in the saddle. To complete the picture there is Zia's son and former banker, Ejaz-ul Haq. The young Zia provided the apt touch to the October polls by offering prayers at his father's grave on election eve. He contested the polls from the Rawalpindi Cantonment constituency and won by a whopping margin of 30,000 votes. What more could Zia have hoped for?

MIAN NAWAZ SHARIF

Ten years ago he was a small-time trader. With Zia's backing, he became one of Pakistan's top ten industrialists. He also has a formidable political constituency in Punjab

Benazir Bhutto knew what she was up against even two years ago when her Pakistan People's Party (PPP) emerged as the single-largest party in the National Assembly with 93 of the 207 general seats. At that time, the Zia protégés managed to win just 55 seats and were in no position to form the government. The establishment, nevertheless, demurred and initially made no move to appoint Benazir Prime Minister. At that stage, Benazir had two options: she could either reject the sham and continue as an Opposition politician or else she could compromise with the establishment. As it turned out, she chose the latter course and, in the process, effectively sealed her own fate.

Benazir was appointed Prime Minister more than a month after the elections and after she held prolonged discussions with President Ishaq Khan and the army. The President pointed out that under the Constitution, rewritten by General Zia, the ultimate power to appoint and dismiss a Prime Minister rested with him. Benazir agreed to accept the conditions laid down by the establishment. She would not interfere with the army, control the financial allocations or diminish its special position. Moreover, she would work in close consultation with the President in matters of key appointments and policy. She would tone down her anti-Zia statements, leave the Afghan issue and nuclear policy to the generals, accept General Yaqub Khan as the foreign minister, pull back from her anti-Islamic posture and, in the ultimate analysis, function within the framework of the power structure.

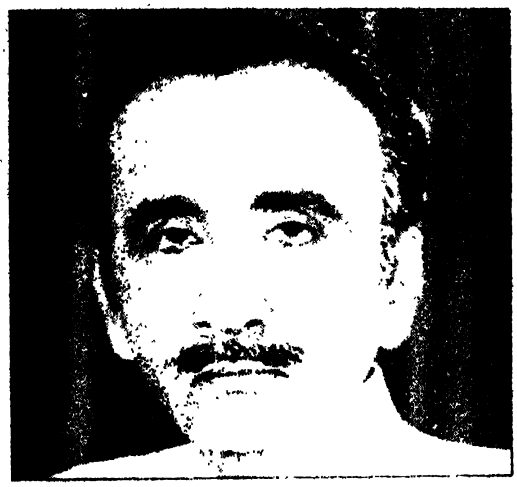
During the first few months of assuming power, Benazir behaved. The establishment heaved a sigh of relief. It believed it had tamed Pakistan's most vociferous democrat. What it had not quite appreciated was the extent of her antipathy to the establishment. Her sole aim was to break the political back of the Zia groupies and then go about dismantling the "real government". Unfortunately, she showed her hand a little too early.

Her attempt to bring down the Opposition government in the province of Baluchistan was frustrated by the courts and in Punjab, her arch-rival, Nawaz Sharif, proved unexpectedly skilful in resisting her attempts to undermine his government. In the meantime, her own regional alliances—with the Mohajir Quami Movement (MQM) in Sindh and with Wali Khan's Awami National Party (ANP) in the North West Frontier Province—were coming apart. In Sindh, her own party would not allow her to make concessions to the Mohajirs, while the President put his foot down when it came to appointing an ANP nominee for the NWFP governorship.

By the summer of 1989, things were beginning to fall apart, but Benazir did not see the signs. On the contrary, she felt it was time to assert herself. The Mujahideen thrust against Jalalabad had failed and Benazir started off by spreading rumours that the army was responsible for the failure of the Afghan policy. At the same time, she openly blamed the President's obstructiveness for her inability to change things in the Frontier Province. More foolhardy were her attempts to get at the army.



She first had the ISI chief, Hamid Gul, transferred as commander of the Strike Corps in Multan. Next, she appointed a committee under one of her buddies, Air Marshal Zulfiqar Ali Khan, to see how the country's intelligence agencies could be reformed. Between April and October 1989, she tried her best to retire the joint chief of staff, Admiral Iftiqar Ahmed Sirohi. Her intention was to kick the army supremo, General Mirza Aslam Beg, to Sirohi's position and install an army chief of her choice. This was a blatant attack and it completely alienated her from the armed forces.

Benazir, instead of winning friends and influencing people, was steadily antagonising every power-centre in Pakistan. Instead of maintaining a working relationship with the President, she began to openly undermine him, arguing that his role should be merely advisory and that the Eighth Amendment was undemocratic because it conferred extraordinary powers on the President. She openly clashed with Ishaq Khan over the appointment of judges and then retracted, beaten.

At the same time, she went hammer and tongs to destabilise the Opposition governments in Punjab and Sindh. She introduced the discredited people's programme under which her party workers were empowered to implement federally-funded projects in the provinces. It was like Congress(I) workers implementing the Jawahar Rozgar Yojana in India.

In another move, she completely bypassed the Pakistan Public Services Commission and opened an employment exchange in her own office. Through this expedient, she unabashedly recruited party workers and posted them at all levels of the federal and provincial bureaucracies. It was an amazingly brash attempt and only succeeded in further strengthening the resolve of her enemies, who finally arranged a no-confidence motion against her in November 1989.

She won that round, but with the barest of margins and was temporarily chastened. However, the retreat was only tactical. In the meantime, her two provincial allies broke away and joined the Opposition. In Sindh, this resulted in the escalation of ethnic violence and the army had to be called in. While Sindh burned, her failure to pressure India on the Kashmir issue fuelled the Opposition's propaganda against her. By this time, her opponents were up in arms—determined to bring about a final showdown.

In early 1990, the President opposed her budget and succeeded in amending it according to his desire. The Senate picked up the Shariat Bill and passed it. The army forced her to approve its list of transfers and appointments. And her opponents began planning another no-confidence motion.

Feeling the ground slipping under her, Benazir started her own political campaign. In mid-July 1990, the intelligence agencies reported to the President that this time too Benazir was likely to return with a formidable majority if elections were held. Once the establishment got wind of the news that she was secretly preparing for elections, it was time to act. Benazir Bhutto had to be stopped.

At about 4 pm on 6 August, 1990, Pakistani soldiers quietly took up position at all key points in the capital, Islamabad. Benazir's house was surrounded, her telephone lines were cut and her staff told to remain indoors.

Poll fraud?

Foreign observers dismiss Benazir's charges of rigging and bogus voting

Anybody who had been in Lahore two days before the 24 October, 1990, Pakistan general elections would have sworn that Benazir Bhutto was all set to make a spectacular comeback. It was the same euphoria that had greeted Benazir two years ago. This time too the crowds screamed: "Wazir-e-azam Benazir...raj karegi Benazir (Prime Minister Benazir...she will rule, Benazir)." Benazir had ended her campaign on the same triumphant note as the last time and the crowds had waited till the cold early morning hours of 22-23 October to catch a glimpse of her.

Virtually every political pundit in the country had predicted her return. Nobody spoke of an Opposition wave. According to the majority opinion, Benazir's alliance, the People's Democratic Alliance (PDA), would either get a majority or at least the same number of seats as it had got in the last elections. The worst case scenario for the PDA was 75-80 seats. And this, incidentally, was the estimate of the Pakistani intelligence agencies. As it turned out, PDA got just 45 seats. The results, needless to say, were truly astounding.

The pundits were stumped. There could only be two explanations: they had either completely failed to read the mind of the electorate or else the polls had been rigged. The rigging theory gained ground after the official statistics on voter turnout were released. In the 1988 polls, the turnout was recorded at about 43 per cent. This time, virtually every first-hand report on polling spoke of very low voter turnout. Yet, the official results showed that the turnout was actually higher than in 1988. Benazir immediately latched on to this discrepancy and declared that the polls had been massively rigged.

Benazir pointed out that even the chief election commissioner, after touring a number of polling stations, on 24 October, had remarked that voter turnout would not be more than 30-35 per cent. But the results showed the turnout at the incredible level of 47 per cent. She alleged that poll results had been tampered with in most Punjab constituencies (which account for 115 of the 207 general seats). A study of the Punjab seats won by the PDA showed about the same turnout as in 1988, or less.

ON THE ROADS

After her ouster, Benazir toured Pakistan, drawing huge crowds. But her opponents had succeeded in confusing the electorate by stressing that Benazir, Husband & Co. were corrupt

Benazir was not at home at the time. At 4.30, President Ishaq Khan convened a press conference, where General Aslam Beg was caught taking a peek at the assembled newsmen. The President announced: "The utility and the efficacy of the National Assembly as a representative institution elected by the people under the Constitution, and its mandate, is defeated by internal dissension and frictions, persistent and scandalous 'horse-trading' for political gain and furtherance of personal interests, corrupt practices and inducement, in contravention of the Constitution and the law, and by failure to discharge substantive legislative functions other than the adoption of the Finance Bill and further the National Assembly has lost the confidence of the people."

It was a cheap coup, made in the name of the people. For Benazir, the nightmare had begun once again. She and a handful of her close Cabinet colleagues were charged with corruption and special tribunals were set up for the trials. Back in Karachi, her husband, businessman Asif Zardari, was accused of influencing bank and

The question was, how had the results been tampered with? For, there had been no general outcry by PDA polling agents in any constituency. Benazir insisted that bogus votes had been added to the tally of 'JI candidates by pro-establishment election officials. But if this had been done, why had her polling agents across Punjab not protested en masse?

Most foreign observers were convinced that the polls had generally been free and fair. The biggest blow for Benazir was the post-election verdict given by the 40-member delegation from the National Democratic Institute for International Affairs (NDI), Washington DC. The NDI team was composed of representatives from a number of countries and its members had visited about 500 polling stations throughout the country on election day. The leaders of the NDI team, after collating reports from all their colleagues, concluded that they had not found any evidence of bogus voting or rigging of any kind. "We believe irregularities did not take place on a scale which could have altered the results," they said. They felt that the elections at this local level were "generally open, orderly and well-administered"; that the procedures used for balloting and counting were in accordance with law; and that the system afforded opportunities for the candidates to check for abuse.

Benazir's contention was that the rigging had been done by pro-administration election officials chosen and appointed by the IJI leadership. The rigging, according to her, had been conducted in an efficient and organised manner. In every constituency, 40-50 polling stations had been selected and in each of these the bogus votes had been added to the tally of the IJI candidates. In the next step, the booth level results were directly sent by the poll officials to the returning officer of the constituency, whose job was merely to total the returns from each polling station. Benazir claimed that certified copies of the station-wise results had not been given to polling agents to avoid cross-checking.

The former Pakistani Prime Minister could not, however, offer a proper explanation as to why there was not a peep from her polling agents on 24 October and why she was the only leader hollering 'foul'. The fact remained that Benazir had been outwitted. As far as Pakistan and the whole world was concerned, she had come a complete cropper in the poll process. It was a little too late to complain.

A COMPROMISE

Benazir was appointed PM more than a month after the 1988 elections. And after she had held prolonged discussions with President Ishaq and the army. But her antipathy to the Zia groupies soon became evident government decisions and of having coerced a non-resident Pakistani to deposit money in an associate's account. Subsequently, Zardari was arrested and clapped in prison. Begum Nusrat Bhutto had earlier departed for her home country, Iran, and Benazir was once again alone.

Benazir, in retrospect, had been dangerously naive in assuming that people's power is all that matters in Pakistan and that she, the heir of Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, was the sole custodian of that elusive power. In the end, she was proved wrong on both counts. She toured Pakistan, drawing huge crowds and considerable sympathy.

But her opponents too had mastered the art of campaigning. They succeeded in confusing the electorate by stressing that Benazir, husband and company were corrupt, that they had bartered national interest for their personal ends. Nawaz Sharif's men released letters, allegedly written by Benazir, asking for Indian intervention, and hammered home the point that Benazir had not passed a single legislation to fulfil her election promises. Even the United States' decision to suspend military and economic aid went against her. The IJI argued that Begum Bhutto had engineered the aid stoppage and that the Americans were trying to influence the Pakistani polls.

Any other person in Benazir's shoes would have run for cover. But she stood up to the challenge and fought, convinced till the very end that she would once again win. Whether the polls were rigged or whether she was defeated in a fair contest will always remain a matter of conjecture. What will never be in doubt is the fact that, one way or the other, it was the establishment that finally got the better of her. She remains, as the poll results demonstrate, the single most popular Pakistani leader with a national base. The only flaw in her make-up was her indecent haste. She thought that one election could dismantle a system General Zia had taken 11 years to build. •

I told you so!

A quick recap of how the scribes viewed the Golden Age of Vishwanath

The Rastrapati has given Weepy a fortnight to prove his majority on the floor of the House. The people have given him a fortnight to prove his minority on the floor of the House. And by 7 November, the Lok Sabha, in the immortal words of Oliver Cromwell, would have told VP: "For God's sake, go!"

Raja ki jayegi barat
Rangeeli hogi raat
Magar mein ro-ungi!

But whyfor "ro-ungi" (and in any case, it should be "ro-unga") as my friend Sharad Yadav would say? I'll tell you whyfor. First they got rid of the Tau. This column survived—but only just! Now they're getting rid of Weepy. Can this column survive that blow? But before this column is consigned to the dustbin of history, here—as Vinod Dua would say (and you know why he is on all our minds!)—is a brief recap of how we scribes have viewed this Golden Age of Vishwanath:

IN THE BEGINNING DEPTT

"Thank God, it's V.P. Singh. He is the obvious choice. He only deserves it."
—STATESMAN, 'People's three cheers for V.P. Singh' (1/12/89)

"We join the people in extending our good wishes to Mr V.P. Singh. He not only deserves but requires the nation's good wishes in tackling the tremendous tasks that lie ahead."
—ECONOMIC TIMES, Editorial (2/12/89)

"Mr V.P. Singh's ascension to power as the Prime Minister marks a historic point in the country's politics...There is no doubt that, like Mr Gorbachev, Mr V.P. Singh too will bring many revolutionary changes in politics and the economy and in other spheres of national life."
—K. Kasturi Rangan, DINAMANI (3/12/89)
Courtesy: INDIA SPEAKS (11/12/89)

"(V.P. Singh) has been called indecisive, inept, infirm. But he has trudged along regardless. When the party has failed him, or tried to pull him down, he has trodden a solitary path. In the end, others have been forced to fall in line. These are remarkable qualities and are certain to stand him in good stead as he seeks to grapple with the tumult that lies ahead..."
—TIMES OF INDIA, Editorial (2/12/89)

PARDON, YOUR SLIP IS SHOWING DEPTT

"...But there will still be reservations about him."
—TIMES OF INDIA, Editorial (2/12/89)

GUSH-GUSH DEPTT

"V.P. Singh is in South Block and he brings to his office, to use his own words, the scent of the dust of India's villages. Long may it linger. A new government has been installed and a new dawn, albeit a misty one, is in sight."
—Tavleen Singh, INDIAN EXPRESS (10/12/89)

JOKE OF THE YEAR DEPTT

"Mr Devi Lal rose above the lure of power and annointed Mr V.P. Singh. By this action, Mr Devi Lal has sent a message to all doubting Thomases that the Janata Dal will not come apart by infighting."
—Editor Prabhash Joshi, 'Uncle Devi Lal's Blessings', JANSATTA (2/12/89)

PREDICTION OF THE DECADE DEPTT

"Watch out for V.P. Singh. He's going to be around for a long, long time."
—SUNDAY (31/12/89)

SECOND THOUGHTS ANYONE? DEPTT

"Shahid Siddiqui: Mufti Saheb, you are the first Muslim home minister of India. How do you feel?
Mufti Mohammed Sayeed: The Prime Minister has displayed great trust in me by giving me this tremendous responsibility...For the first time in the history of this country, its Prime Minister has taken the daring decision to hand over the charge of the home ministry to me, a Muslim, to create confidence among the minorities—a step which even Jawaharlal Nehru could not take."
—Interview in NAI DUNIYA (15/12/89)

LOVE ME, LOVE MY DOG DEPTT

"It must be counted as truly remarkable that Mr V.P. Singh should have been able to assemble a team without too much fuss or delay...He can be said to have assembled an impressive as well as representative group of men and, so far, a single woman, who would do credit to any administration."
—STATESMAN, Editorial (6/12/89)

HATE YOU, HATE YOUR DOG DEPTT

"Singh and his allies—the BJP—have proved convincingly that Rajiv is no longer a factor...The Congress is licking its wounds, praying for a miracle that might yet save the party...Much as M.J. Akbar may vouch for Rajiv's sagacity or Mani Shankar Aiyar sing hosannas to the man, there are not many people who believe that Rajiv has the skill or the acumen to manoeuvre himself back to the centre-stage of national politics."

—Pritish Nandy, THE ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY (11/3/90)

SEE NO EVIL, HEAR NO EVIL DEPTT

"V.P. Singh has already proved one thing: his capacity for conjuring miracles...Time is still on V.P. Singh's side. Popular perceptions too continue to support him. He is seen as a man who keeps his pledges and is endowed with an indefatigable sense of purpose."
—Indranil Banerjie & Rajiv Shukla, SUNDAY (21/1/90)

"None can doubt that the National Front government has seriously settled down to business. There are major differences in its functioning, its 'atmosphere', from the Rajiv Gandhi government...It has proved to be a far more liberal government, more consensus-oriented, less faddist and less paranoic."
—INDIA TODAY, Comment (15/2/90)

SUCK-SUCK DEPTT

"What most people do not realise is that Singh is a clever, in fact, canny political player...amazing astuteness...He would rather step down from office on a matter of principle than cling to power, making compromises."
—Pritish Nandy, ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY (27/5/90)

POLITICAL ILLITERACY DEPTT

"I am amazed at the public support V.P. Singh is drawing, recreating as it were the magic of Jayaprakash Narayan...He might end up stalking the corridors of history as a Prime Minister India will remember. Not for sartorial elegance; nor for his lineage. Not even for the way he has outsmarted his adversaries. But because he has a feel for politics at the ground level and knows how to skilfully turn it to his advantage."
—Pritish Nandy, ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY (11/3/90)

BLINKERS FOR MY EYES, PLEASE DEPTT

"The title: Star Trek II. The star: V.P. Singh...The crowds materialised from thin air, held spell-bound by the simple little homilies, the snatches of self-penned verse and the gentle chiding that has become his campaign trademark...In his inimitable Allahabadi diction, he comes across as sober and sincere and a man who clearly has a finger on the pulse of the people."
—Bhaskar Roy, INDIA TODAY (15/3/90)

PUNDITS CAN BE PUNTERS TOO DEPTT

"To prove the efficacy of his government, V.P. Singh does not have to perform any wonders...If for the first two or three years he manages to keep the National Front government reasonably intact, he will be perceived as a successful Prime Minister because he will have demolished one powerful myth: that only the Congress can provide stable governments at the Centre."
—Vinod Mehta, SUNDAY (17/12/89)

WASTED ADVICE DEPTT

"If the Prime Minister is wise, he will not—given the fractured nature of his support—attempt to introduce too many radical policies. Instead, he will use his powers to launch a clean-up operation to give the people of India a government that they feel they can trust...Then, within a year or so, he will call fresh elections and ask the people to give him the mandate required to finish the job...None of this is difficult to do. The trouble with India's politicians, of course, is that they find 20 complicated reasons for refusing to do the obvious thing."
—Editor Vir Sanghvi, SUNDAY (3/12/89)

PRESCIENCE DEPTT

"The minority status of the government is working like a lucky charm. In spite of severe infighting and factionalism, none of the constituents of the National Front government is willing to break away from it. Similarly, the two parties which are supporting the government from outside are loathe to kill the hen which is laying them their golden eggs. But for how long can Mr V.P Singh run the government with such fickle and treacherous partners?"
—Suneet Ghosh, ANANDABAZAR PATRIKA (9/6/90)
Courtesy: INDIA SPEAKS (19/6/90)

YOU SAID IT! DEPTT

"Strange are the ways of the national press. The fourth estate is busy lavishing praise on the Prime Minister. The trouble is that, of late, the Prime Minister has not given any ground for praise. So, the press has resorted to congratulating the man merely for continuing in office!...Remaining in office has been his main achievement. He has survived by throwing his election promises to the winds, burying honesty in politics, bidding farewell to secularism and ignoring the growth of secessionist forces. Now he is ready to include in his proposed 'national government' the very Rajiv Gandhi who he said should flee to Italy! But the press may praise him for this too. For, after all, V.P. Singh is the print media's Prime Minister."
—Cho Ramaswamy, TUGHLAQ (15/6/90)

WISDOM DAWNS DEPTT

"Scattered all over the country is a small but committed section of voters who are India's real kingmakers. We call this group the Yukavati, an acronym for yuvak (youth), karamchari (salariat), vakil (lawyers) and teachers...The mood of the electorate in 1989 was anti-Congress thanks to Yukavati...After 100 days of the V.P. Singh government, it is this very Yukavati which is full of bitterness. They believed that V.P. Singh's high ethical standards would make an impact on policy-making and policies. No one thought that,

An art and objects exhibition at London's National Portrait Gallery evokes British India like never before

The Raj curry

London is overwhelmed. There is simply no other way to put it. For a people brought up on a heavy diet of Kipling, Scott and Kaye, here is yet another chance of tallyhoing back to the 'glorious' days of Indian summers, punkhawalas and memsahibs.

A five month-long exhibition of Raj paintings and memorabilia—titled 'The Raj: India and the British, 1600-1947'—opened at London's prestigious National Portrait Gallery on 19 October. And the crowds have not stopped streaming in.

The Raj has always held a fascination for Britons, and the organisers of the show played on this key point. Even the title was carefully chosen; another title, confess the organisers, like 'Glories of the Orient' or something similar would have ensured that the exhibition was a washout.

The biggest attraction is a life-size elephant, complete with armour worn at the battle of Plassey in 1757. (The elephant was transported from its home in the Tower of London complex in an operation the organisers call a "nightmare".) Other exhibits, though not quite as massive, but impressive nonetheless, are as riveting. British painters of the 18th and 19th centuries such as Johann Zoffany, Tilly Kettle, Thomas Hickey, Sir Joshua Reynolds and William Daniels have their works displayed. So is a Prabhu Dayal poster and Raj snapshots by Narayan Vinayak Virkar, a prominent 19th century Bombay photographer.

In all, there are over 500 paintings and a hundred objets d'art on show, making it the biggest ever exhibition to be held at the gallery, and its first on the Raj. To add spice to an already heady presentation, the gallery is organising a series of lectures by historians—Judith Brown, Peter Marshall and K.N. Chaudhary, among others—and films such as Satyajit Ray's Shatranj Ke Khilari, Aparna Sen's 36 Chowringhee Lane and James Ivory/Ismail Merchant's Shakespearewallah.

The exhibition is divided into four major sections, devised chronologically. Mughal India and the rise of the East India Company, 1600-1800; Company supremacy and Indian resistance, 1800-1858; The Victorian Raj and the rise of Indian nationalism, 1858-1914; and, finally, the road to Independence and Partition, 1914-1947. On display are many previously unexhibited offerings, culled from collections at the India Office library in London, the Imperial War Museum, The Royal Commonwealth Society, The Museum of Mankind, the British Museum, The Victoria and Albert Museum, and from private collections in India and the USA.

Tilly Kettle's oil on canvas of a dancing girl: Raj colours come alive

Side-stepping the usual manner of blindly overdosing the public with stereotypes, the gallery ensured that the exhibition was not only elephants, snake charmers and tiger shoots, however fascinating a slice of history they may be. Also, the organisers decided that they would try and present both sides of the story, the British-eye view of the Raj, as well as how the Indians saw it. Cambridge University historian Christopher Bayly, chief organiser of the exhibition, wanted to also maintain a careful balance between objects from India, and those from Pakistan and Bangladesh. For two reasons. One, because Pakistan and Bangladesh formed the greater India of the British era. And two, because governments of both countries were keen that their national traditions were fully represented.

While the British painters—Zoffany, Kettle, Reynolds, et al—detail the British image of the East India Company and its conquests, the works of Indian artists serve to counterbalance this view. If the 'Company'

A water colour of a durbar procession during Emperor Akbar's reign: a panoramic history painters tended to show the British as munificent patrons, the subcontinent's artists and photographers used Indian myths, traditions and real life themes or personalities--and sometimes, a fusion of these--as motifs to throw a challenge to Britannia.

Hence, the symbolic use of Kali in several paintings and oleograph posters showing the conquest of the British by the forces of shakti. Hence, again, the poster by turn-of-the-century painter Prabhu Dayal, titled Bharatuddhar (or the liberation of India), where Mahatma Gandhi is depicted as Shiva protecting Markandeya (here, Mother India) from the clutches of Yamraj (the British). In a lighter vein, there is a poster showing a viceroy, Lord Curzon, in the form of an all-encompassing Ganesh

The exhibition also shows a darker India, of 'suttee' and the 'thuggee' cults But even here, contrasting British views are shown. While Zoffany showed the widows as brave, almost glorious, a depiction by Thomas Rowlandson brings out the harsh, grotesque truth of widow burning.

The Mutiny and the struggle for independence inspired numerous works of art both by the British and Indians. 'In Memoriam", an oil painting by Sir Joseph Noel Paton shows the women of an English family huddling together as Indian mutineers enter their home, with mayhem in their eyes. On the other hand, Indian artists concentrate more on the popular, heroic. Mutiny figures. Rani Lakshmibai, Tantia Tope and Nana Phadnavis.A political pamphlet, 'Awake Awake , banned by the British in 1908--the time of Bengal's partition--and now preserved in the India Office library, forms part of the Indian resistance section of the exhibition.

Some more history, and some more of unpleasant [illegible] photographs of labourers in bengal, scenes at a jute factory and [illegible] are fascinating. Equally fascinating are the depressing [illegible] the Bombay plague of 18[illegible] Photographs recording the Jallianwala Bagh massacre, the [illegible] and pre-Independence [illegible] sessions brought [illegible] Nehru Memorial Museum [illegible] Library in New Delhi [illegible] show, as a 1929 sketch of Rabindranath Tagore by Amit Bose. The sketch, in particular, is important, as it [illegible] introduced the European style of portraiture in Bengal.

That it might take more than one visit to the gallery to see everything is an understatement. And a visit has a bonus for those who wish to preserve memories--and even for those who do not make it; the gallery has printed a sumptuous 432-page catalogue, priced at pound sterling 19.95 (about Rs 700), which is a collector's dream. The taste of this Raj curry is sure to linger on long after the exhibition ends next March. Bon apetit. •

Doordarshan shortchanges a serial by M.S. Sathyu

You cannot exactly tool around with a man who made a film like Garam Hawa. Doordarshan did. And M.S. Sathyu is livid Doordarshan (DD) pulled out Sathyu's Hindi TV serial Kayar (Rope) from the prime time nine pm slot and instead, gave it the late night slot. The reason: the DD review committee found Kayar starring Anjan Srivastav, Sreela Majumdar, Anant Mahadevan and Arundhati Nag, among others -too "adult" for public viewing.

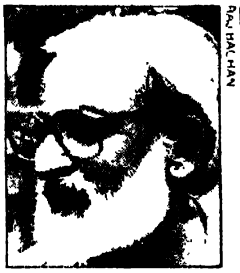
Now, for the flaws in the argument One: If DD could show Tamas at prime time,what is wrong with Kayar? Yes, Tamas had communalism and violence, not sex, but it was very disturbing, nevertheless. And as real-life as sexual overtones can be. Two: Kayar is based on a book of the same title by Thakazhi Sivasankara Pillai, considered an opus in Malayalam literary circles, and won for the author the prestigious Jnanpith award in 1984. If literateurs -indeed, the government—found it good enough for an award, why should DD act as if it has blinkers on?

And three: Kayar tells the story of life in a remote village in the waterlogged Kuttanad region of Kerala, a tale spanning 150 years– upto the 1970s -and six generations of a joint family, which begins to break up with the passage of time. It shows social, cultural and economic changes wrought on the village, with one theme binding the parts together: man's greed for land.

Sathyu claims that after the serial's plot was approved—and here lies flaw number four of the argument—DD officials led him on to believe that it was prime time material. So, he spent Rs two lakhs shooting the first seven episodes; his sponsors had made it very clear that they were willing to back the serial only if it made prime time. Now, however, Sathyu is in a fix, as there are hardly any sponsors for late night shows.

Sathyu is maintaining an angry silence—prudent, perhaps, as talk can cost him the serial entirely, thanks to some obscure babu in DD. But Thakazhi has nothing to lose. "They (DD officials) should be horse-whipped on the steps of Mandi House (DD's headquarters in Delhi)," says the outraged author. "The least I can say is that their notions about obscenity are perverted." Concurs Krishnan Nair, considered to be the finest critic of Malayalam literature: "I cannot see any obscenity in the novel. And the scenes which were found objectionable by Doordarshan are an artistic necessity."



DD may have a fight on its hands. Kerala's minister for cultural affairs and Communist Party of India (Marxist) strongman, has written a stiff letter to Union information and broadcasting minister P. Upendra, asking him to allot Kayar a prime time slot. Besides, all MPs from Kerala have already objected to Kayar being shifted to a late night slot.

Kayar is power-packed. The story begins in 19th century Kerala, when the matriarchal system was at its peak, and the dominant upper castes, the arch-conservative Nairs, were land owners. When, there were not too many taboos on sex or on sexual relationships. It was a society where even an illegitimate child had rights in a Nair family. A Nair woman could take the man of her choice, and if she was fed up with him, she could end the relationship by just placing a pillow and a mat outside her bedroom, which the man accepted as signifying divorce. Everything had to be orderly, and breaking the code of conduct meant social ostracisation, and in some cases, death. "In my novel," says Thakazhi, "I have tried to portray life in all its reality."

So has Sathyu, in the serial. And for that, DD asked him to wipe out an entire episode, the sixth. The episode deals with Kalyani Pillai -played by Arundhati Nag—a charming Nair woman who gets seduced by a land-classifier, Kochu Pillai, and gets pregnant When her uncle, the head of the joint family, hears of this, he gets furious and starts to beat Kalyani In desperation, Kalyani drops the dhoti she is wearing, and runs, the undressing more to deter her uncle. At worst feel critics, DD could have asked for the scene to be deleted, but not the entire episode "It is in this desperation of a woman who sheds her clothes to save herself from being killed that the Doordarshan experts have found sex."

Right now, DD is emphatic about sticking to its stand. It the end, however, Sathyu may have to compromise on one scene. DD, on the other hand, may have to compromise on the serial. •

The day after

Advani's arrest triggers off countrywide communal violence

RIOTS

There was blood in the streets. About 83 people died in the continual communal violence since 24 October--the day the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) called a nationwide strike in protest against the arrest of its party president, L.K. Advani. As SUNDAY went to press, 53 people were reported dead in Rajasthan alone. In Gujarat, the toll stood at seven, and in West Bengal, it mounted to 14. Karnataka had six dead, and Andhra Pradesh, Tamil Nadu and Maharashtra one each.

There was a dramatic build-up to the arrest of L.K. Advani. The climax was on 23 October. The BJP chief was on his way to Ayodhya in his Ram rath when he was stopped at Samastipur, in Bihar, at 6 am that morning. Advani was scheduled to reach Ayodhya, in UP, to launch the kar seva for the construction of a Ram temple at the site where the Babri Masjid now stands. And his yatra, which began in the temple town of Somnath, had fanned enough communal passions on its gruelling 10,000 km route to make the government sit up and take action.

Advani's arrest was always on the cards. Mulayam Singh Yadav, the UP chief minister, had declared that his government would halt the BJP chief at Deoria on the Bihar-UP border. He felt that a communal powder keg was filling up in the state and Advani's entry would provide the deadly spark. What was not anticipated, however, was that Bihar chief minister Laloo Prasad Yadav would be the one to pick up the gauntlet. So, as security forces whisked Advani away from the Samastipur Circuit House to a remote, hill-top bungalow at Massanjore, in Dumka, on the Bihar-West Bengal border, the BJP withdrew its support to the National Front government at the Centre and called a nationwide bandh for the following day.

The BJP's call led to an eruption of communal violence in some states while only clashes were reported from the parts where the bandh was sought to be enforced.

GOPAL SUNGER

Burnt shops in Jaipur: a trail of destruction

RAJASTHAN: The worst affected was Jaipur city, which was never particularly known to be communally sensitive. But in one day's violence, 30 people were killed on 24 October in Jaipur and hundreds were grievously hurt, adding to the toll on the following days. Earlier, when Advani's rath passed through the state, large scale rioting had been apprehended as the Muslims had called a bandh in protest. Even chief minister Bhairon Singh Shekhawat had admitted that the situation was inflammable. Surprisingly, the yatra had passed peacefully. But, 11 days later, the news of Advani's arrest in Bihar had an electrifying effect. On 23 October itself, shops downed shutters, although the bandh was called on the following day, and the mood turned distinctly sulien and ominous.

It was black Wednesday in the Pink City on the 24th as groups of BJP, Bajrang Dal and Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP) activists took over the city. What sparked off the violence was, however, a rumour that a child was being held in a place of worship by one community. And in a situation where rumour mills work overtime, this story proved to be the last straw. A large mob gathered at the religious site and all hell broke loose

A police contingent rushed to the spot, to find itself piteously outnumbered by the rioters. Repeated lathicharges and bursting of teargas shells failed to quell the mob. Seven people died in the firing and a policeman was killed in the cross-fire by late afternoon. Trouble spread to other cities like Jodhpur and Beawar also and an indefinite curfew was clamped on all three places. But before the security forces could restore any semblace of normalcy, shops and business establishments were looted and torched, and several persons stabbed. Eyewitness accounts claim that some BJP and VHP activists forced shopkeepers to open up and went on a looting spree before setting the shops alight.

The frenzy, in fact, increased after the imposition of curfew, and the bewildered administration sent out SOS signals to the army. Strangely, it took the army, known for its quick deployment capabilities, almost four hours to move in. Even that did not improve matters immediately. That night 22 people were burnt alive in a Jaipur locality.

GUJARAT: In Ahmedabad, trouble started a day earlier, on the 23rd itself. Four persons were killed and ten injured in a burst of violence as soon as the news of Advani's detention reached the state. Overzealous BJP workers tried to enforce an instant bandh. Next day, two more people died, this time in police firing and stone throwing as rampaging mobs made central government buildings their specific targets. Two MLAs, Kantibhai Kachoria and Vithalbhai Shah were arrested for violating prohibitory orders and instigating the people, even as the bandh call evoked good response. At least 2,000 people were arrested on charges of rioting.

MADHYA PRADESH: The state lived up to its reputation of communal tolerance. Though its politics is dominated by the BJP, the bandh was marked by restraint both on the part of the people and the administration. Despite sporadic violence in Dhar, where six people were injured in a bomb blast, no deaths were reported.

The state BJP regime, led by Sunderlal Patwa, had anticipated trouble and clamped prohibitory measures in Ujjain, Tikamgarh, Shajalpur at the very first signs of unrest.

KARNATAKA: The wounds of Bidar had not fully healed when another bout of frenzy sent shockwaves through the state. Three persons were stabbed to death in the town of Kolar and two others died in police firing at Mulbagal, in southern Karnataka.The security forces fired on a violent mob also in Hassan district and Mangalore, where vehicles and shops were set on fire. The bandh, partially or totally successful in Karnataka towns, showed that the BJP had cut into an area that had traditionally been a Congress and Janata stronghold.

WEST BENGAL: The state administration knew at least 24 hours in advance that Advani was going to be arrested on the morning of 23 October. It had, therefore, made quick preparations to cope with a crisis situation. But despite the precautions, untoward incidents could not be avoided.

Though the bandh was a complete failure in the state, clashes broke out

In the gilded cage

A glimpse of the royal prisoner

As the National Front government totters on the edge of a precipice, its most celebrated prisoner waits in his comfortable Alcatraz in Massanjore, Bihar. From the balcony of his second floor suite, the BJP president has a view of the rolling waters of the Massanjore Dam, the lush woodlands of Dumka and the policemen doggedly patrolling the driveway upto the house. The inspection bungalow of the Bihar government is a high security prison for one man arrested on 24 October for driving his rath towards his holy grail—the temple-mosque of Ayodhya.

Ten kilometres from the fortified house-on-the-hill, policemen, cradling bolt-action rifles and automatic weapons, manned the checkposts. "No one is allowed to go any further," the officer-in-charge warned with a cold-eyed belligerence. "All roads are blocked."

But one road, a dusty cart-track, snaking its way through paddy fields and impoverished Santhal villages,was not. "There's another route," a 17-year old schoolboy BJP supporter whispered, and volunteered to be the guide. A few kilometres away stood the bungalow, a pale grey in the morning mist. Unsuspecting securitymen of the Bihar Police and the CISF sitting in a circle at the entrance, barely looked up as the car sped through the drive. At the driveway only one paunchy policeman attempted to stop the vehicle.

"How did you get here? Weren't there any checkpoints on the road?" asked the disbelieving senior police officer after refusing to consider all requests to meet Advani. "He is our prisoner. No one is allowed to see him."

But on the second floor verandah overlooking the driveway where five police jeeps, two other vehicles and an ambulance waited, stood Advani sipping tea and reading the previous day's paper. As the photographer aimed his Nikon at him, the BJP president did a courtly namaste, smiled and waved. The cameras clicked and our questions were lost in the steady rumble of the dam's waters. Policemen, menacingly waving their batons, were advancing. As Advani flapped his paper for the last time and turned away, it was time to retreat. Ahead, after bluffing one's way through another roadblock, lay a long trip back to Calcutta. • in certain sensitive pockets, and two people were killed in police firing in Burdwan and Nadia districts. But a red alert was signalled the next day when three people were killed in a sudden outbreak of communal fury in Howrah's Pilkhana bustee and another ten were hacked to death in Purulia district.

Advani in the Massanjore bungalow: lonely at the top

The Pilkhana bustee was an inspiration for Dominique La Pierre's City of Joy. But on the night of 25 October it was plunged in gloom. This was a spillover of earlier clashes in a nearby suburban town where the Hindus and the Muslims had fought a pitched-battle when the VHP brought out a procession.

The state home secretary attributed the Purulia clashes to a series of rumours which lent communal colour to a road accident. A motor-cyclist knocked down a man, killing him on the spot. But the word went round that it was a case of planned communal murder. And, in the madness that followed, ten people were killed.

Pilkhana: the left slips

Chief minister Jyoti Basu squarely blamed the BJP for the unexpected violence and urged his party workers to be extra-vigilant. Evidently the Marxists had grown complacent while the BJP was making a frantic bid to gain a toe-hold in the state.

BIHAR: It was feared that the state would go up in flames. But, mercifully, it didn't. The bandh was largely successful in parts of central and south Bihar, but the government of chief minister Laloo Prasad Yadav managed to keep the BJP activists on a leash.

Significantly, there were no killings in Bihar, though incidents of arson and looting were reported from Sitamarhi, Darbhanga, Dumka and south Bihar. In Patna, shops remained closed and Yadav went around the city in the afternoon, to oversee security arrangements and preach communal harmony, very conscious of his responsibilities. He had shown that he had the guts to arrest Advani. Now he had to ensure that his state did not succumb to communal passions. And he was largely successful, though only a year back Bihar had been rocked by a gruesome riot in Bhagalpur

UTTAR PRADESH: The epicentre of the Ram Janmabhoomi-Babri Masjid controversy was guarded like a fortress. Chief minister Mulayam Singh Yadav had played tough from the very beginning and the BJP and its allies, the VHP and the Bajrang Dal, could do little to dent his armour. In Lucknow, the state capital, the bandh was complete. In Meerut and Aligarh, which have the most notorious records of communal carnage, the bandh passed off peacefully.

Evidently, Mulayam achieved the impossible. And to do that he had ordered the systematic arrest of BJP, VHP and Bajrang Dal workers.

Events during the bandh and after proved one thing for certain: that communal clashes, even in the most sensitive of areas, can be avoided, if the administration is truly keen on preventing them. If Mulayam, Laloo and Sunderlal Patwa could pre-empt a flare-up in UP, Bihar and Madhya Pradesh, there is no way in which the failures of Bhairon Singh Shekhawat and Chimanbhai Patel in Rajasthan and Gujarat can be explained away. Unless, of course, one concedes that some leaders are more keen on playing with fire than others. ●

The bandh in support of the Mandal proposals is total

TAMIL NADU

On 23 October, Tamil Nadu was set on a different trajectory altogether. While, according to Bihar chief minister Laloo Prasad Yadav, "an atmosphere of fear" gripped the country following the arrest of L.K. Advani, Tamil Nadu observed a bandh in support of the Mandal Commission recommendations. The bandh, called by the ruling DMK and its allies, brought life in the state to a standstill in protest against the anti-reservation agitation in northern India and the vitiated communal atmosphere prevailing in the country over the Ram Janmabhoomi-Babri Masjid controversy.

The DMK, which held a meeting on 15 October with "like-minded" parties and some Scheduled Caste organisations to finalise the bandh plan, did not invite the Congress(I) or the AIADMK. DMK chief M. Karunanidhi felt that the two organisations were against the Mandal recommendations and were shifting their stand far too often. However, a splinter group of the AIADMK attended the meeting.

Karunanidhi's one embarrassment was, however, the snubbing he received from the CPI(M), the DMK's ally in the state Assembly. "The Marxists have expressed support for the Mandal report but are not participating in the bandh. I do not know the reasons," the DMK chief remarked when questioned on the issue.

But the rationale behind the bandh was not immediately clear. Almost all the parties in the state have backed the Mandal report and the DMK's target wasn't obvious. Some political observers feel that it was directed against the Centre's failure to get the Supreme Court stay order on the Mandal recommendations vacated.

Asking for the Bill

Biju prepares the legal ground to whack JB

ORISSA

For some time now, chief minister Biju Patnaik's overriding obsession has been J B Patnaik. Ever since he came to power, in March, Biju is out to finish JB with a hefty club of corruption charges. And he has decided to attack not only the former Congress(I) chief minister, but also his followers and sympathisers in politics and the state bureaucracy.

If Biju has failed miserably in fulfilling most of his poll promises, he is firm on his pledge of fighting corruption and is relentlessly gunning for JB and his associates. And his latest salvo has been the adoption of a Bill in the state Assembly, which empowers the government to set up special courts to try politicians and government officials on charges of corruption.

The Orissa Special Courts Bill, 1990, still awaiting presidential assent, is seen as a unique measure to fight corruption. The Bill gives the government the power to confiscate a person's property before and during the trial and states that such property would be returned to the accused with an interest of 12 per cent in the event of aquittal.

The Congress(I) tried to fight the Bill, terming it "draconian" and pointing out that a person was likely to be rendered homeless, if disputed residential houses were also taken over. The option in such cases was to deposit a sum of money, equivalent to the value of the property, with the government and stay on. The Bill has been carefully worded to plug possibilities of the special court's verdict being challenged in the Supreme Court. The only length a contestant can hope to go is upto the Orissa High Court.

Biju cannot really be faulted for introducing the Bill. The ten-year rule of J.B. Patnaik was marked by an unprecedented level of corruption and Biju had made it an effective campaign plank against the Congress before the parliamentary and Assembly polls.

But what makes the Bill seem dreadfully vengeful is the fact that, initially, it was made applicable only to the 1980-89 period, during which the Congress(I) was in power in the state. It was only when the Congress(I) and other critics of the Janata Dal raised a hue and cry about Biju's real intentions that the Bill was amended. But its preamble still sets the tone with disparaging remarks about the Eighties: it identifies the decade as the notorious period when corruption peaked in Orissa.

Biju Patnaik: aggressive

If Biju's earlier actions in which he had ordered random raids on the houses of J.B. Patnaik and other Congress(I) leaders as well as some government officials close to the former chief minister are any indication of the shape of things to come, the Congress(I) leaders would do well to prepare for some rearguard action. If the Bill receives the President's assent, Biju will be armed with a formidable legal weapon and JB and his followers would become vulnerable to damaging legal proceedings.

The political upheaval at the Centre and the possibilites of the National Front regime collapsing, following the withdrawal of support by the BJP, is unlikely to bail the Congress(I) leadership out of trouble. If anything, the crisis could increase the Janata Dal government's eagerness to prove its credentials as an uncompromising crusader against corruption. ●

Master stroke

Arjun Singh outwits the Congress(I) high command

MADHYA PRADESH

With the Congress(I)'s hasty decision to appoint tribal MP Arvind Netam as the acting president of the Pradesh Congress(I) Committee (PCC-I) things seem to be going the Karnataka way in Madhya Pradesh. It all began with the illness of Arjun Singh, the PCC(I) chief and former chief minister of the state. Singh was undergoing treatment in Delhi and had been advised complete bed rest. But that did not in any way hamper the running of the party, not until the high command stepped in and made Netam the de facto chief.

The brain behind the move was

Arjun Singh: playing it cool

Aslam Sher Khan. In July, Khan had a row with Singh during a rally at Bhopal. Singh retaliated by suspending Khan from the party. However, the Congress(I) president, Rajiv Gandhi, revoked Singh's action. When Singh fell ill and was hospitalised in Bhopal, Khan lost no time in moving the party president to apply the 'Karnataka-formula', and remove Singh in view of his 'unfortunate sickness'.

In a letter to the high command, Khan suggested the formation of a committee with representatives from all factions of the Congress. Among those suggested by him were the names of Moti Lal Vora (general), Dilip

Singh Bhuriya (tribals), Aziz Qureshi (minorities), Radha Kishan Malviya (Harijans) and B.R. Yadav (backward castes). He indicated that Vora would be acceptable to all, but argued that since the Janata Dal had V.C. Shukla, a Brahmin, as its state chief, it would be wiser to have someone from the backward castes who could draw the minority votes.

The list of committees formed to monitor the panchayat polls has a majority of Singh-supporters and very few of Shukla or Vora's followers

The party agreed to the proposal by appointing Arvind Netam as the acting PCC(I) chief to the rejoicing of all anti-Singh groups in the Congress(I), especially those owing allegiance to former chief ministers Moti Lal Vora and Shyama Charan Shukla. Thus, an impression was created that Singh's writ will no longer run within the PCC(I).

Arjun Singh, however, did not show any signs of panic. He asked Netam to cooperate with all the members until he was back to handle the November-December panchayat elections in the state. In an appeal to Congress(I) workers, he stressed the fact that they should work unitedly towards their goal of winning the elections.

Arjun Singh's silent and controlled backlash did not end there. His blue-eyed boy, Thakur Jagat Singh, Rajya Sabha member and general secretary of the PCC(I), announced the list of committees formed to monitor the panchayat poll programmes in the districts which are entrusted with the job of allotting party tickets and preparing a poll strategy. The list announced by Thakur has a majority of Singh-supporters and very few of Shukla or Vora's followers.

Shukla had no option but to complain. He publicly protested that Thakur had not shown the list to acting president Netam before announcing it. The anti-Singh faction is now trying its level best to undo the mischief by changing the list. But the ailing Arjun Singh, lying on his hospital bed, seems to have had the last laugh. •

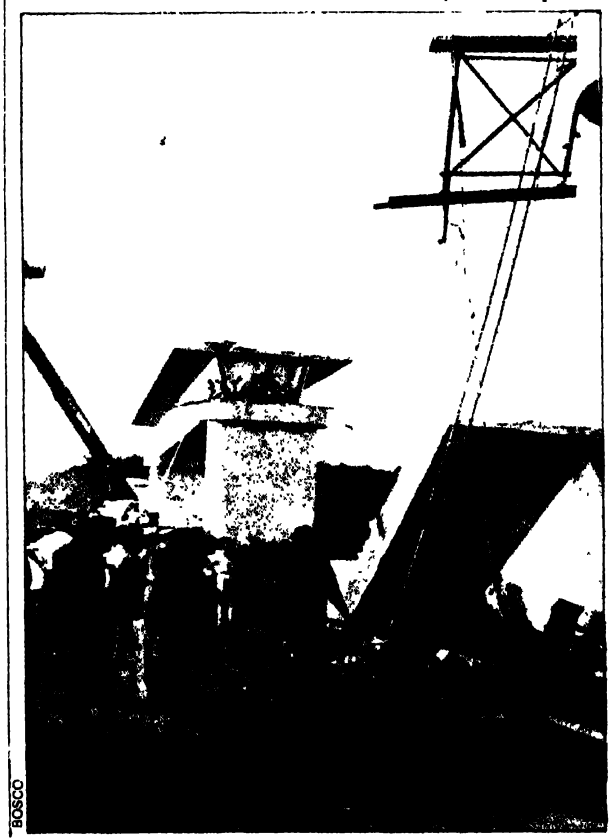
Falling down, falling down...

Another bridge collapses on the Mandovi

GOA



One could call it black magic, coincidence, or simply bad luck. Again, a bridge under construction collapsed, just a stone's throw away from where another had, four years ago. To add to the 'occult' occurrence, the journalist who had predicted the tragedy in 1986, warned the authorities again about the impending disaster in the 25 June issue of the Gomantak Times. In spite of the warning, no action was taken and the bridge crashed, killing five and severely injuring many.

The tragedy occurred on the evening of 14 October. A recently erected 750 tonne, 50 metre-long span of the bridge—the part between two adjacent supports—sank and partially disappeared in the placid Mandovi. Of the 60 odd workers of the Uttar Pradesh Bridge Corporation (UPBC), the firm entrusted with the construction work, five died on the spot while 28 others had to be hospitalised.

Chief minister L.P. Barbosa declared that he had 'sacked' the PWD chief engineer (bridges) R. Mathur twenty days earlier, on charges of corruption, and put U.P. Palondekar, of the Command Area Development Authority (Irrigation department) in his place. Police investigations, however, revealed that Mathur had not been 'sacked' but was on paid leave.

Apparently, Mathur had been brought on deputation from Uttar Pradesh, the post of chief engineer being created for him, to ensure that the new bridge was built as per specifications. He certified all construction work till 4 October, and was thus responsible for the span that gave way.

"He was the main person responsible while casting the span on 26 September," says Matanhy Saldanha, a Gomant Lox Pox leader. "How can he escape being punished?" But while

BOSCO

The 750 tonne, 50-metre-long span of the bridge sank and partially disappeared in the placid Mandovi. Of the 60 workers at the site, five died on the spot seven engineers have been suspended and five of them, along with four UPBC officers, arrested for criminal neglect of duty, Mathur is free. Despite the court's refusal to grant him anticipatory bail, Mathur has neither been arrested, nor penalised in any way.

Thus the arrest of the engineers is widely being viewed as a witch-hunt for scapegoats. According to an engineer at the site, the span collapsed at the fag-end of the complicated but necessary exercise of removing the shuttering. Only two plates were left to be removed. "All the requiredtests had been done," said K.K. Sarin, director general, ministry of surface transport. "The results showed that the concrete had gained enough strength to allow the removal of the shuttering."

The only reason for the bridge collapse can be the failure of the truss (the supporting framework), according to knowledgeable sources. The UPBC, which brought the truss, and Tandon Consultancy, which designed it, are the two most likely to get penalised, apart from Mathur. The Goa PWD Junior Engineers' Association and the Goa Government Engineers Federation have expressed solidarity with the suspended and arrested engineers, and have condemned the action against them.

"The PWD officials were suspended because we have to order a judicial enquiry into the matter and I don't want anybody to tamper with the evidence," said chief minister Barbosa. And allegedly, the IAS clique surrounding the CM is responsible for protecting Mathur. It is also said that Mathur worked for the UPBC before being deputised from the UP PWD four years ago, and the UPBC has made handsome profits from this Mandovi bridge. And significantly, the initial cost estimate of Rs 9 crore was hiked to Rs 18 crore—a clean double.

This repeat tragedy in the same area, on a bridge over the same river, has scared off the locals. And the government has offered to give all bridges a thorough check to restore the people's confidence.

Meanwhile, the queues for ferrying across the Mandovi grows. And the public still waits patiently for the reprimand of those indicated by the Rege Commission in the 1986 bridge collapse. The 1990 repeat tragedy must wait its turn. •

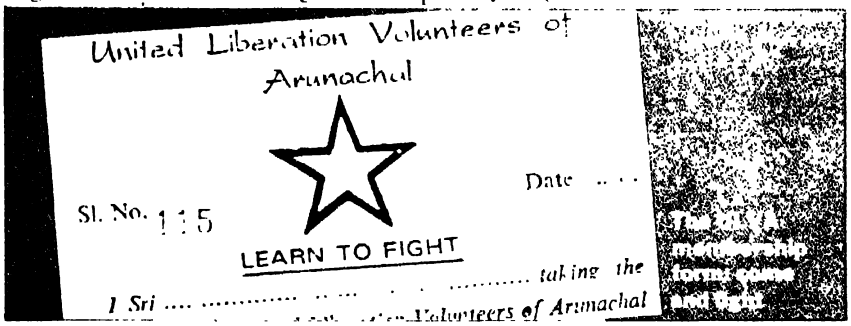
Finally, the frontier

Insurgency spreads to Arunachal

ARUNACHAL PRADESH

The one island of peace in the stormy north-east has finally started rumbling. And new militant organisations are on the rise. With this, all the north-eastern states can now boast of their very own, friendly neighbourhood insurgents.



The most high-profile among the newborns is the three-month-old United Liberation Volunteers of Arunachal (ULVA). It has threatened to take up arms against non-tribals and corrupt politicians, in defence of their tribal identity and land customs. Added to that is a new Chakma organisation that vows to fight for the stateless Chakmas—refugees from Bangladesh who are still denied the basic rights of citizens, after 25 years of hopes and promises. And there are the extremists from Nagaland, Manipur and Assam, who pass through Arunachal Pradesh on their way to their hideouts in Burma. Caught in all this, the state is about to lose its calm.

Maybe the extremists' path to Burma, through Arunachal's Tirap district, is at the root of the problem. Though yet unaccustomed to insurgency, the locals of the area have been initiated into the cult of violence. The responsibility mainly lies with the National Socialist Council of Nagaland (NSCN), which has been indulging in terrorist activities in the state and also getting support from the locals. Two NSCN activists were nabbed from Tirap district, where villagers had given them shelter, even though they had burnt down the Pumao police station and circle office a few months ago.

Along with this comes the disquieting news of Arunachali and Chakma boys forming extremist outfits and allegedly undergoing weapons training. All this makes one believe that the NSCN might be keen on extending its bases in villages adjoining the strategic conjunction of Arunachal Pradesh, Nagaland and Burma to the new militants.

But not everyone is happy with insurgency. Resisting the insurgents and the Tirap locals campaigning for the NSCN cost some village leaders their lives. Chief Khumtu Mussang of Longrang village and Anchal Samiti member Chinson Mosing of Khami Kham village are among those killed.

The Tirap corridor is causing great worry in government circles as well.

For the past one decade this route has been in use, but nothing has been done to block it. Some Manipuri extremists, intercepted by the state police in 1981, had revealed that an Assamese extremist leader had used his contacts in Arunachal Pradesh and ensured smooth passage to the agitators to the NSCN camp in Burma. The same route—through Ledo and Margherita in Assam, Tirap in Arunachal, and Jagun and Mon in Nagaland—is used even today, not only by the NSCN, but also by other extremist outfits of the area, including the PLA (People's Liberation Army) of Manipur and ULFA (United Liberation Front of Assam).

Maybe the recruitment drive of the NSCN, the rearing-to-go enthusiasm of the newly-formed ULVA and the aggressive self-defence strategies of the long-frustrated Chakmas are isolated developments. But, together, they add a new edge to the [illegible] insurgency of the troubled north-east.

GUNS FOR DRUGS

Recently unearthed evidence suggests links between Colombian drug barons and Tamil Tigers

In the early Eighties, at the beginning of the Tamil insurgency in Sri Lanka, many separatist groups relied upon large-scale bank robberies to fuel the armed uprising. It was only a matter of time before many Tamil leaders realised that it was an easier and safer task to traffic and sell drugs than to rob banks. Out of all the separatist groups, the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) became professionals in the dope business beating such others as the People's Liberation Organisation of Tamil Eelam (PLOTE) who tried their luck for some time in the illicit trade.

Eventually, it was the success of the dope business which made the Tigers the most powerful Behind the supremacy of the Tamil Tigers over other separatist rebel groups lies their jealously-guarded monopoly of drugs.

Undoubtedly, the millions earned through drug deals have been the fountainhead of the Tigers' remarkable fire power used profusely to achieve their singular objective of forming a one-party Tamil state in the North-Eastern Province of Sri Lanka.

The LTTE's arms: drug money pays for sophisticated weapons

The LTTE's latest adventures in Bogota, Colombia are only indications of the militant group's determination to globalise its lawless trade. The Tigers got the opportunity to do so after the decision of Medellin cocaine cartel's number two in command, Jose Gonzalo Rodriguez Gacha, to expand his dope business to Europe and Asia. First, the notoriously brutish drug lord who specialised in Colombian death squads, offered to train the Tamil separatist rebels in a small-time military tactics school run by Israeli terror experts. In return, this man who pioneered new cocaine routes through Mexico to the United States wanted the experienced drug carriers of the Tamil militant group to carry Medellin cocaine cartel's illicit produce across Europe and Asia, presumably allowing the money earned in profits to be used for Sri Lanka's separatist war.

Colombia's intelligence reports, the excerpts of some which were recently published by Colombian capital Bogota's El Tiempo newspaper followed by the Washington Post, reveal that the billionaire drug lord also known as 'El Mexicano' hired an Israeli reserve army officer to train the Tamils together with Colombians in a military school which was to be started in the Caribbean island of Antigua. The group selected to be trained was the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam.

According to Sri Lankan military analysts, Israeli expertise in guerrilla warfare was very vital to the Tamils since some of Sri Lanka's anti-terror commando units were also trained by the Israelis.

For the Colombians, the selection of the Tigers as carriers of Medellin cartel's expensive supplies was quite logical, believe narcotic experts, since the rebels had already established the distribution network of a different drug from the Medellin cartel's dope. The Tamils have been successfully trafficking the potent opium derivative of heroin from India to west Europe.

The Israeli military instructor involved in the controversy is Lt Col Yayir Klein (46), who is regarded as an expert in urban guerrilla tactics, having led his own country's elite troops against Palestinian terror. He came to Colombia in search of government contracts for the Israeli company called Hod Hohanit (Spearhead), which reportedly sells arms and military training. But when Klein failed to win the government plum, he allegedly ended up working for drug prince Gacha under the guise of training farmers of the middle Magdelena area. But the Colombian government claims that it knows too well that all ranches in the area were owned by Rodriguez Gacha. Though Klein has admitted being paid US $20,000 for each session to train "poor farmers", Israeli media charged he was offered US $952,000 by the cartel to be picked up in the United States.

During the second session of this training in 1989, Klein's surreptitious plans were leaked out to the authorities by some who had received training in the first one. Though Klein managed to escape to Brazil, thanks to the tip given by the Israeli embassy in Bogota, elite government forces raided his training camp and even took into custody an implicating video film made of the training for promotional purposes. The video was later broadcast all over the world.

A Colombian intelligence report says the other military tactics school financed by Gacha and meant to train Sri Lankan rebels never materialised as planned at the beginning of 1989 due to some unexpected trouble in the Caribbean island of Antigua. According to the organisers, it was "the principal training centre for the organisations of private justice for Colombia and Sri Lanka".

Sri Lankan authorities suspect that the Tamil rebels were introduced to the Colombian drug lords by the Israelis themselves. In fact, the Sri Lankan Parliament Speaker, Haniffa Mohammed, at a press conference in Colombo, accused Israeli intelligence services of involvement with the Tigers. His accusations were later confirmed by the controversial book written by former Israeli spy Victor Ostrovsky,, By Way Of Deception—The Making And Unmaking Of A Mossad Officer. The book startled many when it revealed that the Israeli intelligence service Mossad trained both Sri Lankan government troops and their rivals, the Tamil Tigers, in the same Israeli military camp "without either side knowing about the other"

Although the military tactics school failed to begin, Sri Lankans have been caught with Colombian cocaine.

It was the success of the dope business which made the LTTE the most powerful Tamil separatist group in Sri Lanka. The millions earned through drug deals have been the fountainhead of the Tiger's remarkable fire power

When agents of the DEA raided a Greek merchant ship called Demi, three Sri Lankans including two Tamils were caught with 20 kilos of cocaine with a street value of more than two million dollars at New Orleans harbour in January 1990. Two were later convicted. Both were deck hands of a ship which had left Bogota, Colombia. Commenting on the alarming seizure by the DEA, commander of the narcotic group of the Los Angeles police department, Lorne C. Kramer, said it was a very large amount for two deck hands of a ship to carry. "Probably," the chief of drug detectives said, "they were not acting individually, but had been paid a price to smuggle in for some group."

Colombian intelligence traced the connection of the Sri Lankan Tamils to the Medellin cocaine cartel after an assault team of the Colombian national police's anti-drug elite force killed kingpin Rodriguez Gacha in December 1989. The killing led the elite force to a discovery of 500 Israeli weapons in a ranch owned by the executed drug lord. The weapons allegedly ordered by the Antiguan government from Israel had gone into the hands of the Medellin cartel. One thing led to another which finally exposed the Tamil link.

It was the brilliant track record of the Tamil Tigers as successful drug traffickers, making headlines in Europe since 1984, which drew the attention of the Colombian drug princes. Designed after the Mafia's 'French Connection', the network of traffickers came to be known as the 'Tamil Connection'.

"In the years 1984 and 1985," said Sri Lanka's police chief Earnest Perera, "several hundreds of Sri Lankans were arrested abroad mainly in western Europe on offences of drug trafficking and over 80 per cent were identified as Sri Lankan Tamil youth." The Tamil arrests were made mainly in Italy, France, Spain and West Germany.

Heroin seized in Milan, Italy: funding a separatist war

In 1987, London's Sunday Times infiltrated the Tamil Connection, which was using the busy "Heathrow airport as a staging post in a multi-million pound drug trade". During the month of August that year, Sooriya Kumaran Selvadurai, head of the LTTE in West Germany, offered to supply two kilos of heroin in Britain to a Times reporter who posed as a drug dealer. Sooriya Kumaran told the Times reporter that a "wholesale price of £80,000 to be paid in cash (for the two kilos) would include the services of a courier and the drug could be handed over by a Tamil in London".

The Tiger leader glorified his act of crime by telling the Times man, "Unlike you, we don't do it for personal profit. We are only interested in making money to buy arms to help our fight for justice back home."

Tamil Tigers: fighting a protracted guerrilla war

In 1987, it was estimated that three kilos of heroin, which at that time had a street value of £525,000, was carried fortnightly through London's Heathrow airport by the Tamil Tigers without being caught by the customs officials.

London's Sunday Times claimed that its investigation exposed that a "highly organised network, operated by members of the guerrilla army, the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, has been trafficking heroin through Britain to Europe and North America for more than two years", prior to 1987. In fact, the Tamils became the major traffickers in Britain and during the 18 months preceding August 1987, ten Tamils carrying heroin worth four million pounds were caught at Heathrow airport.

In 1986, Swiss narcotic agents said that law enforcement caught only 15 per cent of Tamil Connection heroin. They believed that the Tigers managed to move more than 100 kilograms of the network's heroin through Switzerland's Bern alone.

Tamil Connection heroin derives from Bombay's underworld, where many Indian Tamil kingpins, who are also politically influential, are alleged to be connected with the hierarchy of the LTTE. Investigations in 1986 by the British customs revealed that 70 per cent of the Pakistani and Afghan heroin arriving in Britain was through India. There were also fears that India, the largest legal producer of opium, was surely becoming one of the illicit producers too.

Many routes of the Tamil drug trade have been identified. Peter Reusser, the public prosecutor in Bern, Switzerland who has keenly observed the network said, "The racket is superbly organised and run from A to Z by Tamils." The two major routes of transport used by the Tamils are the India-Middle East-Europe route and the India-Africa-London route. Swiss investigations also revealed that the Tamil Connection has used Nigerians and Kenyans, who had less visa difficulties of getting into Britain to transport heroin.

During the time of the Iron Curtain, the Tamils easily used a route from India to Poland and East Germany. It is alleged, that with no apparent obstacles by the law enforcement authorities in Eastern Europe which had Marxist regimes in power, the Tigers smuggled heroin in false-bottom suitcases and hollow-soled shoes into capitalist Europe via East Berlin. The lucky route for the Tamils disappeared with the collapse of the East European communist empire, according to Sri Lankan intelligence sources.

With increased law enforcement activities all over Europe and the collapse of the East European totalitarian regimes, the number of Tamils arrested in Europe has dwindled to a remarkable low. In the peak year of 1985, 297 Tamils were arrested for drug offences in foreign countries. It was an increase from the 257 taken into custody the previous year. In 1987, the number of Tamils arrested outside the country for drug deals stood at 108. But in 1988, it dropped to a meagre 34 and in 1989, the figure remained at 35. According to the Sri Lankan police, though these figures indicate the weakening of the foreign operations of the Tamil Connection, they also prove that the Tigers are still very much in business.

But what has alarmed the police in Sri Lanka is, with the alleged declining of sales in Europe, the Tamil Connection's efforts to increase the sales of heroin within Sri Lanka itself. The island nation's police chief, Earnest Perera, said that during the last two years, the Tamil Connection has emerged as the major trafficker and distributor of heroin in the capital city of Colombo in Sri Lanka. Tiger leaders bring large quantities of heroin to the separatist heartland of Jaffna to be distributed by surface roads to the interior of the country. Smaller quantities are also brought to Colombo through its international airport from Madras.

Two Tamils arrested in February 1990 with 340 grams of heroin confessed that they belonged to the LTTE and admitted that they regularly transported drugs between Tamil Nadu and Sri Lanka.

In direct contrast to the pre-1987 period, Tamil Connection drug traffickers have increasingly begun using Sri Lanka as a transit point to reach the troubled European destinations. The Sri Lankan government's fight against the LTTE is thus now on two counts: its battle for a separate Tamil homeland and drug smuggling. It is the worldwide sales of Tamil Connection drugs that is financing the Tigers' protracted guerrilla war. If the LTTE could be deprived of this source of income, many believe, peace might have a chance in Sri Lanka. ●

And now, Mahotsav '90

■Apna Utsav was the urbanite's ultimate ethnic dream. It entailed the mass transportation of hordes of villagers and other rural artistes to the capital. For a few days, bemused city audience had a chance to watch and, to a limited extent, participate in folk songs and dances.

The Mahotsav '90 is a folk art festival with a difference. Organised by the Conseil International Des Organisations De Festivals De Folklore (CIOFF) and its Indian subsidiary Chitrakathi, it is an attempt at deurbanising folk arts.

Mallika Sarabhai, the sole Indian representative of the CIOFF, had organised the first such festival in 1984. The festival had been well received in villages where teams from Bulgaria, Finland, the Netherlands, Russia, Poland and, of course, India went and performed. Cultural interaction and mass participation made it an enriching experience for both the participants and members of the audience. This year's festival, the organisers enthusiastically claim, may even outdo the one held in 1984. It is the international communion and genuine interaction which set the Mahotsav apart from Apna Utsav where crores are spent on the entertainment of a bunch of city snobs.

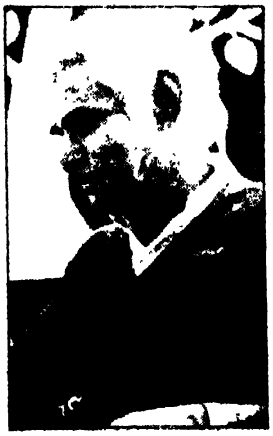
■ The Union Cabinet's approval of a proposed amendment in the Indian Wildlife (Protection) Act making hunting of protected animals legal if they stray out of wildlife sanctuaries and national parks has shocked environmentalists.



Most experts believe that the amended Act will nullify all the good work done in the last two decades. Moreover, the inherent loopholes in the new system will provide ample scope for poaching since an animal could easily be killed inside the park and its carcass then dragged outside the boundary.

Naturalists all over the country unanimously agreed that this was the single biggest blow dealt to the environmental cause. What made matters worse was that the amendment was proposed by none other than Union minister for environment and forests, Nilamani Routray, despite great opposition by his deputy, Maneka Gandhi. Does the minister still expect people to believe that he had the conservationists' interests at heart when he made the proposal?

THIS INDIA

BANGALORE: While the anti-reservation wave is sweeping the north, what has been its impact in the south? A businessman from Delhi on a visit to Bangalore tried to get an answer to this question. In a bid to find the common man's viewpoint he decided to broach the subject to his auto-rickshaw driver. "What do you make of this anti-Mandal agitation? Why are so many students immolating themselves?", he asked the driver. "Woh koi Mandal tha aur woh bahut sara commission kha gaya. Isliye janata naraz hai (People are angry because there was this person called Mandal who pocketed a lot of commission)", was the auto-rickshawalla's non-chalant reply—The Telegraph (Jagadish Patra, Matkambeda)

BORSAD: Talk of the fury of a woman scorned. A woman in a Borsad Lok Adalat insisted that she be allowed to beat her husband five times with her slippers before she let him divorce her. And got away with it too. The husband had filed a divorce and the case was taken up to the adalat when the wife put forward the bizarre condition. BOMBAY: If only it was like in the movies, the operation yesterday would have been a sure success. But alas that was not to be. Working on a tip off about smuggled gold being transported near the Jawaharlal Nehru Port Trust, Srinivas Nadgoda and Kamlesh Kolge of the Directorate of Revenue Intelligence (DRI), laid a trap around the area. Surveillance was stepped up when an Ambassador was spotted moving around in a suspicious manner. A chase ensued and the Ambassador was forced to stop. Out rushed the officers, their minds set on capturing the smugglers. Not to be outdone a gun was pulled out and the smugglers turned the tables on the cops. The result—the smugglers grabbed the DRI's Maruti and zoomed away towards Panvel—Sunday Mid-Day (A.K. Sen, Calcutta)

Losing Paes

Leander quits Vijay Amritraj's tennis academy

The first phase of Leander Paes' development as India's biggest tennis prospect since Vijay Amritraj has ended. The youngster has decided to sever connections with the Britannia Amritraj Tennis (BAT) scheme, under which he had been trained to become a world-beater.

This parting of ways means that Leander is on his own from now on in a world of cut-throat competition, where every match is computed to world-ranking and hard cash. It also means BAT's loss of its most successful trainee since the scheme was started by the Amritraj family in collaboration with Nabisco company to spot and nurture Indian tennis talent.

The question of Leander's future came up immediately after he won the junior Wimbledon title this year. While Vijay Amritraj thought it would be best for Leander to leave the junior circuit completely and concentrate on the international circuit for seniors, Leander and his father Vece had other ideas. They thought the sudden switch would be too hasty and could lead to disaster.

Things came to a head when the BAT authorities did not enter Leander for the US Open junior championship, which would have been a natural follow-up to Wimbledom. For Leander, it had been a cherished ambition to win the US title. Besides, it would have given the youngster a feel of the country he would have to go to in order to further his career.

"We couldn't go along with the BAT plan of propelling my son into the senior world when he hadn't even got a feel of the junior circuit properly," Dr Vece Paes said. "We felt it would mean that Leander would become an also ran for two years or more as he groped through this fiercely competitive field. And that would certainly not do." He implied that this could have a psychologically crippling effect on the budding talent, whom many rate as the best Indian prospect since Vijay Amritraj romped through the tennis courts of the world.

"We have to get him into harness gradually. We have to let him play with youngsters of his age until he is mentally prepared for the next step. And we would like to get the transition gradually. For example, we wouldn't confine him totally to the junior circuit. He would enter senior competitions, but in a phased manner. That is the only way he could grow properly. The senior competitions wouldn't be the toughest ones, naturally," Dr Paes said.

"The other problem we faced with BAT was that they were not prepared to treat Leander separately. Even after winning the junior Wimbledon, he remained just another BAT trainee, going through the same routine as the others. His potential and his growth were not being taken into account," Leander's father added.

He felt that Leander deserved special treatment as far as training schedules were concerned. He had reached a crucial stage of his career and it was essential that he was given intensive and exclusive training, so that he could be primed for the senior level.

"It was, ultimately a decision arrived at mutually," Dr Paes said. "Both Vijay Amritraj and the BAT coach, David O'Meara thought that, under the circumstances, it would be best if Leander left the academy. It would not be a loss to either."

So, what now? "We have appointed Enrico Piperno as his coach-cum-playing companion. He will play with Leander and accompany him to all tournaments, in India and abroad. This, of course, is a temporary arrangement, because we have made this appointment effective till April next year."

Thereafter? "Well, it's certain that Leander will have to move to the United States. We plan to visit the country around April next year to look around. We will see the various tennis academies there and see which would be best for him. We will also have to look for a coach-cum-manager for the lad on a more or less permanent basis," said Vece Paes.

Once in the US, several quick decisions will have to be taken. Leander will need a coach for the defence of his junior Wimbledon title. Also, a decision will have to be taken on the senior competitions in which he will take part.

It is, however, quite likely that the choice of a coach will ultimately fall on Leander's mentor, David O'Meara. "Yes, that is a possibility, because O'Meara's contract with BAT ends in May next, which suits our plans. Besides, Leander feels he gets the best advice from his BAT coach and finds his line of thinking the best for his career."

Right now, there is another sphere that needs tackling though, by the time this appears in print, it may have been sorted out. As part of the BAT scheme, Leander was enrolled in a school in Madras. Since his education is being given top priority by his father, Leander's admission to a school in Calcutta was essential—since it would be here that he would spend most of his time till a decision on the

Now that Leander Paes (left) has severed links with the tennis academy, it will definitely be a setback for Vijay Amritraj (above) and his BAT scheme trip to the United States was taken. "We plan to keep him at the International School here, so that admission to a school in the US wouldn't pose a problem if and when the situation arises."

To make sure that Leander doesn't lose his touch during this transitional period, a rigorous schedule has been drawn up. The youngster is practising four hours a day regularly. There are two workouts planned by Piperno—one in the morning followed by a more exacting one in the afternoon.

But where does this leave the BAT academy? Leander is not the first trainee to quit the academy. Rohit Rajpal had left when he felt the scheme wasn't doing him good any more. In the future, too, there may be others who might feel the same way.

It is no secret that the investment of both time and money by the Amritraj family and Nabisco is very large for each player. Apart from the small returns by way of contract money—there is an arrangement for a percentage of the earnings of the players going into the academy coffers—there is nothing that BAT gets. And since it is only when a player gets into the senior circuit that he begins to earn sizeable sums, the exit of players like Leander, just when they are on the verge of entering the big league, will hit BAT hard.

Leander will be a test case for Indian tennis. As a player who has had the best grounding, it is to be seen how, armed with his own discipline and determination, he fares in the world of top-flight competition

One does not know whether the BAT decision to allow Leander to play only in senior tournaments was taken because the authorities expected to repay some of the investment made on him, but it is a fact that the tennis academy cannot run only on the goodwill it generates. So there will have to be some rethinking within the academy about contracts and their implementation.

Meanwhile, Leander will be a test case for Indian tennis of the BAT era. A player who has had the best grounding a tennis player can receive anywhere in the world, emerges from an academy when his basics have been completed. It is to be seen how, armed with that qualification and his own discipline and determination, the player fares in the world of intense, top flight competition. •

Back on the line

The journalistic fraternity can soon expect one of its members to rejoin it.

Kuldip Nayar, the Raja's high commissioner to the Court of St James, has indicated to friends that he will quit once the government falls. He has no great love for the job—though he has been a spectacular success in it—and it is said that he is a little hurt by the failure of Inder Gujral to defend him adequately during the Lok Sabha discussion on Kuldip Nayar: back to journalism?

the Chief Justice's death.

Moreover, Nayar has collected enough material for a book on his experiences in London and is itching to return to journalism.

But they all look the same

Is the strain getting too much for the poor Raja? Last week, in his new 'The Thakur Who Loves Muslims' avatar, V.P. Singh hotfooted it to the funeral of Mrs Zakir Husain, widow of the late President.

"I knew her well," the Raja reminisced fondly, his eyes taking on a faraway look as he sentimentally contemplated the number of Muslim votes he was likely to get as a result of this visit.

"Why!" he continued, getting into stride, "I met her only two days ago at a banquet for Nelson Mandela."

The family was appalled. The lady had been bedridden for months and had attended no banquets. So, was the Hollow Man telling a little lie?

The charitable explanation is that he had mistaken her for Begum Abida, widow of another Muslim President Fakhruddin Ali Ahmed!

It is a little pointless to expect Muslims to vote for you if you can't tell them apart!

India's best and worst airports

Bangalore: Despite the bad publicity generated by the A320 crash and despite a building that is too small for its needs, one of the best. Staff are courteous and polite. All delays are clearly signposted and even nearby restaurants are fitted with flight information video terminals.

Bombay: Good on the whole. Has the most efficient Indian Airlines operation in the country and at the Air India module, luggage arrives in a matter of minutes. Customs officials tend to be a little rude after the recent decision to harass passengers in the name of meeting collection targets, but otherwise, no problems.

Calcutta: Two black marks. One: the West Bengal excise men are crooks who pounce on unsuspecting domestic passengers carrying more than one bottle of alcohol. (Apparently, it is a crime to bring more than a bottle in—though there are no signs telling you this.)

And two: the airport security policemen who must make about Rs 500 per day per head from shaking down Marwaris. At the international section, securitymen hassle illiterate passengers and demand hard currency bribes.

But customs is clean, efficient and well-run. And Indian Airlines is, relatively, well-managed.

Delhi: Though the Indian Airlines section has improved over the last three months, Delhi ranks as India's worst airport for four reasons. One: the international terminal is very badly designed. Two: immigration officials refuse to clear labourers departing for abroad if they don't pay bribes. Three: airport security is badly behaved (though not dishonest).

Four: the cesspool of Delhi customs—the single most corrupt customs department in India and one where even assistant collectors refuse to intervene when passengers are being blackmailed.

Great speech minister

So what if George Fernandes was summarily dismissed as minister in charge of Kashmir affairs? He's still regarded as an expert on the troubled state in firang land.

Harvard University, for instance, invited the railways minister over to give a talk on the latest situation in J&K and how best it could be salvaged.

George Fernandes: from the mouths of teenagers

George is nothing if not a convincing speaker and on this occasion he excelled himself. The applause which followed was heartening. As was the fact that a young Indian walked up to Fernandes to declare that he'd liked his speech a lot.

The youth was none other than Rahul Gandhi, currently at work in Harvard. •

Myles who? Bob who?

Does anybody still remember the Bofors investigation?

If you think it has been forgotten, then you have another think coming. According to members of the Raja's crack investigative team, the Bofors names will be out "in a few days". (What, again? The first time we heard this chorus was in March!)

The reference is to an appeal filed by AE Services, one of the three agents, in a Zurich court. The investigators take the line that if the appeal is disallowed, then the names of the principals of AE will be handed over to the Indian government.

In fact, the appeal is not the last course open to AE Services. It can delay the disclosure of the names for a few more months.

And, in any case, all the Swiss will tell us is who the beneficiaries of the accounts are. Their names are already known: Myles Stott and Bob Wilson.

How will that help anybody?

R.K. Dhawan and Harmohan Dhawan: causing confusion per Steno. The reference is usually to Harmohan Dhawan, a Chandra Shekhar loyalist, who has briefed the press on his leader's behalf and led the attack on V.P. Singh.

But every time anybody says "Dhawan", Delhi politicos think of RKD and so this has led to a great deal of confusion. In fact, the two men have little in common. Harmohan is a politician in his own right, while RKD is a factotum.

But they do have one thing in common. As one embittered Congressman joked recently, "In either party, there's a Dhawan trying to bring down the leader."

BAROMETER

Flimstars and politics—who supports whom

■ Shatrughan Sinha: It had been coming for a while. But even so, people are surprised by the vehemence with which Sinha has turned against the Raja (see item). At the next election, he can be expected to sock it to V.P. Singh at the hustings.

■ Shabana Azmi: Had carefully arranged herself on a 'secular' platform behind V.P. Singh. In this avatar, she was made head of the Children's Film Society and happily approved projects with relatively huge budgets (Rs 35 lakhs to Pankaj Parashar, for instance) so that she could play sugar mummy.

But is now reconsidering her position. It won't be easy to do an about-turn though.

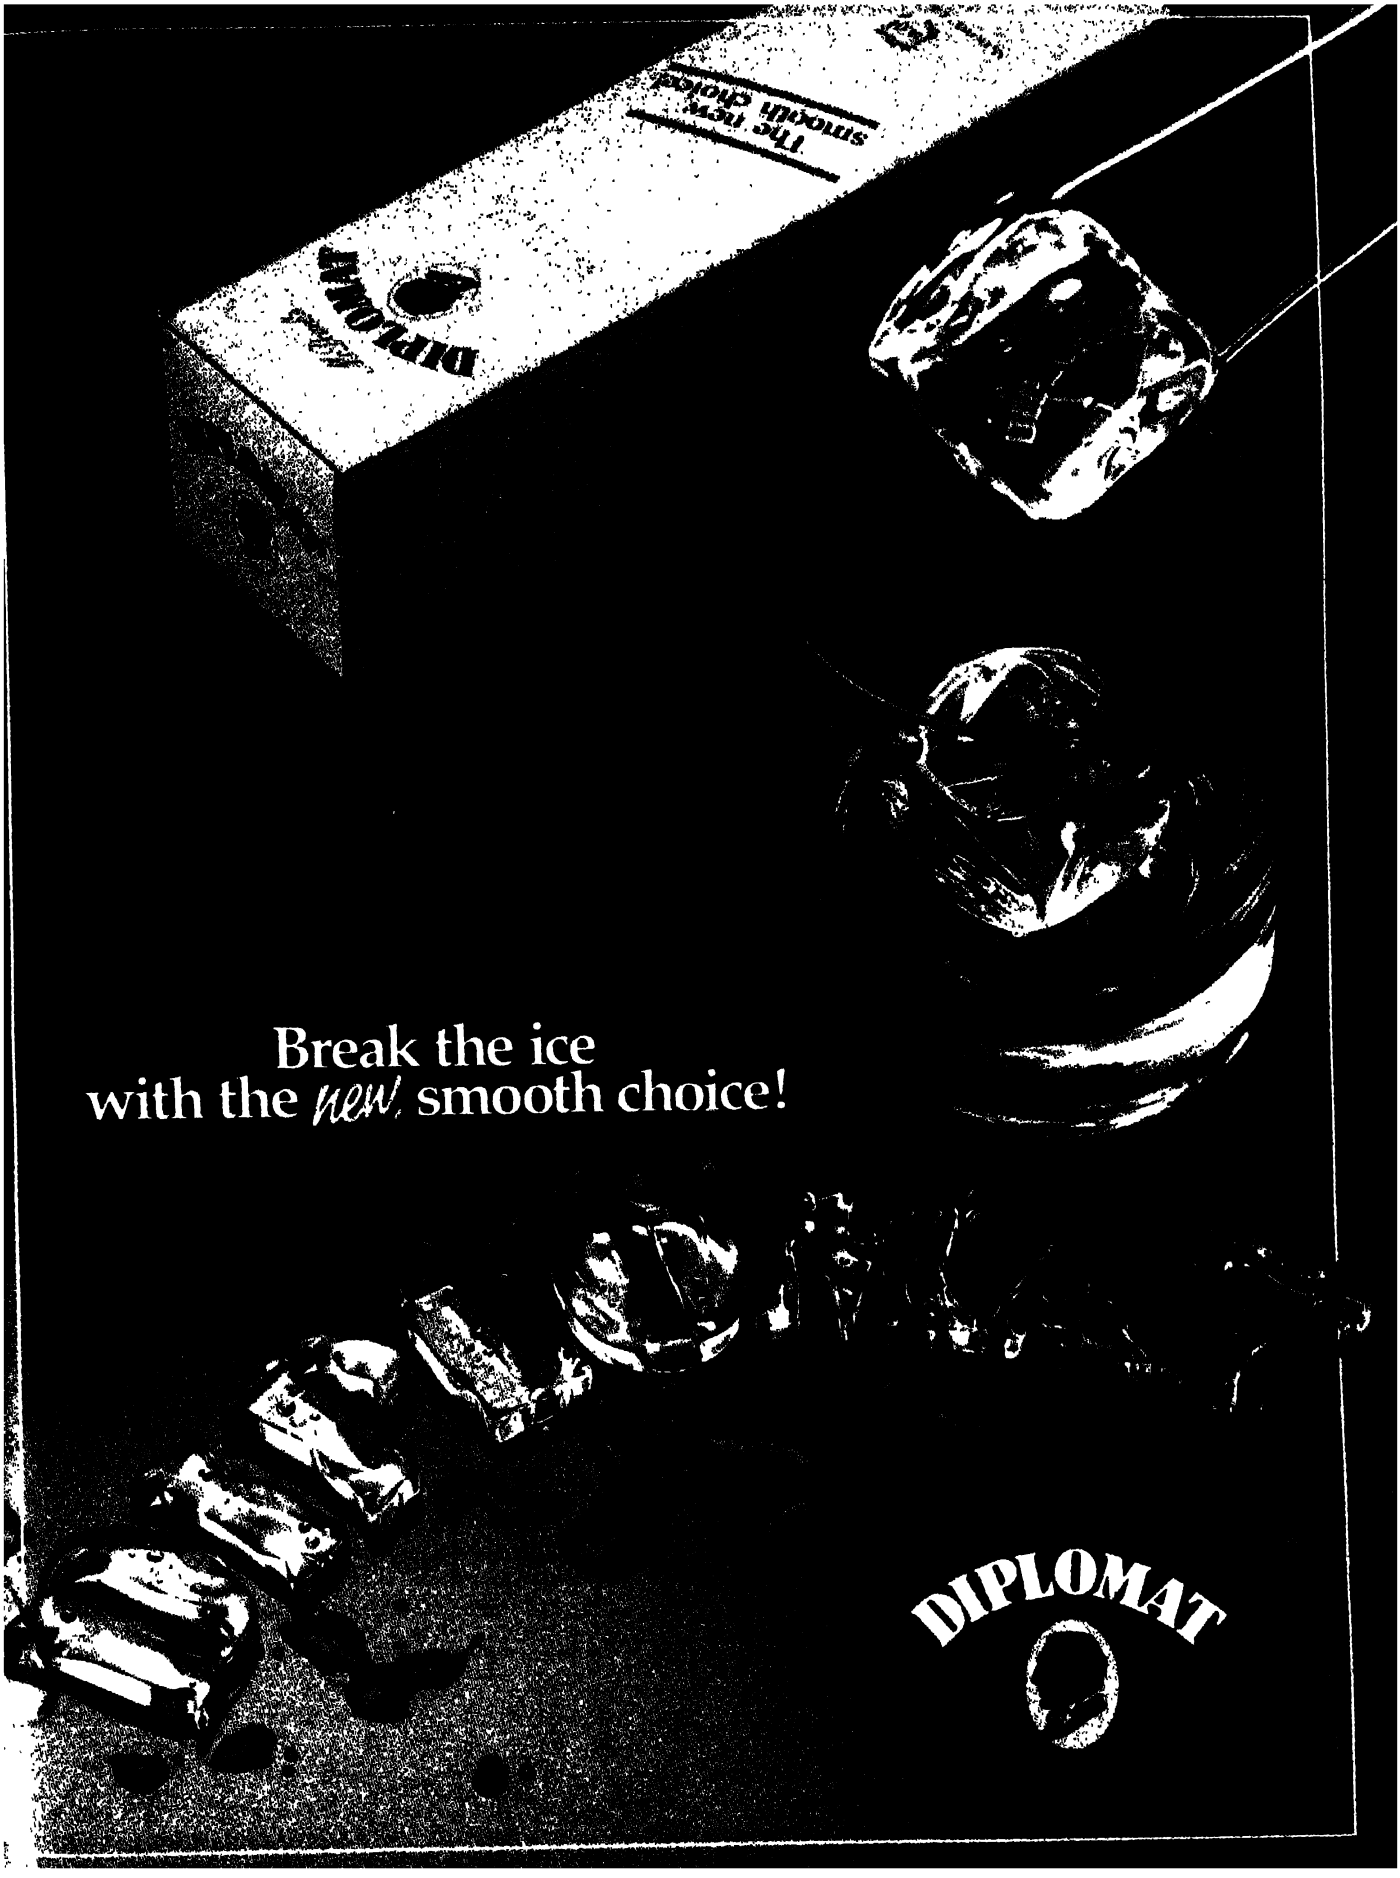
■ Sunil Dutt: The most consistent of the stars in politics. Supported Mrs Gandhi when she was down and out and has stuck to Rajiv since 1984. Has made an excellent constituency MP and should not have any trouble winning re-election the next time around.

■ Raj Babbar: Went to his hometown of Agra recently and was heckled by anti-Raja types. Despite that, Babbar is sticking to his old loyalties. He is not so much a star with an interest in politics (like Shatru) as a key member of Rani Sita Devi's coterie, ie: an insider.

■ Amitabh Bachchan: Despite enormous pressure to contest from Allahabad where he will probably win by a landslide (because of VP's unpopularity in the urban areas), Bachchan is resolutely refusing to re-enter politics. It was a mistake, he says, to have got into it in the first place.

The world according to Sinha

Obviously, those heart-to-hearts with the Raja didn't quite work out. Or why would Shatrughan Sinha be at his voluble best on the lawns of Chandra Shekhar's 3 South Avenue Lane residence, when dissident activity within the Dal was at its height?



Shatrughan Sinha: holding forth

The star was in his element, holding forth on the political climate in the country, the Raja's unprincipled stand, the fact that he'd forecast just such a situation emerging when the Dal formed the government...

Listening in rapt attention were the usual hangers-on. Though there was some doubt whether they were interested in Sinha's political views, or were just mesmerised by the squiggles on his embroidered shirt. ●

Rajiv bungles

The haste with which Rajiv Gandhi effected a change of guard in Karnataka has raised many eyebrows (Triumph and tragedy, 21—27 October). What is even more shocking is the promulgation of President's Rule in the state for just six days, which makes a complete mockery of democracy. It would be too early to say anything about the new chief minister, but if past achievements are any indication, he doesn't have too good a record.

Rajiv Gandhi: still a dictator

U.S. Iyer, Bangalore (Karnataka)

■ The cover story was an excellent appraisal of Rajiv's style of functioning. The obvious conclusion one draws from the Karnataka episode is that Rajiv has not learned any lessons from his past mistakes and is yet to emerge as a strong and mature leader.

The reason for Veerendra Patil's ouster, mainly on health grounds, is simply an eyewash. For, as long as Patil was in control of the affairs in Karnataka, Rajiv never saw eye-to-eye with him on many issues. Rajiv was only pretending to restore democracy in the Congress(I). Therefore, this was a glaring instance of how Rajiv resorted to unfair means in order to install his chosen lieutenant, Bangarappa, by ousting Patil.

Kali Charan Banerjee, Calcutta (West Bengal)

The Madhuri mania

The cover story on Madhuri Dixit (Ek, do, queen, 7—13 October) presented an exaggerated view of the actress. Though I agreed with some of the points raised, the comparison with her so-called rival heroines was certainly a motivated attempt to cut them down to size. For heaven's sake, don't compare Madhuri with an actress of Meenakshi's calibre. Today, Meenakshi may not be riding as high as Madhuri as per the media's ostensible double standards, but she has nevertheless carved out a unique niche for herself with her outstanding discipline and dedication. Unlike others, she is surely an actress to remember, and not just for ek, do, teen years, but decades.

Meenakshi: better than Madhuri?

M.R. Prasad, Hubli (Karnataka)

■ The cover story on Madhuri was simply absorbing. I definitely agree that Madhuri is one of the few heroines who can draw crowds. She is a thoroughbred professional in terms of her performance. She puts her heart and soul into the smallest of roles. She is also a good dancer. She improvises gracefully and that makes her different and original from the rest. She also looks gorgeous in all kinds of dresses. Therefore, Madhuri seems to be slated for the top and stay there for good.

Chayan Dastidar, Bombay (Maharashtra)

Politics of caste

Mahesh Jethmalani (Why I support Mandal, 21—27 October) has focussed on only one aspect of the Mandal Commission issue. The fact remains that the decision to implement the commission's recommendations were politically motivated. What is shocking is that no political party is prepared to speak out against reservations for fear of losing a few votes.

Ritesh Misra, Bhubaneswar (Orissa)

A matter of faith

The special report (Chalo Ayodhya, 21—27 October) was thought-provoking. Though the people tended to term L.K. Advani's rath yatra as communal and denounced it as an "irresponsible act", one cannot ignore the fact that the BJP's programme received considerable popular support, especially in western and northern India. And despite such strong security measures, some desperate kar sevaks did manage to enter the disputed site on 30 October and damage portions of the mosque. This not only dealt a severe blow to the UP government, but embarrassed the Centre as well. Advani's rath yatra may have been terminated midway, but he managed to sway the masses nevertheless.

Chiranjib Haldar, New Delhi

At the helm

The profile of the new Chief Justice (Justice for all, 21—27 October) brought out the personality of Ranganath Mishra. He says "My philosophy is simple: a smile on everybody's face," adding, "The common man is my interest." It is rather unfortunate that even 43 years after Independence, justice remains a far cry for the masses, especially for the poor sections of the society. Not that nothing has been done towards this end. Lok Adalats and panchayats have been set up to dispose of cases. But nothing really worked. And justice remained as elusive as ever. It is time that something is done to revamp the judicial system and somebody like Mishra, who cares for the poor, should be at the helm.

L.K. Advani's rath yatra: the chariot of fire

Kali Charan Banerjee, Calcutta (West Bengal)

Mr Caste

The write-up (In flames, 7—13 October) was timely. The students are hostile to the Mandal Report because it favours caste instead of merit.

The only factor which accounts for V P. Singh's obduracy is the strength of his conviction that the oppressed should be given certain benefits and therefore the Indian society should be moulded along caste lines. And, he is in no mood to compromise, for he feels that the leftists and the BJP are solidly behind him. But at a time when the moral fabric of the society is being torn apart, VP seems to be shirking responsibility.

Chiranjib Haldar, New Delhi

Dreams and visions

The article, The Hollow Man, (21—27 October) was thought-provoking. According to the author, no politician worth his salt has dared to oppose the hollow and fraudulent vision of V.P. Singh, which exposes the shocking immorality of our entire body politic and that of the nation.

And as for bartering away the future of our children, let us face the reality. The cream of our youth will continue to migrate as they have been doing for several decades in the past. The next best lot will join the private sector, a trend that has been in force for the last 20 years. The ones with initiative among those remaining, will set up their own business and a few patriotic souls will join the armed forces where there are no reservations.

Lt Col. B. Singh, New Delhi

A tragic end

The article on Rekha and Mukesh Aggarwal (Fatal attraction, 14—20 October), threw some light on a tragic episode. It is indeed strange that the Mukesh-Rekha marriage should sour within such a short time. Anybody would have expected a more human approach from Rekha, who had spent many happy hours of her life with Mukesh, whom she claimed to have loved.

Prabhakar S. Harsole, Indore (Madhya Pradesh)

■ Mukesh Aggarwal may have been a successful businessman but his personal life was an unhappy one. It was perhaps become of the frustration of a failed marriage that ultimately led him to commit suicide. The way Rekha treated her husband and felt no repentance whatsoever was disgraceful. It is sad that the reel life of these actors are now becoming real.

A genius says goodbye

The obituary (Shankar Nag, 1954-1990, 21—27 October) paid a fitting tribute to one of the most accomplished actor-directors of our country. We have lost a man of tremendous calibre who was bound to create more ripples in the celluloid world. Shankar Nag's directorial acumen can be gauged from the roaring success of his maiden television venture, Malgudi Days—one of the most memorable serials on Doordarshan.

Shashank Shekhar, Meerut (UP)

■ The write-up on Shankar Nag was a fitting tribute to the genius. Nag's death has certainly created a void in the theatre, cinema and the cultural world of the country.

A healthy competition

The write-up (Watch out, 14—20 October) gives a vivid picture of the war between the 30-year-old public sector giant, HMT, and the three-year-old private sector concern, Titan Watches Ltd. It only emphasises the need for competition. However, the government has to ensure that the Titan imports are compensated by its exports, and that there is a considerable percentage of net foreign exchange gains.

Titan watches: taking on HMT

Poor show

The Indian team's performance in the recently-concluded Beijing Asiad (Battered in Beijing, 14—20 October) was very poor and it has brought shame, humiliation and disgrace to the country.

In the previous ten Games, India usually came fourth or fifth in the medal standing, but in the Beijing Asiad, India sank to the lowly eleventh position. Golden girl P.T. Usha failed to perform according to expectations.

KHUSHWANT SINGH

The lyricist

Faiz Ahmed Faiz, by common consent the greatest Urdu poet since Allama Iqbal, had a farmaish sent to him at a mushaira requesting him to recite a ghazal sung by Mehdi Hassan. He was not upset but amused by the request: most ghazal lovers know the singers rather than the names of the poets who composed them. The popularity of a particular ghazal depends on the singer, the tune-maker and the poet—in that order. First come Lata Mangeshkar, Asha Bhosle, Iqbal Bano, Mehdi Hassan, Mohammad Rafi, Jagjit Singh and Anup Jalota; next come music-makers like Naushad, Khayyam, Anandji-Premji, last of all come the poets: Iqbal, Faiz, Sahir Ludhianvi, Hafeez Jalandhari, Kaifi Azmi and Qateel Shifai. It is ironic that men who gave birth to a lyric on paper should be so utterly dependent on music composers and singers for their works to gain recognition. For years one of my favourite ghazals was:

Ulfat kee nayee manzil ko chalaa
Too baahon daal kay bahoon mein;
Dil todney vaaley dekh kay chal
Ham bhee to padey hain raahon mein

You make a new destination of your love,
With arms entwined with another;
You breaker of my heart tread warily
I too am lying by the roadside.

I knew it was sung by Iqbal Bano and imitated by many others. The tune was composed by Master Inayat Hussain of Lahore. Although cassettes bore the name of the poet and the composer, till I met him in Glasgow, I did not realise that the words had been written by Qateel Shifai.

Qateel Shifai was born in Haripur (district Hazara in the NWFP) on Christmas eve of 1919. His real name is Aurangzeb Khan, he changed it to his takhallus (poetic pseudonym)—Qateel, the victim of murder and Shifai the name of his Ustaad—when he started writing poetry while at school in 1935).

He looks a stockier version of Faiz Ahmed Faiz. And shares Faiz's politics being a leftist, anti-Ayub, Yahya and Zia-ul Haq, but unlike Faiz was never jailed for airing his views. He speaks very little English: "I know it as much as your former President Giani Zail Singh," he said to me in Punjabi, which is his mother tongue. He has lived most of his life in Lahore, speaks Punjabi most of the time but writes entirely in Urdu.

Fourteen collections of his poems have been published. His lyrics have gone into the making of over 150 Indian and Pakistani films. He has won the three most prestigious Pakistani literary awards, the Adamjee, the Sarhad Abbaseen Arts Prize and the Presidential Naqoosh Award. In addition, he won the National Film Award for the best poetry of the year in 1986. He is a widely travelled man and his poems have been translated in foreign languages like English, Russian and Arabic. He is undoubtedly the number one film song writer of Pakistan and India today.

Amongst the Indian singers who have sung Shifai's works are Lata, Asha, Salim Agha, Mohammad Rafi, Pankaj Udhas and Mahinder Kapur. His current favourite, ghungroo toot gaye, has been lifted and sung without his permission or payment by scores of singers.

Qateel Shifai's lyrics have gone into the making of over 150 Indian and Pakistani films. He is undoubtedly the number one film song writer of Pakistan and India today

In the ten days I was in Glasgow, I met Qateel Shifai almost every day and spent many hours talking to him about his life and poetry. His two sons settled in Glasgow were usually with him. As a gesture of thanksgiving for the hospitality I had received in their home, I offered to translate three poems of his choosing. He was considerate: he gave me one modest-sized and two very short ones to render into English.

Beware of the time
Ye poets, bards and sculptors!
Endless showers of arrows (of calumny) will be loosened against you.
You will raise cries and hues,
You will cry out to the civilised world:
But every habitant of the civilised world will have already been wounded like you
Of those that remain will any come to your help?
No! they will have become addicts of backward-looking heroin.
All they will hanker after is that this dark wretchedness fill all their veins.
Nothing more.
They'll have no reason, no argument to put forward.
Agreed, you'll do your best to make them understand
But it will be beyond their understanding.
And in these dark times to come
The massacre that will take place
No guardian angel will rise to defend you.
All you meet will be thirsting for your blood.

Beware of that time
ye poets, bards and sculptors;
if you dare, step forward
And block the way
Of the time to come. ●

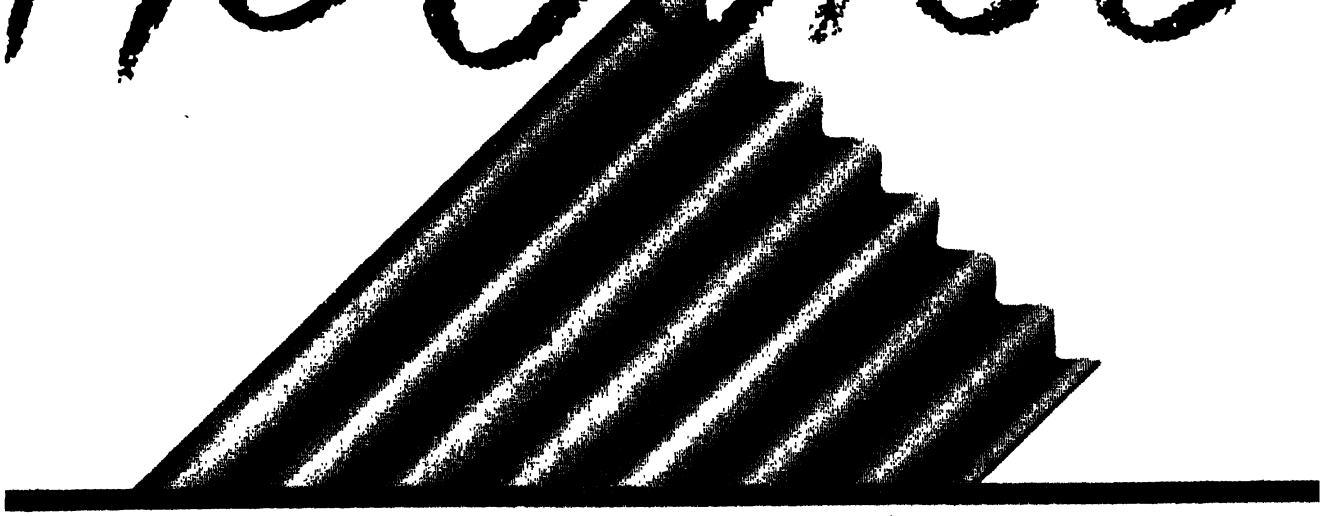
FACTS ABOUT ASBES

Its a fact that Asbestos Cement Sheets are made of over 90% cement and reinforced with about 10% Chrysotile asbestos: a natural fibre with 3-4 times the strength of steel. Asbestos being 100% alkali resistant, gets 'locked in' with the cement matrix permanently. The chemical bond so formed makes the separation of asbestos fibre practically impossible.

Asbestos Cement Sheets are pre-fabricated, ready-to-use and have the advantages of both cement and asbestos.



As a matter of fact, Asbestos Cement Sheets need no protective coatings or treatment. Corrosive industrial pollutants leave them unharmed.

It's inherently resistant to fire, heat, rain and salty coastal air, resulting in a long lasting product. Add to the long life of these sheets, higher coverage efficiency. And you have the most cost-effective roofing material.

Fact is, Asbestos Cement pipes, sheets, slates and shingles have been used since the turn of the century. And continue to be used all over the world.

SUMMED UP WITH

7,00,00

TOS CEMENT SHEETS.

42 lakh tonnes of asbestos, a natural mineral, is mined around the world every year. In countries like USSR, Canada, Brazil and Zimbabwe. Of this, India uses only 2%.

Safe to use. Rather than listen to propaganda put out by vested interests about Asbestos Cement Sheets, listen to what the experts have to say.

The normal use of Asbestos Cement poses no risk to the environment or the public

Leading environmentalists, epidemiologists and the working group of the W H O. agree this material is safe

Finally, let the study group of the Health and Safety Executive of H M. Govt of the U.K. clear all your doubts

"Asbestos Cement products are sometimes confused in the public mind with asbestos insulation We should think it necessary, therefore, to say that we should not expect danger to arise from existing Asbestos Cement products, eg. roofing, sheeting and guttering"

So, if you're looking for the ideal roofing material, you can't do better than choose Asbestos Cement Sheets

And that's a fact

VINOD MEHTA

Get the politicians out

Hindu and Muslim leaders should sort out the Ram Janmabhoomi-Babri Masjid issue between themselves

Under the circumstances, it was the best of results—a draw. The kar sevaks enjoyed a few moments of glory when they hoisted the saffron flag on domes built by the hated 'invader'; the masjid protectors extracted their pound of flesh when they were invited for an on-site inspection 24 hours after the 'historic victory' and could declare that the structure had been saved after a heroic defense. Meanwhile, Vishwanath Pratap Singh and Mulayam Singh Yadav must have breathed a sigh of relief even as they conceded that the apparently impregnable cordon around Ayodhya had been breached. Indeed, as reports of official connivance pour in, the lapses in the security arrangements assume a frightening dimension. Still, to describe the events of the day as the "storming of Ayodhya" is an exaggeration. A few bloody skirmishes did take place before stumps were drawn, but they did not affect the final result.

The Vishwa Hindu Parishad is busy circulating stories of masterly tactical strategy deployed to hoodwink the law and order agencies. Mr Ashok Singhal, otherwise known as the elusive pimpernel, apparently reached the holy site very much like a Hindi film hero escaping the baddies. And the manner in which the crafty kar sevaks remained hidden in the by-lanes leading to the Ram Janmabhoomi is drawing wah-wahs from the faithful. But what was finally achieved? Fifteen minutes on top of the mosque and minor damage to its already peeling plaster is small potatoes considering how meticulously the onslaught had been planned and what huge numbers were involved.

Implicit in a draw is absence of victory. So, let us merely note that events on D day could, from the government's point of view, have taken an uglier turn. The fact that they did not means that, moles notwithstanding, the security forces stood the challenge with courage and some efficiency. More than V.P. Singh, it is the chief minister of Uttar Pradesh who is the hero of the hour. His stock in the nation continues to rise.

It is not clear how the Rajmata of Gwalior and Atal Behari Vajpayee interpret the events of 30 October. Certainly, in VHP circles there is moderate euphoria—which is why the fiction that kar seva did actually take place is being persisted with. It is a patently false claim, unless of course a stray brick was placed in the garba graha, because even for symbolic construction, 100-200 devotees would have had to work for a couple of hours with mortar, stone and cement. Interestingly, even as the VHP extended kar seva by another seven days, the BJP president announced from his place of temporary incarceration in Bihar that his party was determined to force mid-term polls on the nation.

This is the first bit of good news in a long time. The BJP's insistence on an election means that the party is soliciting the verdict of the electorate on the issue. Excellent. Elections will mean that the BJP and its allies will concentrate energies on the battle of the ballot rather than the battle for the temple over the next few months. As a result, the agitation, hopefully, will be put on the back burner.

The kar sevaks enjoyed a few moments of glory when they hoisted the saffron flag on domes built by the hated 'invader'; the masjid protectors extracted their pound of flesh when after an inspection they declared that solid defense had saved the structure

In the coming weeks and months, therefore, the potential for communal violence let loose by the dispute should be reduced. We must keep our fingers crossed and hope that any excess of energy and fervour will be diverted to the political arena, which arguably is the legitimate forum for Ram Janmabhoomi-Babri Masjid type discords. Ideally, political parties, after having obtained sanction from the people, should be in a position to point the direction and force the pace towards where a just solution lies. Unfortunately, their record does not inspire confidence. Whatever the veracity of Arun Shourie's latest bombshell (incidentally, if the alleged parleys between V.P. Singh and Mr Shourie's intimate friends transpired at the Express Towers in Bombay before the 1989 general election, why did Arun Shourie wait for over a year to expose the Prime Minister's 'duplicity' manifest in a conversation to which Mr Shourie was presumably privy when it took place?). The Janata Dal leader and his minority government displayed criminal negligence just waiting around watching the crisis mount. Why was the furious activity we saw in the fortnight before the kar seva left for the eleventh hour? The suspicion that the Prime Minister was playing some devious game of his own cannot be dismissed easily.

It is not clear how the Rajmata of Gwalior and Atal Behari Vajpayee interpret the events of 30 October

Although these days, Rajiv Gandhi and his party swear by secularism and the minorities, in November 1989 they were manipulating vote banks on a daily basis so as to extract the maximum mileage from the controversy. On their part,BJP leaders talk bravely of sweeping the polls, but in their hearts they know that at best they can hope either to participate in a coalition as the junior partner, or support a minority government from the outside. Pragmatists as they are, Messrs Advani and Vajpayee cannot be dreaming of an invitation from Rashtrapati Bhavan to form the government. The four left parties while behaving with exemplary consistency are in the same boat as the BJP. Thus, some parties are discredited while others are impotent.

The message is loud and clear: get the politicians out. They spell nothing but trouble and bloodshed. Having engaged in a trial of strength (both sides claiming a victory of sorts), Hindu and Muslim leaders should be in a mood to get back to the negotiating table and sort out this matter between themselves. In the past, the rival protagonists have used political parties like crutches and allowed them to take over the responsibility for solving a problem that, strictly speaking, is none of their business. I believe the absence of politicians will be a boon for the negotiations.

That a magnificient Ram temple should be built in Ayodhya is no longer a matter of contention. That it should be built not on the outskirts of the city or even 10 kilometres away from where the shilanyas was performed last year, but at the site which the VHP claims is the janmasthan is also not a matter of contention. Thus, the issue has not, as it were, remained frozen. There has been movement, all of it veering towards the demands articulated by the Vishwa Hindu Parishad. For instance, no one today talks seriously of handing over the mosque and the adjacent land to the Archaeological Survey of India. Neither does the suggestion of building a splendid monument next to the mosque in celebration of India's composite culture find much favour. Indeed, the emerging consensus recommends:

(a) the proposed temple stand check by jowi with the masjid.

(b) the possible destruction of the outer wall of the mosque including the so-called chabootra.

Surely, that should be close enough for Mr Singhal and company?

All that the country pleads for is a teeny weeny concession (compromise is too big a word in the contest): drop the demand for relocation or demolition. Take the disputed land, build in any manner adjacent to or around the Babri Masjid. The VHP can then have their sought-after temple at the holy site, while offence to Muslim sentiments will be spared. Perhaps, this formula is overly-generous to the Hindus, and Muslim fundamentalists will describe it as a sell out. Actually, it is the only way to keep this country from going up in flames.

If the communal atmosphere had not been so poisoned, if politicians had not shamelessly exploited the issue for narrow electoral gains, the relocation of one mosque in a secular country would have exercised only a tiny minority. In Islamic countries, mosques have been shifted/pulled down to facilitate traffic movement. Muslims in India know that their religion is strong enough to withstand the elimination of a single house of worship. All over the country there are numerous abandoned mosques and temples where goats feed and locals go every day to perform their morning ablutions. So much for the sanctity of holy places. The Babri too is an abandoned mosque which in four or five decades would have collapsed, courtesy neglect and the ravages of nature. Alas, we are living in charged times. When people believe that their faith is threatened, they begin to cling to symbols. The mosque in Ayodhya, disintegrating, unused, forgotten, is one such symbol.

On the BBC World Service, the leader of the VHP London branch, when asked why it was so absolutely vital to tear down the mosque in Ayodhya, replied with stirring rhetoric: "Hindus in India will not be able to sleep, eat or drink water until this insult to their religion is removed." Well, I have seen that insult in Ayodhya, and I can tell you that it is not worth a glass of warm soda. Arre bhai, aap ke Ram lalla ka mandir ek tooti poothi masjid giraye bina nahin ban sakta? ●

The family way

R.K. Hegde and his son are indicted by the Dayal Commission

The scandals, it appears, just won't go away. Four months ago, an embarrassed and discredited Ramakrishna Hegde was forced to quit the Planning Commission after the Kuldip Singh Commission virtually indicted him in a land scam. And now—just as everyone seemed to be forgetting the findings of that commission—another has probably sealed his chances of making an early political comeback.

Last week, the Parameshwar Dayal Commission passed strictures against the former Karnataka chief minister over his role in the MD seat scam. The commission, which was constituted by Hegde himself in 1985, had been probing the allegation that his son Bharat Hegde and two others had cheated a coffee planter of Rs 2.5 lakhs by promising to get his daughter admitted into a medical college.

Although the commission's report does not suggest that R.K. Hegde had a hand in the deal, Justice Dayal passes strictures against the former chief minister for his "overenthusiastic role in defending his son". The Justice claims that Hegde had done so despite knowing that an FIR was filed against his son. "(Hegde knew) a case was registered and the matter under investigation. It was for the courts and the police to decide if they were guilty or not," the Justice notes. Hegde is also accused by Dayal of not taking any action against a written complaint against his son and the other two accused. Dayal's report even draws attention to Hegde's "arrogance, power puffedness (sic) and impoliteness" during his testimony before the commission.

While Justice Dayal recommends that criminal prosecution be launched against Bharat and his associates, he has left it to the state government to decide on the course of action to be taken against R.K. Hegde. Given that the state is now run by S. Bangarappa, Hegde is unlikely to find the government very forgiving. Unlike the previous Congress chief minister Veerendra Patil (who was reputedly soft on the Janata Dal leader), Bangarappa's attitude to Hegde varies between a profound distaste and unaccommodating hatred.

VEERAPPA MOILY

The MD seat scandal

Why the commission was set up

The Dayal Commission was set up in 1985 to probe an allegation that R.K. Hegde's son, Bharat, had cheated a coffee planter of a sum of Rs 2.5 lakhs. It was charged that Bharat, his cousin Udayshankar and a friend, C.P. Lakshman, had received the money from C.P. Bharathan after promising to have his daughter admitted to medical college.

It is said that C.P. Lakshman was approached by C.P. Bharathan (the two are brothers) with the request that a seat be 'fixed' for

BHARAT AND R.K. HEGDE

Justice Dayal held that R.K. Hegde went out of his way to defend his son Bharat after the MD seat scandal broke Justice Dayal's report was submitted to the government as early as 17 September. While Veerendra Patil—who was then chief minister—decided to keep it under wraps, Bangarappa—who took over only last fortnight—acted with a rare speed to make the findings public. His newly-formed Cabinet accepted the commission's recommendations and the government went out of its way to publicise them. The chief minister handed over the report to the law ministry—now headed by another self-confessed Hegde-hater, Veerappa Moily—to take action on the basis of the recommendations. At the moment, the ministry is working overtime and the whole case is expected to be handed over to the Lok Ayukta.

Given that it is Bangarappa and Moily who are responsible for the future course of action, Hegde is likely to be in for a difficult time. The present chief minister has smarted on more than one occasion from Hegde's vicious and unsparing criticism. "Now that Bangarappa has a stick to beat Hegde with, he is bound to use it to flog Hegde. He can't expect this government to treat him the way Veerendra Patil's did," says a Congress MLA. Moily—who was falsely implicated by Hegde in the famous tapes scandal—is unlikely to be any less harsh. The law minister, however, claims that he will not be vindictive. "The law will take its course. Why should I try to get back at Hegde?" he told SUNDAY.

Predictably, the Hegde camp—as it did in the case of the Kuldip Singh Commission—has already begun discrediting the report as biased and motivated. Says one of Hegde's close aides: "We expected something like this would happen. We knew the report would be unfavourable ever since Dayal was appointed (during President's Rule when the Congress was in power at the Centre) to head the commission."

Although R.K. Hegde was unavailable for comment, his son Bharat—who will now have to face a criminal suit—describes the report as "politically motivated". "We have not yet worked out our line of defence for the criminal prosecution," he told SUNDAY. "But my conscience is clear."

For Ramakrishna Hegde, the findings of the Dayal Commission will make it all the more difficult to effect a re-entry into Karnataka politics. He is also going to be unable to resort to his favourite ploy when faced with embarrassments of this nature: the resignation. Hegde has stepped down from public office four times in the past. And each time, he has—though with varying degrees of success—attempted to reinforce his image of someone who stands for value-based politics.

Obviously, this is not going to be possible now. As one Congress MLA sarcastically remarked, "The only thing that Hegde can resign from now is politics."● his daughter, Sudha Satyanath, in the Belgaum Medical College. He knew that Lakshman had close ties with Bharat Hegde and Udayshankar and a sum of Rs 2.5 lakhs was decided on. When Sudha failed to secure a seat, Bharathan demanded that the money be returned. When all attempts at recovering the money failed, he filed a suit against Bharat, Udayshankar and Lakshman.

When the case began to receive publicity, R.K. Hegde—then Karnataka chief minister—tried his best to make out that it was a politically motivated attempt to discredit him. But when the pressure began to mount, Hegde was left with no option but to institute a commission of enquiry.

The commission was headed by three other judges before Justice Parameshwar Dayal took over. All the other judges before him had problems with conducting the enquiry and so did Dayal, who complained publicly about unpaid bills and the lack of facilities extended to the commission.

Justice Dayal notes in his report that Bharat and his associates were more than just friends—that they were also engaged in business transactions. He writes that Bharat was in a position to get work done by virtue of being the chief minister's son. "Bharat Hegde was not taking the money directly but directing it to Udayshankar. Thus, all three were conspiring to cheat others," the Justice notes.

Justice Dayal has recommended that criminal proceedings be initiated against Bharat and his associates. As for the course of action against R.K. Hegde—who has been accused of trying to shield his son—the judge has left this to the state government.

MANI SHANKAR AIYAR

Crocodile tears

Goodbye V P, goodbye Shourie. You deserve each other

And so the thieves fall out among themselves. What an irony that the poison pen which made V.P. Singh Prime Minister should also prove the "diamond-tipped lancet" of his final quietus (the nishtar-e-almas, as the immortal Faiz put it). As Shourie and Singh both go together, each carrying on his back the dagger with which he has been cunningly stabbed by the other, what can we the much-abused public do but recall the childhood ditty:

"Thank you, very much
You are maggarmach!"

No, I find it impossible to shed any real tears for either of these gentlemen. Each was the product of a monstrous falsehood, a special talent for covering his true visage behind a veil of self-righteous morality. While VP shaved his head and pulled his kurta off to turn his torso full-frontal to the camera (in a reasonably persuasive imitation of Gandhiji), Shourie bought himself a library-shelf full of the Collected Works Of The Mahatma to festoon his writings with quotations from Gandhi A-Z.

Both built for themselves a larger-than-life image of men above the fray, not quite flesh-and-blood because their souls wandered in ethereal realms that we poor earth-bound mortals might gawp at in admiration but not ourselves dare to aspire to emulate. Each disavowed any ambition for himself, proclaiming only a higher commitment to the larger good of a greater humanity. Both collected awards—Rajrishi, Padma Bhushan—from well-meaning dupes mesmerised by the Thespian genius that each displayed. If they can get together again, a marvellous future awaits them in Bollywood: Shourie can write the dialogues and Singh can fill the vacuum caused by the departure of Johnny Walker.

Till about January 1987, Shourie had no use for Singh and Singh none at all for Shourie. Singh was busy laying his traps for the capitalist class that constituted Shourie's clients and employers. Shourie, for his part, was occupied as usual with finding a cudgel with which to belabour his favourite whipping-boys: the country's Muslim minority. So, even as VP demonstrated his courage by laying siege on octogenarian industrialists and his probity by misusing his high office to persecute the film star who had upstaged him in the factional party politics of his hometown of Allahabad, Shourie gave the final touches to the manuscript of his book on Islam, a work so vicious and perverted that every English-speaking Muslim I know was outraged at the extracts from the book carried in Illustrated Weekly of India. (I decided then to show my solidarity with secularism by not reading the book: in any case, who can get through hundreds of pages of the man's convoluted prose?)

What brought Singh and Shourie together was their discovery in late 1986/early 1987 that they were on the same side of a private quarrel. They agreed to abuse their respective public offices—one as a Cabinet minister and the other as an editor—to ventilate their private grievances. They shared many traits in common: each was loyal, above all, to himself—and damn everyone else; each a loner; each contemptuous of team-work; each adept at denying the credit to his collaborators; each a master at garnering all the kudos for himself; each a ruthless carpenter fashioning the corpses of his victims into rungs on which to ascend the ladder of his personal success. Each was also his own make-up man. As Rajiv Gandhi discovered. As Ramnath Goenka has discovered. As Chandra Shekhar found out. As Devi Lal now well knows. (And even Pritish Nandy does.)

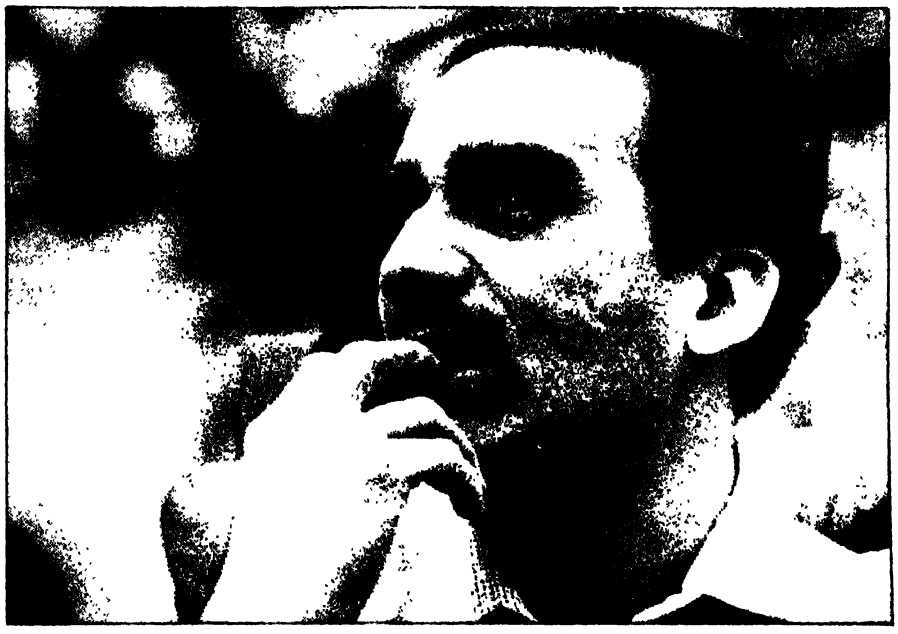
In Fairfax were they conceived. In

V.P. SINGH: What brought Singh and Shourie together was their discovery in late 1986/early 1987 that they were on the same side of a private quarrel. They agreed to abuse their respective public offices, one as a cabinet minister and the other as an editor, to ventilate their private grievances.

Bofors were they born. There was one little problem though. V.P. Singh thought that Shourie the Intrepid had the evidence. While Shourie thought VP the Spotless had it. Neither seems to have checked with the other. Meanwhile, VP bloated like a Khaimal on the campaign of calumny launched by Shourie. The Rajrishi, for his part, preened himself in postures that imparted a touch of probability to Shourie's shrill screeching. The one told the electorate—and the other his growing band of avid readers—that within but a fortnight of the anointing of the Raja of Manda, the lid would be blown off Bofors, HDW, Fairfax and every other can of Rajivian worms. But once they got VP into South Block, they discovered with startled surprise that the Singh jhola contained no evidence, only empty accusations and blatant falsehoods, while Shourie's satchel too was innocent of the Truth That Involves US All and chock-a-block full only of innuendo, distortion and downright lies. What was worse, the two were clearly in cohorts to bring into the Cabinet the one rotund needle of suspicion they had stumbled upon accidentally and unwittingly—in their rummaging through the Bofors haystack. Hence the deliberate suppression of Chitra Subramaniam's story on the eve of the last Lok Sabha elections.

What the stage Gandhi and the print Gandhi forgot was that the real Gandhi has based all his ethics—political as well as personal —on one inflexible principle: that the ends do not justify the means, that resort to unethical means vitiates the ends however good, that only the right means can lead to right ends.

So, Shourie happily overlooked the mote in Singh's eye, even as Singh winked at the beam in Shourie's: the mote in Singh's eye being his politics of caste, the beam in Shourie's being his politics of community. And thereby hangs a tale which certainly bears the telling.



For, when Singh left the Congress, he took with him but half-a-dozen Congressmen (most of whom loathed him anyway, as the Jan Morcha component of the Janata Dal Parliamentary Party has just unanimously demonstrated). He, therefore, had to build his political organisation with the collaboration of others. But where were these others to be found? Outside the Congress (and the communists—who, in any case, count for nothing, in the country bar West Bengal and, occasionally, Kerala, which is what, of course, makes them such an irresponsible, unprincipled and opportunistic party at the national level), there are only two sets of political forces in the country —the casteist and the communal.

The casteists (going back to the days of the Tau's Tau, Sir Chhotu Ram, the original manipulator of the AJGAR combine in the first limited franchise elections organised in the Twenties, after the Morley-Minto Reforms, by our erstwhile colonial masters)—the casteists, as I was saying, believe in cobbling together a majority by coalescing one caste with another and then pitting the composite against all the other castes outside the pale, that is, building their support base by dividing the country. The communalists, on the other hand (going back to the Days of 'divide and rule' and Shourie's many Taus—Savarkar, Hegdewar and Guruji Golwalkar, to name but three, not to mention his step-Tau—Mohammad Ali Jinnah)—the communalists, as I was saying, believe in building their majority by coalescing all the members of one community into their camp and then pitting the composite against all the communities outside the pale, that is, building their support base by dividing the country.

Singh fell into the company of the casteists. Shourie was always at one with the communalists. It is, however, impossible for the casteists and the communalists to remain together for too long. This is because casteism divides the community by raising one caste over and above—the other, while communalism thrives on welding all castes into one united community to give battle to all those other communities that they want to exterminate, eliminate or, at the very least, cut to size. When Singh's new-found casteism and Shourie's deep-rooted communalism fused together in 1987, the seeds of the end were planted in the very beginning. For Singh needed Shourie to promote his casteism and Shourie needed Singh to promote his communalism. The incompatibility between casteism and communalism led to the falling out.

For it was the Mandal report that roused Shourie against Singh. Shourie had not cavilled at the NF manifesto promise on Mandal—because he was shrewd enough to notice that Mandal was no priority in the manifesto and merely a nine-word sop to keep the Ahir element of the AJGAR combo placated. While Singh—by far shrewder than Shourie—spotted in those nine words the petard with which to hoist the original father of original sin, the redoubtable Patriarch of Haryana. So, while Shourie was lulled into thinking that V.P. Singh's highest objective in politics was to give the BJP national respectability, VP busied himself with demonstrating that casteism took precedence over communalism in his ongoing battle for political survival.

ARUN SHOURIE: But what separated the Siamese twins were their priorities. VP's were: casteism first; communalism later. Or Manda first; Mandal second; masjid/mandir later. Rubbish, screamed Shourie; masjid/mandir first, Mandal never, Manda only if...

Not that V.P. Singh objected to communalsm per se ("Aap usey masjid kehtey hi kyon ho? Woh tho Ram Lalla ka mandir hi hai!" reference Shourie's swansong, denied publication in the Indian Express but reproduced in extenso in my favourite newspaper, the National Herald, 30/10/90, from which all further quotations in this column are taken.) No, V.P. Singh was quite happy to do clever little below-the-table, behind-the-back dirty deals with any brand of communalist ("the art," as he has himself so felicitously put it "of managing contradictions"). But when it came to priorties, VP's priorities were clear: casteism, first; communalism, later. Or, more accurately, Manda first, Mandal second, masjid/mandir later.

Rubbish, screamed Shourie, masjid/mandir first, Mandal never, Manda only if...

And thus were the Siamese twins separated, the first abortion in history to take place nine months after birth! And each is now receiving his richly deserved comeuppance. As VP crumbles to an ignominious collapse (by the time this column is published, the nation would have done with him), Arun Shourie bares his communal fangs in the idiom of the BJP. From his BJP friends he has pinched their favourite term of abuse: "pseudo-secularist" (reference my article in SUNDAY 9/9/90). It appeared for the first time in what was to prove to be the last Indian Express editorial penned by Arun Shourie, the nasty minority-baiting piece on 24 October. It is there again in the parting shot of the Shourie article scooped by the National Herald. So taken up have most of us been by the clinching evidence in the article of V.P. Singh's double-dealing with the RSS, the VHP and the BJP, that few of us have had the patience to read through to the end where Shourie's unabashed knickerwallah conclusions have been proclaimed.

L.K ADVANI: Shourie has abuses for the thekedars of the Muslims; none for the likes of Advani who have set themselves up as the thekedars of the Hindus. Who gave the BJP the mandate to roll in a rath to Ayodhya?

There is abuse for the "thekedars" of the Muslims; none for the likes of Advani who have set themselves up as the "thekedars" of the Hindus. Who gave the BJP the mandate to roll in a rath to Ayodhya? Not even one Indian in ten. For a bare 11 per cent of the electorate voted for the BJP in the 1989 elections. Moreover, that one-in-ten vote contained many who were compelled to put their seal against the lotus symbol because V.P. Singh's utterly unprincipled seat adjustment with majority communalism had deprived them of the opportunity of stamping their seal on the chakra. Deplore, as Shourie does, the "baubles" by which "the Muslim masses have been enticed by their thekedars" he has nothing at all to say about the baubles by which his knickerwallah friends, the self-appointed thekedars of Hinduism, have tried to entice the Hindu masses.

Shourie has not a word of reservation to express about Advani's DCM Toyota setting out from Somnath, not a word of condemnation for the inflammatory anti-Muslim slogans chanted by the Bajrang Dal goons accompanying the chariot, not a word of outrage at the blasphemy of a Lord Ram look-alike marching alongside the van as Advani collects the accolades from atop his raised platform, not a word of sympathy for the hapless victims of spreading communalism from Colonelganj to Chennapatna.

The tragedy is that Shourie has no understanding of the desperate need of our minorities to retain their identity in the face of the floodwaters of Hindu chauvinism with which he and his Hindutva cohorts threaten to swamp our minorities. Instead, he has the gall to describe as "moderates" the votaries of the Hindu Rashtra and mock the Muslims for falling victim to the "contrived superficials: the Lakhnavi or Hyderabadi cut, the cap of this cut rather than that, the person's demeanour at Iftaar parties, the smattering of Urdu in the person's speeches". If that is all that Shourie knows of our unity in diversity, God save not only India but Hinduism itself from this self-appointed thekedar of our dharma.

Today he abuses the "surface promise" of constitutional status for "the Minorities Commision". But he himself lent his pen to the group that drafted that NF manifesto promise! And even if he didn't, why was he silent on this point all these months? Amnesia, Shourie sahib? Or silent collaboration between casteism and communalism?

Anyway, V.P. Singh is gone, in a futile, doomed blaze of Doordarshan publicity—on the ineluctable principle that every Prime Minister gets the Parthasarathy he deserves! And Shourie is without a job...But not for much longer, I assure you. If I have no crocodile tears to shed for him, it is because a little birdie tells me there is an editorship falling vacant shortly at the Organizer! •

How green is the Valley?

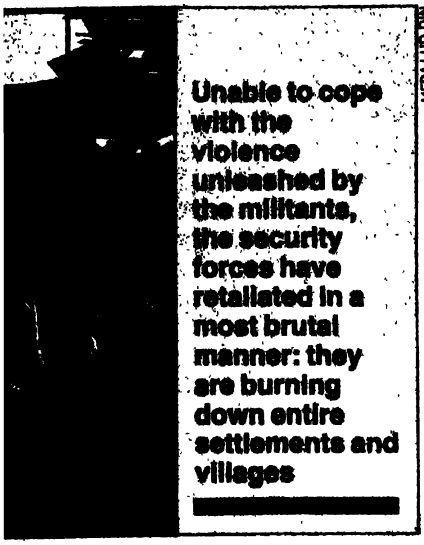
A long and bitter winter lies ahead for the Kashmiris

SHIRAZ SIDHVA

SHIRAZ SIDHVA

The cries for azaadi that resounded in the narrow lanes of Srinagar only a few months back can be heard no more. The flag-burning mobs too have disappeared. Endless hours of curfew is a thing of the past, and shops that have not opened for the better part of the year are once again doing modest business. Even the ice-cream parlours have the odd customer strolling in—something that was unthinkable only three months ago. Courageous tourists—mostly foreigners—have begun taking the flight to Srinagar, undeterred by newspaper reports on the crisis. The holiday-makers stroll down the Dal Lake by day but they do not venture out of their houseboats at night. Girish Saxena's Kashmir seems more normal than Jagmohan's, but the calm is deceptive. "Things have only got worse," admits a senior bureaucrat. "Just because the national press has lost interest in Kashmir doesn't mean the state has stopped burning."

And Kashmir is literally in flames. Unable to cope with the guerrilla tactics adopted by the militants, the paramilitary forces are retaliating by torching entire settlements and villages. But instead of achieving its desired aims, such inhuman and brutal measures, have only alienated the people further and there are very few Kashmiris left in the Valley who have a kind word for the government. Hassan, a wealthy carpet-dealer, says he didn't try to stop his son when he decided to join the azaadi movement. "Instead, I gave him a pair of snowboots that cost me Rs 1,000. Even six months ago, I would have tried to dissuade him, but today we have no option left but to fight back."



The administration, however, keeps reiterating that the masses are fed up with militancy. But there is no evidence of it anywhere. The people, on the contrary, do all they can to shield their "boys who are fighting for a cause". Even the moderates of yesteryears have been forced to adopt a militant posture solely because of the excesses perpetrated by the armed forces. And as they silently suffer, they wonder why their cries are not heard by champions of civil rights like Nelson Mandela. "It's hypocrisy," says Ghulam Nabi, a schoolteacher, referring to the warm welcome given to Mandela during his visit to India. "We can't understand why a single country or international agency is not coming to our aid."

The answer to that question is not as baffling as the Kashmiris make it out to be. "Nobody is going to interfere in India's war against Kashmir because nothing scares the world more than the possibility of a pan-Islamic state, or even another Iran, on their hands," explains a senior external affairs ministry official. And the Muslim world is too preoccupied with the Gulf crisis to pay any attention to the problems of a small community which for all practical purposes is part of a non-Islamic state.

There is another reason why international agencies and governments haven't rushed to the aid of the beleaguered Kashmiris despite reports of human rights violations and excesses by the armed forces. Underlying the fact that most Kashmiris today want independence is the reality of Pakistan's involvement in the movement. But nobody is willing to admit that the movement has, in recent months, acquired communal overtones.

Behind the facade of the gun-toting militant is a formidable network of intellectuals who mastermind the movement and give it the desired direction

In early October, militants shot dead six members of a Kashmiri pandit family, for no ostensible motive. This incident stunned the neighbourhood in downtown Srinagar; some people even took up arms and protested against the senseless killings. "We had permission from the militants to continue living here, and had even paid protection money to one of the groups," says a brother-in-law of the unfortunate accountant from Broadway Hotel, who was killed along

Unable to cope with the violence unleashed by the militants, the security forces have retaliated in a most brutal manner: they are burning down entire settlements and villages

MERAJ-UD-DIN

The warrens of downtown Srinagar would have done Dickens' 19th century London proud. Gutted shops stand as brutal reminders of violence, rats scamper for cover and a darkness engulfs everything

Even children have joined the movement. Their innocent smiles and pink cheeks do not betray the hatred they nurture towards the Indian government and the security forces

MERAJ-UD-DIN

The excesses perpetrated by the security forces have only alienated the people of Kashmir further. Whatever the administration might say, strong-arm tactics are not the answer with his wife and four others. "Our relatives kept warning us to leave, but we have known no other home and didn't think we needed to." The dazed survivors left Sringar for Jammu in a police van; there was perhaps no other option left.

But despite the selective killings, the militants are not willing to concede that the movement has turned communal. In fact, the repeated pleas made by militant organisations to all Kashmiris who have abandoned their homes that they should return to the Valley and would be safe sounds terribly hollow, if not sinister. Many Hindus have died in recent months and nobody is willing to take risks.

The warrens of downtown Srinagar would have done Dickens' 19th-century London proud. Open drains stink of excreta, rats scamper for cover, and a dankness pervades everything. The narrow bylane is lined with young Kashmiris, who signal to each other as soon as they spot a visitor. Their looks are innocuous but everyone is well-armed. You stumble into a passage that is pitch-dark before groping up a flight of steep steps, to emerge in a spacious, semi-lit room. Every window is shielded by armed guards. They form an invincible ring around their leader who has lived underground for the past 11 months. One of them has a cherubic face, and admits he is only ten years old. There, dressed in army fatigues emblazoned with the letters JKLF in white, sporting a cap and dark glasses, sits Javed Ahmad Mir, the acting commander-in-chief of the Jammu and Kashmir Liberation Front (JKLF). Before he took up the gun, Mir was a plumber. Today, he is the only one of the JKLF's four area commanders to have escaped death or prisons. But Mir and all his colleagues seem unfazed by the fact that the security forces have either killed or captured many of the militants. "For every Ishfaq who dies, there will be a hundred others to take his place," claims Javed Mir, adding, "There is no question of giving up our struggle for freedom."

Asked if the change of Governor had made any difference, Mir replies in the negative. "Whether it is Jagmohan or Saxena, they belong to the same nation. We will fight till victory." Isn't it unlikely that the militants will be able to take on the might of the Indian armed forces? "Why not? We will get independence, which is our birthright, even if we have to sacrifice our innocent boys, men, women, and children for it," says Javed Mir.

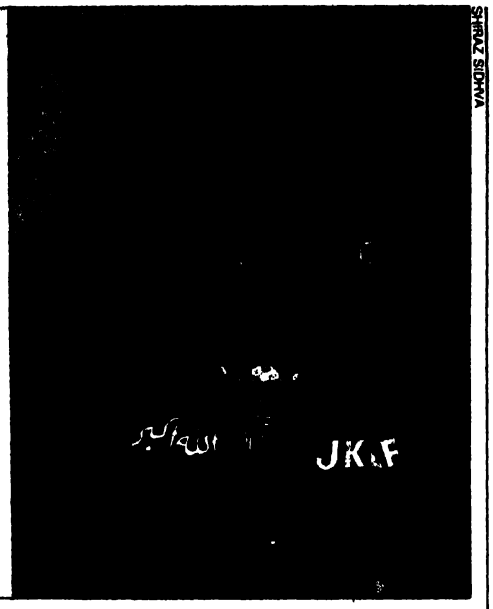
There is no evidence to suggest that the average Kashmiri is fed up with the militants. Everywhere, ordinary people are sheltering the "boys fighting for a cause"

Dismissing that there was tension between the JKLF and the more fundamentalist Hizb-ul Mujahedeen—which seemed to be calling the shots in the Valley even though the former had widespread support among the population—Mir says: "We are all brothers. Whether we belong to the Hizb or the JKLF, we have only one main objective and target—to defeat the Indian Army." But while the JKLF was in favour of azaadi, the Hizb, which is affiliated to the Jamaat-e-Islami, very clearly wants Kashmir to be a part of Pakistan. How did they hope to reconcile their differences? "After the Indian Army withdraws, we will ask the people what they want. Until then, we shall fight our common enemy together," asserts Javed Mir.

How did the JKLF, which has always prided itself as being a secular organisation, view the senseless killings of the few Hindus that had chosen to stay behind in the Valley? Especially since Mir himself has recently asked all Kashmiri pandits to return to their homes? Refusing to concede that the organisation had little control over the scores of splinter groups that were running amuck in the Valley, the JKLF leaders insist that if there were senseless killings, they were the work of Indian agents. "Whether we are Muslims, Christians or Hindus, we are first Kashmiris. And we believe in secularism," insists Mir. "We ask our Hindu brothers to return. It was not the militants who asked them to leave; it is a trick played by the Government of India."

Are the militants prepared for talks with the government to find a solution to the crisis? "Not unless they withdraw all troops and stop humiliating us, torturing our boys, raping our women." Mir has even written a letter to Mandela spelling out what the JKLF thinks are the cause for the Kashmir crisis and urging the African leader to visit the Valley. "But Mandela has not responded. The Indian government has poisoned his ears," says the militant leader.

There is a change of attitude among the militants, but only in the sense that they seem a little more nervous than they were four months ago. But they are a lot more prepared for the long battle ahead, for the sacrifices they may have to make. Chatting informally, Salim, one of those guarding Javed Mir, admits that he hates pulling the trigger. "I feel something when I kill a CRPF man," he says shaking his head. "Some of them talk to us, and tell us, 'leave us alone, go shoot the political leaders who created this mess'."



The ten-year-old militant is less repentant though. And Mir is proud of him. Only yesterday, he saved 12 militants by firing a volley of shots on the CRPF. "I feel nothing when I kill them," he says brazenly. His innocent smile and his pink cheeks make it hard to believe that he is capable of playing with anything else but a toy gun. But the revolver tucked under his sweater is very real. "Our founder, Maqbool Butt sahab, was tortured in different jails, and your forces are killing innocent people," he says by way of explanation. The boy has only recently been trained in one of the many camps that have sprung up in the Valley. His indoctrination is complete and his childhood has been cut short by circumstances.

One interesting fact emerges from the meeting with the militants—that Surrounded by armed guards, Javed Mir, the acting commander-in-chief of the JKLF, exudes confidence. "There is no question of giving up the struggle," he says behind the facade of the gun-toting militant is a well-organised and formidable network of intellectuals—lawyers, doctors, engineers, professors—who mastermind the movement and give it direction. This is evident from the fact that nearly all the articles in the local press are ghost-written, though they bear the signatures of the militant leaders. "It is only these behind-the-scenes guides who control these boys from going berserk or making terrorist-style attacks on their own people or outside the Valley," divulges a senior police official. "Right now, they are only attacking the armed forces, and those they feel are helping them."

Today, all the splinter militant groups have one enemy: the Indian Army. And, the JKLF is willing to go to the negotiating table only if the troops are withdrawn

While the rest of the country celebrates Diwali, albeit scaled down because of the Mandal immolations, Kashmir is engulfed in darkness. The electricity goes off for hours at a stretch. Since 15 September, nearly 1.37 lakh state government employees have gone on strike following the dismissal of five office-bearers of the employees' coordination committee, which had called a token five-day strike to protest against the excesses perpetrated by security forces in the Valley. As if things were not bad enough, all essential services and government schools and colleges have been suspended since mid-September. Asked if he had plans of holding negotiations with the striking employees, Governor Saxena told SUNDAY: "It is a situation that the employees brought upon themselves. These are our own people, it is a family affair and we could sort these things out." Then why had there been such a protracted agitation? "The employees cannot presume to act as a human rights organisation or as a political party. They have to work within the system," stated the Governor. "We appreciate their sentiments, but there is a point beyond which we cannot tolerate things. You cannot hold the government to ransom or act as a watchdog body of a super-human rights organisation. You have to ventilate your feelings and ideas within the system."

Saxena feels that 80 per cent of the employees would like to return to work, but are being intimidated and kept away by the militants. "This is why I have not resorted to any disciplinary action yet," he claims magnanimously.

The Governor's adviser, Ved Marwah, who during Jagmohan's time had boasted that due to his efforts the power and water supply situation in the Valley (as if those were the only problems that plagued the people) had improved, is, according to reliable sources, deliberately not working the turbines that generate power for the Valley. "There is no need to waste energy on these people," he is believed to have said to his engineers. No wonder the stalemate continues. And there is only darkness. ●

The Benazir saga

How she rose, why she fell

Two years ago, on a cold November night, Benazir Bhutto rode into Lahore like a resplendent conqueror, carrying with her an entourage that stretched for miles. As she had come in through the Badshahi Mosque area and entered the narrow streets of Old Lahore, the crowds surged forward, gripped with hysteria and screaming in adulation. Virtually the entire city had stayed awake that night, nerve ends electrified with euphoria. Benazir's coming seemed to herald the beginning of a bright new era.

Last month, Benazir was back in Lahore. The crowds were once again waiting. The black, green and red banners of Benazir's Pakistan Peoples' Party (PPP) continued to festoon the streets. But a chill had crept in. The euphoria had long seeped out. All the actors this time seemed a little fatigued, their cheering distinctly subdued. For, in the 23 months between the two elections, a great hope had been snuffed out in Pakistan. Democracy had lost its glitter.

Benazir Bhutto had been hounded out of office on corruption charges. Her businessman husband, Asif Zardari, was accused of misusing his position and homicidal intimidation, and flung into prison. Benazir's mother, Begum Nusrat Bhutto, had much earlier thrown up her hands in disgust and sought retirement in her home country, Iran. The PPP's erstwhile allies—the Mohajir Quami Movement (MQM) in Sindh and Wali Khan's Awami National Party (ANP) in the North West Frontier Province—had long crossed over to the rival coalition, the Islamic Jamhooree Ittehad.

Materially, of course, nothing much had changed in the country. Benazir's months in office had been marked by the lack of any significant legislation. Poll promises remained unfulfilled and forgotten. The November 1988 polls might as well have not taken place. It was not that the average Pakistani now felt that Benazir was corrupt and uncaring. They continued to chant, "Ye Allah! Ye Rasool! Benazir Baykasoor!" But they no longer believed that the kind of democracy Benazir expounded would work. If any idea had been reinforced, it was that real power in Pakistan would always remain with the so-called "establishment" comprising the military top brass, the upper echelons of the bureaucracy, a clutch of feudal landlords, the favoured super-rich and their international allies.

It was not that the average Pakistani felt that Benazir was corrupt or uncaring. But they no longer believed that the kind of democracy she expounded would work. Real power, they thought, would always remain with the military top brass Electoral democracy for the overwhelming majority of Pakistanis has turned out to be a monumental charade. This cynicism is reflected in voter turnout figures. Pakistan's first general elections, held 23 years after independence, had recorded 67 per cent voter turnout. Since then, the figure has progressively declined and touched a low of 43 per cent in the 1988 polls. This time, officially, more than 45 per cent of the electorate cast their franchise. But this claim appears to be highly suspect. For, virtually every report on polling day (24 October) spoke of low voter turnout. The BBC's network of correspondents said the same thing. And Pakistan's chief election commissioner remarked that voter turnout this time would be as low as 30 to 35 per cent. Not surprisingly, the entire country was more than a little astounded when the official results showed a turnout of more than 45 per cent.

Equally amazing was the PPP's rout—the party secured just 45 out of the 207 general seats in the National Assembly (the Pakistani Parliament). The IJI had miraculously secured 105 seats, which is exactly one more than the number required to form the government independently. Nothing could explain the IJI's overnight metamorphosis into a vastly popular entity. In most constituencies, IJI candidates had won with margins of 10,000-20,000 votes. This means that all over the country, lakhs of bogus voters had turned out to vote for the IJI.

Even before the elections, there was no evidence to suggest that the tide of popular enthusiasm had turned in favour of the IJI. The election mood this time was predominantly one of cynicism. If the average Pakistani had any certainty, it was that "they" would not allow Benazir to become Prime Minister once again. The "they" referred not to the people of Pakistan but to the shadowy "establishment". Benazir's corruption was not the issue. The point, as the average Pakistani saw it, was that the establishment was out to get Benazir. If Pakistan's first democratically elected Prime Minister, Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, could be hanged, what chance did Benazir have? She had been written off the day President Ghulam Ishaq Khan sacked her. At that time, too, there had been no countrywide protest, no mass upsurge or show of public indignation. As far as the average Pakistani was concerned, Benazir had failed. Democracy had failed to deliver.

Pakistanis cannot be faulted for losing faith in the democratic experiment. For, every time the country faced a crisis, it was not the politicians but the army that saved the day. The ethnic violence in the province of Sindh and Benazir's inability to control it only strengthened this view.

BACK WITH A BANG Though Benazir tried her best to demolish all the power centres that the late General Zia had built, the elections saw the rise of the Zia groupies once again

Even Benazir finally had to call in the army to restore a semblance of order in the cities of Sindh.

Even on polling day, armoured personnel carriers and trucks full of khaki-clad soldiers patrolled the streets of Karachi and Hyderabad. In Clifton, the residential area of the Karachi super-rich, there was hardly any evidence of polling. Asif Zardari's Bhilawal House stood deserted, the giant cut-outs of Benazir and family rocking forlornly in the gentle sea breeze. It was a little ironic that Karachi, the first capital of independent Pakistan and the final resting ground of its founder, Mohammad Ali Jinnah, after 43 years of independence should remain a battleground, with democracy hiding in the back streets.

Mudra H : HAL

In a sense, the events of the 1990 elections, far from being fortuitous, had its genesis in processes shaped by Jinnah during the formative years of the country. Pakistan was formed out of Jinnah's belief that Muslims of the Indian sub-continent constituted a separate nationality. The custodian of this nationality was his party, the Muslim League. Strangely, however, the Muslim League was never confident of coming to power through general elections. The party had to resort to the most complex of intrigues to form governments in the four provinces of West Pakistan but failed completely in its attempts to secure a foothold in the eastern part of the country. General elections were scheduled to be held for the first time in the country's history in February 1959, a full 12 years after independence. But General Ayub Khan's October 1958 coup ensured that nothing of the sort happened.

During the next 12 years, the bureaucracy and the armed forces strengthened their hold over the country. The Pakistani "establishment", as this nexus came to be called, administered every aspect of national affairs, from internal security, state finances and economic policy to foreign affairs. The establishment even attracted some of the best and brightest men in the country. To survive and prevail, the establishment had to be imaginative, far-sighted and extremely canny. And, on the whole, it was all of these. It made various pacts with other countries to shore up its defences, it created a credible military machine to stand up to India. It managed generous foreign aid and initiated policies that helped a select group to achieve super-rich status. In the process, it also introduced the Green Revolution complete with large-scale mechanisation and assured irrigation.

The establishment could not, however, tackle two basic problems. One was the rise of Bengali nationalism in the eastern wing and the other was the increasing aspirations of the West Pakistani peasant and dispossessed labour. These problems had arisen essentially because of the lack of democratic processes. Discontent had been repressed. The establishment made a tactical retreat and held general elections for the first time in 1970. That blew the lid. East Pakistan voted overwhelmingly in favour of the nationalistic Awami League led by the charismatic Sheikh Mujibur Rahman while the populist Zulfikhar Ali Bhutto, with his socialistic mantras, was returned by a landslide in West Pakistan. If democratic processes had been adhered to, Sheikh Mujib would legitimately have been the first democratically-elected Prime Minister of Pakistan. Instead, he was arrested and East Pakistan revolted. India intervened and Pakistan was split in two.

For seven years, the establishment maintained a low profile having lost face in the 1971 war with India. Bhutto with his emotional promise of a 1,000-year jehad against India and with his populist promises kept the remnants of the country in thrall. But things were falling apart. The politicians were not half as efficient as the establishment men. Corruption, nepotism and half-baked policies were fast eroding the edifice built by the generals. Finally, in 1977, the establishment once again intervened. Bhutto, the one-time darling of the Pakistani people, was arrested and finally hanged. Political parties were outlawed and the peoples' representatives jailed, and tortured. The establishment, led this time by the shrewd General Zia-ul Haq, restored order. Pakistan was deemed Islamic and the Afghan issue was exploited to gain favour from the United States, which began pouring in billions of dollars in military and economic aid.

Zia managed to impose 11 years of stability in Pakistan. But the cracks were widening. Subnationalism in Sindh and Baluchistan flared up and rising inequalities were breeding discontent throughout the length and breadth of the country. The establishment by this time had learnt the importance of allowing some forms of democratic processes. Zia, with his foresight, promoted a handful of men as the future leaders of Pakistani democracy. They included the present President, Ghulam Ishaq Khan, the IJI supremo, Mian Nawaz Sharif, caretaker Prime Minister Ghulam Mustafa Jatoi and ex-Prime Minister Mohammad Khan Junejo.

In 1985, Zia held partyless elections and appointed Junejo as Prime Minister. But democracy and plutocracy could not co-exist indefinitely. Junejo and Zia clashed over the Afghan policy. Junejo was then summarily dismissed. Zia's death made elections even more imperative and Benazir, much to the chagrin of the establishment, emerged as the strongest political leader in the country and the head of the largest party in the National Assembly. Benazir, thanks to her own blunders, lasted a bare 20 months. Now, the Zia groupies in the form of the IJI are at the helm. The establishment proteges are now championing Pakistani democracy. But yesmen and democrats are not synonymous. The IJI for all its success, remains a party largely confined to the province of Punjab (which accounts for about 60 per cent of National Assembly seats). Benazir's party, in contrast, continues to be the widely-accepted national party with a tremendous following. By ousting Benazir, the establishment has at best won a temporary reprieve Any attempt at controlled democracy cannot work in the long run. Similar problems as in 1970 could well resurface again. History has taught that nations cannot be managed, they can only be democratised or destroyed. •

The desperate hours

The collapse of V.P. Singh and after. The inside story

ASHOK VAHIE

"LIMPET"

As his majority vanished, the Prime Minister clung on to the sound of jibes

It was a time for vengeance. Last year, two men believed that Vishwanath Pratap Singh had stabbed them in the back. Veteran Janata Dal strongman Chandra Shekhar had always been opposed to letting the Raja into the Opposition and had missed no opportunity to make it clear that Singh was not his leader. After the Janata Dal was asked to form the government, Shekhar insisted on standing for election as leader. He would lose, he said, but at least, he would make his opposition to the Raja public. Finally, Shekhar withdrew from the fray after being assured by Devi Lal that the Tau would himself assume the leadership. In fact, Lal had done a deal with V.P. Singh. Once Shekhar withdrew, the Raja stepped in and gleefully accepted the prime ministership.

Rajiv Gandhi had his own score to settle. In 1985, he had disregarded Congress hacks who warned him against appointing a UP politician finance minister and bringing V.P. Singh to Delhi to be part of his 'A' team. After a year and a half of apparent loyalty, the Raja turned against his mentor, began investigating his friends and finally, denounced his leader as a "Bofors ka dalal". It was a betrayal that Rajiv will never forget.

From the moment the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) withdrew support to the National Front government thus robbing it of its majority, both Shekhar and Rajiv had a one-point programme: get rid of V P. Singh.

Such was Chandra Shekhar's determination that he did not even mind taking the support of the Congress, a party he had spent over 15 years opposing. And Rajiv Gandhi, resolved as he was to see V.P. Singh out of office, made it clear that he would link up with anybody (save the BJP)—even Devi Lal—if a government that kept the Raja out could be formed.

On the record, however, both men insisted that their motivations were not personal. They talked of V.P. Singh's casteism, his double-dealing on the Babri Masjid/Ram Janmabhoomi issue, his inability to handle the economy, his lack of interest in confronting secessionist forces in Kashmir and Punjab and his naked opportunism.

But beneath it all, there was the personal factor. For Shekhar and Rajiv, here at last was the time of reckoning. The Raja had cheated them before.

And now, he would pay the price.

Shekhar and Gandhi had one thing in common: they hated V.P. Singh

Not for nothing is Vishwanath Pratap Singh called one of the master tacticians of Indian politics. Others, faced with the sudden loss of their majority in the Lok Sabha, might have considered resigning. Not Singh. He decided to brazen it out.

First, he told a mystified President R. Venkataraman that he would prove his majority on the floor of the House.

VENGEFUL

By toppling V.P. Singh, Shekhar avenged last year's fraudulent leadership election

As he had no majority to prove, the President did not quite realise what V.P. Singh was playing at. In fact, the Raja was considering several options. These were:

The election scenario: V.P. Singh believed that with Babri Masjid and the Mandal Commission, he had the Muslim and backward votes sewn up. He would face the confidence motion, lose and then call an election on the secularism issue. It might not result in an overall majority for the Janata Dal, but he would get 200 seats, enough to form a government with the support of the left.

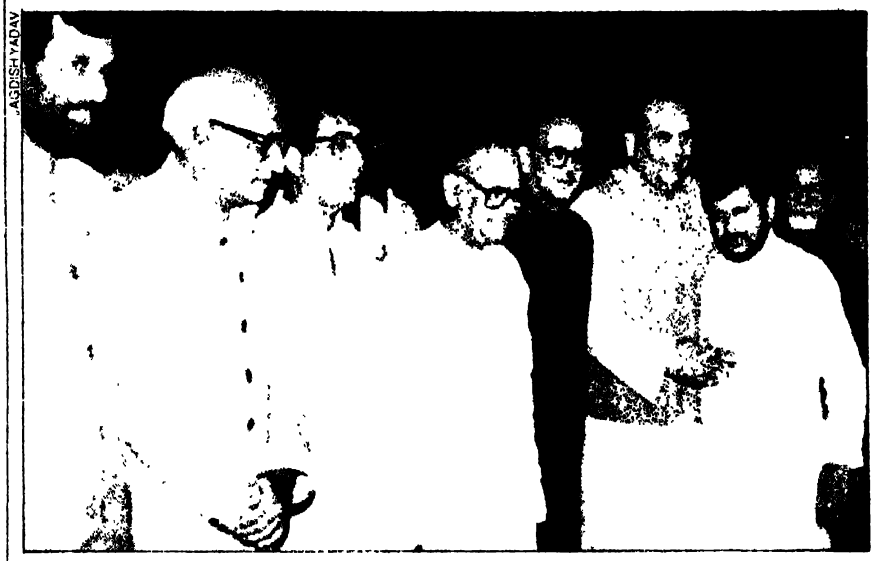
Backward unity: Shortly after the BJP withdrew support, the Raja's supporters claimed that the government was guaranteed a majority because backward caste MPs from both the Congress(I) and the Janata Dal would defect in droves and vote for the Janata Dal.

Coalitions: Even before the BJP withdrew support, there had been talk of making West Bengal chief minister Jyoti Basu Prime Minister. V.P. Singh was, apparently, willing to step down in favour of Basu, convinced that the Congress would support a National Front-CPI(M) coalition in an effort to isolate the BJP.

Another leader: V.P. Singh's principal concern was to ensure that Chandra Shekhar did not succeed him as leader of the Janata Dal. He was willing to accept Devi Lal as Prime Minister to ensure that this did not happen. The scenario assumed that Lal would get Shekhar's support and be able to negotiate a deal with the BJP.

Deal with Congress: It was most important for V.P. Singh to win his vote of confidence in the Lok Sabha on 7 November. Accordingly, his emissaries approached the Congress with the following formula: the party would vote for Singh on the 7th; he would then step down; and a leader acceptable to both sides would be found from within the ranks of the Janata Dal.

Barely hours after Atal Behari Vajpayee wrote to the President withdrawing support from the government, V.P. Singh and his advisers were busily pursuing these options.



The Raja first explored the possibility of getting Congress MPs to defect. This task was assigned to K.P. Unnikrishnan, Murasoli Maran and P. Upendra. The trio approached 21 MPs—all from south India—but found that not one was agreeing to cross over. Then, Sharad Yadav did his best to cultivate the Congress backwards, again with a notable lack of success.

That attempt having failed, the Raja turned his attention to the BJP. He knew that Atal Behari Vajpayee had not been fully in agreement with L.K. Advani's strategy on Ram Janmabhoomi. And he had hopes that BJP MP Jaswant Singh would be sympathetic to his point of view. Moreover, V.P. Singh knew Murli Manohar Joshi and Rajendra Singh from Allahabad and reckoned that they could persuade Advani to reconsider.

Vajpayee was still the key to the strategy and V.P. Singh used Union minister of state for home affairs Subodh Kant Sahay to get through to him. Sahay and Arif Beg served as the Prime Minister's emissaries, but try as they might, Vajpayee would not relent.

V.P. Singh knew that even if he did earn the support of the BJP on 7 November, he could not hope to last for long. But there was a deeper plan at work.

Shortly after his now notorious Independence Day speech in which the one-time Mr Clean recast himself as a cow-belt demagogue with a reliance on Mandal and other populist measures, he discussed the possibility of a mid-term election with President Venkataraman. The President told him that he was not sure that the leader of a minority government had the right to ask for the dissolution of Parliament.

NATIONAL GOVERNMENT

His back to the wall, the Raja took his Cabinet to the President with a new suggestion

Since then, V.P. Singh has been advised by legal experts that were he to ask for a vote of confidence in the Lok Sabha and win, then his advice, tendered immediately afterwards, would be binding on the President. His strategy now was simple: win the vote and ask for elections.

Hence the feelers to the Congress and hence the overtures to the BJP

There was one major problem with this scenario. the Janata Dal Parliamentary Party did not want elections. Many JD MPs were not sure that they would win re-election. Others had not collected funds. And most thought it unnecessary to go back to the country only a year after they had got to Delhi.

It was this sentiment that Chandra Shekhar capitalised on. Each day, he told visitors to his sprawling bungalow on New Delhi's South Avenue Lane that his immediate priority was to avoid elections. This earthy sentiment contrasted powerfully with the Raja's high-minded homilies. A few minutes away, at Race Course Road, V.P. Singh was busy telling MPs that he was willing to give up his office for the sake of a principle and to let the people of India cast their verdict against communalism. When pressed, he would declare that there might be no alternative to a mid-term poll and that he, for one, was not scared of facing the people.

The trouble was that the MPs were scared and so each time V.P. Singh suggested that an election was imminent, his supporters began to have second thoughts By some estimates, it was the Raja's insistence on holding elections that saw the strength of the Chandra Shekhar camp swell. In four days, the dissidents' strength grew from 18 to 30 and other MPs also sent out feelers.

Sensing that he had made a tactical error, V.P. Singh altered his strategy. Now, he told JD MPs that he was against the dissolution of the Lok Sabha. "We have stood up for a principle," he declared at a tea party he hosted for the parliamentary party. "If we lose, then we will go and sit in the Opposition."

The prospect of losing power seemed marginally more attractive than the thought of facing the people again, but more and more MPs were recognising the merits of backing Chandra Shekhar. If the Janata Dal strongman was able to secure Congress(I) support—as seemed likely—then they could stave off an election and retain power.

Once this became clear, V.P. Singh spent his time trying to keep his MPs together. The support of chief ministers was particularly crucial. Of them, Laloo Prasad Yadav was a VP loyalist because of the Mandal issue. But Biju Patnaik, Chimanbhai Patel

The new Rajiv

Same as the old Rajiv?

"Has he really changed?"

Last week, as Rajiv Gandhi returned to the centre-stage of Indian politics, that was the only question that mattered.

The parallels with his mother were obvious. In 1980, Indira Gandhi returned to power more because of Janata's failures than because of any concrete achievement of her own. Then too, her supporters suggested that she was not the bad-tempered dictator of 1975-76, but the well-meaning idealist of 1969-71. But as her term (1980-84) proved, she hadn't changed from 1976 at all.

So it is with Rajiv. Is he the arrogant, unreasonable Rajiv of 1989 or is he the Mr Nice Guy of 1984-85 again?

Rajiv has his answer ready. He has never been arrogant or unreasonable—that image was due to "a failure of communications". The way he sees it, he hasn't changed since 1985!

His friends believe that this view is pure bluster. They reckon he has changed in many crucial ways. They offer the following instances:

and Mulayam Singh Yadav were undecided.

The Raja used Jyoti Basu and Indrajeet Gupta to persuade Biju Patnaik that V.P. Singh was in the right. Initially, the Orissa chief minister wavered, but finally, he gave in, though he warned that regardless of what happened, a mid-term poll seemed inevitable.

Chimanbhai Patel's case was different. Once the BJP withdrew support to his government, he lost his majority and seemed certain to fall over a BJP-sponsored motion of no-confidence. Chandra Shekhar saved his ministry by arranging a deal whereby the Congress(I) would vote for Patel in the no-confidence motion. In return, Patel crossed over to the dissidents.

That left the most crucial chief minister: UP's Mulayam Singh Yadav. Perhaps, the only flaw in V.P Singh's Mandal-masjid electoral strategy was that it depended overmuch on Mulayam Singh. The backward-Muslim constituency that the Raja has constructed for himself was essentially Mulayam's own support base. If Yadav came out against him—by accusing him of double-dealing on Ayodhya, for instance—then that would cause the Raja's constituency to come crumbling down.

V.P. Singh had an insurance policy. When Bihar's Laloo Yadav had backed the Prime Minister, Chandra Shekhar had organised a revolt by 50 of his MLAs. Now, the Raja held out a similar threat to Mulayam: support Shekhar and those MLAs owing loyalty to Ajit Singh will topple you.

It was this that held Mulayam back though his hatred of V.P. Singh and his disdain for what he sees as the Raja's opportunism are no secret. At first, the chief minister refused to commit himself to either side, claiming that he had to deal with the Ayodhya problem. By 1 November, he could no longer use that excuse and both Shekhar and V.P. Singh called him nearly 20 times over the next three days.

On 3 November, Mulayam finally came to Delhi and told Shekhar that he would support him if Ajit Singh would. As Ajit had—in his characteristic flip-flop fashion—sent messages of support to both sides, Shekhar told Yadav that nobody could count on the Jat leader's support. "But," he added reassuringly, "don't worry. V.P. Singh can't topple you. Once he does, then it is the end of his backward-Muslim constituency."

The argument worked. Late on the night of 3 November, Mulayam's MPs met at communications minister Janeshwar Mishra's place. They were to support Shekhar, the UP chief minister declared.

V.P. Singh, who had been anxiously awaiting Mulayam's arrival in New Delhi, made frantic attempts to contact him. But the chief minister did not return his calls and left for Lucknow without meeting the Prime Minister.

TRICKIER THAN TAU

Devi Lal changed his mind every day till he finally came out for Shekhar

- He has ceased to depend on a coterie. Most important decisions are now taken after consultation with a wide variety of Congress leaders.

- He no longer shoots from the hip. Rajiv's instinct was to come out strongly against Mandal. On Ram Janmabhoomi too, he wanted the party to take a more aggressive stand. But he held his peace, asked around and when his colleagues convinced him that it was wiser to soft-pedal the issues, he went along.

- He avoids personal attacks. Though this is not widely known, Rajiv believes that Mulayam Singh Yadav has pandered irresponsibly to Muslim sentiment in an effort to carve out an electoral base for himself. He feels that Mulayam has invited a Hindu backlash and that ultimately, Muslims will suffer.

In the old days, he would have gone for Mulayam. Now, he is more restrained.

Similarly, though he despises V.P. Singh, he disguises his contempt and gives him the respect due to a Prime Minister.

- He has come to terms with the fact that to change the political system, you must play by the rules. Earlier, he imagined that his popularity was enough to overcome any obstacles. Now, he sees the merit in such gimmicks as the second class rail yatras.

Oddly enough, Rajiv's view of himself (that he hasn't changed) is quite easily reconciled with his friends' observations. He means that he was never arrogant—the changes everyone talks about are essentially tactical and have to do with methods of communication and not with his basic personality.

Will these changes be enough? Rajiv clearly thinks so, but others are not so sure. They point out that he is not a political person at heart and has always seemed like a nice guy when he is out of office. It is when the pressure builds up—as it did in Karnataka last month—and he has to act, that the problems begin.

Sensing that the revolt was snowballing, the Raja began exploring his other options. By now it was clear to him that he was finished as Prime Minister. But he had a one-point programme: ensure that Shekhar did not succeed him.

The day after the BJP had withdrawn support to the National Front government, V.P Singh had sent an Indian Air Force plane to the Maharashtra town of Nasik to fetch Devi Lal. By then, the Raja had won over Ranjit Singh, the Tau's younger son, and on the flight to New Delhi, Ranjit persuaded his father to support V.P. Singh.

Devi Lal drove directly to Race Course Road from the airport. The Prime Minister was waiting for him. "Devi Lalji," he intoned melodramatically, "you gave me the job (a reference to their fraudulent deal last year), now you take it back."

So overcome was the Tau by this display of histrionics that he announced his support for the Prime Minister on the spot and emerged from Race Course Road to declare that nobody changed horses in the middle of the race.

But as the Tau is inconsistent, so are his children. Within a couple of days, Ranjit had changed his mind. Why didn't Devi Lal take the job after all? Didn't he have the right to be Prime Minister?

The reasoning appealed to the Tau. Messages were sent back and forth and V.P. Singh reiterated that he was willing to support Lal as Prime Minister. But how would the Tau get a majority? One answer was that he would work out a deal with the BJP. And so, Devi Lal, who only three weeks ago had been a great BJP-baiter, moderated his statements and refrained from attacking his former—and perhaps future—allies.

While the Tau dreamt his dreams of glory, the Raja encouraged the Janata Dal Parliamentary Party to believe that there was no question of changing the leader. Certainly, many leading members of the government—who had resigned over Chautala's reinduction and had rejoiced when the Tau was fired—would have been appalled by the moves to install Devi Lal as Prime Minister. The Arun Nehru faction and the Ajit Singh group in particular had no desire to work under the Tau.

Till 1 November, Devi Lal still believed that his best bet was to back V.P. Singh in public before his own inevitable ascension to the prime ministership. Then, somebody told him that at the next day's meeting of the National Front presidium, a resolution would be passed expressing faith in V.P. Singh's leadership.

The Tau was outraged. "He has made a fool of me," he raged to his supporters. That night he sent a message to Chandra Shekhar. And the next day, he offered him his unconditional support. He had no prime ministerial ambitions, he said, and would back Shekhar.

It was clear that time was running out for V.P. Singh and it seemed that Shekhar would at last be avenged. But the Raja had a few tricks up his sleeve.

Nathu Ram Mirdha approached the Congress on behalf of the Prime Minister and offered a deal. At a time of crisis, he said, V.P. Singh would not divide the country any further. Secular forces (ie, everybody except the BJP) should now come together and form a government. Rajiv could be Prime Minister and V.P. Singh would agree to be his deputy.

It was an absurd suggestion. Rajiv Gandhi was—by his reckoning—on the verge of driving the man who had stabbed him in the back out of government. Why on earth would he agree to a formula that would offer the Raja a way out?

There was a second approach to the Congress. George Fernandes, in his current avatar as a V.P. Singh lieutenant, took a proposal to Sharad Pawar. If the Congress would vote for V.P. Singh in the motion of confidence, then the BJP would stand isolated and the 'secular' stand on Babri Masjid would be vindicated. Once that was done, V.P. Singh would gracefully step down and a new leader of Rajiv Gandhi's choice would take over.

This was as bizarre a scenario. When Pawar conveyed it to Rajiv, it was summarily dismissed. The Congress president's objection was the same. V.P. Singh was going anyway. Why should the Congress step in to ensure that the man who betrayed the party made a graceful exit?

Meanwhile, a third approach was made to the Congress, but this time, V.P. Singh knew nothing about it. It was Arun Nehru who sent a message to his cousin, suggesting a mass defection from the Dal to the Congress.

Nehru has made no secret of his disaffection with the Raja: he is appalled by Mandal and horrified by the Prime Minister's double-dealing. His problem is that he is even less enthusiastic about the alternatives to V.P. Singh within the Dal: Chandra Shekhar and Devi Lal.

At heart, Nehru remains a Congressman and it was to the Congress

GATHERING SUPPORT

As the hours went by, the likes of O.P. Chautala and Shatrughan Sinha rushed to Shekhar's side

THE CHIEF MINISTERS

Two (Biju Patnaik and Laloo Yadav) went with V.P. Singh. The others (Mulayam Singh and Chimanbhai Patel) chose Shekhar that he wished to return. He sent a message to Rajiv saying that he wanted to cross over with 70 MPs. That would have given the Congress a majority and allowed Rajiv to become Prime Minister again.

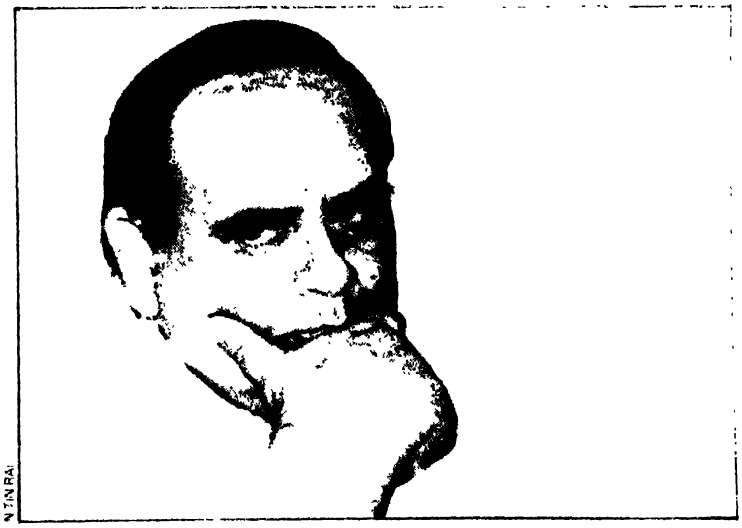
Nehru's scheme ran into powerful opposition from within the Congress. Many senior leaders simply did not want him back. Others cautioned Rajiv that to return to office as a result of defections would be counter-productive.

Finally though, it was the numbers that killed the scheme. The Congress calculated that Nehru did not have more than 20 MPs on his side. Under the provisions of the Anti-Defection Act, that did not allow his group to cross the floor without being disqualified.

By 5 November, it was clear that V.P. Singh was running out of tricks. His support fell into four broad categories: the casteists (Sharad Yadav, Ram Vilas Paswan, et al); the non-entities (George Fernandes, Madhu Dandavate, Jaipal Reddy, etc.); the Ajit Singh faction; and the Arun Nehru group. Of these, the Nehru group was only sticking on because it wasn't sure where to go. And Ajit could change his mind any time and lead his faction into the opposing camp.

Despite this, there was no doubt that the Raja had the numbers on his side. Simply put, a majority of the Janata Dal Parliamentary Party still wanted him as Prime Minister.

Unfortunately, this was not enough to ensure his survival. It was clear that Shekhar had enough MPs to split the party and it seemed probable that he would be able to form a government with Congress support.



Nevertheless, a majority is a majority and the Shekhar-Devi Lal group—aware that numbers were not on its side—chose to give the Janata Dal Parliamentary Party meeting a miss. Instead, it assembled on the lawns of Devi Lal's Willingdon Crescent bungalow, announced that it now comprised 68 Lok Sabha MPs (under the Anti-Defection Act, 47 are needed for a split) and so was declaring itself the real Janata Dal.

Next, the meeting unanimously elected Chandra Shekhar as its leader and expelled V.P Singh. While the decisions were far-reaching in their import, newsmen seemed more interested in the identities of the politicians who had turned up. There were the ministers who had resigned: Janeshwar Mishra, Maneka Gandhi, Jagdeep Dhankar, Bhakta Charan Das, Usha Singh, etc. But the real surprise was Sanjay Singh, the newly-elected Rajya Sabha MP from Uttar Pradesh, who is a relative of V.P. Singh's. Why had Sanjay Singh switched sides? "Because V.P. Singh is a disaster," he stated flatly.

For all this, there was little doubt that V.P. Singh's faction of the Janata Dal had the more impressive turnout. He got 83 Lok Sabha MPs and so had the majority. (Though, if Ajit Singh defects, then that could change very quickly.) At his meeting, 30 Janata Dal MPs, including Chandra Shekhar, were expelled and the split termed illegal.

The numbers presented their own problems: 83 and 68 add up to 151, but the Janata Dal has only 140 MPs in the Lok Sabha!

Either some of the names had been made up or some MPs had signed both lists. There was the example of Prakash Bhatt, a JD MP from Gujarat, who REMEMBER ME?

Arun Nehru tried to return to the Congress, but Rajiv shot the plan down had gone to V P. Singh's meeting. After he got there—and perhaps when he realised that the Raja did not have the support of two-thirds of the party—he began complaining of chest pain.

VP SHOULD GO

A doctor was called and Bhatt rushed to hospital in an ambulance. On the way to hospital however, he said he was feeling better, stopped the ambulance, hailed a passing taxi and drove away.

He went straight to Devi Lal's house, assured Chimanbhai Patel that he was with the dissidents, badmouthed V.P. Singh and then went off to hospital and finally, got himself admitted!

Once Shekhar had split the party and finished off the Raja's prime ministership, V.P. Singh resolved to play a spoiling game. Now, his only concern was with ensuring that Chandra Shekhar did not become Prime Minister: all talk of principles had long been forgotten.

There were two prongs to the Raja's strategy:

- Because he had expelled 25 of Shekhar's supporters (including Shekhar himself) as well as another five Rajya Sabha members, he argued that they could not be said to have split the party. The 33 MPs who had not been expelled had left on their own, but as they did not constitute a third of the Janata Dal's membership, they were in violation of the Anti-Defection Act. (Finally, Shekhar claimed the support of 58 Lok Sabha MPs.)

This was a bizarre argument and suggested that nobody could ever split any party—all the leadership had to do was expel them!

Strangely, Speaker Rabi Ray, a Janata Dal MP himself, accepted this position, even though Shekhar personally urged him to reconsider, pointing out that his MPs had split the party before any expulsion was ordered.

- With this essentially crooked position in place, the Raja affected a high-minded stance. He took along eight of his ministers and rushed off to see the President.

How could an 'unattached member' like Shekhar who had been expelled from a party be allowed to form a government? he asked.

What was the alternative? Well, said V.P. Singh, hastily revising the stand he had taken two days before, he thought a national government would be a good idea.

The idea was a non-starter. The Congress and the BJP had both made it clear that they would not participate in any national government, but by then, V.P. Singh was prepared to try anything to keep Shekhar out of office.

Eleven months after he had been

Shekhar and the media

An uneasy, hostile relationship

If Vishwanath Pratap Singh is the man the media made, then Chandra Shekhar is the man the media unmade. Few politicians (except perhaps V.P. Singh over the last two months) have faced the kind of sustained media hostility that Shekhar has endured.

But once, it was all so different. During the 1977-79 Janata period, Shekhar performed creditably as party president and once Mrs Gandhi returned in 1980, he emerged as the obvious Opposition alternative. His principled stands, his padayatra and his natural charisma made him a media darling.

Then, in 1984, it all began to come unstuck. The starting point was Operation Bluestar. At a time when the entire country lost itself in an orgy of self-congratulation, Chandra Shekhar was one of only two national politicians (the other, oddly enough, was Subramaniam Swamy) who pointed out what we now know to be correct—that the action had hurt Sikh sentiment and would backfire.

The media reacted badly to Shekhar's view and after Rajiv Gandhi's 1984 landslide (in which Chandra Shekhar lost his own seat), dismissed him as a has-been. In 1987, when the disillusionment with Rajiv began, the press turned to V.P. Singh as an alternative. Unlike the rest of the Opposition, Shekhar did not welcome the Raja with open arms.

He had many reservations: if V.P. Singh thought Rajiv was dictatorial, then how did he justify worshipping Indira Gandhi? If the left were the Raja's "natural allies", then why had he been so right-wing while in office? And so on.

Today, now that V.P. Singh's reputation is in tatters, these seem to be valid questions. But in 1987-88, Shekhar was seen as a spoiler, as a bitter man who was jealous of the Raja's prominence.

In 1989, Shekhar insisted on standing for the post of leader of the Janata Dal Parliamentary Party, even though he was certain to lose. "At least then they will not be able to say that V.P. Singh's election was unanimous," he told friends. This decision sat uneasily with the Raja, who wanted to be drafted by unanimous acclaim sworn in, V.P. Singh had finally revealed himself as a manipulator who would bend any rule and take any step to keep the democratic process from functioning normally.

Even while the Raja and Rabi Ray were busy with this little scheme, Shekhar and Rajiv were ironing out the details of their arrangement.

The Janata Dal strongman met the Congress president twice. First, they had breakfast at Rajiv's bungalow on Janpath. And then they met again to work out the modalities of the deal.

The salient points were:

- Shekhar would be Prime Minister.
- The Congress would support him from outside, but would not join the government.
- This arrangement would last longer than a year after which there would be elections.
- Perhaps some kind of electoral adjustments would be possible once the election was called.
- After V.P. Singh lost the vote of confidence, the President was bound to summon Rajiv. At that stage, Gandhi would refuse to form the government, but would declare his party's support for Shekhar.
- Should the Speaker persist in being unreasonable, then they would bring a motion of no-confidence against him.

From all accounts, the two men get along well. Ideologically, they are poles apart. Shekhar is an unreconstructed socialist who tries manfully to fit into a changing world. Rajiv is a free-marketeer who has had to adapt himself to the socialist rhetoric of Indian politics.

As individuals too, they are very different. Rajiv is essentially a private person. An obsessive family man, he seems ill-at-ease in the hurly-burly of Delhi's political circus. Shekhar, on the other hand, is a totally political person. He has sacrificed family life for statecraft, runs an open house and is always to be found in the midst of a group of political activists. He has no life other than his work.

However, they do have some things in common. Both are basically secular. Neither believes in introducing caste into Indian politics. Both are essentially straightforward men who speak their minds. Neither is very good at deal-making and duplicity.

And both hate V.P. Singh.

As SUNDAY goes to press, all that is clear is that the Raja will lose the vote of confidence and that his crumbling, discredited prime ministership will collapse.

Logically, Shekhar should be his successor. But this is still not certain. And even if Shekhar's band of dissidents does form the next government, theirs will be an interim one till the next election. Moreover, with the likes of Devi Lal around, it is not clear how stable such a regime can be.

The real winner, of course, is Rajiv Gandhi. Eleven months after he was turned out of office, Rajiv is back on centre-stage. He calls all the shots. He holds all the cards.

Once V.P. Singh collapses, it is Rajiv who has the right to form the next government. He has passed it up because he intends to stick to his promise that he will not assume power without a mandate. And the only reason why elections are not being held is because Rajiv believes that neither he nor his party is ready for that responsibility.

But in a very real sense, Chandra Shekhar is also a winner. Right from the time that the rest of the Opposition welcomed the Raja with open arms, he expressed his reservations. Today, he has the satisfaction of knowing that those reservations are shared by most of the Lok Sabha.

Eleven months after V.P. Singh cheated him in the leadership election, Shekhar has got his own back on the Raja. He may or may not be Prime Minister. But just as Rajiv has had the last laugh, so Shekhar has had his revenge. •

STAKING HIS CLAIM

Shekhar told the President that he ought to be Prime Minister (having repeatedly declared that he would not take the job) and so an elaborate conspiracy to defraud Chandra Shekhar was hatched with the assistance of Devi Lal. Incredibly, the media supported this ploy and hailed the Dal leadership for lying to Shekhar!

Today, with V.P. Singh's media image in ruins, most of the press agrees that he should go. Yet, so deep is the hostility to Shekhar that his candidacy evokes little enthusiasm among leader-writers.

To Shekhar, of course, this is only to be expected. V.P. Singh lived by the media; his prime ministership died by the media. Chandra Shekhar, on the other hand, has got where he has without the press. So how does it matter what the editorials say?

THE BATTLE OF AYODHYA

The police finally crack down on the kar sevaks. But the crusade for a Ram Mandir continues

The repeat wasn't long in coming. Only two days after the kar sevaks stormed the Ayodhya complex to enter the disputed area and inflict symbolic damage to the Babri Masjid, rigging up a saffron flag on one of its domes as a mark of victory, they were at it again. On 2 November, curfew was relaxed from 4 to 8 am. Thousands of devotees went to the Saryu for a holy dip and prayers. And then assembled at the Ram Ki Chavni Temple, owned by Nritya Gopal Das, a local mahant and vice-president of the Ram Janmabhoomi Mukti Yagna Samiti. It was a crowd with a collective will: to enter the disputed area once again and effect another victory in this battle for Ram.

A little before 10 am, the kar sevaks, led by activists of the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP) and the Bajrang Dal, headed for the shrine through Hanuman Garhi, which is only 700 metres away from the disputed area. Police sources have it that the mob was armed with spears and lathis, a charge hotly contested by the kar sevaks. Their progress towards the Janmabhoomi complex was slow, as the security forces resorted to a lathicharge in an attempt to beat them back. Undeterred by this, the crowd continued inching forward. Realising that matters were getting out of hand, the police fired tear gas shells, and was brick-batted by those gathered on roof tops for their pains. Meanwhile, the kar sevaks moved forward inexorably.

In a last-ditch effort to prevent re-entry of the mob into the masjid, the security forces opened fire. According to eye-witnesses, this lasted for about half an hour, and the kar sevaks swear that about 50-60 dead bodies were dragged away from this spot alone. Security forces also opened fire at the Saryu bridge, from where a number of kar sevaks were trying to force their way into Ayodhya, and VHP sources maintained that 16 people had died in the police action.

Claims on the number of casualties varied. While the administration insisted that only nine people had died in the firing, newsagency reports had it that around 15-18 lives had been lost. A number of people were also taken into custody, among them firebrand BJP MP Uma Bharti, while many others suffered injuries. But whatever the cost in terms of human lives, the security forces did manage to keep the mob out of the Babri Masjid, which is more than what they achieved on 30 October.

The administration, of course, led by chief minister Mulayam Singh Yadav, had sung loud hosannas of self-praise after the 30 October action. According to them, the police had only acted according to considered strategy, by resorting to the minimum use of force. For, they reasoned, if the security forces had kept out the kar sevaks by firing indiscriminately on the advancing mob, the number of casualties would have led to a communal conflagration all over the country, far worse than what the nation was experiencing now. But by allowing the "Ram bhakts" some leeway—and entry into the masjid —they had prevented a major catastrophe.

JAGDISH YADAV

Kar sevaks* raise the saffron flag on top of the Babri Masjid

Not many observers were willing to buy this. They maintained that the security forces, particularly the Central Reserve Police Force (CRPF), had connived with the kar sevaks and virtually allowed them a free run in the disputed area, as their sympathies—as also of some members of the district administration—were with the Hindu mob. Reporters disclosed that except for such paramilitary forces as the Border Security Force (BSF) and the Indo-Tibetan Border Police (ITBP), everyone else vanished from the scene of action, allowing the kar sevaks to go through with their plan. The only senior official in charge was Sulkhan Singh, commandant of the BSF. But, obviously, it was difficult for one man to control such a large mob, especially one surcharged with religious fervour.

Tellingly enough, the VHP and Bajrang Dal activists were confident that they had nothing to fear from the police or the district administration. Omkar Bhave, central secretary of the VHP, told SUNDAY: "The district magistrate (Faizabad) scolded the police force for firing upon the kar sevaks. Men of the PAC (Provincial Armed Constabulary) told us that Mulayam Singh Yadav had said, don't wait for orders to shoot, just fire." The implication, obviously, being that even the CM had his doubts about where the loyalties of his officers lay.

In retrospect, the UP government seemed to have erred in deploying such forces as the PAC (whose anti-Muslim bias is only too well-known) and the CRPF, which had borne the brunt of anti-Hindu violence in Punjab and Kashmir. The jawans who had been treated like an occupation army by Sikh and Muslim militants in these states, were hardly likely to turn against their Hindu brethren in Ayodhya. And sure enough, the jawans took visible pride in their Hindu identity, bathing in the Saryu every morning, applying tikkas on their foreheads, praying at the temples of Ayodhya and participating in the kirtans. When they donned their uniforms after this routine, it was difficult for them to remain impartial observers to the religious drama being played out before them. The kar sevaks, too, were canny enough to appeal to their feelings for Hindutva, chanting over and over again: "Police humare bhai hain." The ploy worked. While rumour had it that the CRPF had objected to the demolition of the canopy at the shilanyas site, in accordance with Mulayam Singh's orders, it was beyond doubt that the force (along with the PAC) had, on 27 October, refused to open fire on a mob defying prohibitory orders in Allahabad. The chief minister retaliated by asking that CRPF be pulled out, and a neutral force be installed in its stead (hence the induction of the ITBP). The battalion was then kept in reserve, and rumours had it that it was being sent back to the barracks.

In retrospect, the Uttar Pradesh government seemed to have erred in deploying such forces as the PAC and the CRPF

But the kar sevaks weren't doing too badly for support, anyway. According to Omkar Bhave of the VHP, well before the rath yatra, activists of the RSS, Bajrang Dal and the Shiv Sena fanned out into the districts of eastern Uttar Pradesh to sell their cause. Help from the mahants of Ayodhya wasn't long in coming. Says Bhave: "We held secret meetings with the village pradhans and block pramukhs and found that all of them supported our cause. Village heads promised to supply food and shelter to our kar sevaks. With their help, we charted out maps of the route, how to avoid the police, come by river if necessary. Copies of these maps were

The spreading hatred

Communal violence engulfs the country

It took the kar sevaks 15 minutes to storm the Ram Janmabhoomi-Babri Masjid complex, enter the disputed area, partially damage the mosque and put up a saffron flag on one of its domes. Over the next five days, the fallout all over India claimed about 200 lives, with the violence spreading to Bangladesh as well. Strangely enough, there were no reports of serious violence in the Indian state bordering Bangladesh, which had witnessed bloody communal riots during the Partition. The south, too, was relatively peaceful. Jammu and Kashmir displayed remarkable restraint. Punjab remained wrapped up in its own problems.

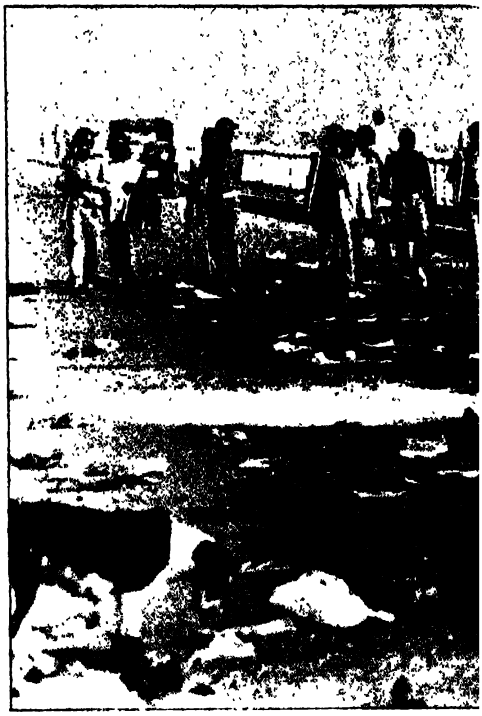
But the rest of India saw the worst communal flare up since the Forties. As SUNDAY went to press, reports of violence were still coming in. The situation in some states occasioned particular concern.

UTTAR PRADESH: More than 70 people were killed, even with 26 districts under curfew and shoot-at-sight orders in Aligarh, Bijnor and Meerut. On the one hand, the army staged flag-marches in Lucknow, Faizabad and Meerut, and on the other, the Provincial Armed Constabulary (PAC) lived up to its reputation and went on a rampage in Bijnor.

BIHAR: Communal rioting claimed about six lives in Bihar. Old Patna city seemed the worst affected, with many buildings set on fire and violent group clashes. Curfew was imposed in Patna, Giridih and Ranchi. The army tried boosting the locals' morale with flag-marches and the police arrested about 250 people to prevent further violence.

GUJARAT: The riots left around 54 people dead. Three bogies of the Jammu-Tawi Express were set ablaze as it left Ahmedabad. Eight people were burnt alive in the tribal-dominated Panch Mahals district, but the police prevented a repeat in Ahmedabad. However, a mob led by an ex-BJP minister broke into an Ahmedabad mosque and reportedly installed Rama's idol there. Mosques in Porbandar and Jamjodhpur were attacked as well. Following extensive arson, curfew was clamped on practically two-thirds of Ahmedabad and half of Baroda, Baroach, Jamjodhpur, Dhaboi and Godhra were under curfew too.

RAJASTHAN: The state didn't have a history of communal tension. But since the rath yatra, it has experienced the most intense communal flare ups. The riots following the kar sevaks' entry into the Ayodhya complex left 52 dead over four days. Although a number of towns—including Jaipur, Jodhpur, Beawar and Chomu (near Jaipur)—were under curfew, the frenzy remained uncontrolled.



MADHYA PRADESH: Trouble was expected in this BJP-dominated state. The toll, five days after the storming of the religious complex, stood at 15. Trouble started at Indore, where the police clashed several times with rioters. The BSF was promptly brought on and shoot-at-sight orders were issued in certain areas. As the unrest spread to Jabbalpur, Gwalior and Dewa, security measures were tightened, and some areas came under prohibitory orders. Extensive curfew was imposed in Indore, Mhow and Dewa.

given to the kar seva committees for distribution."

Not surprisingly then, thousands of kar sevaks managed to sneak into Ayodhya despite the tight security, and inflict damage to the mosque on the 30th. After the event, too, Ayodhya experienced virtual anarchy, with the police watching on helplessly while kar sevaks roamed around freely, carrying the dead bodies of their comrades through the town in procession, chanting provocative slogans all the while. Prominent leaders of the VHP and the Bajrang Dal, who are supposed to have gone underground, surface every evening to address thousands of "Ram bhakts", who are determined to hang on in the temple city till 7 November.

As these meetings commence, the security forces obligingly stand a few furlongs away. The faintly farcical air that surrounds the proceedings increases when Vinay Katiyar, the fiery commander-in-chief of the Ram Kar Seva Samiti demands that the government remove curfew and restore normalcy in Ayodhya within a stipulated time frame. Life couldn't be more normal with chaat and tea vendors standing around the venue of the meeting, while flavoured milk and cold drinks were freely available.

Therefore, the crackdown, when it finally came, caught everyone by surprise. A section of the local media reported the events as if a massacre had been perpetrated by the security forces. A Lucknow-based daily brought out a special evening edition on 2 November, declaring that 100 kar sevaks had been killed in police firing in Ayodhya earlier in the day.

The repercussions were immediate. Communal violence erupted all over the country, and in Ayodhya itself a masjid and eight houses belonging to Muslims were looted and then burnt down. The police, it was alleged, stood by passively while the mob went to work. Madhukar Gupta, commissioner of Faizabad district, was heckled by a crowd of 500 women, some of them the wives of lower-ranking government personnel, who pleaded with him not to direct their husbands to take action against the kar sevaks. The editor of a Faizabad daily, who'd reported the casualties as nine, was asked to stay out of Ayodhya, on pain of being lynched by the kar sevaks.

The government action had a positive fallout only where the older kar sevaks were concerned. Though they insisted that they were still committed to the cause of Ram, fear of further repression by the administration and the breakout of communal violence all over the country, prompted them to depart from Ayodhya. While some began trudging down the highway, others hung on in the hope that the Maulana Mulayam?

Is the UP chief minister pandering to Muslim fundamentalists?

In less than a year Mulayam Singh Yadav has addressed more rallies than most politicians do in a lifetime. And in every one of them the chief minister has driven home only one point: his commitment to secularism and the interests of the minorities.

The fact that each one of these bravura performances is followed by communal tension at best and riots at worst is dismissed by Yadav's supporters as some remarkable coincidence. Those less charitably inclined, however, insist that there is a connection. For, the argument goes, while Mulayam Singh lambasts the Hindu fundamentalists, he fails to mention their Muslim counterparts. So, his fiery rhetoric inevitably breeds resentment in the majority community. His secularism, they insist, is bogus. Or why would he arrest the Shankaracharya on one hand and on the other tolerate the presence of Mohammad Azam Khan in his Cabinet, despite stories to the effect that the latter was past master at instigating communal violence, ask the CM's opponents.

Be that as it may, at a time when national politics had come to revolve around a mosque and whether it should be pulled down to make place for a Ram mandir, Mulayam Singh's stance made political sense. And those who were opposed to a chief minister's taking sides in a dispute quite so openly found themselves in direct conflict with the conventional wisdom on the subject. As far as national opinion—and the media—was concerned, Yadav had taken a principled and courageous stand at great personal cost. Those who ascribed his avowed secularism to a desire to emerge as a messiah of the Muslim masses were dimissed as die-hard cynics who knew no better.

Mulayam Singh Yadav

Whatever Mulayam Singh's motivations may have been, there was no denying that with his stand on the Babri Masjid-Ram Janmabhoomi controversy ("I won't allow even a bird to enter into the mosque") Yadav had the minority vote all sewn up. And that, combined with the support he commanded among the backwards, made him unassailable as far as electoral battles went.

But only at considerable cost. For a section of the Hindus saw the chief minister's attitude as needless pandering to minority sentiment, and saw no reason why they should be called upon to compromise all the time. It was this feeling of near-paranoia that the BJP campaign appealed to, and the emotive appeal of religion combined with what was seen as the CM's partisan attitude led to the inevitable backlash. Result: the creation of majority communalism and a schism between the two communities.

The worst loser in the end was the community Mulayam insisted he would safeguard to his last breath. The Muslims may well have experienced a fleeting sense of well-being at those rallies where Yadav breathed fire and brimstone at those who threatened the Babri Masjid. But, in the ultimate analysis, they would have to bear the brunt of the majority communalism that was created by this extreme stand.

And pay the price for Mulayam Singh's exercise in image-building.

Militancy pays

The Ram Janmabhoomi/Babri Masjid issue catapults the VHP on to the centre-stage

If the Ram Janmabhoomi-Babri Masjid controversy spelled disaster for V.P. Singh, the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP) had cause to celebrate. It had at last, in a way, succeeded in launching a huge Hindu movement.

Going by facts, the VHP had been pressing for the reconstruction of not one, but three shrines. Besides the disputed Ram Janmasthan, the Kashi Viswanath temple at Benares and the temple at Mathura (believed to be the birthplace of Lord Krishna) had been identified by the organisation as the sanctimonious trio. This, according to the VHP, would be a meagre compensation for the 30,000-odd temples which history records as demolished by the Muslims.

However, since 1988 the demands of the VHP have been focussed on the Ram Janmabhoomi issue alone. According to many who witnessed the freedom struggle, this was easily the largest "movement" since the Quit India call in 1942. B.L. Sharma, the general secretary of the VHP said: "When Hindus are being beaten they are said to be secular but when they fight they are called communal. The Ram Janmabhoomi issue has proved this yet again." Warned Surya Krishna, the joint secretary of the organisation: "If the government thinks this movement will die a natural death, they are mistaken. The Ram temple will be built whatever the cost."

Such an aggressive, even militant posture is nothing new with the VHP; only it is receiving nation-wide attention for the first time in its 26-year-old history. Formed in 1964, the VHP and like organisations—the Bharatiya Mazdoor Sangh and the Bharat Vikas Parishad—acknowledge the Rashtriya Swayamsewak Sangh (RSS) as its parent body. The RSS itself was formed in 1925 and interestingly, many of the founder members of the VHP were senior leaders of the party.

Ashok Singhal after he was injured in Ayodhya

The present Ram Janmabhoomi crisis revived the lessons learnt by the RSS and the Hindu Mahasabha during the Partition. The Mahasabha and the Congress party were loosely-knit organisations then. They received the wrong end of the stick with the two-nation theory propounded by the Muslims, and Pakistan was created. The Hindus found themselves a disillusioned, disintegrated lot. According to Sharma: "We wanted to show that Hinduism is a nationality and never has the movement got such an impetus as it has over the Ram temple issue."

Surya Krishna notes: "Politicians have tried to give our socio-religious work a communal colour. In 1983 Mrs Gandhi said that the VHP's rath yatra was ruining the country. This time too V.P. Singh and his ministers made a major controversy out of the rath yatra."In both cases the VHP got political mileage.

While the VHP is criticised for having its eyes set on electoral gains by such mass programmes, its leadership denies it flatly. After Mrs Gandhi's assassination the party embarked on its Ramjanaki rath yatra. There was not much to gain because elections were close at hand but from that point onwards, the campaign for the Ram Janmabhoomi began in earnest. The first phase of the movement culminated in the 9 November 1989 shilanyas ceremony at Ayodhya.

Even Rajiv Gandhi admitted the Ram shila puja and the shilanyas contributed to his electoral defeat. The VHP claimed that it had more than doubled its network with shila pujas being performed in more than two lakh villages in India. Consecrated bricks arrived from other countries too and during the shilanyas at Ayodhya itself the VHP announced that the foundation for the fabulous granite Ram temple would commence on 30 October.

Of course, it was the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP), with whom the VHP has no official link, which reaped the electoral benefits. The party managed 86 seats in the Lok Sabha—an otherwise impossible feat had it not been for the Hindu revivalism of the VHP.

No doubt, the BJP snatched the advantage from the VHP by announcing the 10,000 kilometre rath yatra but as the events of 30 October eventually showed, the VHP won back the mileage.

Ritu Sarin/New Delhi government would provide them transport back home.

The younger lot, however, assumed an even more militant attitude, hinting that they would wage an armed struggle if the government didn't relent. Said Vinay Katiyar, who has taken over the movement, "Ram also began his campaign against evil on a peaceful note. But when Ravana turned violent, war was inevitable. Mulayam Singh is today's Ravana." In anticipation of such a development, some kar sevaks had, in fact, come armed with revolvers and crude bombs.

All attempts of the minority community to affect a reconciliation were snubbed by the Hindu militants. Outside the Faizabad civil hospital, some Muslims joined the crowds gathered outside in order to donate blood to those injured in police action. But the kar sevaks sullenly instructed that their blood should not be used. Mahant Nrityn Gopal Das, vice-president of the Ram Janmabhoomi Mukti Yagna Samiti, said : "Let the Muslims give us Ram's birthplace instead of their blood. We don't want the pure blood of Hindus to get sullied with impurities and in the bargain beget a generation of dubious progeny." The strident tone was a marked contrast from the conciliatory note that

JAGDISH YADAV

VHP had struck at its Hardwar meeting only four months ago, when anti-Muslim sentiment was played down to focus the organisation's resentment against V.P. Singh and Mulayam Singh Yadav. Now, the VHP makes no secret of the fact that the defacing of the Babri Masjid was meant to show the Muslims that they'd better know their place if they intend to live in "Hindu India". Says Katiyar: "The Muslims are apprehensive now? They should have been afraid of us long ago. Let them remember if they want to live in India, they are at the mercy of the Hindus."

Bajrang Dal workers admitted that the main purpose of damaging the masjid was to break the morale of the Muslims. But that goal, they said, "will only be achieved when we liberate the Gyan Vapi Masjid in Varanasi and Krishna Janmabhoomi in Mathura."

Says a Bajrang Dal activist: "But first we have to build the Ram Mandir. The blood of three lakh people has gone into our struggle. Only when the temple is built will their atma rest in peace...Ravana too put all kinds of barriers but eventually Hanuman was able to reach Sita."

The agitation, then, would continue. And this was not a BJP show, the VHP leaders were quick to clarify. Said a leader. "This is a VHP andolan. The BJP supported us and we are grateful to them. Full stop. If the Congress and Janata Dal had also supported us we would have been similarly grateful to them."

The VHP criticism centres around that fact that the BJP leaders "tamely courted arrest" when they should have been present on the "battlefield". Instead they let the VHP, the Bajrang Dal and others "face the music". Asked a considerably mystified RSS leader from Haryana: "Just the other day even Uma Bharti courted arrest. What is the meaning of all this."

The VHP, for its part, intends to ensure that the BJP doesn't derive political mileage from its campaign. Leaders of the organisation disclose that the VHP means to fight the next election on an independent plank. Or, if that doesn't work out, prevail upon the BJP to give it a free hand in nominating candidates.

But that comes later. For the present, the temple has top priority. And only after Ram gets his mandir, will the VHP (along with the RSS and Bajrang Dal) look to the future. •

Radhika Ramaseshan/Ayodhya

The Bijnor backlash

The PAC is blamed for the riots

Bijnor, in northern Uttar Pradesh, was just another quiet town where the Hindus and the Muslims lived together without any major problems. Though Meerut, Aligarh and Moradabad—the state's trouble-spots—are not very far away, Bijnor was free from the communal virus. But the events of 30 October in Ayodhya changed all that. For more than three days, the town witnessed a violent communal flare up as people fought pitched battles on the streets and destroyed public and private property at will. And before the paramilitary forces could restore a semblance of order, at least 50—33 according to official reports—lives were lost in the rioting.

Most Hindus in Bijnor—they constitute around 60 per cent of the town's population—claim that the trouble began not because of the Ram Janmabhoomi issue but due to the utterings of chief minister Mulayam Singh Yadav. Apparently, a public meeting of the chief minister in Bijnor was postponed several times and even his associates advised Mulayam not to hold the rally there as it could whip up communal passions. But an undeterred chief minister went ahead and addressed a large gathering on 9 October. Said Om Prakash, whose ration shop was gutted by the rioters, "Muslims and Hindus have been living together in Bijnor. But since the chief minister's visit, tension ran high. On the morning of 30 October, there were rumours that kar seva had begun in Ayodhya, and suddenly the attack of the Muslims began."

Many Hindus also claimed that the Muslims were well prepared to launch an attack on them. They pointed out that a large quantity of arms and ammunition was recovered from Muslim homes during searches conducted by the police. "When the moment came, we found that the Muslims were well armed and we were taken completely unawares," complained Om Prakash.

The Muslim community, however, felt that the Ram Janmabhoomi movement had swayed the Hindus of Bijnor. Mohammad Azad, who has been living in the town for quite sometime now, said that much before 30 October, kirtans and frequent prayer meetings had disturbed the peace of Bijnor. "Life had suddenly become difficult. We could hear nothing but the cries of Har, Har, Mahadev. The Muslims were definitely scared."

Charges and counter-charges notwithstanding, the fact remains that both the communities contributed to the flare up. On the morning of 30 October, a large number of Hindus had assembled at the local Arya Samaj temple. Soon, rumours began doing the rounds that the kar sevaks had stormed the Babri Masjid and construction of the Ram temple had begun. A procession was soon taken out to celebrate the victory, and, as the group of hymn-chanting devotees was passing through the Mirdgan and Kassawan areas of the town, the Muslims allegedly attacked it.

Trouble spread within minutes. The administration promptly called in the army and the Provincial Armed Constabulary (PAC) to restore law and order. But as it turned out, the PAC, which has the dubious distinction of perpetrating excesses, came in for severe criticism, particularly from the Muslims. Anisha Begum, for instance, alleged that two of her sons were brutally gunned down by PAC constables, who, she claimed, were clearly siding with the Hindus. Then there was Shabnam Pravin, who claimed that on 31 October several PAC men entered her house and forcibly dragged away her 14-year-old daughter.

But instead of heeding to such serious allegations, the Uttar Pradesh government rushed in more forces from outside and sealed off Bijnor. Even reporters were prevented from entering the town. What is more, the administration laid the entire blame on the local police and transferred the superintendent of police, Pravin Singh, leaving the residents of Bijnor at the mercy of an outside force. Lamented Pravin Singh: "The developments here are pitiable. But this is what is happening all over Uttar Pradesh."●

Karnataka's new chief minister might be in the soup

For S. Bangarappa, the new chief minister of Karnataka, the guddi is proving to be rather uncomfortable. In the first place, he was installed at an extremely difficult time when the state was rocked by communal violence in Bidar district. Besides, the former CM was removed under particularly unhappy circumstances, after he had a paralytic stroke. And now Bangarappa has a peculiar balancing act on hand—to try and get the caste factor under control.

Bangarappa formed the ministry according to the wishes of the Congress(I) high command. But that hardly helped. The special session of the Assembly convened to formalise his appointment was problematic, even though the Congress MLAs finally joined hands to pass a unanimous vote of confidence in his favour. The Opposition, led by the Janata Dal, had geared up to prevent the new CM from initiating the motion. The six-hour-long bickering reached a peak when some Congressmen nearly assaulted Independent member Vatal Nagaraj for his remarks about the Congress(I) president, Rajiv Gandhi.

Nagaraj is a well-known supporter of ousted CM Veerendra Patil. Obviously, he did not like the sudden dumping of his mentor and issued a call of protest by "self-respecting Kannadigas against the ignominious ouster of Patil". Immediately, the Opposition parties latched on and condemned the "reemergence of the goonda culture of the Congress which had been ushered in by the new dispensation".

Surprisingly, Bangarappa's troubles are not caused by the Opposition alone. The ex-CM's supporters in the Congress are not ready to accept a new master either. Besides, his induction of six senior Congressmen into his Cabinet, with permission from the high command, has also created trouble.

And Bangarappa has no escape route. When he tried to calm the Patil supporters down by including G. Puttaswamy Gowda, who had sided with the ousted CM till the last moment, the MLAs protested wildly. Quite a few members of the strong Vokkaliga community cried out loud that their loyalty to Rajiv Gandhi had not been rewarded while a Patil-supporter had been presented with a ministerial berth.

It seems that the allocation of portfolios has come under criticism in general. Bangarappa has kept a number of departments to himself. And his ministers have expressed furious dissatisfaction at being given "insignificant departments". Even Veerappa Moily, a die-hard loyalist of Rajiv Gandhi, is reportedly brimming with ill-concealed discontent. Moily had hoped for the chief ministership, and having lost out to Bangarappa, had expected at least an important portfolio. Instead, he got the same departments that he held under Patil.

Interestingly, another reason for dissatisfaction with Bangarappa's Cabinet is the age factor. The new CM, instead of infusing fresh blood, has opted for the old guards. The Cabinet has an average age of 56, and the 50-year-old Moily is considered the baby of the team. The Congress Legislature Party, which has a host of young MLAs, was considerably irked by this development.

But probably the most important problem that Bangarappa is facing is the caste factor. The powerful Lingayat lobby is truly dissatisfied with Patil's exit and Bangarappa's entry. The new CM, who is himself a backward class man, is racking his brains to think out ways of placating this important caste lobby. He has already started making overtures of peace towards Patil. He has been seeking Patil's blessings. He has offered to foot the ousted CM's medical bills. He has tried to be helpful in more ways than one.

However, whether all this will help the caste balance in Karnataka politics is uncertain as yet. Bangarappa might have realised the gravity of the situation, but the Lingayat community is still too strong a match for the backward caste leader. And Bangarappa might have to walk the tight-rope for some time to come. •

EDIBLE OILS/MURDER ATTEMPTS

Kill to profit

National Dairy Development Board officials take on the ire of Gujarat's powerful—and dangerous—edible oils lobby

• 15 August, 1987. A.A. Chothani, chief of the National Dairy Development Board's (NDDB) vegetable oil division, is on his way to New Delhi. With him on the Frontier Mail is his daughter. Around two am, early morning the next day, he shuffles out of his first class cabin on his way to the toilet. At least two people—Chothani is not sure exactly how many—hit him on the head with iron bars and fling the NDDB official out of the moving train. His daughter wakes up a few minutes later, and not finding Chothani around, pulls the chain. When the train grinds to a halt, the assailants escape, but fortunately for Chothani, a search party finds him lying by the tracks, profusely bleeding, spine twisted and body swollen. But alive—barely.

Now, three years later, Chothani is in high gear. He is the managing director of the National Cooperative Dairy Federation of India, but has not forgotten the attempt on his life. Or why it happened. "To fight the oil lobby we have to generate heat," he says. "They tried to kill me, but by me being buried the oil project would not have stopped. We will win in the end." The killers have not been found.

• 30 April, 1990. It is late in the night, and NDDB chairman Verghese Kurien is at 1, Amul Dairy Campus, his home in Anand, Gujarat. Two people arrive on a motorcycle, and throw a bomb—apparently with a slightly delayed fuse—at Kurien's ground floor bedroom. But the alert watchman, noticing the projectile, makes a dash towards it, scoops it up just as it is about to touch the ground, and flings it back to the road. The alleged killers speed away, as the bomb explodes, leaving a large crater in the tarmac. Officials later say that the bomb, if it had found its target, would surely have killed Kurien.

"Of course the oil lobby was behind this," says Kurien, in his office, five months later. "The police could not find out who it was, because there are thousands of them... Their fire-crackers don't scare me. When it is time for me to leave the world, I will go. I'm not afraid of dying. Till then, I will fight them with everything I have."

NDDB chairman Verghese Kurien: "Everybody wants to crucify me"

Kurien will have to. Chothani cannot give up, neither can any official at the NDDB. The thing is, the oil lobby will not give up, either. The threats will go on, and so might the attempts on people's lives. For, in this game of oil for money—and oil for self-sufficiency—there is simply far too much at stake for niceties.

Now, for the background, which shows that events leading up to the present crisis could have been entirely avoided. The Saurashtra region in Gujarat is known as the 'groundnut bowl of the world.' In a good year, it produces as much as 15 million tonnes of groundnut, used mainly to produce oil, and down the line, generates an income of a staggering Rs 7,800 crores. Other oilseeds—such as rapeseed, sunflower, til—are extra.

Only, whatever India produces is not enough to cater to the demand, and the situation is set to get worse. So, the government is forced to import edible oils at great cost (it could cost the exchequer as much as Rs 800 crores for the 1990-91 financial year). To obviate a grim oil environment, the government decided more than a decade ago to hand over the job to Kurien and his NDDB, hoping that the rural management expert could repeat his milk production (Operation Flood) trick. He did, and was helped along when the government formulated the technology mission on oilseed in 1986. India has the resources, went the wisdom, so why not? All that the move for increased production needed was good management.

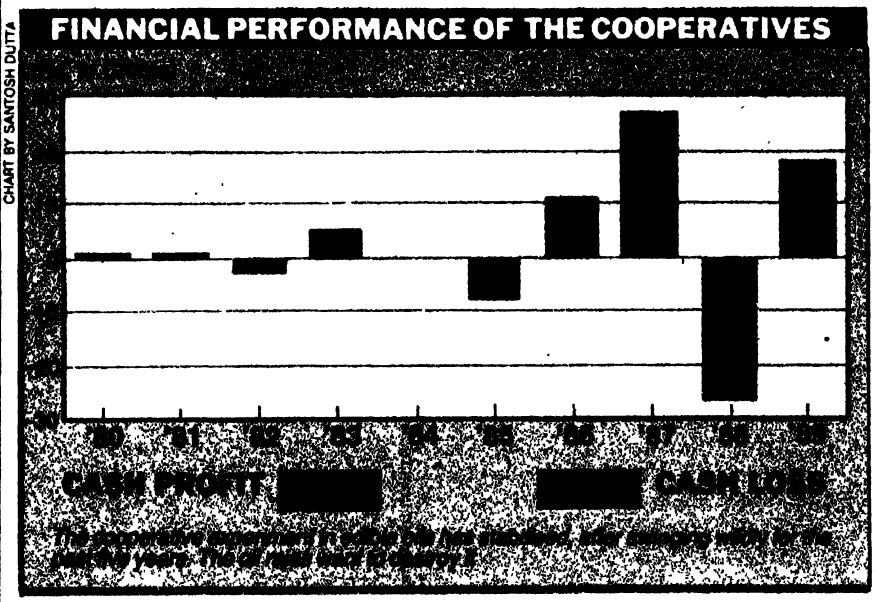
So far so good. But, the government fouled up even while it was harping on self-sufficiency. In the late 1970s, New Delhi began to play bureaucratic games. On the one hand, the babus made noises about going swadeshi. But on the other, the government began to import edible oils at international prices—usually lower than Indian prices for most commodities—and distributed these in the market at rates far lower than prices at which domestically produced oils could ever be supplied. The obvious happened: the domestic market plunged, as did oilseed purchases by the trade, and farmers were left holding their crop and nowewhere to go. Traders, however, made their killing. They made crores of rupees by simply adulterating the cheaper imported oils and pushing them, at prevailing prices, in the market.



The government woke up to the menace, years after it should have, and stepped in. On 13 January 1989, New Delhi finaly decided that the NDDB would handle its 'market intervention operations' (MIO) to control prices and check adulteration. The NDDB would also have the authority to import edible oils and oversee distribution and sale. The telia rajas (or oil kings) of Gujarat obviously did not like the idea: a government grip on edible oil prices would mean a cut in their profits. They began to lobby with politicians and declared war on the NDDB. (Actually, they already had, spurred on by NDDB's Operation Golden Flow, as the attempt on Chothani's life signifies. Now, NDDB's Dhara brand of groundnut oil, which sells for almost half the prices private competition offers, has raised the lobby's hackles.)

The MIO was a little slow to catch on, with a formal go-ahead reaching Kurien in April 1989. And Kurien went headlong into trouble. The NDDB was authorised to import 1.5 lakh tonnes of edible oil for 1988-89, but the organisation found it very difficult to bring in even a third of the amount. The explanation according to Kurien: it was the oil lobby, which manipulated New Delhi to hinder imports. This also broke the back of NDDB's MIO, as it had less oil than it needed to intervene in the market. And critics sneered that Kurien flunked his test for controlling prices.

The dairy—and now, oil—don refutes this. For example, says Kurien, "the price band for groundnut oil was fixed between Rs 20,000-25,000 per metric tonne at wholesale prices in Bombay for the year 1988-89. During this time, the price band behaved and stayed within the periphery of the stated figures." And the band for 1989-90, he says was fixed between Rs 22,000-28,000 per metric tonne. "All these rabble rousers scream

India's edible oil imports have been steadily dropping, thanks to the NDDB and technology mission status, but meddling by oil barons can ruin things completely that prices have gone up." continues Kurien. "But anybody, even a bullock, knows that the consumer price index and the wholesale price index have shot up by eight per cent and nine per cent (respectively) in the last one year." Everything has become more expensive for the farmer, he says, ploughs, tractors, diesel oil and fertilisers. "It is easy to sit and blame me for the rising prices of oil," says Kurien. "Why not also blame me for the rising prices of cement, textiles and pulses?" He adds: "Everybody wants to crucify me."

Not everybody. Just the oil lobby. Because, Kurien is still trying his MIO stunts. "I know for certain that they (the oil barons) paid Rs 14 crores to the politicians in Gujarat and New Delhi," says Kurien, "and now they say, 'let's get this bugger Kurien off our backs'...They tried to kill Dr Chothani, and now I guess it is my turn."

It is. Kurien has had to live with having his organisation's key oil plant in Bhavangar burnt and damaged seven times in the past three years or so (every time, the plant was quickly put back into operation). The more stubborn Kurien is about taking on the lobby, the more difficult it will be for him to hang on. Besides, Kurien is also taking on the age-old business-politics nexus, and with every new disclosure against the trade, the gang gets firmer in its resolve to break NDDB. It hardly matters that some trade members are changing their minds about whose side they are on.

For example, in March this year, it was discovered that 60 per cent of the oil millers in Gujarat were squirelling away money that should have legitimately gone to the government as taxes. Interestingly enough, this exposure was made by a section of the Saurashtra Oil Mills Association (SOMA), who should, by any stretch of logic, be gunning for Kurien. In a startling memorandum to Gujarat civil supplies minister Ashok Bhatt, the SOMA provided figures which showed that the state government was incurring a revenue loss of Rs 100 crores a year. This confessional trend has extended itself to Bombay, India's premier oil market, too. In a letter to Maharashtra chief minister Sharad Pawar, the vice president of the Bombay Oilseeds and Oil Exchage, N. Shah, says it all. "It is observed," the letter goes, "that in the recent past, some unscrupulous and dishonest elements have started indulging in serious malpractices, with a view not only to evade sales tax, but also pocket the same after collecting it from purchasers, but without paying the same over to the state exchequer...market reports show that the amount runs into crores of rupees."

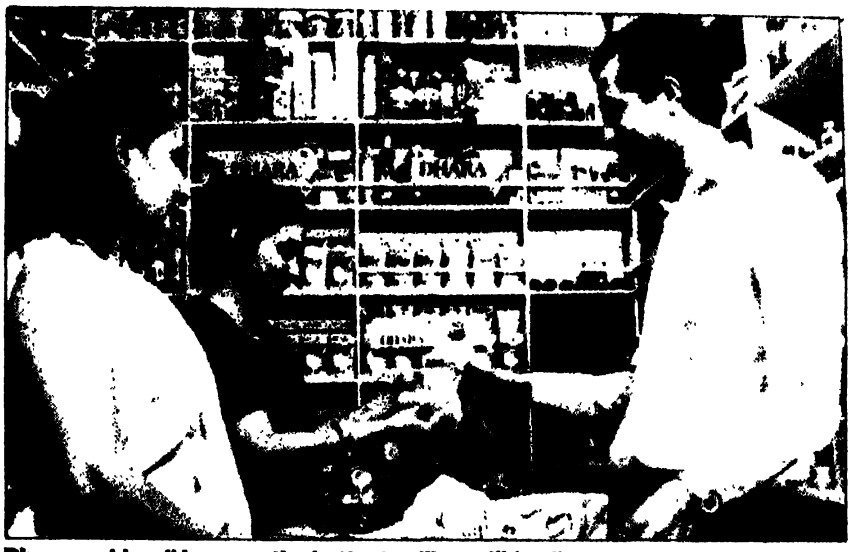
More exposure. According to trade insiders, aiding and abetting corruption is the government's public distribution system. And its premier trading agency, the State Trading Corp. (STC), which has now come under the wing of a holding company, along with the Minerals & Metals Trading Corp. Edible oils have always been imported through the STC—till the NDDB virtually took over—and the STC, in turn, distributes it to the various state civil supplies departments.



And so on, down the line. By the time oils reach consumers, say insiders, it is adulterated, quite thoroughly. At Chokha Bazar, one of Ahmedabad's wholesale marts, the reaction to adulteration is funny—almost. "What is wrong with the mixing of oil?" queries a grinning Ishitbhai, an oil merchant who prefers not to divulge his last name. "People have been doing this for years. So what if palmoline is mixed with groundnut oil? It is not killing anybody, and we can supply it cheap to the poor people." He adds: "That dudhwala Kurien should stay with his cows." Conveniently, Ishitbhai neglects to talk about his profit margin. And inconveniently, for him and others of his ilk, Kurien is not content with merely being a dudhwala.

An NDDB survey which covered five major cities showed that as much as 60 per cent of the total oil sold loose—instead of the packaged and sealed variety—was adulterated with cheaper, imported palm and palmoline oil. The findings showed that adulteration was at its maximum with groundnut and coconut oils. Further, a check on various laboratories by Ahmedabad-based Consumer Education and Research Centre showed that these places were ill-equipped, indifferent and prone to passing on false reports. The research centre arrived at a frightening conclusion: there is absolutely no way of thoroughly checking the quality of edible oils. On another matter, equally frightening: the governments of Gujarat and Maharashtra have done nothing to check either tax evasion or adulteration. Neither has the Centre.

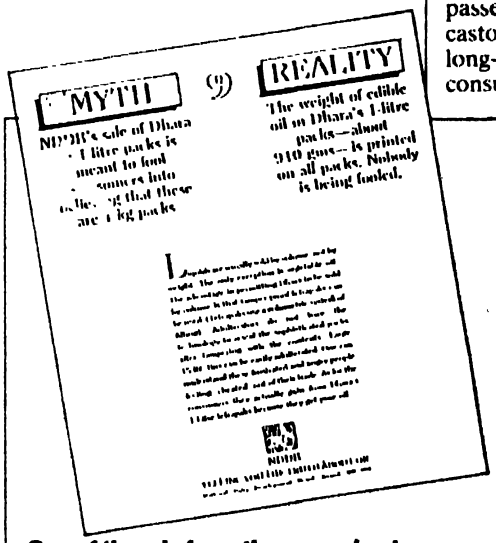
Which is expected. A combination of knee-jerk policy and alert vested interests has ensured that it does not pay attention, despite public claims of extending all power and help to the NDDB. Forty to fifty per cent of imported edible oils given over to the public distribution network finds its way into four major oil producing states: Maharashtra, Gujarat, Andhra Pradesh and Tamil Nadu. Since the four produce surplus oil, which they export to less privileged states, the distribution pattern—government endorsed, of course—hardly makes much sense. Again, this year, the Centre released imported edible oils in the market just as the domestically produced varieties arrived. And created an instant surplus. "It would appear," says Kurien, "that this policy of import and release of oils was designed precisely to allow private traders to profit from the surplus, by adulteration, and for the government's machinery to share in the profits."

It could well be that way. Despite statistics flashing danger—nay, disaster—signals, pointing to a future where all the work for becoming self-sufficient and staying self-regulated add up to a big zero, the government has not done much to help. Not just the NDDB, but the country as well. Current readings point to a massive overall deficit in vegetable oils, which could swing beyond eight lakh tonnes per year, despite an impressive domestic oil extraction level of between 25 lakh tonnes to 28 lakh tonnes a year. To measure up, the government will have to do more than just extend help to the NDDB and cut back on lobbyists. It will have to reduce industry taxes. Presently, besides a market cess of 0.4 per cent, there is the sales tax, turnover tax, and specific taxes for every variety of edible oil (groundnut oil, for instance, attracts a separate tax of Rs 2.80 per kilo).

Dhara could well become the hottest selling edible oil

Yes, the government and oil kings have to do a lot. But Kurien is not free from criticism, either, says the trade. People at Ahmedabad's Kalupur ghee bazar, for example, insist that Kurien is playing dictator at NDDB, and one day, the government will finally wise up to his tricks. "He (Kurien) talks of us being corrupt," says Manilal Shah, a major wholesaler. "(But) what is he doing by concealing the huge amounts of oil that he is buying from the traders? He has refused to even make this figure known to the government of Gujarat." Kurien's stubborn stand, says Shah, only proves that he has something to hide. "Just because his 'Operation Flood' has achieved some success, it does not mean he can do the same with oil," Shah goes on. "It is a different field. Kurien will learn the hard way. Oilseed crops are not cows and buffaloes."

"For us," says R.P. Aneja, "there is no going back. Sure, there have been pressures. But we've learnt to live with them."



Sure, but Shah does not realise that his comments damn the trade more than it indicts Kurien. The trader's remarks reek of a veiled threat. Besides, Kurien does have a defence, and given the circumstances, an obvious one.

"Why should I let on to how much oil I have?" is Kurien's comeback. "If I do that, every private trader will move in. By manipulating the trading they will certainly make things difficult for me." All NDDB transactions, says Kurien, is recorded on computer. So, they are there for New Delhi to audit. "It must be remembered that MIO is a government of India programme that NDDB has been requested to work on," adds Kurien. "No profits can come to us. So why should we cheat?"

In fact, says Kurien, the question of NDDB hoarding oil came up for discussion in Parliament. Then, former deputy Prime Minister and agriculture minister—and presently, a PM aspirant—Devi Lal intervened and categorically said that it would not be in public interest if NDDB gave out its oil stock figures. "For example," says Kurien, "if the oil lobby knows that we are running short, they will gobble up existing stocks. What we are doing is helping the consumer to buy almost directly from the producer, and the middlemen don't like this." Adds R.P. Aneja, who recently resigned as NDDB's managing director because of his "own mental and physcial state" and is now a consultant: "For years, there has not been one day when entirely honest transactions have taken place where oil trading is concerned. And last year, we were being asked by these fools in New Delhi, 'How come the prices of edible oils have crossed the price band?'"

The Kurien criticism that does make some sense comes from the man who complained to Sharad Pawar about trade malpractices, Bombay oil exchange official Navinchandra Shah. "If Kurien is so interested in helping the farmers, why does he not buy oil directly from them after they have crushed their produce (in an Operation Flood-like milk procurement scheme from cooperatives)? Why does he come to Bombay to buy oil from the traders?" Kurien's response: if he gets oil at the right price, anywhere, he will buy it. That sounds a little flat, but the point is that it is perfect for keeping the MIO trick going. Says Kurien: "Let me ask this one question to the thousands of traders: 'How many people live on the import of oil alone? For every rupee spent on imports, how many other people make money by adulteration?'"

MYTH

NDDB's sale of Dhara 1 litre packs is meant to fool consumers into believing that these are 1 kg packs

REALITY

The weight of edible oil in Dhara's 1-litre packs—about 910 gms—is printed on all packs. Nobody is being fooled.

NDDB

One of the ads from the campaign to educate the public

Counterpoint. Adulteration is a health hazard, however much traders such as Ishitbhai may wave off the argument. Take the Behala tragedy in 1988. People from this Calcutta locality bought what they thought was mustard oil from a ration shop. Only, the man who ran the shop mixed a chemcial with rapeseed oil to make it smell and appear like the more expensive mustard oil, cashing in on the difference. The result: paralysis for scores of people who consumed food cooked in that chemical muck. Or, take the widely sold, infamous 'loose sweet oil' or '235 oil', which is a mixture of two parts castor oil, three parts palmoline, and five part groundnut oil. This concoction, which is also known as 'disco oil' in the market, is passed off as groundnut oil. Since castor is a powerful laxative, the long-term effect of the mixture, if consumed regularly, is disastrous.

Dhara has still to make a profit, but sales have reached 130 tonnes a day, and that is hurting the oil lobby.

Another thing that could be upsetting the oil kings—besides the MIO and adulteration checks—is NDDB's attempt to change the oilseed cropping pattern completely. According to Kurien, India's edible oil future lies in increasing rapeseed production. This is based on the assumption that consumption patterns can be changed—an idea that appears to be working. In Gujarat, for example, the most widely used oil was til. Today, it is groundnut oil. Tomorrow, it could be rapeseed.Here,India'senvironmentalists have stepped in. Groundnut produces 250 kilos of oil per hectare of crop, they say,and rapeseed yields 700 kilos. So why not go in for the better solution, they ask, especially as it means more yield with less land used? Kurien concurs.

Says Jeet Jadhav, an oilseed farmer in Ahmedabad's outskirts: "If there is money in it, I will even grow sunflowers." A beginning may have already been made, if not by pricing policy, then thanks to the way NDDB behaves. "I have stopped selling groundnut to private traders" says Jadhav, "because I found out that the scales they use for weighing are wrong. They cheat people. At least with NDDB, I know that they will not cheat and I will get a fair price."

On the other hand, there are many farmers who still sell to the private trader, mainly because they can negotiate. Then there are others who are forced to part with their produce for paltry amounts because they have borrowed money from traders; a virtual manifestation of bonded labour—till the farmer pays back the loan, he has to continue selling to the particular creditor/trader, the advantage entirely with the latter. Among other things, the NDDB is trying to break this hold. And the lobby, inevitably, is resisting. "The oil lobby till today is trying to beat us," says Aneja, still talking as if he is very much with the NDDB team, "but for us, there is no going back. Sure, there have been pressures. But we have learnt to live with them."

Presently, NDDB's edible oil project covers seven states, involving five lakh farmers through cooperatives. And Dhara, according to NDDB estimates, is going to hit the top spot very soon. "Dhara has still to make a profit considering all that we have put in, says Kurien, "but it will." He adds: "The sale of Dhara has now reached 130 tonnes a day, and that is hurting the oil lobby."

Yes, because the threats have not stopped. Kurien routinely receives phone calls—at night, true to underworld stereotyping—ordering him to back down. Even Kurien's wife, Molly, has to listen to voices telling her to "stop her dudhwala" from dabbling in oil. And NDDB officials fear that another attack may be forthcoming, because many Gujarat oil traders were recently raided for income tax evasion—they hold Kurien responsible. "Let them think what they will," says Kurien, gravely. "What's one bomb thrown at me?" Then, he breaks into a smile and wisecracks: "What better way can I think of leaving the chairmanship at NDDB? At least I will go out with a big bang." ●

ADVERTISING

Selling chauvinism

Sexist ads still work in a man's world

Visual: A nattily dressed, macho man pinning down a glamorous woman to a jazzy red car. The advertising copy: "Man at work. Your environment, your work, your way of life, your comfort, easy and affordable." The product: Siyaram's Oxemburg shirts and trousers.

Visual: A woman, in a strappy green and yellow dress flying in the breeze, superimposed on a lush mustard field. The copy: "Inspired by nature, perfected by us." The product: Kurl On mattresses.

Women continue to be used for selling every product imaginable. From luxury soaps, detergents, men's suitings, colognes, plywood and even, hardware. A recent advertisement for Ranutrol Hansa Aqua Mixers (simply put: taps) has the tantalising visual of a pair of enticing, and perfect, female legs, rising out of a bubble bath, complete with the arch delicately poised over a gleaming Hansa tap. The copy is not as inspiring, however, and reads: "The world's most elegant way of mixing water with pleasure. Flawless to the minutest detail." In this ad, like in numerous other cases, the woman has little or nothing to do with the product being sold.

The thing is, the products do sell. And selling, as any marketing or adperson will testify, is what advertising is all about. Only, for a price: women are often demeaned in the ads, they are there for their physical presence and little else.

And despite strident protests from women's organisations, the much touted Indecent Representation of Women's (Prohibition) Act passed in 1986 and pious declarations from agencies, ads continue to portray a woman as a "sex commodity".

"The stereotype these ads present are positively dangerous," says an activist with Saheli, a women's rights group in New Delhi. "Ads are playing an increasingly important role in all our lives thanks to the invasion of television, video and, of course, the boom in the print media. They reflect and worsen the subservient and second-class-role situation that women play in our society."

The ads, in short, have just helped polarise the gender difference in societies all over the world. American media expert, Trevor Millum, has noted in an often-quoted study: "Most women were captured in pictures which tended to emphasise mannequin and dummy expressions...while men more often demonstrated a thoughtful expression implying some intellectual processes."

Dangerous stereotype

"The ads, in essence, have remained the same over the years," says Kamla Bhasin, a member of the Committee on the Portrayal of Women in the Media, set up in 1983.

However, Bhasin admits that sexist portrayals are lessening, even if marginally. "The really blatant advertisements have stopped after the hue and cry that we raised several years ago." But the difference is only a matter of degree. While the really obnoxious ads have stopped, it is now a question of subtler forms of discrimination. Earlier, women's organisations had to battle ads such as the one for Cosmic TVs, which said: "A beauty of 14, keep her in your bedroom or take her to the office." Accompanying the offensive copy was the visual of a young, presumably 14-year-old girl with a portable TV next to her. Now, they fight ads for Harpic toilet cleanser, for instance, which is all about how cleaning a toilet is really the easiest and most glamorous household job.

The scene outside commercial product advertising is even more dismal with frankly lewd film ads making a huge comeback. In fact, the Delhi police had even formed a committee against obscene advertising in the city. Set up with much fanfare in 1987, the committee boasted a host of luminaries such as Sharmila Tagore, journalist Mrinal Pande, the then deputy commissioner of police in the crimes against women's cell, Vimal Mehra, and ex-Doordarshan chief Bhaskar Ghose, among others. But after the initial frenzy of activity, precious little was done. "We haven't had a meeting for the last eight or nine months," says committee member Pande.

That seems to be the way of all government action on the issue. Most illustrative of this is the abortive Indecent Representation of Women's (Prohibition) Act, passed only after intense lobbying by women's groups in 1986. "Only the government machinery can take an advertiser to court," says Bhasin. On the other hand, she counters: "what government department can possibly be expected to do such a thing? The onus, as usual, falls on us."

And, so, the female stereotype, be it pliant girlfriend or self-sacrificing mother, patient wife or demure daughter, still remains the hottest selling property in the multi-crore advertising industry. A fact that no women's organisation, not even the most vociferous, can do much about. For as long as ideas and products sell, nobody is about to change his—or her—ways. ●

■ Enough!

As predicted by this column two years ago, the Raunaq Singh group has lost its best manager. Dr Surinder Kapur, Raunaq's son-in-law and the group's single best manager and public relations man has just relinquished charge of Bharat Gears.

Kapur is said to have tired of interference from less competent members of the family and walked out to look after his own, flourishing Sona Steerings, a joint venture with Maruti Udyog.

Raunaq Singh: lost his best man.

Two years ago, Kapur nearly quit—and this featured in Business Diary then—but was persuaded to stay on. Now he has decided that he doesn't have to take the Raunaq family's style of functioning any longer.

■ Time out

If Titan Watches Ltd pulls this one off, HMT Ltd may have to. The fast-paced private sector watch-maker is going to collaborate with Timex of the US to make quartz, digital and analog (nothing fancy, just your usual wind-me-up variety) watches in India, at "more affordable" prices than are available currently. The Rs 60 crore project, to be set up in the New Okhla Industrial Estate near New Delhi, will manufacture two million watches a year. Titan officials say they expect production to commence next year.

This could give HMT nightmares. Titan has largely wiped out its quartz segment hold. And with Titan also making moves towards a segment which has kept HMT going all these years—no nonsense, inexpensive watches—the public sector giant would be badly hurt. Besides, HMT hasn't touched the digital watch market. Titan could be ahead here, too. HMT could be rueing its advertising catchline "If you have the inclination, we have the time." Increasingly, it looks like going Titan's way: "We have the inclination, and we have the market."

Sipani Automobiles Ltd has one problem: the company does make cars that are light, economical and cheap, but with the Maruti-mania in full swing, not many buyers looked the Bangalore-based car-maker's way. Now, Sipani wants to actually take on Maruti, sidelining its older Dolphin and Montana models in favour of the Fox, and the as yet officially unnamed D1.

Sipani Automobiles' Montana: justifying fibre-glass bodies for the D1 and Fox?

Sipani plans to manufacture the newer cars in collaboration with Reliant Motors of the UK, which helped out with the Montana. Sipani will stick to fibreglass bodies for the cars. This is in tune with earlier models, but Sipani could still face an old problem with the new cars, too. Simply put, not many consumers believe that a fibreglass body can be tough, and seem to prefer metal bodies for their cars. Sipani tried to break this voodoo last year by conducting demonstrations: a man with a hammer would beat the daylights out of a Montana fibreglass panel to show onlookers exactly how tough the car was. It didn't help very much. This time round, Sipani plans to score a point with what the company calls superior cars. ●

WINNER OF THE WEEK

Dhirubhai Ambani

Chairman, Reliance Industries Ltd

By the time you read this—if all has gone according to plan—V.P. Singh will no longer be a full-fledged Prime Minister. And the champagne corks will be popping at Nariman Point. The way they tell it, the Janata Dal crisis is all Dhirubhai's doing: he set up Devi Lal, Chandra Shekhar is his man, he has RKD in his pocket, etc.

In fact, Singh's problems are entirely of his own making: Ambani's contribution has been minimal. Nor does he have either Shekhar or Rajiv Gandhi wrapped up, whatever the Reliance PR machine might spout. But even so, it's clear that Ambani has won and the Raja has lost. The Reliance share price has boomed and the worst V.P., Gurumurthy, Vinod Pande, et al, have been able to do is take Larsen & Toubro (L&T) away. Now, any new government—that is not motivated by vendetta—is certain to tell financial institutions to remain neutral in the L&T affair. Once that happens, the Ambanis will regain control.

And 1990 will be no more than a bad dream in the life of the polyester pasha.

Man in the middle

Mulayam Singh Yadav holds the key to Janata Dal politics

As the tussle for the leadership of the Janata Dal gained in intensity and the political situation in the country became more confusing than ever, everyone turned to the one man who could well decide how things turned out. No, he wasn't the Raja, or the Tau, or Chandra Shekhar or even Rajiv Gandhi. It was the diminutive chief minister of Uttar Pradesh, Mulayam Singh Yadav, who held the key to the future. For, the leadership of the Janata Dal Parliamentary Party would be decided by whom Mulayam Singh—and his band of committed loyalists—chose to support. So, effectively Yadav would decide who faced the Lok Sabha on 7 November to seek a vote of confidence. Thus, while the chief minister stayed back in UP to devote his time, energy and considerable political acumen to defusing the Ayodhya issue, speculation abounded in the capital as to which side Yadav would plump for. As the various theories made their rounds, one thing was clear: Mulayam Singh Yadav had emerged as the new strongman of Indian politics.

At a time when most reputations had taken a severe knocking, Yadav had, by a process nothing short of miraculous, managed to enhance his. Chandra Shekhar had ruined his image by sulking in the corner like some churlish schoolboy once he was cheated out of the prime ministership; the Chaudhary stood exposed by his excessive love of family; and V.P. Singh had transformed himself first into the Raja of Mandal and then the Lord of the Limpets. Yadav, on the other hand, had not only consolidated his vote-bank, but established himself as the leader who would make the ultimate sacrifice when it came to safeguarding the secular fabric of the country. Yes, every other politician made much the same noises, but Mulayam Singh's case was different. When he said: "Given a choice between saving a few lives and saving the government I will choose the former," everyone believed him. He was dubbed Maulana Mulayam by his critics, but as Yadav pointed out with justifiable pride, as many Hindus attended his rallies as did Muslims.

It was, perhaps, this turnout that convinced the chief minister that the majority of his people were secular and that there was nothing to fear on the 30th of October. This was, at least, his public stand. In retrospect, this turned out to be a highly erroneous reading of the situation.

Strangely enough, that wasn't how everyone saw it. Political leaders across the spectrum congratulated Yadav on a job well done. while media reports had it that the chief minister had handled the situation with commendable skill. Even the Muslims didn't take the attitude that their masjid had been defiled. On the contrary, members of the Babri Masjid Action Committee (BMAC) went on television to endorse the official view that no damage had been inflicted on the mosque and that Yadav had delivered despite extremely trying circumstances.

Nobody had granted that Mulayam Singh would ever be a major player, when he first emerged on the UP political scene. A short wiry higher secondary schoolteacher, when he first began dabbling in Etawah politics, nobody paid Mulayam much attention. He belonged to a poor agricultural family (sleeping with the cattle because there was no room for him in the house) and lacked the money power often deemed essential to making it big in politics. Nevertheless, Yadav joined politics along with his close friend Balram Singh Yadav, with whom he'd studied and wrestled in his younger days. The two men dabbled in party politics and organised dangals (wrestling bouts) on the side, and seemed happy enough being lower-level players.

His debut in electoral politics had been quite successful, with Yadav being elected member from Jaswantnagar during the Sixties and Seventies. But while district politics in Etawah had always revolved around him, his first big break came when the Janata government was formed in Uttar Pradesh in 1979. While Mulayam Singh missed the chance to become chief minister, because Raj Narain supported Ram Naresh Yadav, he was appointed Cabinet minister in charge of cooperatives.

The Janata experiment, however, didn't last too long. And when Charan Singh split from the party to form the Lok Dal, Mulayam Singh followed his lead again. In 1980, Yadav lost the elections from Jaswantnagar, but was appointed leader of the Opposition in the Legislative Council by virtue of being the UP chief of the Lok Dal. In 1985 he contested elections from Jaswantnagar yet again on a DMKP (Dalit Mazdoor Kisan Party, a creation of Chaudhary Charan Singh) ticket and won. The DMKP reverted back to its original name, Lok Dal, and Yadav took charge as leader of the Opposition in the Assembly.

It was around this period that Mulayam Singh built up his power base. Touring incessantly throughout the state—his petrol bill was always a matter of some controversy—he created a strong party organisation at the village and district level, taking care to install those personally loyal to him in key positions. All those who were opposed to him were systematically destroyed and Yadav built up a party that owed allegiance to him over everyone else.

His rise to the upper echelons of the party wasn't without a struggle, though. And Mulayam Singh made a fair number of enemies along the way. Among them were Charan Singh's daughter Saroj and Rajendra Singh, the state chief of the Lok Dal. When the Chaudhary's health worsened and he lapsed into coma, this duo tried to freeze Yadav out. But he proved to be more than a match for them, persuading Charan Singh's son Ajit (with some help from Sharad Yadav, Ajay Singh and K.C. Tyagi) to join politics against Saroj.

But Ajit and Mulayam couldn't remain on the same side for long. And their rivalry, which culminated in the fight for the UP chief ministership in 1989, began around this time. Mulayam Singh, along with Sharad Yadav and Devi Lal, split the party and went over to Lok Dal (B), led by the late H.N. Bahuguna. Around the end of 1986, Mulayam was removed as leader of the Opposition by Ajit Singh, with Yadav swearing revenge against the son of his mentor.

Even when the two men found themselves in the same party as, in 1988, Janata Dal, the rivalry continued. Both claimed to be heirs to the Chaudhary's legacy and fights commenced on every issue, from the leadership of the state unit to the distribution of party tickets for the parliamentary and Assembly elections. Mulayam Singh won the right to be state party chief on the basis of his organisational strength and influence on party workers. But this was only a minor skirmish: the battle was far from over.

And the final round came after the Assembly elections, where the Dal won 212 seats in a house of 425. Mulayam Singh staked his claim to the chief ministership, only to come up against Ajit Singh, who wanted the same post. While Devi Lal came out openly in favour of Yadav, the Raja seemed to be favouring Ajit.

With reason. There was no love lost between the two men ever since 1980-82 when V.P. Singh had been UP chief minister and Yadav the leader of the Opposition in the Legislative Council. Mulayam Singh had gone on the record to call the Raja a killer of backwards, having engineered their deaths in fake encounters. In 1986, when VP was the finance minister in Rajiv Gandhi's Cabinet, Yadav had brought the work of the Uttar Pradesh Assembly to a standstill for a week on the issue of the Dahiya Trust scandal, in which the Raja's family was alleged to have obtained Rs 1 crore as compensation by fraudulent means.

V.P. Singh, therefore, was loath to have Mulayam Singh as chief minister. But such was Yadav's command over the individual MLAs that the Raja was forced to concede the point that he would win an election to the CM's post. Though he didn't come out openly in Mulayam's favour, he withdrew support from Ajit Singh anyway. And Mulayam Singh Yadav became the new chief minister of UP.

That wasn't the limit of Mulayam's ambitions, however. And instead of restricting himself to state politics and administration, he chose to adopt stances which were bound to prove controversial and would thus ensure greater publicity for him at the national level.

That was what inspired the chief minister's anti-English stand. Yadav had always suffered from an inferiority complex vis-a-vis his inability to speak angrezi, and now that he was in a position of authority he would get his own back on all those English-speaking types who had sniggered at him throughout his political career. Of course, Mulayam Singh came up with ideological arguments, talking about the damage servility to a foreign tongue had done us, but those didn't really wash when it was discovered that his son was studying in an English medium school.

The CM had greater success in his anti-communalism campaign. His government, unlike V.P. Singh's, didn't depend on the support of the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP). So, Yadav could afford to adopt an openly confrontationist stand against the party. He first gave notice of his aggressive intentions when he arrested the Shankaracharya of Dwarkapeeth, when the religious leader was on his way to Ayodhya to participate in the shilanyas ceremony. With this one stroke, Mulayam Singh established himself as the best bet for the Muslim voter and a secular leader of note.

The charges that Mulayam Singh had levelled against others, however, stuck to him as well. His critics claimed that the chief minister had 24 criminal cases pending against him. Yadav conceded the fact, but maintained that these had been trumped up by his political opponents to discredit him and that there was no substance to these charges.

Or to the allegation that he provided succour and support to criminal elements (Anna in Lucknow was a name bandied most often in this connection) in the state and utilised their services in settling scores with his rivals. Mulayam contended that his behaviour was no different from that of Jaya Prakash Narayan and Vinoba Bhave. While they had tried to reform dacoits, he was trying to convert common criminals into respectable citizens. And he deserved approbation, not condemnation for this.

Meanwhile, Yadav's assertion of independence from the central leadership continued. Not only did he invite Chandra Shekhar to address rallies with him, he also appeared on the same platform with Bahujan Samaj Party (BSP) leader Kanshi Ram. At all these events the Raja was conspicuous by his absence. And to prove his point, Mulayam Singh refused to comply with the Prime Minister's directive to come to Delhi after 30 October. Yadav stayed put in his state, and the Raja couldn't even utter a ritual protest for fear that the chief minister would vote against him in the elections to the post of party leader.

JOSHI YADAV

THE BABRI MASJID: everyone felt that Mulayam had done his best

V.P. Singh did achieve a pyrrhic victory, by depriving Mulayam Singh of the chance to arrest BJP president L.K. Advani. But Yadav's secular credentials were too well established by then for that to make a discernible difference. He'd been attending meetings organised by various Muslim organisations all over India and at the National Integration Council meeting held in Madras, the left and the Congress had offered him their full support in the battle against communal forces.

The Raja had perforce to give in to Mulayam Singh Yadav for, with the Muslims and the backwards solidly behind him, the UP chief minister was well nigh invulnerable Yadav could, therefore, afford to take an uncompromising stand, refusing, for one, to accept the secret understanding that Advani be allowed a safe passage to Ayodhya. And the Raja had perforce to give in to him for with the Muslims and the backwards solidly behind him, Mulayam Singh Yadav was well nigh invulnerable.

The chief minister didn't give up on the other vote-banks, either. Thus, unlike Ram Vilas Paswan and Sharad Yadav, he did not adopt a strident tone on the Mandal recommendations, thereby ensuring that the forward communities in his state didn't turn against him. Despite his admiration for the Lohia school of thought, Mulayam Singh invited various industrialists home for dinner and asked them to invest in his state.

Yes, Mulayam Singh Yadav thought of everything. And as the Janata Dal leadership crisis deepened, everyone's thoughts were focused on the UP chief minister, and which way he would swing. There was no better measure than that of Mulayam Singh's place in the scheme of things. •

EXIT SHOURIE (AGAIN)

Goenka fires his crusading editor for the second time

SONDEEP SHANKAR

When Indian Express editor Arun Shourie received a one-page telex from proprietor Ramnath Goenka on 25 October, asking him, in effect, to resign, it was history repeating itself. For over two weeks before that happened, there were strong rumours in the capital that the press baron and his crusading editor would once again part ways, ostensibly because they differed on "policy matters". Earlier, in 1982, Shourie had been forced to leave the paper he was so closely identified with as its executive editor—only to be asked to return as editor in February 1987.

As Arun Shourie sees it, the dismissal came as a complete surprise to him. The ailing octogenarian had spoken to his editor only three hours before sending him a telex charging him with violating the paper's policy, and virtually asking him to resign. "I had absolutely no knowledge that this would happen. Ramnathji had been as affectionate to me as always," insists Shourie. "When I phoned him, he reassured me that he would come to Delhi the next day, and we would talk. But since he didn't come, or couldn't come, I went over to Bombay with N.S. Jagannathan (who took over as editor on 3 November) to meet him."

According to sources in the newspaper, tension had been brewing in the offices of the Indian Express for some time. The old man, say sources close to him, was unhappy with his editor since his damning exposure of Devi Lal, in which Shourie reproduced a telephonic conversation with the then deputy prime minister, replete with the most vulgar abuses in Hindi, on the Express' front page. He was not pleased with Shourie's strident criticism of the government's decision to implement the Mandal Commission Report either. Earlier, Goenka had backed Shourie's inimitable crusading style, and even encouraged it, as the paper's circulation soared. Over the last few months he was interfering less and less with the

Arun Shourie: V.P. Singh is a liar

Express' editorial content. But there were other members of his family who were more than perturbed that the paper was being increasingly used by the editor to launch vituperative attacks on some politicians in a style which sometimes verged on pamphleteering.

Two young directors of the company, Goenka's grandsons Vivek Khaitan and Manoj Sonthalia, had, for some time, been engaged in a running feud with Shourie and his ally in the organisation, S. Gurumurthy. Shourie denies that there was any tension between him and the grandsons, maintaining that their relationship had always been cordial. "They told me in Bombay that they were ashamed that such a decision (to sack Shourie) had been taken, and they could see no reason why it had happened," he claims. According to Shourie, Goenka was his usual affectionate self when they had a "frank" discussion. The ailing press baron later called Gurumurthy and said, "all points are in your friend's favour, I have asked him to return to Delhi and continue as editor"

The following day, at lunch, Shourie received a fax message dismissing him. Goenka had changed his mind, saying that the decision to sack him was irrevocable, and that he should hand over charge to Vivek Khaitan. Shourie refuses to divulge the reason for this volte-face, though he does mention that he warned Ramnathji that "people were poisoning his ears". While admitting that he felt "buffetted" by the tide of events Shourie consistently denies that he has a clear explanation for his dismissal.

Others in the newspaper are, however, quite forthcoming about the reasons behind Shourie's ouster. They are certain that the flashpoint between the editor and the management was an article Shourie wrote for publication on the day he received the telex sacking him. The article, which details negotiations between Prime Minister V.P. Singh and RSS leaders on the eve of the last Lok Sabha elections, was spiked. Apparently, Goenka and adviser Gurumurthy were involved in the negotiations, and the proprietor did not like the idea of the details being divulged a year later at such a critical juncture in Indian politics. The piece entitled, "Arre bhai, masjid hai hi kahaan?(Where is the mosque, my brother?)" makes out that V.P. Singh had wooed RSS leaders with a promise that the Babri Masjid would be demolished, and later went back on his word after wresting power with their (BJP and RSS) help. Quoting "persons I know intimately" (he later divulged that they were Jaswant Singh, Arun Jaitley, Gurumurthy, and Bhaurao Deoras; Jaswant Singh also issued a statement saying that the facts reported by Shourie were absolutely true, though the Janata Dal spokesman Jaipal Reddy termed it a piece of fiction) who were present at the meeting, the article is a scathing indictment of the Prime Minister's attitude to the problem, even a year before it escalated into one of the worst crises ever to have threatened the country's unity. V.P. Singh is quoted as having said: "Demolition ki zaroorat hi kahan hai, bhai? Ek dhakka doge to woh gir jayegi...aur agar aap sab ek ek eent ghar le jayenge, wahan kuch rahega hi nahin (where is the need to demolish the mosque? One shove and it will crumble...if each of you carried one brick home, there would be nothing left)!

Shourie dismisses the idea that the piece had anything to do with his dismissal, or that the management was afraid that he had gone overboard in attacking V.P. Singh, whom they supported. "How can I, writing in my little paper, affect Singh?" laughs the soft-spoken editor with the acid pen. "He has committed self-immolation, he is already cremated, who can save him?"

He consistently declines to badmouth the management that has so summarily dismissed him, saying, "I wish them all the best, they were fair to me (when working out the terms of his dismissal)." He is also all praise for his colleague, N. Jagannathan, who has taken over as editor, but only after Shourie declared that the management has been fair in their dealings with him.

Would Shourie return if the management asked him to? He brushes aside the possibility, not wishing to answer hypothetical questions. He suggests that you read his article, "What can a mere writer do, and what he must do to do it", and wishes the press wouldn't "get after" him, and "invent motives" for all his stories. He breaks into an Urdu couplet to describe how he feels about being sacked for the second time. "You get used to it, woh yaad bhi kahan aati hai (you don't even remember)," he smiles stoically. "I'm much more distant from my work than I used to be." He adds that he would never refuse an office which would enable him to serve the people. "None of us must look for anything other than brief opportunities to do that."

Goenka (left) did not like the details of the negotiations between V.P. Singh and RSS leaders being divulged at such a critical juncture in Indian politics

It may be a while before another "brief opportunity" comes along, admits Shourie. "Which paper would give me a job?" he jests. Until then, there are three books to be written, and a column or two, perhaps. And maybe there will be a short respite from the abuse and accusations hurled at him by the "bloody fool press".

"Even Baba Amte and Mother Teresa, such saintly persons, were abused in our society," he says dramatically. "I am only a cheenti (ant) compared to them, but you must stand up and counter it (the abuse) all the same." ●

A GREAT WAY TO SECURE YOUR FUTURE

INDER MALHOTRA

The diplomatic drift

The V.P. Singh regime never had the time to look beyond its borders

By now it is crystal clear that for several months, until fresh elections hopefully clear up the mess, India is in for grave political uncertainty, confusion and convulsion. This crisis of unprecedented dimensions could not have come at a more awkward time. For, the searing conflicts within the country are accompanied by no less grim external challenges to Indian security and diplomacy.

Ironically, in a remarkable reversal of the traditional subcontinental pattern, Pakistan has been able to put its act together at the precise moment when Indian politics is in disarray, bordering on disintegration. It is after many a summer that Pakistan has a democratically elected (never mind the rigging) civilian government entirely in tune with the hard-line President, Ghulam Ishaq Khan, and the hard-headed army generals. The new combination can therefore be depended upon to try to wrest Kashmir from India—or, at the very least, fatally to bleed this country in both Kashmir and Punjab.

At the same time, the Gulf imbroglio is bound to come to a head within the next few weeks. Even at the best of times, when V.P. Singh's government was still stable and Inder Gujral was able to rush from one world capital to another (now he has had to cancel his visit to China), this country was unable to formulate a long-range Gulf policy beyond the safe evacuation of Indians stranded in Iraq. How on earth are we going to have a policy on this subject—the single most crucial international factor to influence subcontinental affairs—when there is an unstable and shaking hand of an essentially caretaker regime at the helm?

Before answering this question, let us briefly survey how, despite frenetic activity by the foreign minister, the Janata Dal government managed to lower both India's voice and importance in world affairs. In the first place, it did so by largely confining its sights to the country's immediate neighbourhood, indeed to the six SAARC sisters. This was in accordance with the Janata Dal's pre-poll world view, influenced greatly by the new ruling party's brains trust. The wisdom then was that, reversing Rajiv Gandhi's policies, the Janata Dal would almost overnight convert South Asia into an "area of peace, cooperation and friendship"

Pakistan, however, delivered a shattering blow to this naive notion though, to its credit, the new Indian government did improve relations somewhat with Bangladesh. Moreover, the improvement of relations with Nepal—and this is not much—has been due entirely to the return of democracy in the Himalayan kingdom. And this would have been impossible but for Rajiv's refusal to do a deal with the royal Nepalese regime. In Sri Lanka, where Gujral was to go on 11 November but cannot possibly go now, the likes of Ranjan Wijeratne have been scoffing at India since long before the V.P. Singh regime landed itself in its current ignominy.

Even when V.P. Singh's government was stable, India was unable to formulate a long-range foreign policy

The second major flaw of the Janata Dal government's conduct of international relations was the virtual abdication of his inescapable responsibilities by the Prime Minister. V.P. Singh was right in trying to undo the personalisation of foreign policy and the concentration of decision-making on it in the Prime Minister's Office which was Rajiv's penchant. But in doing so, Singh let the pendulum swing to the other extreme. Consequently, in the absence of prime ministerial authority behind it, no worthwhile initiative could be taken on such issues as the Gulf or the future of the Non-Aligned Movement.

Those inclined to believe that as in the French Fourth Republic, so in an uncertain and unstable India, the top bureaucracy can be depended upon to keep things going ought to think again. From the days of Indira Gandhi through the Janata years, the Charan Singh interlude and Rajiv's Raj, a very depressing bureaucratic culture has developed in Delhi. Top civil servants such as the Cabinet secretary, the principal secretary to the Prime Minister, hand-picked advisers and so on tend to become servants of those in power, not of the Indian state. At a time when a make-or-break election is to be fought, it is doubtful if many of them would, or would be allowed to, shed those bad old ways.

The country's only hope is that the people occupying such sensitive positions as those of defence and foreign secretaries, service chiefs or stewards of intelligence agencies would place national interest above loyalty to the boss and petty self-service. ●

The Ayodhya fall-out

The kar seva sparks off communal violence in Bangladesh

COMMUNAL STRIFE

Ayodhya may be more than a thousand kilometres away, but it is close enough to inflame communal passions. All attention was riveted on the UP town where the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) and its allies—the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP) and the Bajrang Dal—had planned to defy prohibitory orders and begin the construction of a Ram temple at the controversial site of the Babri Masjid-Ram Janmabhoomi on 30 October.

Tension had been mounting in Bangladesh ever since BJP chief L.K. Advani began his rath yatra from the temple town of Somnath in the last week of September and the party announced its plans. Despite reports of the elaborate security arrangements made by the state of Uttar Pradesh and the government of India's resolve to beat back any attempt by the BJP and its allies to desecrate the place of worship, apprehensions persisted in the public mind. And 30 October was the day of reckoning.

The happenings in Ayodhya on that crucial day sparked off a spate of communal violence in parts of Bangladesh. Reports saying that the kar sevaks had breached the police barricades, entered the mosque, damaged it partially and set frenzied mobs rampaging in the streets. The worst-affected were the port city of Chittagong and the capital, Dhaka, where trouble broke out on the evening of 30 October itself.

The Bangladesh press had been following the events in India, where recurring communal riots took a heavy toll of life everyday, but few had charged the Indian government with failing to protect the interests of the minorities. The pro-Islamic Inquilabi was, however, an exception. On 31 October, it front-paged an editorial screaming that the Babri Masjid in Ayodhya had been razed to the ground, and added fuel to the already raging fire. The next day, the paper realised the blunder, retracted and apologised for publishing a piece of fabricated news.

President H.M. Ershad (above): promising communal harmony; Hasina Wajed (top right): preaching religious equality; Khaleda Zia (right): stressing collective responsibility for protecting the minorities

But communal storm-troopers had taken over by then. By the afternoon of 31 October, the situation had clearly gone out of hand and curfew had to be clamped in Dhaka and Chittagong, where the army was called out to restore order. The violence left four people dead and over a hundred injured. Shops and houses belonging to the minorities were looted and torched and several Hindu temples damaged. In Dhaka, the arson was mainly confined to the old parts of the capital where the minorities are concentrated. The curfew was relaxed for a couple of hours on 2 November so that the Muslims could say their Friday prayers. But miscreants took this opportunity to foment fresh trouble.

Most political parties reacted by calling for peace and stressing communal amity. On 1 November, President H.M. Ershad said at a meeting of his Jatiya Party that the "glorious tradition of communal harmony would be preserved at all costs and trouble-makers indulging in anti-social activities would be dealt with severely."

Next day, Ershad visited the affected areas in Dhaka and Chittagong and ordered the immediate restoration of the damaged shrines. According to reports available in the capital, restoration work had already begun under heavy security arrangements. The rebuilding of the broken temples was being undertaken by the works ministry at government cost.

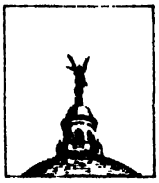
And the Opposition, too, condemned the violence—both in India and in Bangladesh. The Awami League, headed by Sheik Hasina Wajed, expressed surprise over the intrusion of Hindu fundamentalists into the Babri Masjid and flayed communalism and religious bigotry, saying that her party believed in the equality of all religions.

The other fiery Opposition leader, Bangladesh Nationalist Party chief Khaleda Zia, also urged the people to maintain peace. "It is our collective responsibility to give protection to life and property of the minority community," she said.

But Maulana Abbas Ali Khan, acting amir of the fundamentalist Jamat-e-Islami party took a dangerously rabid stand. There is no scope for communal harmony, he thundered, even as the minorities were in a state of shock.

Other Opposition parties and independent groups took a different view of the crisis. They criticised the imposition of curfew in Dhaka and Chittagong as a government ploy to defuse the anti-Ershad agitation sweeping the country, and attributed the clashes to vested interests who, they said, were trying to divide the people.

Dr Kamal Hossain, convenor of the Profession Council, and Faiz Ahmed, convenor of the Cultural Front, alleged that anti-socials struck terror in different areas while securitymen stood as mute spectators. The Hindu, Bouddha, Christian Oikya Parishad, a joint platform of the three religious communities, also held the government responsible for the violence.



Most opinion-setters, however, expressed concern at the growing miasma of Hindu fundamentalism in secular India, but welcomed the steps taken by Prime Minister V.P. Singh—which might well be at the cost of his own government—to foil the attempts of the fundamentalists to demolish the Babri Masjid and build the temple in its place. They are all praise for the UP chief minister Mulayam Singh Yadav and the CPI(M) leader, chief minister Jyoti Basu of West Bengal, for their unwavering stand against the communal forces.

But despite the brave front put up by some Indian leaders, the Bangladeshis are worried over the resurgence of communalism in India, as it tends to stoke communal passions in Bangladesh. •

The left urges the Congress(I) to join its peace initiatives in Calcutta

WEST BENGAL

Reports from the cow-belt states were grim—the tragedies of Partition were being enacted over and over again. Though Ayodhya had reopened the wounds of 1947 and lit the bonfires of communal hatred, Bengal—where over 12 million Muslims live, remained outwardly calm, apart from stray disturbances in Howrah and Purulia. While the Hindi heartland burnt, a crumbling mansion in Beliaghata, a north-east Calcutta suburb, became a new symbol of communal harmony. On 1 September, 1947, Mahatma Gandhi had begun his fast-unto-death at this Beliaghata house. Forty three years later, on 29 October, leaders of the CPI marched past the house, now a museum few ever visit.

Led by chief minister Jyoti Basu, senior CPI(M) leaders lined up with party workers to form a human chain in Calcutta

The acrimony of the past was forgotten as the CPI leaders appealed to all secular forces including the Congress(I) to unitedly fight the communal scourge. "The left parties in India aren't strong enough ..We are appealing to the Congress(I) and all other secular forces to come together and strive to avoid a '47 type situation," CPI MP Gurudas Dasgupta said. Demolishing the Babri Masjid would be construed as an act of barbarism, he felt, adding that the Hindus living in Pakistan, Bangladesh and the Islamic republics of West Asia would be in danger if the VHP succeeded in the objective.

Only a day later, as the VHP storm-troopers were punching their way through the police cordon around the temple-mosque, senior CPI(M) leaders linked arms to form a chain for peace. Led by chief minister Jyoti Basu, senior ministers including Buddhadev Bhattacharya, Asim Dasgupta and Shyamal Chakraborty and CPI(M) Central Committee member Biman Bose lined up alongside DYFI members (the CPI-M youth wing) as part of a human chain. The workers formed human chains in different parts of the city, organised local committee meetings and marched in processions chanting "Hindu-Muslim bhai bhai."

Blaming the BJP-led state government in Rajasthan, Basu claimed that government employees had incited the rioters there. Bengal, he proudly proclaimed, was free of communal disharmony for decades, but referred to the outbreaks at Pilkhana in Howrah (the setting of Dominique Lapierre's The City of Joy) and Purulia as "severe blots". But the Left Front chairman, Sailen Dasgupta, ruled out anti-communal alliance with the Congress(I): "We cannot make it a general rule, the Congress(I) is at the root of many problems."

And reacting to the CPI(M) sniping, PCC(I) general secretary Pradip Bhattacharya accused the marxists of "dirty politics". The Congress(I) also organised a rakhi bandhan day and a communal harmony week. But more than the appeals of political leaders, it is the memories of the Forties' carnage, aided by the lack of grassroots strengths of Hindu chauvinist organisations, that has prevented a major conflagration. •

Militant groups proliferate in Assam

ASSAM

Insurgency is the only growth industry in Assam. Every other day a new outfit mushrooms in the state proclaiming itself to be the saviour of the masses, and the host of acronyms that vie for attention on walls of buildings can be mind-boggling. The latest addition to this proliferating tribe of do-gooders is the United National Socialist Council of the Eastern Region (UNSCER).

The nomenclature has a strong affinity to the National Socialist Council of Nagaland (NSCN), a dreaded rebel outfit that operates on the Nagaland-Manipur border. But the UNSCER claims to be a far bigger forum than the NSCN, as its professed area of operation covers the entire north-east.

This new outfit has recognised the NSCN, the ULFA (United Liberation Front of Assam) and the Kangleipak National Union as the dominant revolutionary groups in Nagaland, Assam and Manipur respectively. It claims to have established fraternal ties with these organisations and hopes that they will reciprocate.

Claiming that it has already built up its own militant force to liberate the north-east, the UNSCER has also disclosed that these militants have been trained in a country other than Burma.

The others who have joined the fray are the Ahom Mukti Force of Assam (AMFA) and the Assam Muslim Liberation Army (AMLA). The AMFA has emerged as a counterpoise to the AASU-AGP-ULFA nexus and has threatened to meet the terror tactics of the ULFA with its own brand of militancy. The AMLA likewise plans to float vigilante groups to protect the minorities.

As the elections approach, more such groups are likely to sprout. And Assam's ethnic scenario might be interesting to watch. •

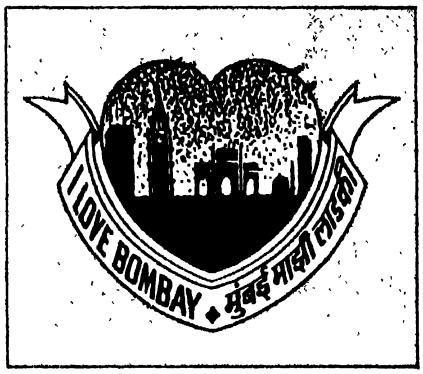
All for Bombay



A row breaks out over the city sheriff's decision to hold a cultural extravaganza

MAHARASHTRA

Had it been a hundred years ago the mayor and the sheriff of Bombay would have fought a duel. Mayor Chhagan Bhujbal and sheriff Nana Chudasama are engaged in a keen contest of oneupmanship to prove that they know Bombay best. It all happened suddenly, on 25 October, when the sheriff, whose term is going to end shortly, thought of a Rs 15-lakh extravaganza to get people to say, "I love Bombay". The idea is to spread the message of keeping Bombay clean and fighting drug abuse. And, accordingly, the enthusiastic sheriff has planned a cultural show on 15 November.

As soon as he had the brain wave, Chudasama got into the act. He roped in the city's officialdom, which is eager to carry through the impresario's game plan. For example, the government's secretary of publicity is in charge of the festival.

The festival logo: the heart of discontent

Mayor Bhujbal did not like the sheriff's flowing enthusiasm. He, along with Congress(I) councillor R.R. Singh, felt that the sheriff was edging them out in the popularity race. So, the two men embarked on a bitter battle. Said the mayor: "The present sheriff seems to be very interested in publicity. islands, and the sheriff has gone about advertising his own name."

But sheriff Chudasama is unfazed. "Those who criticise us do not understand our problem," he retorts. "We are doing everything for free—KalyanjiAnandji, Amitabh Bachchan, rock groups and Gujarati and Marathi drama troupes will perform and the common people will get all this for free." But to what end, no one really knows.

And the mayor has some tough questions which the sheriff has so far parried. If Chudasama is really keen on entertaining the slum dwellers, Bhujbal wonders why the extravaganza was being planned at Marine Drive instead of Dharavi. Bhujbal also criticises BEST's (Bombay Electric Supply and Transport) readiness to press additional buses into service on the day of the function, when it has drastically reduced its daily fleet.

As if all this was not enough, the sheriff had to drag the navy into the controversial razzmatazz. Surprisingly, the navy has agreed to fly helicopters to shower confetti and arrange fireworks from ships.

Evidently, the mayor points out, the fuel crunch does not seem to worry the sheriff or the government. •

A stolen Garuda idol is brought back to Puri

ORISSA

There was much rejoicing in Puri last month. To the god-fearing people of this temple town it was the victory of good over evil. An ancient and rare twelfth-century idol, stolen from the Gundicha temple of Puri five years back, was finally brought back by the sleuths of the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI). But it will be quite a while before it is re-installed in the temple's sanctum sanctorum. The image is valued at several crores in the international antique market.

The idol, a rare specimen of the mythical half-man half-bird Garuda, is still sub judice, says Sarat Chandra Mohapatra, administrator of Puri's more well-known Jagannath temple. It will take some time before the case filed by the CBI against a gang of antique smugglers is settled. And till then, the 15-inch high, 40-kg statuette will have to be produced before the metropolitan magistrate, Delhi, from time to time during the legal proceedings.

The image, carved out of superquality black granite back in 1197, is now kept in the southern precincts of the Jagannath temple and is being worshipped daily.

The temple administration, assisted by the crime branch of the Orissa Police, initiated efforts to bring the idol back to Puri because of two reasons. First, the magnificent artefact was lying uncared for in the CBI's maalkhana (godown) in Delhi and was beginning to lose its lustre. Secondly, the people were growing increasingly suspicious about its fate, to the extent that its existence was being doubted.

The Garuda: worth its weight in gold

For three years, the Garuda was in the possession of the smugglers before the CBI seized it when it was about to be taken out of the country.

According to Mohapatra, Garuda worship is a very ancient tradition. The half-man half-bird diety that thrives on snakes is the vahana (carrier) of Lord Vishnu, and inscriptions from the Indus Valley civilisation mention Garuda worship. The excavations at Mohenjodaro and Harappa unearthed its images. The Garuda statue of Gundicha may not be as pristine, but it is almost a thousand years old and is worth its weight in gold. • circumstances. Scientific luminaries such as Prof. C.N.R. Rao, head of the Indian Institute of Science, Prof. V. Radhakrishnan, chief of the Raman Research Institute, and Prof. R. Narasimhan of the National Aeronautics Laboratory were signatories to the appeal.

The scientists have said that "religious fundamentalism closes the door to rational debate and discussions, the prerequisites of democracy" and feel that the Ram Janmabhoomi-Babri Masjid issue is threatening democratic and secular ideals. They have particularly taken the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP) to task for trying to impose its will on the nation and rejecting constitutional options.

The scientists incurred the wrath of some fundamentalist groups because of their stand. On 31 October, an attempt was made by a five-member gang belonging to the Kannada Ranadheerara Pade (Kannada Warriors' Battalion) to kidnap Dr U.R. Rao, chairman of the Indian Space Research Organisation (ISRO). The police acted on a tip-off and arrested the five men before they could execute their plan. The leader of the gang confessed to the police that their intention was to secure a better deal for Kannada language in the state and the release of all arrested BJP and other Hindu fundamentalist leaders.

Scientists apart, leading litterateurs and artists also demonstrated against the machinations of the VHP-BJP combine at the Ravindra Kalakshetra, the state's cultural nerve-centre.

As the wave of communal hysteria lashes the state, the people keep their fingers crossed. Since end-September, the state has been witnessing the worst-ever communal clashes and even the police are not sure when the madness will end. •

Reprieve for a 'ripper'

The Supreme Court stays the hanging of a murderer on the grounds of caste

The court's decision was unique. Muthukutti Chandran, 40 known as 'ripper' Chandran, had death staring him in the face. He knew that in a few days, the jail warden would lead him to the gallows. But 72 hours before that fateful moment, Chandran got a reprieve by virtue of a Supreme Court order that stayed his hanging.

Chandran is a notorious criminal. During 1985-86 he and his gang created terror in north Malabar area in Kerala and in southern Karnataka. Chandran was found guilty of having committed serial murders and, like the Calcutta Stoneman, his gang killed by clobbering the victims on the head with sticks or a hammer. They left behind a trail of ghastly murders, and for six months the police in the two states were in a state of total confusion.

Finally, it was the Karnataka police that tracked Chandran down, near Chikmagalur in Karnataka. The police in the two states spent nearly Rs 20 lakhs on the 'ripper' investigations. The courts in Kerala sentenced Chandran to the gallows, while four of his associates were given life imprisonment.

The death warrant against 'ripper' Chandran was ultimately signed by the district and sessions judge of Kasargod on 9 October, directing the superintendent of Cannanore Jail to hang him on 31 October. The news of the black warrant made Chandran go berserk. According to jail officials, he "behaved like a mad man". He told the other prisoners and the officials around him: "I will move the mountains, they will never hang me."

Chandran wrote to the home ministry claiming that he was a Harijan and in Ambedkar's birth centenary, the emotional blackmail worked. The government decided to put off the hanging for the time being

And he sure did. Initially, he had written to politicians and jail officials pleading for mercy, but his letters were not even replied to. Then, someone advised him to write to the home ministry claiming that he was a Harijan and that his wife and daughter were his dependants. And in the year of Mandal, the emotional blackmail worked. The home ministry underwent a quick change of heart. "How can a Harijan be hanged when the nation is celebrating Ambedkar's centenary?" the ministry officials asked.

So, the Union home ministry appealed to the Supreme Court to defer the hanging. And 72 hours before Chandran's tryst with death, he got a new lease of life. The jail superintendent refuses to say why the Supreme Court issued the stay order. It is believed that the Harijan factor helped make the decision.

'Ripper' Chandran is a cold-blooded murderer who started his crime career by using dogs and cats as guineapigs. He used to smash the heads of the neighbourhood animals in order to perfect his murderous techniques. Later, he started doing the same with human beings and, as per police files, he knew precisely where to strike on the head.

A little-known fact about Chandran is that he is also a rapist. He and his men had gangraped many women. Six children had been attacked by his gang. Chandran also used to rob his victims.

There are doubts whether Chandran is truly a Harijan. People allege that he is married to a Harijan woman but is not one himself. Says a social worker at Cannanore: "There should not be any reservations for murderers. It is a dangerous precedent that will have far-reaching consequences."

In March this year, Balakrishnan, a man guilty of committing four gruesome murders, was hanged at the Cannanore Central Jail. His mercy petition was rejected and the Nayanar government had, at that time, criticised the press for giving what he called undue publicity to a murderer who was going to be hanged. The same government is, however, surprisingly silent in the Chandran case.

Says a shocked advocate of the Kerala High Court: "Probably this is the first time in the country's history that a man has escaped the gallows because he happened to be a Harijan." And in the territories that were terrorised by the 'ripper', the people are still not willing to believe the news. ●

A new Delhi Administration scheme provides homes for the homeless

NITIN RAI

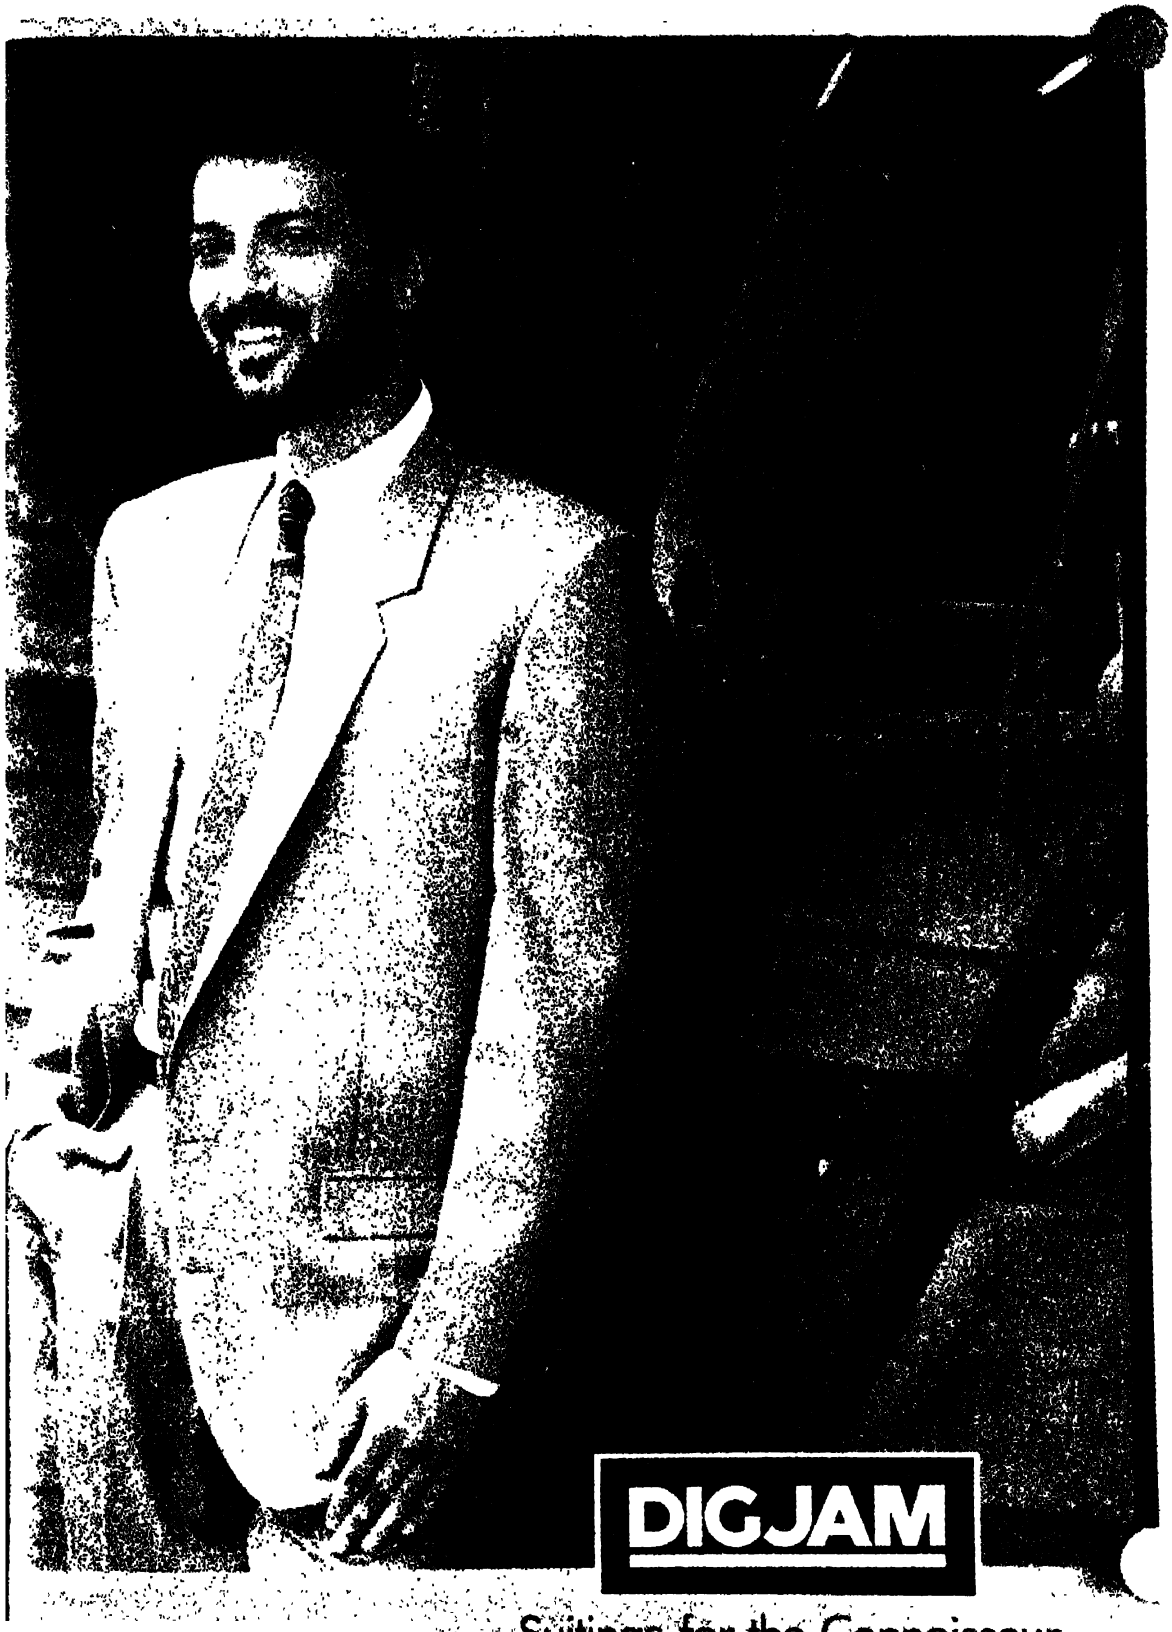
Ekta Vihar: hope for slum-dwellers

For the residents of Ekta Vihar in South Delhi, it is a dream come true. From an impoverished, rootless existence, to owners of land. Almost overnight these slum-dwellers have a home they own. a home they cannot be evicted from, a home secure from the Delhi Administrations' demolition squad. Says one of the new home-owners, a migrant from Gorakhpur in Uttar Pradesh: "After living in Delhi for eight years, I finally feel that I belong." Adds a beaming Bhoop Singh, Ekta Vihar's pradhan: "For the first time, we have a house of our own."

Ironically, for all this, the home owners have the much maligned, but all powerful, Delhi Development Authority (DDA)—and its new cooperative scheme—to thank. It is the DDA which has given the residents land, arranged for a Rs 5,000 loan on nominal interest, and provided technical assistance to build their houses. Ekta Vihar is the first colony under the DDA's novel scheme.

The residents of the colony have also done their bit. With each home costing an estimated Rs 10,000 (just four walls and a roof), each resident had to arrange for a minimum of Rs 5,000 on his own, an astronomical amount for people who barely earn enough to make both ends meet. But they managed admirably. They borrowed from money-lenders, sold off land in villages back home, pawned ornaments, worked overtime and somehow, arranged for the money. The lure of a permanent home in Delhi seemed to be worth any price.

However, the deal had a catch. The scheme, initiated by Action for Social Health for All (ASHA), a voluntary organisation, has laid down several conditions for membership. The houses cannot be sold to an outsider, nor can they be rented out. Perhaps the most outstanding condition is that women will be primary owners of the houses. "Actually, it is joint ownership," explains Dr Kiran Martin of ASHA. "But we thought that women are less likely to be tempted into selling land. Also, women are not normally given to addiction and brawls. In slums they are the ones who keep the family together." This prerequisite has unwittingly given Ekta Vihar's women a new status: their husbands now treat them with due respect. "My husband doesn't fight so much anymore," says Gayattri, a housewife still unaccustomed to her recent emancipation. "Nor does he get drunk in the evenings."



The passage to a secured life was, however, not without hurdles. The community resisted initially, a major objection being that women were given the ownership rights. But, after prolonged meetings with the DDA and ASHA, the residents warmed to the idea. Also there were financial sacrifices to be made and threats from neighbouring slum lords who felt their hold would weaken once the residents had their own houses. But there are no regrets. Says Sunita, an illiterate but active social worker of the area and a new-scheme resident: "Our lives have become more peaceful since we got the house. It's almost as if we have a new purpose in life." She adds: "We have to earn enough to repay the loans." And Sunita is determined to do just that.

If the scheme has given a new lease of life to the slum-dwellers, it has also given the DDA a chance to clear its bullying, insensitive image. "It was not easy for us either," says a DDA official. "The land and building department of the Delhi Administration initially refused us permission to build, but eventually they gave in." The official maintains that more colonies would be added under this new scheme.

It would help. In Delhi, an estimated 45 per cent of the eight million population still live in filthy, squalid hovels. If the DDA is really serious about its intentions, it could turn much of this mess to Ekta Vihars. ●

CHAINED BY HER IMAGE

[redacted] She continues to take her political career—and her love of good causes—as seriously as ever. Unfortunately for Shabana Azmi, nobody else does.

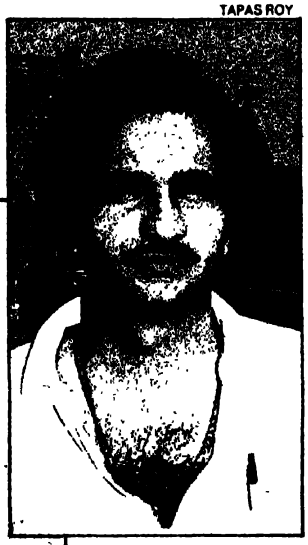
Take the events of 30 October, when the film star turned up at Patel Chowk, New Delhi, to participate in a function organised by the Yuva Janata Dal, for instance. The programme commenced on schedule, with copies of the pledge for communal harmony being circulated and those gathered—including such celebraties as Bhisham Sahni, Mulk Raj Anand, Ram Vilas Paswan, Raj Mohan Gandhi and Sonal Mansingh—forming a human chain as a symbol of "concern and urgency of our people to remain united".

SANDEEP SINHA

Shabana Azmi: hasty retreat

Unfortunately, the aforementioned concern lasted only until Azmi arrived. For, as the star took centre-stage to address those assembled, the groupies took over, pushing and shoving to get a better look and quite ruining the prevalent sombre atmosphere in the bargain.

Shabana tried to retrieve matters somewhat, hurrying off to join the human chain, husband Javed Akhtar in tow. But even that didn't work.



And in the end, activist Azmi had to beat a hasty retreat.

SIPPY AND SOAP

First, we had the soap operas: Hum Log, Buniyaad. Then came the mythological mishmash: Ramayan, Mahabharat. And in the end there was sheer tedium.

It was left to film and tele-serial maker Ramesh (Sholay) Sippy to salvage the situation. And to his credit, he's planning to do just that with another magnum opus which will—Mandi House willing—take over the Sunday morning slot vacated by Mahabharat.

TAPAS ROY

Sippy has already begun work on a 104-episode serial, titled Parivartan, scripted by Manohar Shyam Joshi (of Hum Log fame) and with Neena Gupta in the lead. Gupta plays the young bahu while Ajit Vachani is the 90-year-old patriarch who rules over his family with an iron hand.

A pilot episode has already been filmed and despatched to Mandi House. And were clearance to come through, viewers may well have another Buniyaad unfolding on their TV screens.

SHOWBIZ IS BEST

His duties as Lintas chief have kept him away from theatre for a bit. But it's back to showbiz for Alyque Padamsee now, with his production of Shakespeare's Othello scheduled to go on stage in Bombay and Calcutta in November.

The play serves as a comeback vehicle for another old theatre person Kabir Bedi, who'd decided years ago that he preferred Sandokan to Tughlaq. Bedi will, of course, be playing Othello to new find Nikki Vijaykar's Desdemona.

No, Sharon didn't get to bag the lead role this time.

TRY AND CAP THIS!

For an environmentalist, she has singularly bad taste when it comes to choosing her leader.

First, Maneka Gandhi threw her lot in with the Raja of Manda, he of the karakul fur cap. Predictably a fair amount of embarrassment followed for the lady who prides herself on her commitment to the preservation of all wild life (and by that we don't mean enterprising goons of the Rashtriya Sanjay Manch variety, either). Whose side was Maneka on anyway? asked concerned environmentalists, and the other Mrs G was stumped for an answer.

Then, in the best traditions of noblesse oblige, the Raja decided to shun karakul in favour of synthetic fur. And the crisis seemed to be over.

Not quite. For the Green ex-minister decided to change sides. And went over to Chandra Shekhar, who has been immortalised for posterity only too often, sitting on a deer-skin rug.

You may well argue that that shouldn't be any skin off Maneka's perfect teeth. But those who know Maneka know better. And according to them, Shekhar may well find his rug whisked out from under him one of these days.

And replaced by a synthetic carpet, no doubt.

Maneka Gandhi: dear me!

His complaints are quite standard: nobody in the country respects sportspersons; the Bengal government didn't even send him a congratulatory letter after he won the world amateur billiards title; and much more in the same vein.

But Manoj Kothari isn't going to waste more time than strictly necessary in rueing his lot. Instead, the champion has decided to give his sporting career a new turn by turning professional.

THE INTERNATIONAL FAVOURITE

Everyone had Kabir Bedi down as the man most adept at loving and leaving 'em (Protima, Parveen and Susan will vouch for this). Everyone but Sonu Walia.

For sexy Sonu acts as if Kabir's walking out on her is nothing short of a national calamity. All queries about the fate of her "beautiful relationship" are met with moist eyes and a "I'd rather not talk about it now" forced out in a choked voice.

But surely Walia should have seen it coming. For, if Bedi could dump the original (Babi) he was hardly likely to remain faithful to a pale imitation.

Kabir and Sonu: the affair is off

She hasn't proved her worth as an actress. But when has that ever mattered when it comes to making the gossip columns? And the Kapoor beti, Karisma, the latest entrant to the film world, has managed to feature in them with effortless ease.

The latest is that Karisma has—god, what will they come up with next?—a boy friend. And if that's not exciting enough news, there's more. He's none other than Nusli Wadia's son Jeh, heir to Bombay Dyeing.

Their friendship goes back to school, but it has flowered only recently, with the duo going on long drives in Jeh's black Mustang and then parking in some dark suburban lane to cootchie-koo the hours away.

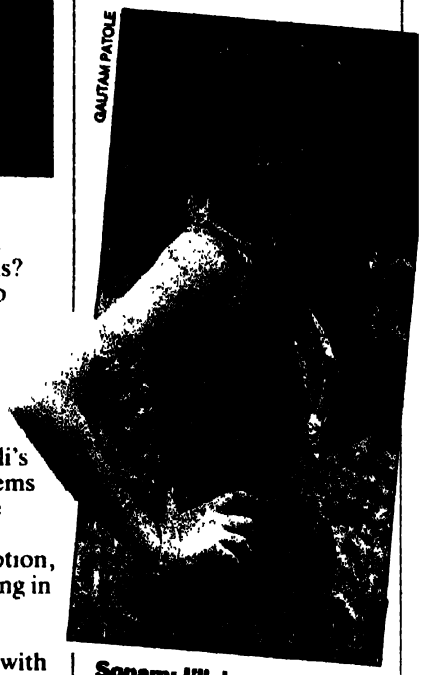
Karisma: old enough for long drives

Wonder what mama Babita has to say to this? After all, isn't her Lolo baby's career the most important thing at this time?

While Muzaffar Ali's professional career seems to be on hold, with the shooting of Zooni progressing in slow motion, there's plenty happening in his private life.

Ali and second wife Subhashini have split, with the Umrao Jaan director marrying an architect, Meera, who's just a little older than his eldest son.

Apparently, the estrangement with Subhashini, now a member of Parliament, began around the time she began getting involved with politics. This meant spending more and more time in Lucknow, while Ali remained in film land.



The inevitable happened. Muzaffar found a new love and conducted a nikaah with her. Only he ommitted to divorce Subhashini before that and she is reportedly livid with him for treating her in this cavaliar manner.

But that doesn't make much difference to Ali, who claims that with Meera he's found a new reason to live.

Poor Sonam. Despite her best efforts to cut down husband-to-be Rajiv Rai's expenditure on his shooting stint in Nairobi (she left her make-up man behind for one), his expenses continue to sky-rocket.

Of course, that has a lot to do with free loaders like

With Rajiv Rai picking up all the tabs, of course.

Perhaps, the extremely large drunk has decided to settle into happy domesticity, after all. For, the second Mrs Vinod Khanna is in the family way.

While Kavita is very excited at the prospective birth, for Khanna the event has an air of deja vue about it: he's had two sons by first wife Geetanjali, remember.

But never mind that: here's good luck to him, anyway. ●

Profound and simple

R.K. Narayan's latest novel is both at once

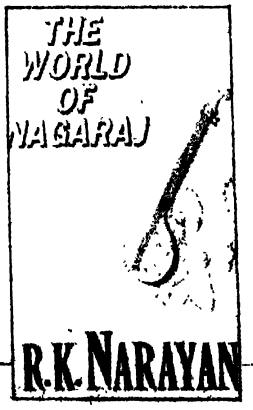
The maestro returns. Rasipuram Krishnaswamy Narayan, better known as R.K. Narayan, has produced his 14th novel on the fictitious south Indian town called Malgudi, continuing to enchant readers with his inimitably charming style and depiction of quaint Malgudi characters. The World Of Nagaraj, originally published earlier this year by Heinemann of London, is now available in an Indian edition.

Narayan, who celebrated his 84th birthday last month, is the only one of our senior triumvirate of Indian-English novelists (the other two being Mulk Raj Anand and Raja Rao) who continues to write fiction prolifically in his advanced years. Unlike many others who persist in churning out volumes despite declining inspiraton, his unique literary touch remains unaffected by age. Also unlike many others, including some much younger authors, he continues to live in India, showing no desire to settle down where the grass is greener. And, certainly unlike many lesser Indian writers in English, he completely desists from either exoticising India to attract Western customers or simplifying India for their benefit. Yet, he retains a wide readership outside; some even say that his non-Indian audience is larger.

How does he do it? Simple. That's the keyword. His novels are the apotheosis of simplicity. There's none of the convoluted complexities as in the works of so many serious 'intellectuals', nor the superficial structural razzle-dazzle that typifies much fiction nowadays, which leaves us breathless just trying to remember who is who and catch up with who has done what. But it is difficult to be simple. Narayan's apparent transparence disguises a very sophisticated craftsman and elegant stylist.

This novel, for instance, is about Nagaraj, an ordinary man attempting to grapple with the unpredictability of life—a consistent theme in all of Narayan's stories. When you come to think about it, hardly anything happens in the novel, apart from the mishaps and mysteries accompanying the arrival of Nagaraj's beloved nephew. But the master story-teller weaves a magic spell, so hypnotic that one scarcely notices the fineness of the threads in his web. His method is intricately digressive, containing stories within stories (in our hallowed epic tradition) in an accumulative flash-back and flash-forward technique that is stunning when one pauses to reflect on it.

What Narayan might be suggesting is that a mere story is not the point of fiction; people and emotions are what's important. The characterisation of Nagaraj is simply a gem. Like most of Narayan's heroes (and like most of us) he has dreams which fail to materialise: "Life is getting more and more complex," he cogitates. "All that I seek is freedom, peace of mind and scope to write my book" (he wants to write the definitive book on the sage Narada).



The entire novel revolves around his thoughts: Nagaraj thinks all the time, rarely speaks his thoughts and never acts. He is the archetypal procrastinator; when his brother likens him to a cow chewing his cud, there could not be a better analogy. He sits on the pyol(raised platform) outside his house surveying the world slipping by and recognises his own ineffectualness: "Everyone is in a hurry and passing on. I am stationary like a milestone...Why can't I also pass instead of being a milestone? People take advantage of my milestone nature." Of course, he never does anything to reverse the process.

The tragedy of Nagaraj's life is made into a sympathetic comedy by Narayan, with the kind of genial humour for which he is famous. His tenderness towards all humans, his understated irony on their foibles, his acute sense of the past and present jostling each other in India, get inflected in the other characters he draws. So we find Nagaraj's friend Coomar running a shop called the Boeing Sari Centre; his mother constantly picking fault with his wife (even for being childless); the anonymous Talkative Man staging a comeback from Narayan's previous Malgudi novel; and the man who stands on his head for 72 hours without food, wanting to get into the Guinness Book. They and many others come and go, representing the simultaneously fleeting yet eternal nature of smalltown India. •

THE MOSSAD

How the Israelis trained the Tamils, Sri Lankans and Indians—at the same time

Few books on intelligence can have caused as much of an uproar as By Way Of Deception, the memoirs of Victor Ostrovsky, a former agent of Mossad, the Israeli secret service.

The Israelis have tried their hardest to get the book banned and there has been a worldwide uproar over many of the book's allegations. One charge that has escaped notice in the Western uproar is Ostrovsky's allegation that Mossad trained Sri Lankan troops, Tamil Tigers and Indian security forces—all at the same time!

In this extract, he tells the story.

After several months in research, I was transferred to what was to me the most exciting department in the building, Kaisarut, or liaison. I was in the section called Dardasim, or "Smerfs," which handled the Far East and Africa. I worked under Amy Yaar.

It was like a train station, sort of a mini foreign office to countries Israel has no formal ties with. Ex-generals and various former security people would be sauntering in and out all the time, wearing visitors' tags and using their former Mossad contacts to arrange deals for their private companies—usually selling arms. Because these "consultants" couldn't go to certain countries as Israelis, liaison would facilitate the sales by providing false passports and other items for them.

It wasn't right, but nobody would ever say anything. Everyone felt that one day he'd be a has-been, too, and likely doing the same thing.

Amy told me that if I received any unusual requests, I was not to ask why, but simply to bring such things to his attention. One day a man came in and asked me to have a contract signed that had to be approved by the Prime Minister. The contract was for the sale of between 20 and 30 U.S. made Skyhawk fighters to Indonesia, something that contravened Israel's armament agreement with the United States. They were not supposed to resell such armaments without U.S. approval.

"Okay," I said, "if you don't mind coming tomorrow, or leaving me your phone number. I'll call you once it's taken care of."

"No, I'll wait," he said.

During my trip to IAI, I had seen about 30 of these Skyhawk fighter jets sitting on runway completely wrapped in bright yellow plastic, and ready for shipping. When we asked about it, they just said they were for shipment overseas, but they wouldn't tell us where they were going. I was quite sure there was no way the Americans would approve of the sale of these planes to Indonesia. It would change the balance of power in the area. But it wasn't up to me. So when he said he'd wait for Prime Minister Peres's approval, I opened my drawer, looked in, and said, "Shimon, Shimon." I turned to him and said, "Sorry, Mr. Peres is not here right now."

The guy got really mad and told me to go see Amy. I hadn't even bothered asking who he was. When I told Amy about it, he got quite excited. "Where is he? Where is he?"

"Out in the hall."

"Well, send him in with the contract," said Amy.

CONNECTION

About 20 minutes later the man left Yaar's office and walked by mine. Holding the contract under his chin for me to see, and grinning from ear to ear, he said, "Apparently Mr. Peres was in, after all."

Peres, in reality, was probably in Jerusalem, and would certainly have known nothing about his signature being put on these documents. The paper involved was known as an "ass-cover", for internal use only, just to show the shipper or whoever else was involved that they were covered financially because the Prime Minister had approved the deal.

Officially, of course, Mossad employees work for the Prime Minister's Office. The PM would be aware of money transactions, but he often did not know about actual deals. And many times that was fine with him. It was sometimes better not to know. If he knew, he'd have to make decisions. This way, if, say, the Americans found out, he could say he didn't know and it would be what the Americans call a "plausible deniability."

The Asia Building, owned by wealthy Israeli industrialist Saul Eisenberg, was right next to headquarters. Because of Eisenberg's connections to the Far East, he was the Mossad's tie-in with China. He and his people were doing considerable armament dealing with various places. Many of the sales were of leftover equipment, Russian-made material captured from the Egyptians and Syrians during the wars. When Israel ran out of Russian-built AK-47s to sell, it began manufacturing its own—a cross between the AK-47 assault rifle and the American M-16, called the Galil. It was sold all over the world.

It was like working in a department store servicing all these private consultants. They were supposed to be tools used by us, but the tools got out of hand. They had more experience than any of us, so that in fact they were using us.

One of my assignments, in mid-July 1984, was to escort a group of Indian nuclear scientists who were worried about the threat of the Islamic bomb (Pakistan's bomb) and had come on a secret mission to Israel to meet with Israeli nuclear experts and exchange information. As it turned out, the Israelis were happy to accept information from the Indians, but reluctant to return the favour.

The day after they left, I was picking up my regular paperwork when Amy called me into the office for two assignments. The first was to help get the gear and staff for a group of Israelis going to South Africa to help train that country's secret-police units. After that, I was to go to an African embassy and pick up a man who was supposed to fly back to his home country. He was to be taken to his home in Herzlia Pituah, then driven to the airport and ushered through security.

"I'll meet you at the airport," Amy said, "because we have a group of people coming from Sri Lanka to train here."

Amy was waiting for the Sri Lankans' flight from London when I joined him. "When these guys arrive," he said, "don't make a face. Don't do anything."

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"Well, these guys are monkeylike. They come from a place that's not developed. They're not long out of the trees. So don't expect much."

Amy and I escorted the nine Sri Lankans through a back door of the airport into an air-conditioned van. These were the first arrivals from a group that would finally total nearly 50. They would then be divided into three smaller groups:

- An anti-terror group training at the military base near Petha Tikvah, called Kfar Sirkin, learning how to overtake hijacked buses and airplanes, or deal with hijackers in a building, how to descend from helicopters on a rope, and other anti-terrorist tactics. And, of course, they would be buying Uzis and other Israeli-made equipment, including bulletproof vests, special grenades, and more.

• A purchasing team, in Israel to buy weapons on a larger scale. They bought seven or eight large PT boats, for example, called Devora, which they would use mainly to patrol their northern shores against Tamils.

•A group of high-ranking officers who wanted to purchase radar and other naval equipment to counter the Tamils who were still getting through from India and mining Sri Lankan waters.

I was to squire Penny, President Jayawardene's daughter-in-law, around to the usual tourist spots for two days, and then she would be looked after by someone else from the office. Penny was a pleasant woman, physically an Indian version of Corazon Aquino. She was a Buddhist because her husband was, but she was somehow still a Christian, so she wanted to see all the Christian holy places. On the second day, I took her to Vered Haglil, or the Rose of Galilee, a horse-ranch-restaurant on the mountain with a nice view and good food. We had an account there.

Next I was assigned to the high-ranking officers who were looking for radar equipment. I was told to take them to a manufacturer in Ashdod named Alta that could do the work. But when he saw their specifications, the Alta representative said, 'They're just going through the motions, they're not going to buy our radar."

"Why?" I said.

"These specs were not written by these monkeys," the man said. "They were written by a British radar manufacturer called Deca, so these guys already know what they're going to buy. Give them a banana and send them home. You're wasting your time."

"Okay, but how about a brochure or something to make them happy?"

This conversation was going on in Hebrew while we all sat together eating cookies, and drinking tea and coffee. The Alta rep said he didn't mind giving them a lecture to make it look as if they weren't being brushed off, "but if we're going to do that, let's have some fun".

With that, he went into another office for a set of big transparencies of a large vacuum-cleaner system that is used to clean harbours after oil spills. He had a series of colourful schematic drawings. Everything was written in Hebrew, but he lectured in English on this "high capability radar equipment". I found it difficult not to laugh. He laid it on so thick, claiming this radar could locate a guy swimming in the water and practically tell his shoe size, his name and address, and his blood type. When he'd finished, the Sri Lankans thanked him, said they were surprised at this technological advancement, but that it wouldn't fit their ships. Well, we knew about their ships. We built them!

After dropping me off at the hotel, I told Amy the Sri Lankans weren't buying the radar. "Yes, we knew that," he replied.

Amy then told me to go to Kfar Sirkin where the Sri Lankan special-forces group was training, get them whatever they needed, then take them into Tel Aviv for the evening. But he cautioned me to make sure it was all coordinated with Yosy, who had just been transferred to the same department that week.

Yosy was also looking after a group being trained by the Israelis. But they weren't supposed to meet my people. They were Tamils, bitter enemies of my Sinhalese group. Tamils, who are mostly Hindu, argue that since Sri Lanka won independence from Great Britain in 1948 (as Ceylon), they have been discriminated against by the island's predominantly Buddhist Sinhalese majority. Of the 16 million or so Sri Lankans, about 74 per cent are Sinhalese, and just 20 per cent are Tamil, largely centered in the northern section of the country. Around 1983, a group of Tamil guerrilla factions, collectively known as the Tamil Tigers, began an armed struggle to create a Tamil homeland in the north called Eelam—an ongoing battle that has claimed thousands of lives on both sides.

Sympathy for the Tamils runs high in the southern Indian state of Tamil Nadu, where 40 million Tamils live. Many Sri Lankan Tamils, escaping the bloodshed, have sought refuge there, and the Sri Lankan government has accused Indian officials of arming and training the Tamils. They should be accusing the Mossad.

The Tamils were training at the commando naval base, learning penetration techniques, mining landings, communications, and how to sabotage ships similar to the Devora. There were about 28 men in each group, so it was decided that Yosy should take the Tamils to Haifa that night while I took the Sinhalese to Tel Aviv, thus avoiding any chance encounters.

The real problem started about two weeks into the courses, when both the Tamils and Sinhalese—unknown to each other, of course—were training at Kfar Sirkin. It is a fairly large base, but even so, on one occasion the two groups passed within a few yards of each other while they were out jogging. After their basic training routine at Kfar Sirkin, the Sinhalese were taken to the naval base to be taught essentially how to deal with all the techniques the Israelis had just taught the Tamils. It was pretty hectic. We had to dream up punishments or night training exercises just to keep them busy, so that both groups wouldn't be in Tel Aviv at the same time. The actions of this one man (Amy) could have jeopardized the political situation in Israel if these groups had met. I'm sure Peres wouldn't have slept at night if he'd known this was going on. But of course, he didn't know.

"Technically we worked for Prime Minister Peres (seen here with Itzhak Shamir) but he usually did not know the details "

When the three weeks were just about up and the Sinhalese were preparing to go to Atlit, the top-secret naval commando base, Amy told me he wouldn't be going with them. The Sayret Matcal would take over their training. This was the top intelligence reconnaissance group, the one that carried out the famous Entebbe raid. (The naval commandos are the equivalent of the American Seals.)

"Look, we have a problem," said Amy. "We have a group of 27 SWAT team guys from India coming in."

"My God," I said "What is this? We've got Sinhalese, Tamils, and now Indians. Who's next?"

The SWAT team was supposed to train at the same base where Yosy had the Tamils, a tricky and potentially volatile situation. And I still had my regular office work to do, along with the daily reports. In the evenings, I took the SWAT team to dinner, again making sure none of the groups ended up in the same place. Every day I had an envelope brought to me with about $300 in Israeli currency to spend on them.

At the same time, I was meeting with a Taiwanese air-force general named Key, the representative of their intelligence community in Israel. He worked out of the Japanese embassy, and he wanted to buy weapons. I was told to show him around, but not to sell to him, since the Taiwanese would replicate in two days anything they bought, and end up competing with Israel on the market. I took him to the Sultan factory in the Galil, where mortars and mortar shells were made. he was impressed, but the manufacturer told me he couldn't sell him anything, anyway: first, because he was from Taiwan, and second, because everything he had was preordered. I told him I had no idea we were training so hard with mortars. He said, "We aren't, but the Iranians are sure using a lot of them." That was keeping the company in business.

At one point they made arrangements to bring in a whole group of Taiwanese for training. It was a compromise of sorts. They had asked the Mossad to give them combatants in China, but they wouldn't; instead, they trained a unit similar to the neviot, capable of gathering information from inanimate objects.

At this time, the department also had a series of Africans coming and going and being offered various services. I stayed with the department two months longer than I was supposed to, at Amy's specific request—both a compliment and a useful addition to my personnel record.

They used to tell the story of the "kerplunk machine" to illustrate some of the weird and useless things the Africans would spend their money on. Someone asked an African leader if he had a kerplunk machine. He didn't, so they offered to build him one for $25 million. When a huge arm, nearly 1,000 feet long and over 600 feet high, hovering over the water, was complete, its creator went back to the leader and said he'd need another $5 million to finish it. He then devised an elevator apparatus under the arm that held a huge stainless steel ball more than 60 feet in diameter. All the leader's subjects and visiting dignitaries from other African countries gathered at the river bank on "launch" day to see the wonderful machine in action. When it was turned on, the elevator moved slowly along to the end of the arm, it opened, and the giant ball fell into the water and went "kerplunk."

It's just a joke, but it's not so far from the truth.

Two weeks into the courses, both the Tamils and Sinhalese—unknown to each other, of course—were training at Kfar Sirkin...On one occasion the two groups passed within a few yards of each other while they were out jogging

I never saw so much money changing hands so quickly and among so many people as during my time with Amy. The Mossad regarded all these contracts as initial contact with various places that someday would bring diplomatic relations, so money was no object. And the businessmen, of course, were looking at it from a profit point of view. They were all getting their healthy percentages.

My last assignment with Amy was a four-day trip around Israel with a man and a woman from Communist China who wanted to buy electronic equipment.

They were angry at being shown equipment of lesser quality than they already had. They complained saying, "What are they trying to sell us, socks?", which I found really funny, because I used to say that if we could sell socks to the Chinese army, we'd be economically sound. Everybody would be knitting.

But the Chinese couple were badly treated, and that was because Amy thought they weren't high-ranking enough. He was making foreign-affairs decisions by himself, without asking anyone. It was astonishing. All his life Amy worked for government at a government salary, yet he lived on this acreage north of Tel Aviv in a huge villa with a small forest of his own. We'd stop there sometimes for a drink when we were working on the weekends and there were always businessmen wandering around the lawns, and a barbecue going. I once said to him, "How can you manage all this?" and he said, "You work hard, you save, and you can manage." Yeah, sure.●

V. GANGADHAR

The Indian Ex-pressman

Even his detractors will miss Arun Shourie

Arun Shourie never regarded himself as a journalist. In fact, he tended to look down on journalism, particularly the Indian variety. He was a pamphleteer to many, a social reformer to himself.

Shourie started off being anti-Indira Gandhi and anti-Emergency. He and his boss never forgave Indira Gandhi for suspending the democratic process, albeit for a brief period. Like many others, Shourie and Goenka believed that once Congress and Indira Gandhi were ousted from power, all our problems would be solved. It did not work out that way. They propped up the ailing Jayaprakash Narayan and his sidekicks at the penthouse suite of the Express Towers, gave them the five-star treatment while working on something called Total Revolution. Nothing really came off it.

Shourie changed sides as frequently as any politician. He praised Rajiv Gandhi to the skies and then turned against him with a vengeance. The same was the case with Vishwanath Pratap Singh. For some time, Singh was the saviour of the nation, a symbol of our hope and value-based politics. The political ploy over the announcement of the Mandal Commission recommendations changed all that and Singh became Enemy Number One.

The former Express editor never liked Chandra Shekhar or Devi Lal. He would have dearly loved to see Lal Krishna Advani assume the Prime Minister's gadi and, perhaps, the Scindia Maharani, the home minister! Fortunately, this is not likely to happen.

Shourie's sympathies are clear. They are for the middle, upper middle class and for a Hindu India. Towards the end of his career with the Indian Express, the dislike against the minorities was showing clearly.

There are still some mysteries around this fascinating personality. Why did the Express and Shourie turn against Rajiv? Was it because the Rajiv government failed to 'punish' Dhirubhai Ambani? Why did Sethji delay taking action against Shourie? After all, the controversial article, "Arrey bhai, masjid hai hi kahaan?" which was withheld from the Express, did not say anything new. In fact, it was less offensive than the one published on Devi Lal, which contained all those choice Hindi abuses. Some say, Goenka was influenced by the younger members of the family to rein in Shourie. According to others, the likely emergence of Devi Lal, Chandra Shekhar or Rajiv Gandhi would have made things difficult for the Express, had Shourie remained the editor. Shourie who refused to talk to the Indian press, did give an interview to Radio France International. He said he did not know the reasons behind his sack. It could have been family quarrels or pressure from the government. The Indian Express management may have taken objection to his exposing the hypocrisy of V.P. Singh, who met the BJP leaders constantly in 1989 and hid this fact from the public. In his typically arrogant manner he declared Rajiv Gandhi to be "illiterate" and accused V.P. Singh of playing Hindu against Muslim.

One may never agree with Arun Shourie but even his detractors would miss him. His departure from the Express yet again confirms that it is not the government which imposes restrictions on press freedom, but the newspaper managements.

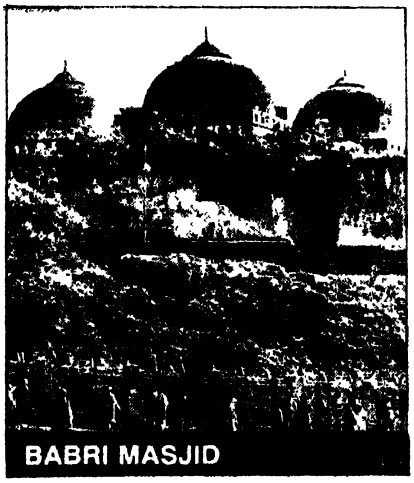
Misleading report

How did the Indian press, by and large, react to the recent happenings at Ayodhya? A symposium organised by the Bombay Union of Journalists felt that the media asked the 'right' questions on the Ram temple issue and handed out bouquets to the media.

Yet, there were quite a few disturbing trends. The national newspapers, which are supposed to be objective and propagate secularism, erred on a number of occasions. The Indian Express and The Times of India carried highly coloured reports. The Times headline mentioned pitched battles but the copy contained no mention of these.

Covering a provocative speech of the Shiv Sena boss Bal Thackeray on the Ram Janmabhoomi, the Times used the headline, "Demolish Mosque: Thackeray". A bit irresponsible, I felt. What is disturbing is the obvious sympathy and admiration for the kar sevaks from the accompanying scribes. The bias may not come through in so many words, but the tone of the reports clearly suggests a leaning towards the proponents of Hindutva. Those who are killed while trying to destroy a place of worship are referred to as martyrs. It's all a bit sad.

Vishwanath Sachdev, resident editor of Navbharat Times, Bombay, checked with his paper what the proposed headline was for the lead story from Ayodhya, filed by his man on the spot. "VHP's Dreams Come True", he was informed. Sachdev had the story killed. Not because he did not believe his correspondent, but because journalism had a larger responsibility to the cause of communal harmony. Journalism could do with some more Sachdevs!



We are still a nation in a flux and journalists should realise that even educated people tend to be communally aroused on reading inflammatory reports on sensitive issues. I certainly agree with the anguish felt by Jyoti Punwani of the Independent. According to her, the events of 30 October, only confirmed that India is a Hindu state. Why? Because only 11 people died when tens of thousands broke the law at Ayodhya? She points out that 11 persons died within 30 minutes in February 1989, when barely 1,500 Muslims took out a morcha in Bombay. Between 60 to 200 died in Srinagar in January when 20,000 Muslims, including women and children, defied curfew to protest against indiscriminating raids and house to house searches. May not be the right kind of logic, but the bitter truth cannot be evaded.

While appealing for the "Healing Touch", the Indian Express editorial mentioned "Greek tragedy", "Catch-22" situation, "Russian roulette" and a "Micawberish hoping for the best". Only the "Gang of Four" was missing!

The sanest voice was that of the Economic Times. "Meanwhile, the business of righting historical wrongs has clearly gone too far. This country has had a strife-torn history and been subjected to waves of invasion and conquest. If the Hindus want to demolish mosques which were built on temple sites, should Buddhists ask for the rebuilding of Nalanda university which the Hindus destroyed? History relates to what had happened. Should we let that determine the future in a destructive manner?

"The most dangerous development of them all is the majority community's adoption of a minority complex, the feeling that Hindus are second class citizens in their own country. This is arrant nonsense. By any economic, educational or social yardstick, the Hindus are better off than Muslims. No opportunities are denied to anyone on account of his being a Hindu. If anything, the complaint has been that there is not enough representation for Muslims in the executive, judiciary and police. In short, no one can claim with any degree of credibility that the seats of power—political, financial, or any other—are held by minorities which then seek to deny these to the majority community." •

BABRI MASJID

Some national newspapers have been biased on the Ram Janmabhoomi/Babri Masjid issue. The tone of the reports clearly suggests a leaning towards the proponents of Hindutva. Those who were killed on 30 October are referred to as martyrs. It's all a bit sad

Tough tackling

The IFA takes steps to impose discipline on the field

Violence on the field always increases in inverse proportion to the standard of play. This is a Calcutta Maidan truism, never more evident than in the season which has just concluded. And its effects are still continuing—both on the football field and the game's administrative front.

The three leading clubs of Calcutta, which were at one time considered invincible, are faring so poorly that defeat no longer rankles their die-hard supporters. Even as recently as in the DCM tournament, all three tasted defeat to relatively weaker sides in the initial rounds of the competition.

Trouble during the match between Mohammedan Sporting and East Bengal

But more important, all the three outfits have faced an unprecedented spate of disciplinary measures taken by the parent body in the state, the Indian Football Association (IFA). "There are several reasons for this," says Justice Ajit Sengupta, president of the IFA. "Maybe, the money that is being paid to the footballers—albeit as conveyance and other allowances—is going to their heads. Maybe, the urge to win trophies at all costs is another. But we, as the controlling body in the state, just can't sit and watch indiscipline mounting on the field. After all, as far as we are concerned, football is an amateur sport here and we must do everything to ensure that the game is played in the best spirit. Amateurs, after all, are supposed to play for the fun of playing."

But that is not how Mohun Bagan, East Bengal and Mohammedan Sporting view the situation. Their players and officials have been involved in ungentlemanly conduct on and off the field—leading to disciplinary measures being taken against some of them.

In a fracas during a Mohun Bagan-East Bengal match, several players were involved in a free-for-all. Some of them were fined and others suspended. It is a different matter that they were all let off before the stipulated period, after most of them paid their fines.

But the latest imbroglio threatens to disrupt the entire functioning of the game here. It all started with the walkout of the Mohammedan Sporting team during the IFA Shield final match against East Bengal. Claiming that the only goal of the match till then, scored by Kuljit Singh, was from an off-side position, the players stomped off the field at the bidding of some of the club officials. They did so after threatening and jostling with both the referee of the match and one of the linesmen.

The IFA took prompt action. The association suspended the club from taking part in any tournament till 31 December this year. It also issued show-cause notices to some players who had misbehaved with the supervisors of the game on the field. Going by precedent, it was a foregone conclusion that the players would be fined and suspended and, if they expressed sincere regret, they would perhaps be let off without actually being suspended.

But Mohammedan Sporting, after an initial plea for clemency, decided to go to court on the issue of suspension. As the matter became sub judice, the IFA could take no further action. In the meantime, the DCM authorities were eager to get Mohammedan Sporting to play in the tournament.

The club won a victory in court and immediately proceeded to Delhi and played their first match. Not only did they lose, they have also landed themselves in another controversy, the effects of which are likely to be far-reaching.

The IFA rules clearly state that any affiliated club wishing to take part in a competition outside the state would have to take written and prior permission from the association. Mohammedan Sporting, busy with the court case and then jubilant over the verdict, ignored this basic requirement.

The IFA played its cards well. It convened a meeting immediately on receipt of the court verdict to discuss disciplinary measures. But Mohammedan Sporting officials stated that they did not receive the letter. "Though we know they had" Justice Sengupta said. "But we preferred to give them another chance, so that we are not accused of acting in haste."

The IFA president was clear about the IFA's objective. "We are not here to punish people or institutions. But we do have to maintain discipline, because, otherwise, we cannot supervise the game properly.

By not taking permission from the IFA, Mohammedan Sporting have queered their own pitch. This amounts to gross indiscipline and one that will be difficult to explain away in any court of law. Not only is the act punishable by the IFA, the situation will get worse when the All India Football Federation (AIFF) is apprised of the matter.

Privately, some IFA officials admitted that the club could be banned from taking part in any tournament for a year or so. This will be an unfortunate blow to a club poised to celebrate its centenary through several competitions and seminars.

Of course, one such seminar took an ugly turn when the Mohammedan Sporting Centenary Celebration Committee chief, Kalimuddin Shams, accused the IFA of being blatantly communal and working against the club at every opportunity. While some invitees to the seminar walked out in protest as the former deputy speaker of the West Bengal Assembly launched his diatribe, almost everyone else condemned the statement made by Shams, at a seminar ostensibly convened to further communal harmony through sport. Several officials of Mohammedan Sporting Club also criticised the attitude and the utterances of the club official.

The IFA took offence to Kalimuddin Shams' reported assertion that the association was out to get Mohammedan Sporting because it was communal

The IFA has decided to take action against Kalimuddin Shams, who is a vice-president of the club. At a governing body meeting, the IFA decided to issue a show-cause notice to the club official, for saying that the association was "the illegitimate child of the BJP and the Vishwa Hindu Parishad". Simultaneously, the club will also be asked why it had taken no action against its office-bearer and member for this objectionable remark.

But all of this is having a demoralising effect on the club. Mohammedan Sporting, which has made notable contribution to sport in West Bengal and the country, is now faced with a suspension that could ruin the fruition of a hundred years of dedicated service to sport in general and football in particular. It would indeed be a cruel irony if the club found itself out of action at a time when it was about to celebrate a 100 years in sporting activity. •

Vikrant pioneers India's All Steel Radial Tyres for trucks and buses.

The radial tyre technology swept in a dynamic change in the West as early as 1948. It took a responsible manufacturer like Vikrant to bring this state-of-the-art tyre technology to trucks and buses in India.

Five years of extensive research and development went into it. So did technological inputs from Avon of UK. Today Vikrant's All Steel Radials are rolling out in ever increasing numbers. An achievement that puts Vikrant way ahead of other tyre manufacturers in the country today.

Vikrant All Steel Radial. A tyre to give greater mileage and save fuel. To reduce downtime and maintenance losses. A tyre to fight punctures every inch of the way.

ODDS AND TRENDS

Loss of Eden

■ The Mandela fever, which gripped Calcutta a few weeks ago, has left behind a casualty in its wake. The Eden Gardens was the best venue the state government could offer Dr Nelson Mandela to speak to the people of Calcutta. The Cricket Association of Bengal (CAB) does not usually let out the field for non-cricketing purposes, but to keep the government smiling, the CAB offered the ground for the 18 October meeting. And paid a big price for it.

According to a senior CAB executive committee member, the grass at the Club House end has been totally ruined. Four to five kgs of nails used for construction have already been removed from the ground, with possibilities of "God knows how many more", yet to be discovered.

In fact, the condition was so bad that the authorities had to consider a change of venue, for the Cooch Behar Trophy match between Bengal and Assam. It will come as no surprise then, if the CAB's welcome to a foreign dignitary in future stops short of an offer of the free use of Eden.

Cure for Thalassemia?

■ Four Indian doctors have developed a drug which, they claim, can cure thalassemia among children. Dr Harsh Priyadarshi of Allahabad claims that he, together with Dr A.K. Sarkar and Dr S. Kumar (both scientists at the National Physical laboratory, New Delhi) and Dr Gajendra Singh (biochemist at the Hamdard College of Pharmacy, New Delhi), have developed an "oral chelating drug" which could remove the presence of excessive iron deposits in the tissues of thalassemia patients.

The new drug extracts two mgs of iron per day as compared to .80 mgs in the case of "desferol therapy". Moreover, the new drug is safe and has no side-effects while "desferol therapy" is quite expensive and painful.

Rodents at war

■ East Kemang, a district in Arunachal Pradesh, is facing the same problem that the residents of Hamlyn town of Brunswick must have faced years ago. Thousands of rats have overrun the area damaging crops and even attacking the grains in stock. According to folklore, this sudden rise in the rodent population is a result of the flowering of bamboo which, the saying goes, is an ill omen foretelling famine. And if the destruction caused by the rats is anything to go by, the saying couldn't be closer to the truth.

The residents of east Kemang, however, have discovered a novel way of tackling the problem. No, they haven't found a Pied Piper to rid the town of rats. Instead they have begun fighting the menace by opting for rat-meat. What with the shortage of food stuffs in the state, this solution seems to be the best one.

Which Arif is it anyway?

All the time the Raja was making public noises about not conceding the fight to communal forces, he was engaged in attempts to set up secret meetings with the BJP. And the man deputed to conduct negotiations on behalf of the government was minister of state for home affairs, Subodh Kant Sahay.

Sahay, with some help from Javed Habib, member of the Babri Masjid Action Committee, and Arif Baig, BJP member, arranged for a meeting at A.B. Vajpayee's residence. The BJP leader consented at first, but then, cancelled it at the last moment. The ostensible reason: he was scheduled to go on tour.

Vajpayee asked his staff to inform all concerned that the meeting was off. Arif (Baig) was among the people who were to be called. Only Atal Behari's staff—to whom one Arif was much like the other—called Arif Mohammad Khan instead, to inform him that the meeting had been cancelled.

Considerably mystified by the message, Khan began investigating into the matter. And soon stumbled on the truth, which he then shared with some of his Cabinet colleagues.

Needless to add, the Raja found himself the butt of some very strident criticism at the next Cabinet meeting.

But, of course, he waffled his way out of that one as well.

Answer: Turkey.

hosted on the occasion of Haryana day. But the Prime Minister took care of that one. An invitation had been despatched to V.P. Singh for the dinner but everyone had presumed that—given the fact that both Chandra Shekhar and the Tau would be in attendance—the Raja would decline.

But VP is, obviously, made of sterner stuff. For no sooner had the party got started that the Raja made his appearance, much to the horror of the assembled dissidents.

Of course, no politics could be discussed after that. So while Chandra Shekhar and V.P. Singh exchanged pleasantries, a couple of female dancers were put on the task of entertaining the dignitaries. And they did just that in their most robust Harayanvi manner.

Who's who in the Chandra Shekhar camp

■ Yashwant Sinha: Preferred Chandra Shekhar to a ministerial berth in the Raja's council. Staged a walk-out at the swearing-in ceremony and has continued to do so at periodic intervals. Is in the forefront of the movement to win over party MPs to Chandra Shekhar's side and maintains that his leader will be Prime Minister. And never mind the number.

■ Harmohan Dhawan: His animus against the Raja is well-known. Was one of the first party leaders to come out openly against VP's leadership. Initiated the signature campaign against the Prime Minister and has been hard at getting all dissident members together ever since.

■ Kalyan Singh Kalvi: Has thrown in his lot with Shekhar and does all the ground work preparatory to winning MPs over. Has also been in touch with various Congress MPs on behalf of the Shekhar camp and is said to have been instrumental in getting Nathu Ram Mirdha to Chandra Shekhar's side.

■ Raj Mangal Pandey: Was one of the first members of the Jan Morcha but has since then been disillusioned by the Raja. Is intent on removing VP any which way and is currently conducting talks with the Devi Lal camp asking that it unite with Shekhar's brigade against the Prime Minister.

Of sons and fathers

It has been one embarrassment after another for Tamil Nadu chief minister Muthuvel Karunanidhi at the hands of his arch-rival, AIADMK general secretary Jayalalitha. The latest is the mammoth rally she had organised in Madras to unveil a statue of MGR. That rally clearly overshadowed the DMK rally in the Tamil Nadu capital taken out only a few days earlier.

But what hurt the DMK chief even more than this was the desertion from his camp of his own son Muthu who added insult to injury by even declaring loyalty to Jayalalitha. He would now devote his life to selflessly serving the lady and her AIADMK party, Muthu declared.

Muthu is Karunanidhi's son through his first wife, and has been a sort of a rebel in the household for a long time, especially after his father began promoting Stalin, his son through his second wife.

In the years long gone by, Karunanidhi had found Muthu useful for getting at MGR, who was then the DMK treasurer; by promoting him (Muthu) as a film hero in an attempt to dent MGR's popularity in cinema. That strategy had bombed and Muthu was one of the reasons then for MGR's estrangement from Karunanidhi. ●

Namaskar Rajivji!

Now that Rajiv's comeback bid seems to be paying off—with more than a little help from the Raja—the number of those paying attendance at his court is increasing every day.

Nevertheless, the presence of minister of state for defence, Raja Ramanna, at a function held at Teen Murti to give the Indira Gandhi award for national integration to M.S. Subbulakshmi, occasioned some surprise.

Raja Ramanna: aisle seats are best

Ramanna got himself an aisle seat, along the route Rajiv was to take to the dias. And when Gandhi made his way past him, the minister was quick to execute a namaskar with a sycophantic smile playing on his lips.

Gandhi returned the greeting, readily enough. But alas, didn't stop to exchange pleasantries.

In search of a constituency

Obviously, all those caste calculations that inspired the Raja to implement the Mandal Commission's recommendations haven't made Sharad Yadav and Ram Vilas Paswan too sanguine about their electoral chances. For, the latest is that the two ministers are busy looking around for alternative constituencies.

While Paswan was elected from Hajipur—with a Bhumihar, Rajput majority—Yadav won from Badaun, which has a sizeable Jat population. Since these communities haven't gained from the Mandal bonanza, the ministers feel that they may well lose their deposits if they contest these seats again.

Hence, the search for safer pastures, with some help from Bihar chief minister Laloo Prasad Yadav. Laloo has, apparently, found an alternative constituency in Saharsa, Bihar, with three lakh Yadav residents, for Sharad.

But Ram Vilas is still on the look-out. Any suggestions?

Ministers whose reputations have suffered the most

- P. Upendra: The single biggest disaster of this ministry. Every night, millions of viewers curse him when they see the distorted rubbish Doordarshan calls news. To make matters worse, Upendra has now taken to telling lies while briefing the press after JD meetings.

- Arif Mohammad Khan: It is not really his fault. Everyone concedes that Arif has been a good energy minister. The problem is that he was landed with the aviation ministry, forced to ground the A320s and then, not allowed to resign. He retaliated by ignoring the ministry and innocent passengers suffered.

- Inder Gujral: Sadly this celebrated India International Centre intellectual will be best remembered as the man Devi Lal dismissed as a wimp. Gujral's role in the foreign ministry will be best remembered by, "What? What did you say? What?"—his response to each crisis.

- Mufti Mohammad Sayeed: The invisible home minister. The ministry is run by Subodh Kant Sahay, who has the Prime Minister's confidence. Mufti is not a bad chap. He was just the wrong choice for the home ministry.

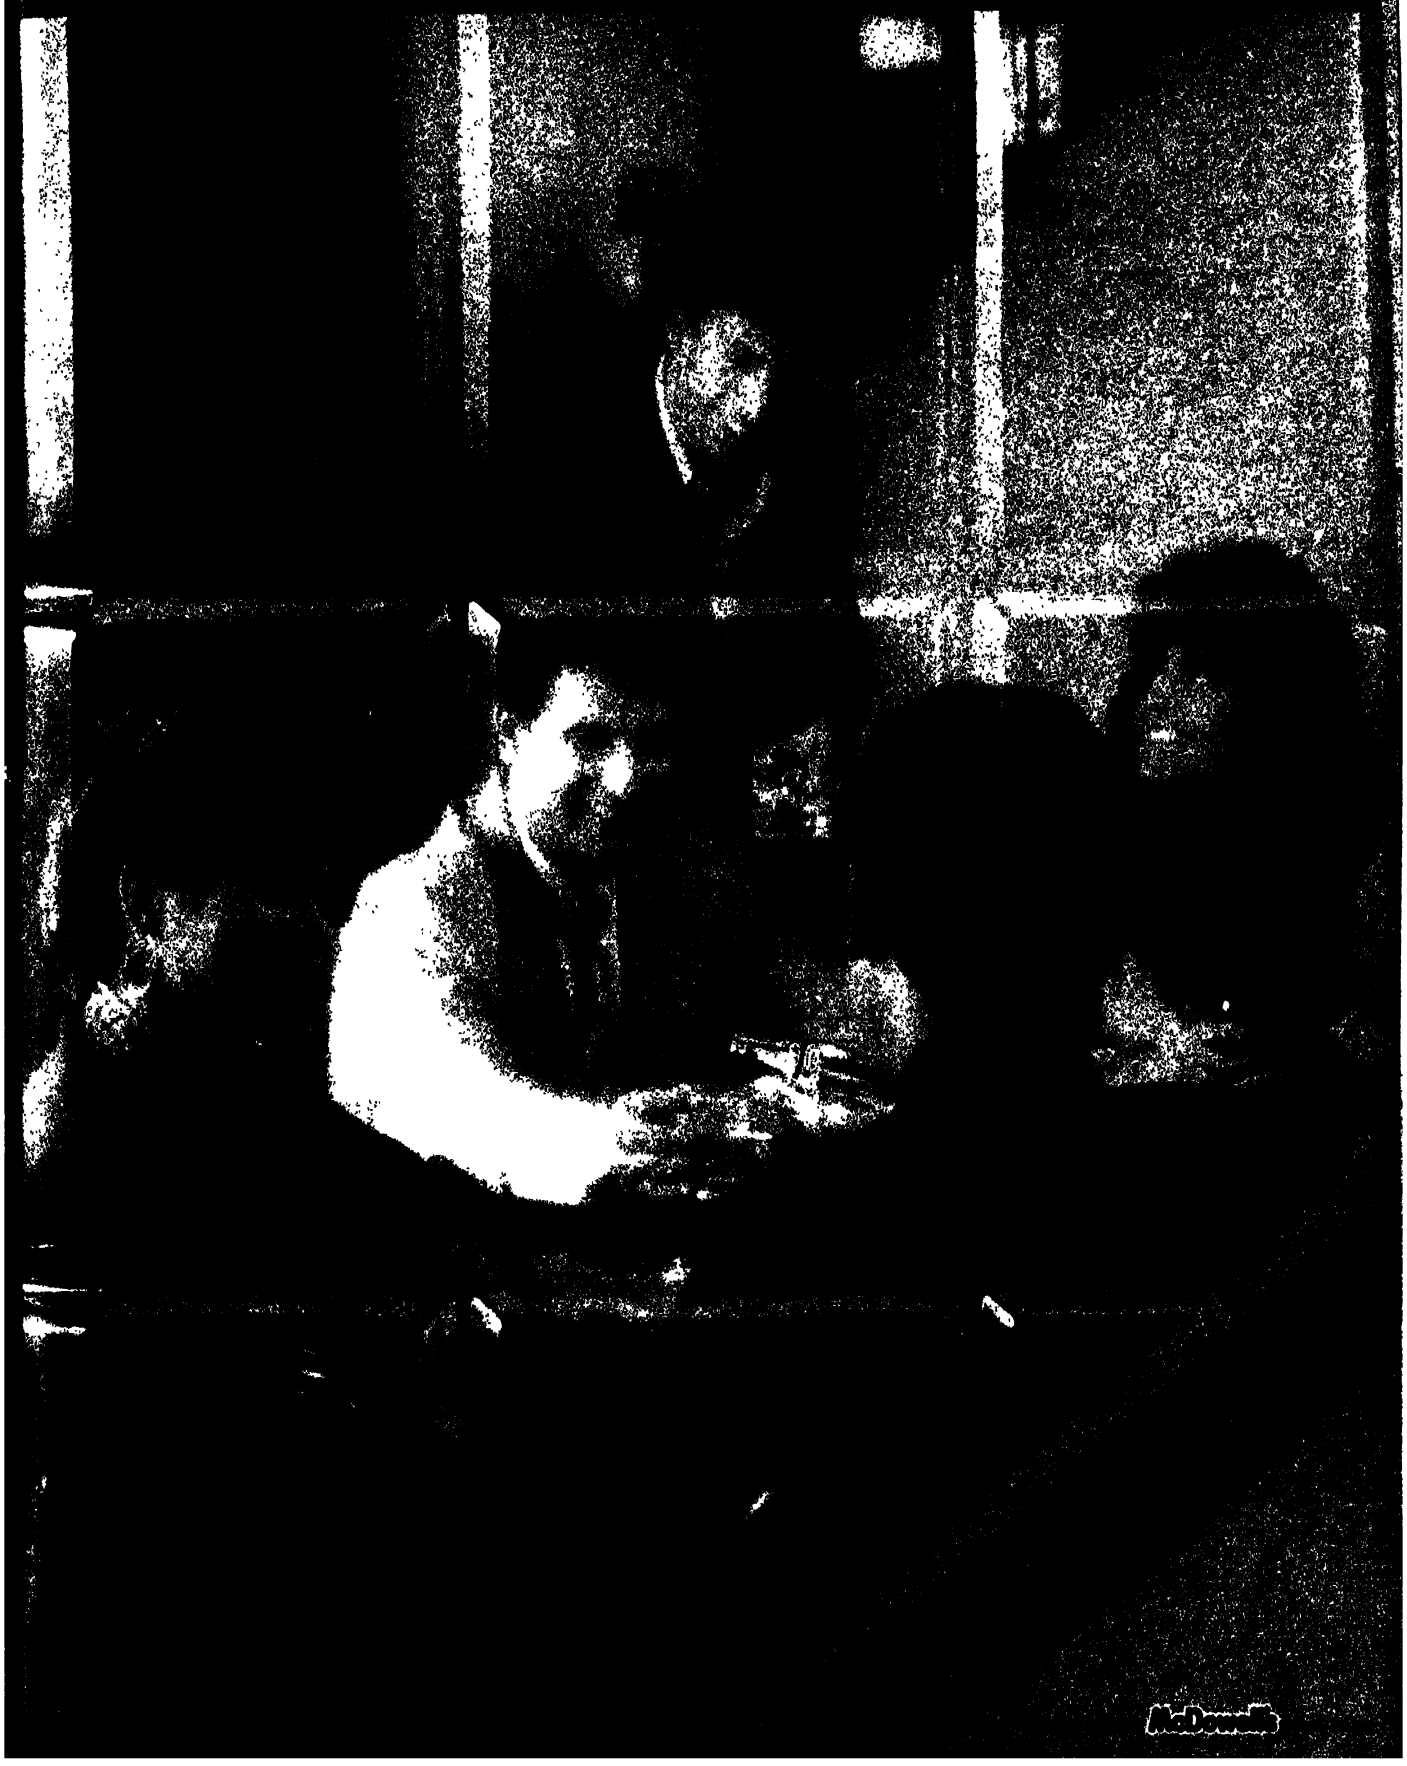
- George Fernandes: Remember him? What became of Dynamite George? Or even of the hero of Kashmir? Is this the man who spent the Emergency in jail—when the Raja was a minister?

- K.P. Unnikrishnan: In Opposition he proved to be a good parliamentarian, attacking the government on all issues of import. But as minister, he spent more time picking fights with Pitroda than getting the country's communication network going. Shifted out of that ministry, he maintained a low profile at surface transport, until the Indian refugees in the Gulf roughed him up to protest the unsatisfactory arrangements made by the Dal regime.

Changing sides

Those who live by intrigue, must in the end, die by intrigue. Around the time that the Janata Dal had been formed, the Raja had begun working on the loyalists belonging to other camps, with a view to winning them over to his side.

V.P. Singh had some success in this endeavour, with some liberal handing out of ministerial posts. He weaned away Subodh Kant



Ajay Singh: rallying the dissidents

Sahay and Bhakta Charan Das from Chandra Shekhar, Ajay Singh from Ajit Singh, among others.

But not for long. For, at the first sign of trouble the defectors began threatening to pull the same trick yet again. A meeting was held at Ajay Singh's residence, with Anil Shastri a surprise invitee. The decision arrived at after hours of discussion was that the Raja had to go.

The only debatable point was when and

The temple of doom

The cover story (Crunch!, 28 October—3 November) was thought-provoking. Going by the recent developments sparked off by L.K. Advani's rath yatra, he seems all set for a showdown. And the National Front government, sans BJP support, is in deep trouble

But what is unbelievable is the fact that for the first time in the history of Indian democracy, a government is being challenged on the basis of an irrelevant issue – the building of a temple. There are numerous Ram temples in Ayodhya. So, why this militant desire to build another one? And what's worse, in the din, issues of national importance— the implementation of the Mandal Commission recommendations, inflation, border disputes with neighbours and terrorism in Punjab, Kashmir and the north-east— have taken a backseat. What's more, the government is spending a neat sum on security for Ayodhya. All this for a crisis created by a group of politicians and some communal elements. It's time the secular-minded citizens of India put their foot down.

Nanda Dulal Roy Chowdhury, Kharagpur (West Bengal)

L.K. Advani: looking forward to a Ram Rajya?

Double-dealing

The author deserves praise for his article (The Hollow Man, 21—27 October) where he pointed out that V.P. Singh is crafty, deceitful and deals in chair-based politics. Under his leadership the country is teetering on the brink of a disaster.

Abbas Ali Mahdi, Lucknow (Uttar Pradesh)

V.P. Singh: the chameleon

■ The analysis was deep and penetrating, showing great insight into the character of V.P. Singh

A metamorphosis took place when V.P. Singh decided to opt for 'self-based' politics, best exemplified by his decision to implement the Mandal Commission Report without even consulting his Cabinet colleagues.

What the country needs now is a patriotic leader who can weave the vast tapestry of this great nation into a cohesive and prosperous unit. V.P. Singh is not that man.

Ramakuri James, Ootacamund (Karnataka)

Duty bound!

I invite your attention to the article, Cesspools (14—20 October). I am constrained to point out that the article contains factual inaccuracies with regard to the working of the customs at the Indira Gandhi International Airport, New Delhi, and has been written without checking the facts from concerned officials.

It is totally wrong to say that nearly all luggage of the incoming passengers are X-rayed by the customs. The factual position is that more than 90 per cent of the passengers pass through the Green Channel. It is pertinent to mention that the passengers themselves can opt for Green Channel if they have no dutiable articles. The luggage of a Green Channel passenger is subjected to X-ray check on a very selective basis in about 10 per cent cases and the process of X-raying baggage takes only a couple of minutes. The waiting period is about five minutes excepting in rare cases when several flights land within short intervals. And on numerous occasions it has been found that in spite of having substantial dutiable goods and contraband, passengers have deliberately chosen the Green Channel. Faced as we are with the problem of smuggling, the department is justified in exercising the option of checking the correctness of the declaration by the selective X-ray check. In fact, concealment of contraband like gold can only be detected through X-ray and majority of such cases have been detected through X-ray.

The article quotes only the version of the passengers who apparently had a grievance with regard to their clearance. I may mention that while we too hear occasional criticism from the passengers, we have also on numerous occasions received appreciation from the members of the public regarding speedy clearance of the passengers at the Delhi Airport.

I have been misquoted with regard to payment of rewards to the officers. All that I had stated was that, as the government has given good incentive by way of rewards, there is enthusiasm in the officers for detection of smuggling cases. That the officers are too harsh with the passengers is the writer's own conclusion.

Passengers awaiting baggage clearance

The two photographs of the Green Channel and the detained baggage room are also misleading. The detained baggage room is meant for keeping the goods at the passengers' own request pending payment of duty. There is nothing for the officers to gloat over this. Similarly, the photograph of the Green Channel shows the passengers in the Green Channel passage leading up to the exit gate. The passengers shown in the photographs are, in fact, in the process of moving to the exit gate and not waiting for their luggage to be X-rayed.

Shiraz Sidhva had talked to me some time back about the trends of revenue collection and the number of passengers cleared at the airport. However, the subjects of corruption and harassment of the public, both debatable issues, where we too have something to say, were not raised by her. She has, however, chosen to write about these matters without even ascertaining the department's views on these matters, which, to be fair, she should have done. At this stage, therefore, I can only say that the department attaches highest importance to any complaint of corruption or harassment. Action has been taken in all cases where complaints relating to these two issues have been found to be true.

A.K. Pande, collector, customs, New Delhi

Reply

1. We contest Pande's claims that firstly, only ten per cent of baggage is X-rayed. And that secondly, the process of X-raying the baggage takes five minutes. Both assertions are false. Scores of passengers complained about the tendency to X-ray at will. And the X-ray machine is so incompetently managed that delays of 20 minutes are not uncommon.
2. As for his assertion that customs officials receive more "appreciation" from the members of the public "than complaints", no rebuttal is necessary. Any passenger will be able to set him right.
3. We stand by Pande's quote. He said it. We quoted him.
4. The picture of the detained baggage room clearly shows pleased customs officers. If Pande thinks that there is nothing for them to gloat over, perhaps he should tell them that.

The Green Channel picture shows passengers queuing up for the Green Channel—supposedly a walk-through channel! Nowhere does it say that they are waiting for the X-ray. They are certainly not queuing up for the exit as Pande claims.

5. We accept Pande's assertion that his department is concerned about corruption at Delhi airport. But considering how bad things are—and his apparent inability to rebut any substantial point in the story—perhaps he should be even more concerned.

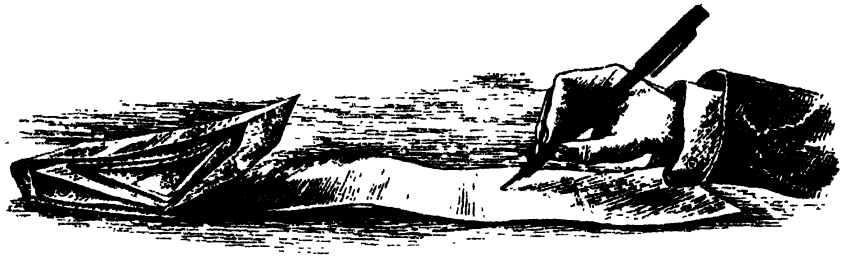
And now, the good news

This is with reference to the article, First, the bad news (28 October—3 November). While not going into the allegations against individual ministers, I am directed to make clear the position of the ministry of commerce on the issues raised.

The production of coffee depends upon the annual cycle and consequently, this year the production is low. Besides, the International Coffee Agreement is not working and the international coffee prices have also declined by about 40 per cent. Consequent upon this important international trend, the unit value realisation of coffee has gone down. Similarly, the current trends in East European countries and the USSR are beyond anybody's control. The rupee trade agreement with the USSR will continue till 1995 although the rupee agreements have to give place to trade in free foreign exchange in the East European countries. So the quotations attributed to the ministry of commerce in the article are not correct.

Tea tasting in progress

The tea situation is not so alarming as reported in the article. The tea exports are in fact going up in spite of the need to find a balance between exports and local consumption. Apart from taking various measures to increase the exports of tea, the ministry of commerce has also taken up the problem of law and order in Assam, in consultation with the ministry of home affairs of the Government of India and with the government of Assam.



The ministry of commerce has also helped the tea industry by withdrawing the condition of alternative auctions for local sale so that the exports could be boosted. This, in fact, helped the exporters. However, as stated above, the requirements for high local consumption has to be kept in view.

The minister of state for commerce had stated in a general way that the government will not object to anyone importing tea for value added exports.

In regard to rubber, although it is the admitted policy of the government to support farmers, the prices are determined after a cost study by the ministry of finance. In fact, this study is presently in progress and the price is yet to be announced.

The pepper prices are now looking up and we hope the trend will continue.

KHUSHWANT SINGH

A bard from Bangladesh

I don't know of any Bangladeshi poets writing in English who have found acceptance in English or American literary journals except Kaiser Haq, currently, associate professor of English at Dhaka University. Forty-year-old Haq is a product of Dhaka and Warwick University where he got his doctorate in English literature. After receiving a crash course with the Indian Army, he fought in the Bangladesh War of Liberation with the Mukti Bahini and received a commission as 2nd Lieutenant from the Bangladesh government in exile. He retains his military bearing with his upwards turned, greying moustache and a martial gait; the rest of him is a jovial litterateur writing articles and poems for a variety of journals including London Magazine, The Cambridge Review, Chapman (Glasgow) and Inter Arts (Edinburgh). He has edited a volume of Indian poetry published by the Ohio State University Press and translated poems of Shamsur Rahman into English.

The influence of Nissim Ezekiel, to whom he has dedicated one of his poems, is evident in his attempt to emulate Nissim's poems in Indian-English. His poem Welcome Tourist Sahib! has echoes of Ezekiel's Farewell to Usha:

When you come I go to airport
(International Wing) to receive you and conduct with welcome.
You are very Important Person,
VIP to me,
full of £ and/or $. I am BA pass in History, Economics, Philosophy and General English and Bengali are the compulsory of course.
Now I training for tourist guide.
I practise in front of mirror (I have good-looking face) what I say to you in English conversation.
I make vernacular conversation with local and interpret and translate, both ways.
I have ambition for writing tourist handbook and printing-publishing in Big Uncle's printing press;
I sell you with concession
If price payment is £ or $

Kaiser Haq's strength lies in controlled sentimentalism as on recalling the memory of a beloved uncle:

Chill as the sudden news had been the wind that marked your passing
Is back, bringing unknown birds
Of passage: a rush like a breathing Amplified. Then, again, the silence of memory.

Like Nissim Ezekiel, Kaiser Haq has a macabre sense of humour. This comes through in a short poem on a naked beggar:

Nanga pagla the sky-clad one
Terror and delight of children
Halts the traffic to announce his name
Is Badshah Akbar, Henry Ford, Aga
Khan.
Then marching to the department store
Stops before assistants can bar his way
And dismisses them with a laugh:
'From you I will buy nothing'.

What distinguishes Kaiser Haq from his Indian contemporaries is the essential Bangladeshiness of some of his poems. This is illustrated in his Peasant's Lament:

Kaiser Haq is a jovial litterateur writing articles and poems for a variety of journals including London Magazine, The Cambridge Review, Chapman and Inter Arts. He also has a macabre sense of humour similar to that of Nissim Ezekiel

Your name on granny's lips
mumbles
Put me to sleep
sang in my dreams
Allah
On hungry nights filled half the belly the other half cried for you, to you,
Allah
I stole a chicken and fled
Your wrath in nightmares
but no one found out and I thanked you
Allah
Five times a day your name cried from minarets scatters pigeons from the corn and people knock their heads proclaiming your greatness through grunts of anguish
Allah

There is nothing strait-laced about Kaiser Haq when it comes to Brotica: The snake-charmer charms more than her dancing snakes,
He wants them put away and a different dance to start, bends his fingers into a hook, large banknotes for bait

but she draws back giggling refusal, glinting eyes saying Look at mine, a stiff cobra in her hand.

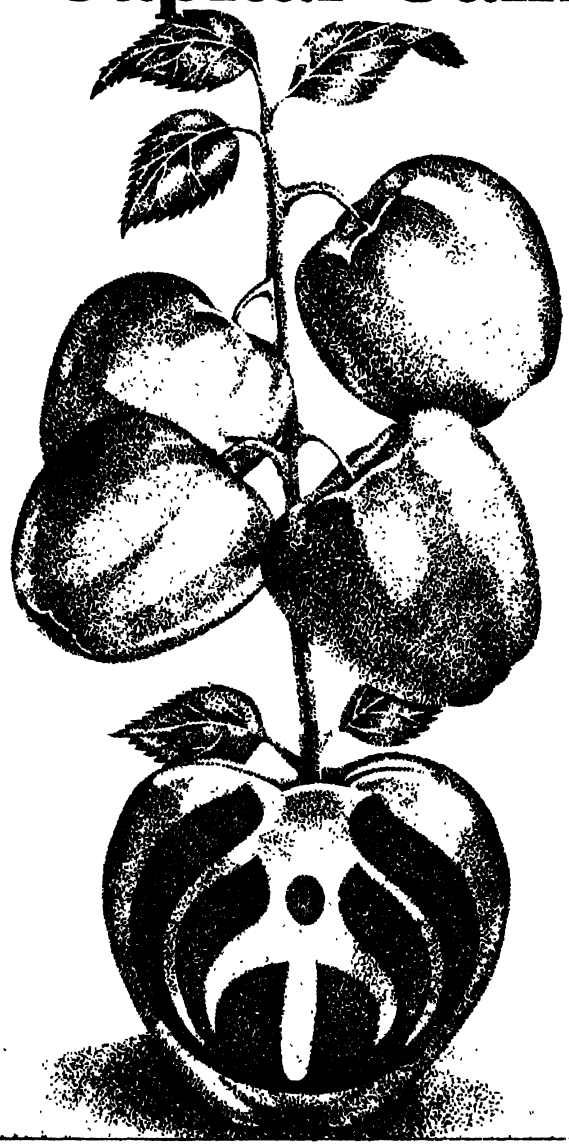
Two slender volumes of Kaiser Haq's poems, A Little Ado and Starting Lines, have been published in Dhaka. Although he has earned recognition abroad, he has yet to make his debut in Indian journals and publishing.



Heart of the matter

A pretty girl was looking at a large collection of greeting cards labelled, "For your sweetheart." She read each card carefully before rejecting it. Finally she settled on one which said simply, "Because I love only you."

She took the card to the shopkeeper and said, "Please give me a dozen of these."

VINOD MEHTA

Success, at last

For sheer doggedness, Chandra Shekhar deserves a try

Two days before the momentous vote in the Lok Sabha, Chandra Shekhar, jostled by cameramen journalists and acolytes, made a brief appearance on our TV screens. I forget whether he was coming out of Devi Lal's house or going to Rajiv's or on his way to one more late night cabal. His eyes were bloodshot, his hair dishevelled, his usually neat beard in urgent need of scissors and razor, his nerves quite clearly on edge. For a front runner, who for 10 years and more had single-mindedly pursued a single goal, a goal that was now almost within his grasp, his appearance seemed odd, even absurd. Is this what happens to men who make one deal too many in pursuit of an ambition from which there seems no release?

When he is pressed by unfriendly critics, Mr Chandra Shekhar snaps, "Yes, I want to be the Prime Minister. Is it a crime?" Vishwanath Pratap Singh mastered the ploy of donning the garb of the reluctant candidate, but we all know the tenacity with which he fought to protect his 'chair' once it was threatened. Mandal was going to reserve jobs for not only the backward classes, but for V.P. Singh and his select group. VP's hypocrisy notwithstanding, the impression persists that the MP from Ballia nurses an altogether different species of ambition, one that is relatively rare in Indian public life. Indira Gandhi nursed it, Charan Singh perhaps, but who else? Of course, Chandra Shekhar is unlikely to go so far as to impose another Emergency to stay put, yet a vast number of voters feel uncomfortable with the personality of the Prime Minister-in-waiting. He has been in the wilderness for too long, and disappointment piled upon disappointment tends to make people unpredictable and treacherous. If finally power does reach his grasp, will he go around the bend?

Since treachery is the natural business of those who run for high office, we shouldn't lose sleep on that count. Neither should Mr Chandra Shekhar's protracted and bitter quest for the ultimate prize cause concern. Indeed, his nearly 20 years of experience in politics at the grassroots and organisational level—he has never held a ministerial position— renders him in some ways unique. Chandra Shekhar cronies insist that their man understands 'power', both urban and rural, from the inside, and is therefore ideally placed to exploit it for the public weal. Amateur do-gooders, they emphasise, are no match for Chandra Shekhar's hard-headed understanding of politics as the art of the possible. Mental balance while holding office? Well, unlike the previous incumbent, no one has yet sued him for lunacy!

He comes with one additional advantage: Chandra Shekhar is no English speaking Devi Lal. He does not make judgements on people on the basis of their postal address—all this phoney India for the farmers rhetoric is alien to his temperament. He is bound to contain and possibly reverse the damage done by those who seek to divide India into antagonistic village-city categories. Neither is he a casteist.

For once Rajiv Gandhi is playing his cards with uncharacteristic cunning. Two objectives are being pursued. First: discredit the Janata Dal. Second: invite the JD leaders to get at each other's throats

I do not quarrel with the identikit portrait of the person currently moving heaven and earth to secure the prime ministership. We can even add a few details to the sketch—modern, progressive, internationally-minded (the last time I met him we had a spirited discussion on Saddam Hussein and US intentions in the Gulf), left-of-centre social democrat who, unmindful of the reverses socialism has suffered recently, had little hesitation in christening his breakaway faction, Janata Dal (Socialist). Perhaps Mr Chandra Shekhar's public posture on socialism is a trifle strident as is his hostility to big business and multinationals, but considering the fact that his unacknowledged benefactor is Dhirubhai Ambani, we shouldn't get too alarmed if he sometimes sounds like George Fernandes.

In short, India is getting no village rustic with half-baked pretensions to ushering in a just social order, but a genuine nationalist who is equally at home in Ballia and Bombay, Kathmandu and Khartoum, London and Los Angeles. He has the confidence of the Muslims because his commitment to secularism is known and tested; the

To be appointed Prime Minister is a great honour. But to be sustained in office by the Rajiv Gandhi-led Congress, which Chandra Shekhar swore to oppose, marks a new low for democracy

Sikhs admire him because he has been a most vocal critic of pandering to terrorists on one hand, and police excess on the other; the rural lobby respects him because he is perceived as pro-agriculture.

The perfect Prime Minister-in-waiting? A model others should emulate? Even habitual Chandra Shekhar baiters (this writer could conceivably be counted as one) will have to concede that on paper at least, the MP from Ballia has a lot going for him. This country could do worse—consider Arun Nehru, Devi Lal, Biju Patnaik as the alternatives—than settle for the leader of the Janata Dal (Socialist). Finally, here is a man who since 1977 has openly, insistently, and unashamedly been hustling for the prime ministership. For sheer doggedness he deserves a try. We should give him the job so that he can get it out of his system—and ours.

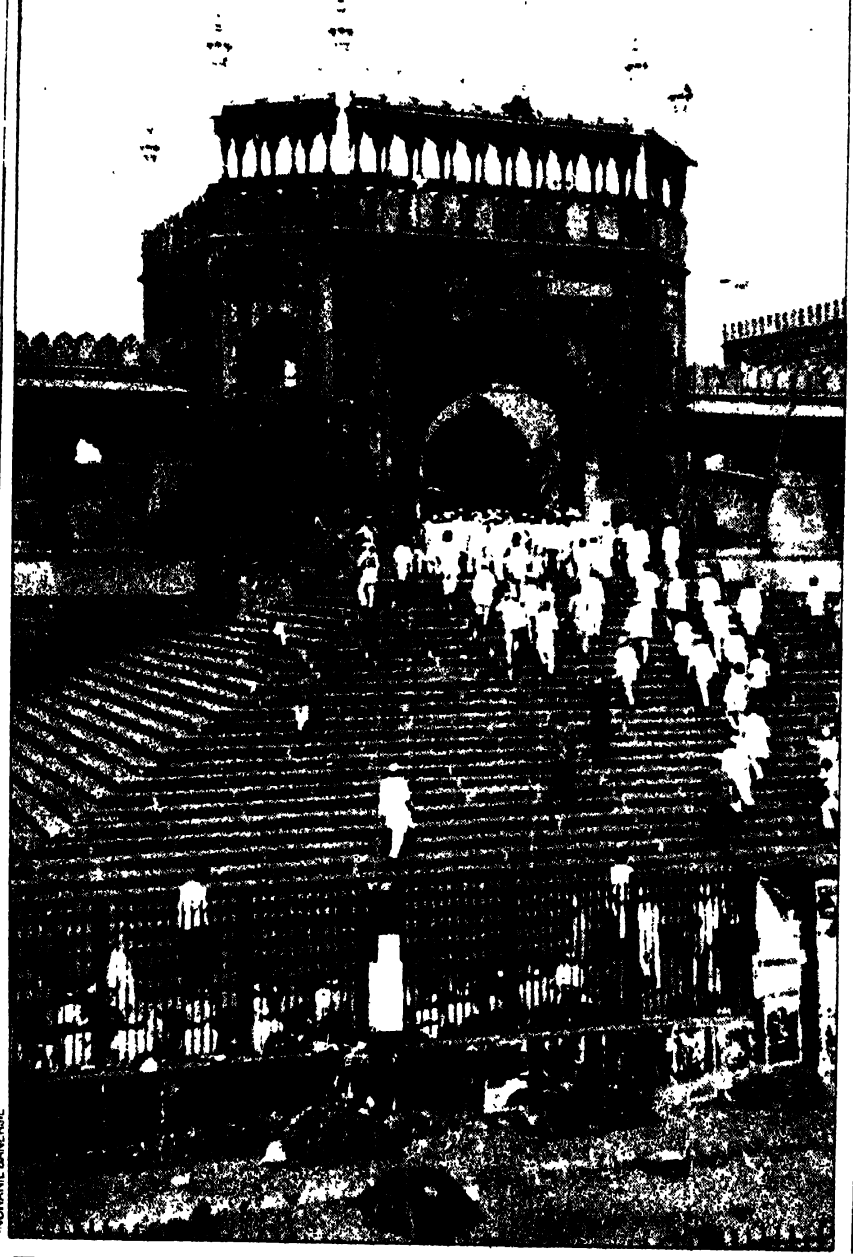
We could, but let us take cognisance of the attendant dangers. Even before the 1989 general elections, Chandra Shekhar had been marginalised. As Vishwanath Pratap Singh's hold on the Janata Dal tightened, as the formation of the National Front was finalised, Chandra Shekhar found himself increasingly isolated in the party as a result of his crude hostility to the unanimously accepted leader. The high command of the Janata Dal-led National Front left no one in doubt that it had only one candidate for the top job. The electorate was asked to vote for the Opposition on the understanding that if they could form a government it would be led by V.P. Singh.

Mr Chandra Shekhar did campaign for the party, but he did so without enthusiasm or conviction. He was clearly not one of the star campaigners—a fact that did not seem to bother the party since the dissident leader's vote-winning capacity was not held in high esteem. In the cow belt for instance, Ajit Singh and Devi Lal were more visible than the Old Turk who spent most of his time sulking and complaining about how he was being deliberately ignored. Thus, in north India, the Janata Dal's success had very little to do with the exertions of Chandra Shekhar. In many ways he was the forgotten man of the 1989 poll.

It is worth reminding ourselves that the last general election was fought on a single issue—Congress hatao, or more precisely Rajiv hatao. All 145 Janata Dal MPs were elected because Vishwanath Pratap Singh managed to dramatise and highlight the ineptitude and corruption of the Rajiv Gandhi-led Congress government. Even Mr Chandra Shekhar, who lost the 1984 election, won his seat in Ballia on an anti-Congress wave thrust into the electoral arena via the personality and the leadership of Vishwanath Pratap Singh.

ASHOK VAHIE

The last general election was fought on a single issue—Congress hatao. All 145 Janata Dal MPs, including Chandra Shekhar, were elected because V.P. Singh managed to highlight the corruption of the Congress government



With around 10 per cent of the total membership of the Power House backing him, Chandra Shekhar has staked his claim to form a government. It is for the President to decide whether such a claimant is deserving of an invitation, especially since 25 of the MPs making up the 10 per cent are officially 'unattached'. What moral and legal legitimacy a government thus constructed would enjoy is a matter that will surely exercise Mr Venkataraman's fine mind. That this motley 'independent' group would be sustained in office solely by the party, which individual members of this group swore to oppose in the 'people's court' less than a year ago and on which promise they got duly elected, marks a new low for democracy in this country. Even the always-fooled Indian electorate would find such a gigantic fraud hard to stomach.

For once Rajiv Gandhi is playing his cards with uncharacteristic cunning. Two objectives are being pursued. First: discredit the Janata Dal in the eyes of the voting public, something which to a large measure he has already achieved. Second: invite Janata Dal leaders to get at each other's throats so that the party is split into various factions. The Congress is well on its way to achieving this goal too with the help of Chandra Shekhar and friends.

To be appointed Prime Minister of India is a great honour. The victory is not merely a personal milestone, it is a unique opportunity to do things that have been left undone for four decades. There is no reason to doubt that Mr Chandra Shekhar is animated by such noble thoughts as he awaits the call from Rashtrapati Bhawan. But even someone possessed with so notoriously ferocious an ambition as his must pause and consider the means by which that ambition is being realised. If he succumbs to the bait dangled by Rajiv Gandhi, Chandra Shekhar's government will be a short-lived swindle. Alas, there seems no escaping it now. •

Groping in the dark

With the rise of Hindu fundamentalism, Muslims are a terrified and confused lot

©NORANIL BANERJEE

When BJP leader L.K. Advani drove his chariot through Old Delhi like a Hindu conqueror invading the bastion of the Muslims, almost everybody expected trouble. For, the ancient alleys of the old city are testimony to many a communal carnage. This part of the city is also soaked in faded memories of a once glorious Muslim empire. For many Muslims this is the last refuge. And the entry of the BJP chariot only further pushed a declining community to the wall. But oddly enough on that day, there was not the slightest reaction. There was no battle or blood on the streets.

"Not that there was no provocation," recalls Sayeedullah Khan, a young garment exporter, who was among the many hundreds watching Advani's procession inching through the old city. He says that minor scuffles had broken out and there was some stone throwing. More serious was the case of the vice Imam of the Fatehpuri Jama Masjid, Mohammad Muazzam, whose chest was pierced by History at times throws up frightening parallels. Forty four years ago, there was the Muslim League's Direct Action programme with the slogan: "Lad ke layenge Pakistan" (We will fight to get Pakistan). Today, we have the BJP and the Vishwa Hindu Parishad, saying, in so many words: "Lad ke layenge Ram Janmabhoomi" (We will fight to get Ram Janmabhoomi). In both cases, the net effect is communal hatred. And in both cases, the casualty is secularism.

The similarities do not end there. What Mohammad Ali Jinnah, founder of the Muslim League and ultimately of Pakistan, achieved in 1946, BJP president L.K. Advani, if given a chance, could well match in the coming months. Jinnah, it will be recalled, had called for Direct Action when his attempts to get a separate homeland for the subcontinent's Muslims was meeting little success in the face of Congress opposition. Jinnah claimed that the Muslim League spoke for every Muslim in undivided India. He claimed that the Hindus had [illegible] towards the Hindus and argued that Muslims should [illegible] given the right to [illegible] a trishul while he was being escorted home by two policemen Muazzam had to be hospitalised and news of his injury sent shock waves through the city.

Yet nothing happened. It was just another day of shuttered shops and garbage putrefying in the sun. The Muslims had retreated, overwhelmed by the fear of starting something they could not contain. Then there was the police. "For the first time we found the administration ready to crack down on anybody trying to take the law into their hands," says Mirza Farooqi, a shopkeeper of the Lal Kuan locality. Middle class residents, both Muslims and Hindus, of the area pointed out that communal violence, as in 1984, is always spearheaded by anti-socials who are more interested in looting than in hacking down religious opponents. "We have seen that if the administration is alert and strict, anti-socials do not dare go on the rampage," explains Shabbir Ahmad Falahi, a small businessman who also works for an Islamic trust that distributes scholarships to bright Muslim students.

The non-event of Advani's rath yatra through Old Delhi holds all the clues to the current thought processes of Indian Muslims. The BJP and its ally, the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP), are terrifying. Their arguments against the appeasement of minorities etc., while sounding perfectly rational to many Hindus, are seen as aimed at further stifling a community which is considered as the underdog of the nation.

The minority community leaders do not, however see any immediate way out of the political blind alley they are trapped in. If anything, today they are more confused than they were ever before. Rajiv Gandhi and his Congress(I) has long been discredited and conclusively rejected. V.P. Singh momentarily emerged as their champion but he bowed out prematurely. Mulayam Singh Yadav, the tough chief minister of Uttar Pradesh, still holds some promise. But his alliance with Chandra Shekhar is viewed with uncertainty. And Chandra Shekhar himself cannot be wholly trusted after his faction of the Janata Dal supported Rajasthan's BJP chief minister, Bhairon Singh Shekhawat.

A majority of Muslims admit that the past one year has witnessed a homeland, complete with their own government and laws.

Mahatma Gandhi did not agree. The Congress had several prominent Muslim leaders, including Maulana Azad and Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan, and refused to accept Jinnah's claim. Ultimately, faced with the prospect of political death, the Muslim League called for Direct Action. The decision to precipitate lawlessness soon turned into carnage. Communal violence flared up all over the country, leaving thousands dead. From then on, things would never be the same again in the subcontinent.

Advani's decision to flout judicial procedures and ride on his chariot to Ayodhya in support of militant actions bent on pulling down the Babri Masjid and building a [illegible] is motivated by a desire to create a political constituency. The BJP for the first time in independent India had secured a sizeable number (88) of seats in Parliament and felt that Vishwanath Pratap Singh by upholding secularism and implementing the Mandal Commission was undercutting their support base. The BJP had to get back in the game. It chose to be the champion of Ayodhya.

The result: countrywide communal violence and the reawakening of the feeling that Hindus and Muslims cannot co-exist.

The point is not that Advani wants a separate Hindu state, minus the Muslims. He knows it is not possible. Nor does he say that Muslims must be suppressed. But he too, like Jinnah before him, is floating his campaign on myths. The biggest of which is that Muslims in this country are being pandered to. The facts, as any sociologist knows, is that the Muslims of India are largely landless, illiterate, and steeped in grinding poverty. This is in utter contrast to what the community was during the British raj.

At one time, Muslims ruled this country and then became the favoured community under the British. Today, they are disappropriated. Babri Masjid is a symbol, in fact the last symbol of their past glory. Today, the BJP and the militant Muslims have made the Ayodhya structure a matter of communal prestige. Neither side can afford to back out. By saying that the issue can be settled forcibly, Advani is merely claiming that Hindus have more clout than the Muslims and the latter must recognise it. Jinnah drove a wedge between the two communities, and splintered the country. Advani's ultimate achievement could well be the same. For, 120 million people cannot permanently be pushed to the wall. Not even if the majority is composed of many more millions.

INDRANIL BANERJEE

Security outside Delhi's Jama Masjid: a threatened bastion great flux in their community's political attitudes. "Muslims at one time traditionally supported the Congress, which was a party that preached secularism," says Aftab Alam Khan of Bihar's Siwan district, who is currently doing his M Phil from Delhi University. "Today, even the most simple-minded Muslim does not consider the Congress(I) to be his saviour." The reasons, he says, are clear enough: the Babri Masjid locks were opened during the Congress(I) regime and subsequently the shilanyas was allowed during their tenure.

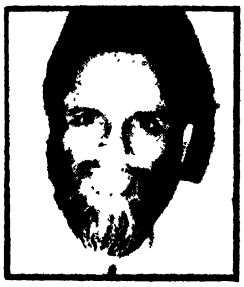
"Rajiv Gandhi and the Congress(I) cheated Muslims in the name of secularism," declares Shabbir Ahmad Falahi. "During their time,communal riots continued for days. The Congress(I) always spoke against communalism but secretly encouraged the communalists for political purposes." Syed Yusuf, the secretary of the powerful Jam a at-e-Islami Hind, a non-political organisation that has more clout in the community than any Imam in the country, adds: "Muslims no longer consider the Congress(I) to be secular ...and it's not just because of Babri Masjid and the shilanyas. The history of this country shows that successive Congress governments have not given very much to the Muslim community, they have not even been able to secure the safety of our lives and properties."

Vishwanath Pratap Singh, in dramatic contrast, had emerged as the undisputed champion of the Muslims for his decision to abide by the court verdict on the Babri Masjid-Ram Janmabhoomi controversy and treat anybody who refused to abide by the judicial process as common criminals. The stance and actions of Janata Dal chief ministers, especially UP's Mulayam Singh Yadav and Bihar's Laloo Prasad Yadav, strengthened the view that here at last was a government and a party that practised what it preached. For instance, Laloo Yadav's message that the administration would be pulled up if they failed to douse any communal conflagration and his conviction, publicly stated, that sustained communal violence was not possible if the state government did not want it, made enormous sense to the Muslims.



"Vishwanath Pratap Singh remains the most popular leader as far as the Muslims are concerned," asserts the Jamaat's Yusuf Syed. "We don't believe what Shourie wrote about V.P. Singh making a deal with the BJP, we only believe in his actions," adds Aftab Alam Khan. Many Congress(I) Muslim leaders also admit in private that Singh had won the hearts of Muslims for his stand on the Babri Masjid. Now, however, the break-up of the Janata Dal has compounded confusion. Muslims would in all probability have sided with the Singh faction had Mulyam Singh Yadav not gone over to Chandra Shekhar's camp. The tussle for Muslim votes in the Hindi belt will consequently be between Mulayam Singh and V.P. Singh.

"The Congress(I) will not benefit from the break-up of the Janata Dal as far as the Muslim vote is concerned," believes Shahid Imam, a Calcutta lawyer and a Youth Congress(I) member. For one, Chandra Shekhar's decision to break the Janata Dal at a moment of crisis is viewed as a blatantly opportunistic move. The overwhelming majority of Muslims interviewed felt that the party leadership was not the issue at this juncture. This was crisis time. "Perhaps it would have been wiser for Rajiv Gandhi to have supported V.P. Singh and proved to the electorate that for him the national crisis is more important than personal vendetta," says Imam. "Instead, we are once again viewed as opportunists cashing in on a crisis to destroy a political opponent."

But all the goodwill in the world cannot put together V.P. Singh's Janata Dal together again. And this is precisely where the Muslim support might just turn against him. For, Indian Muslims are not an ambitious community. They have modest and very fundamental aspirations, the most important of which relate to personal safety. A politically weakened V.P. Singh might not be able to ensure their safety any longer. Nothing will be the same for the Muslims after the BJP's rath yatra and the subsequent collapse of the government. It looks like a free for all and the Muslims do not quite know where their besieged alleyways lead to. •

Distant tremors

New political equations are being worked out in Assam following the change of guard in Delhi

The drama, the tension and the uncertainty in New Delhi has cast a shadow thousands of miles away. The ruling Asom Gana Parishad (AGP) in Assam, where Assembly elections are scheduled to be held in December, suddenly finds itself in an awkward position with the collapse of V.P. Singh's National Front government, of which the AGP is a constituent. The Opposition Congress(I), which was pressing for a spell of President's Rule before the polls—the party feared that the AGP might rig the elections—has changed tune and is now demanding elections on time. The AGP leaders, too, were so long undecided about whether to go to the people or not. But the changes in Delhi—after all, Chandra Shekhar will not be as friendly to the AGP as V.P. Singh—have spread panic among the rulers in Guwahati and they are eager to seek a fresh mandate from the people before the new government at the Centre settles down.

Apparently, the only political party which has gained substantially from V.P. Singh's fall is the Congress(I) Over the last five years, the party in Assam has suffered considerable erosion in its ranks and was all but wiped out from the state. Overnight, following the change of guard in Delhi and the re-emergence of Rajiv Gandhi as a key player in the power struggle, the state Congress(I) is back in action and crowds have begun thronging the palatial hosue of the Assam Pradesh Congress(I) Committee (APCC-I) president Hiteswar Saikia once again.

However, the party finds itself in an uncomfortable position because the two issues that have brought about the downfall of the National Front government—the Mandal report and the Ram Janmabhoomi dispute—which had been exploited by the Congress(I) to embarrass V.P. Singh as long as he was in power are both crucial for the party's survival in Assam. For, the Congress, chances of returning to power in the state are largely dependent on whether it can garner the support of the backward classes and the minorities. True, the backwards and the Muslims, who provided a solid base for the Congress in the Seventies under the leadership of Dev Kant Barooah and Sarat Chandra Sinha, no longer constitute a unified force, but they are nevertheless receptive to any policy that might threaten them.

Chief minister Prafulla Mahanta is a worried man. His party, the AGP, is in a tight spot following Rajiv Gandhi's re-emergence as a key player in New Delhi's power politics

No wonder then that Hiteswar Saikia has been carefully cultivating the backwards and the minorities with an eye to the elections. As many as 21 backward communities in the state have been agitating for scheduled tribe status and it is well known that the Congress is behind some of the movements. But Saikia's plans received a setback after V.P. Singh dropped the Mandal bombshell. Today, the backwards and minorities look upon Singh as their saviour. And Saikia has definite cause to worry beause the backwards and the minorities constitute almost half the state's electorate.

Saikia (left) with a delegation of the minorities: banking on their support

Not that the AGP is ignoring this crucial vote bank. Being a constituent of the National Front, which implemented the Mandal Commission Report, the party has a distinct advantage over its rivals as far as wooing the backwards are concerned. But what really worried chief minister Prafulla Mahanta and his colleagues are the minorities. Though V.P. Singh has taken a tough stand on Ram Janmabhoomi and the BJP, the electorate of Assam are yet to forget that the anti-foreigners agitation spearheaded by the All Assam Students Union (AASU)—the AGP is the political wing of the student's body—in the Seventies was in fact a movement led by the caste Hindus directed against immigrants from Bangladesh—mostly Muslims.

Moreover, the agitation was backed by such fundamentalist organisations as the Vishwa Hindu Parishad (VHP) and the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS). Realising that the AGP would not be able to go very far without the support of at least a section of the Muslims, Mahanta and his men have tried hard to shed its pro-Hindu image: during Advani's rath yatra, the AGP had come out strongly against the idea and the BJP. The ULFA's—the militant outfit is said to have links with the AGP—public denouncement of communal forces and warning them to keep away from Assam has only given strength to the AGP's stance. But despite such honest efforts, some of the mud obviously got stuck.

Osmani's faction of the UMF has been roped in by the LDA. This will undoubtedly give the alliance a solid minorities base

Political observers in the state feel that apart from the AGP, the Congress(I) has to contend with yet another formidable coalition in the forthcoming polls: the Left and Democratic Alliance (LDA) under the leadership of Sarat Chandra Sinha. The Osmani faction of the United Minorities Front (UMF) has already been accommodated in it to give the alliance a minorities base. And if the efforts to rope in the Karbis, the Bodos and other tribal organisations succeed, both the AGP and the Congress(I) could well be in for a shock.

There is, however, one problem for the LDA. Can some of the constituents of the alliance, especially parties like the Janata and the Congress(S) which form the National Front at the Centre, afford to oppose the AGP, which again is a NF ally? But if the mood in the LDF is anything to go by, both the Janata Dal and the Congress(S) are determined to take on the AGP, no matter what the consequences at the national level. And, now that the National Front is no longer in power at the Centre, both the parties can well afford to take such a militant stand.

The AGP, too, has other problems. According to reliable sources, a section of the party is in favour of striking an alliance with the Congress, however ridiculous that may sound. The argument of this group runs as follows: the AGP has done nothing worthwhile during its tenure and there are distinct signs that the people are disillusioned with the party. Moreover, the state government has failed to implement the Assam Accord—the one issue that catapulted the AGP to power five years back. This, despite the fact that a "friendly" National Front government was in power in New Delhi for the last one year. Thus, it would be disastrous for the party to face the electorate alone, especially since the LDF is already a formidable force to contend with.

Moderates within the AGP led by the chief minister are naturally opposed to such an idea. Whether the party will split on this issue is difficult to say at this juncture. Other combinations are also being worked out. The Opposition parties too are busy parleying and working out strategies.

Election fever has finally hit Assam.

The war within

The Indian Army is busy fighting its own people

In this column, being written at a time when the ramshackle V.P. Singh regime is crumbling fast, let me concentrate on one of its egregious follies on which there can be little scope for difference of opinion even in the present highly polarised atmosphere. I refer, of course, to the abominable practice of calling out the army, often without any justification, to the aid of civil authority to quell very emotive political conflicts on the streets.

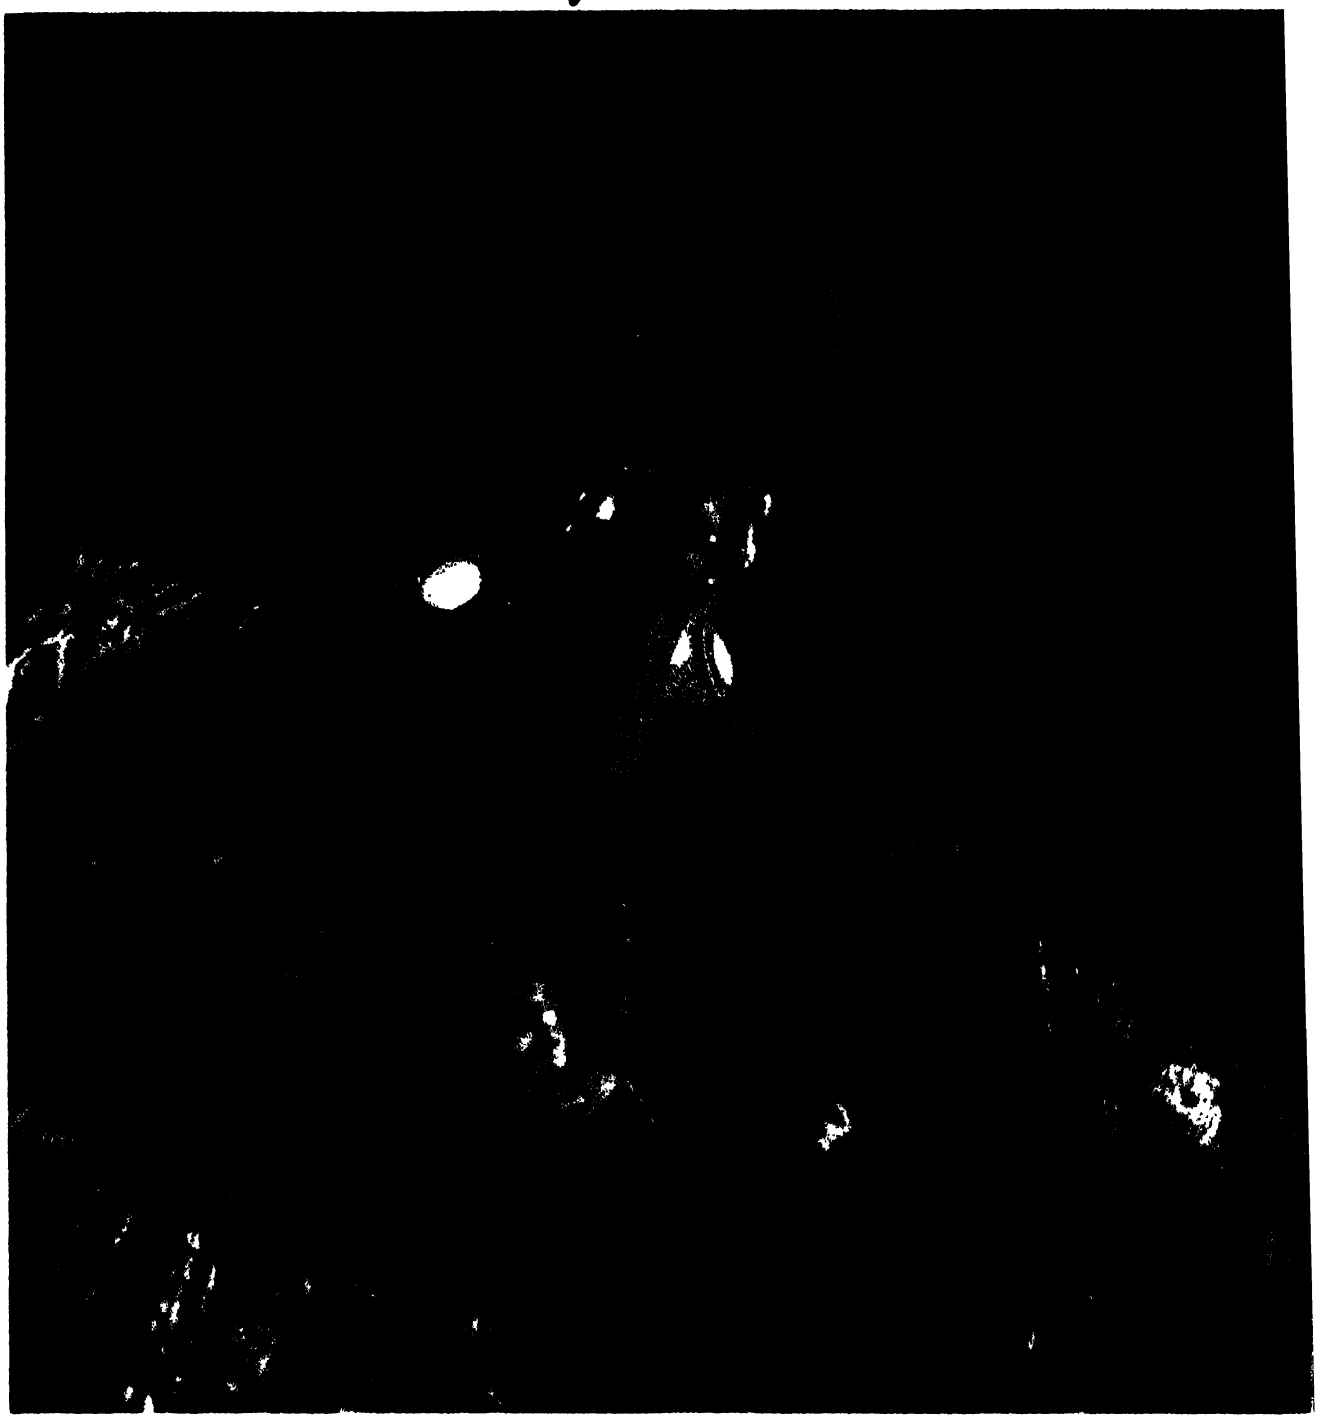
Regrettably, the malaise is not new. It has afflicted the body politic practically since Independence though, over the years, its frequency has seen ups and downs. During the Raja of Manda's eleven-month reign, however, especially since his cynical decision to Mandalise India, the disease has turned into a raging scourge.

This is sad and surprising. For, VP—despite all his faults, some of them wholly unsuspected until his rise to the top—is a sensible man, no less patriotic than any of his contemporaries. Moreover, he is an experienced administrator, having been, successively, chief minister of UP and Union minister for commerce, finance and defence in his previous incarnation as a "loyal" Congressman. Since becoming Prime Minister, he had retained the defence portfolio. He was therefore better aware than most people of the pitfalls of casually dragging the armed forces into civil strife with dangerously political overtones. And yet he has recklessly gone on doing so.

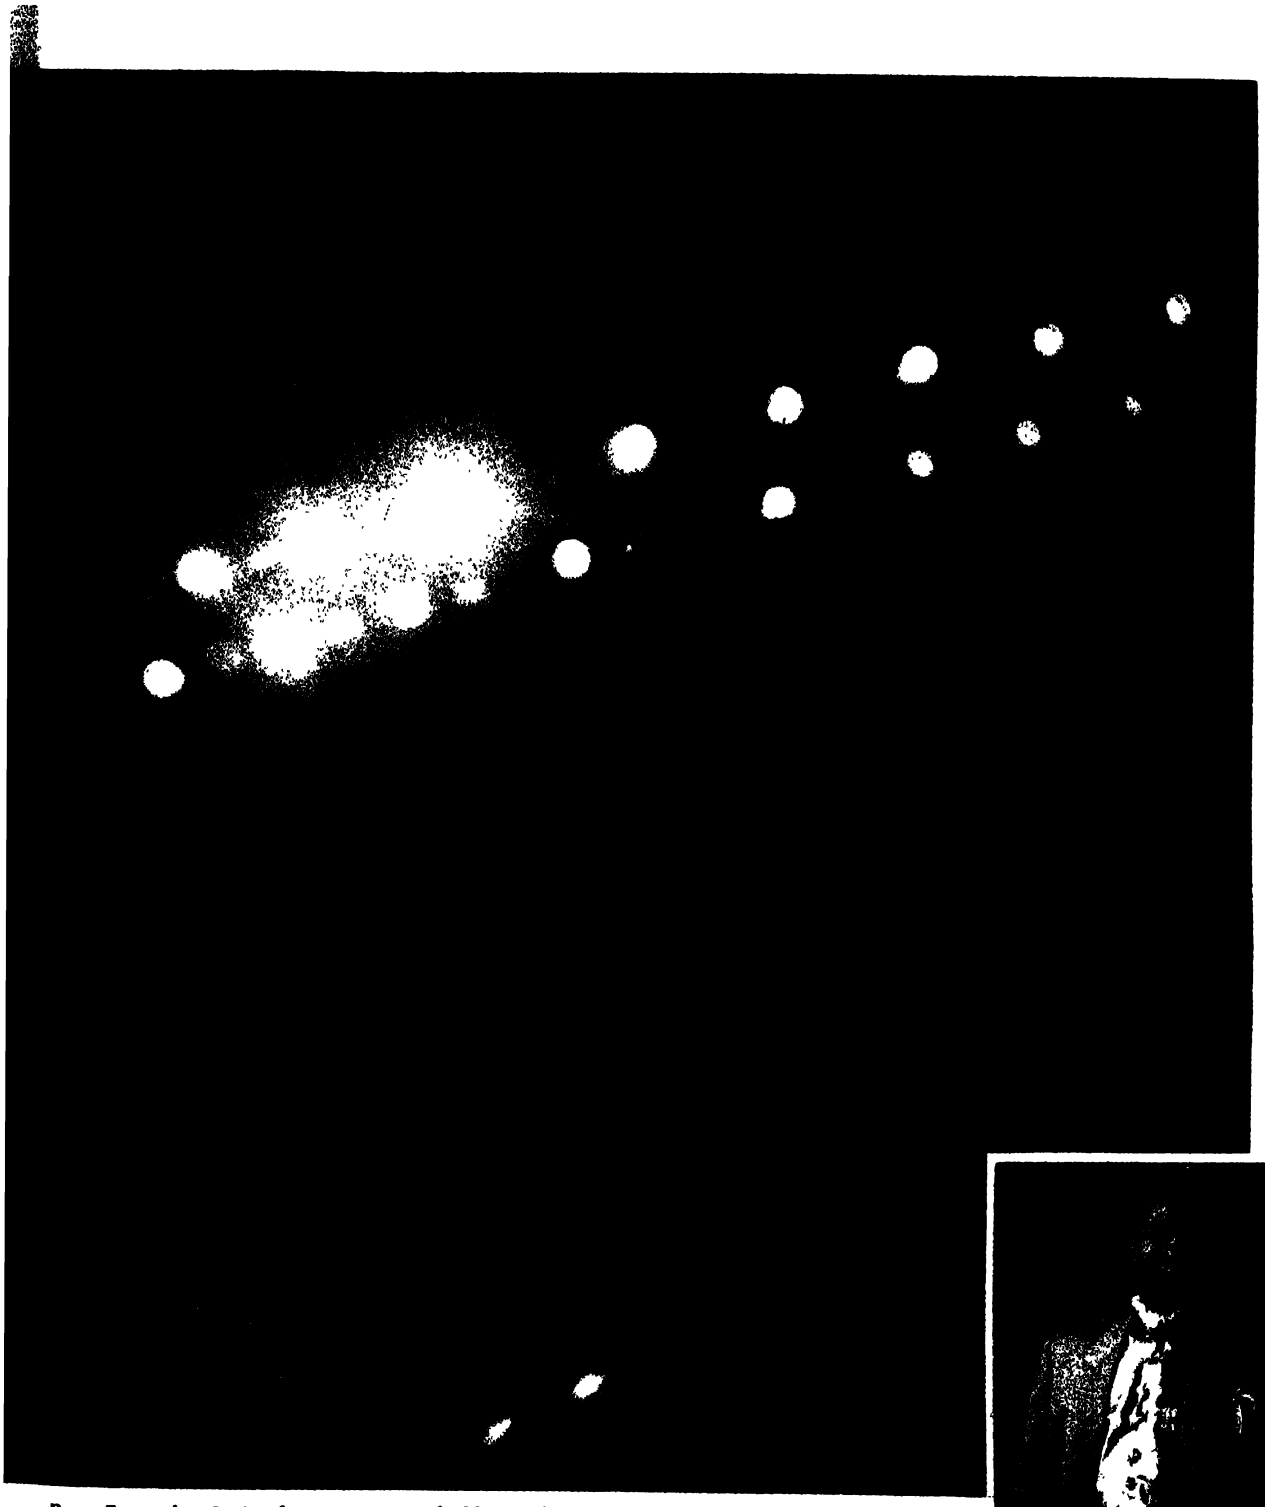
Let the facts speak for themselves. 1988 was not too bad a year as far as the calling out of the army, for tasks which ought to be none of its business, was concerned. There was a bad patch in Gujarat where the armed constabulary went on "strike" and an infantry division and two independent brigades of the army were needed to tame it. For the rest, there were only four cases of the troops being called out to do the policing job—for a day each at New Delhi and Chandigarh, for nine days at Ahmedabad and for a fortnight at Muzaffarnagar in UP. During the subsequent year, 1989, which was also the election year, the Rajiv government's record in this respect was appalling.

Before both the year and the Rajiv regime ended, the army was out at Bhagalpur, Samastipur and Sitamarhi in Bihar, putting down horrendous communal carnage, for more than two months. Earlier, large army contingents had to be deployed for full five months in, of all places, Leh which is usually an oasis of peace. The Bodo upsurge in Assam necessitated the commitment of the army at a fairly large scale in Assam.

With the formation of the Janata Dal government, amidst enormous goodwill and much rejoicing, it was expected that the myriad conflicts would finally subside and that the country might settle down to something approximating civilised rule. The subsequent story turned out, alas, to be precisely the opposite. On the morrow of the new Cabinet's formation, Kashmir blew up. Mufti Mohammad Sayeed's daughter was kidnapped and the army's long-term and somewhat unfortunate involvement in the Valley began.



And then came the obscenity of Meham where the Haryana police was ordered to abdicate and the army was asked to move in. It did so also at Abohar. Communal riots at Jamshedpur in Bihar and Ahmedabad and Baroda also set into motion the govenent's Pavlovian reflex. Since then, especially after the Mandalisaion of India, all hell has broken loose. Fourteen columns of armymen were called out in Haryana alone and were engaged for 19 days running. The story was equally dismal in Himachal Pradesh, Jammu, Chandigarh and Jaipur. As the mandir tussle overtook the Mandal question, the situation become infinitely worse.



Much worse than the shocking frequency of this outrage were the utterly strange circumstances in which the troops were asked to be out. Under the law of the land, the calling out of the army is absolutely the last resort. Under the Raja it became the first option To give only one representative instance, at the height of the anti-Mandal agitation at Sonepat in Haryana, 200 buses and a train were burnt in the course of one day. The Haryana armed police did not fire a single shot. The army was called out. Is it too much to hope that whoever succeeds V.P. would set a better example? ●

Who's that man?

Introducing the ubiquitous Jagdeep Dhankhar

How does one best describe Jagdeep Dhankhar? The man himself has his answers ready. He was—till V.P. Singh submitted the resignation of his government—deputy minister of parliamentary affairs. (By the time you read this, he'll probably have got an even more grandiose title in the new dispensation.) Until he was elected to the Rajya Sabha last year, he was one of the most sought-after advocates in the High Court in Jaipur. And, as he is not too modest to remind us, even in the Supreme Court, he had a higher ranking than such key luminaries of the Express lobby as former additional solicitor general Arun Jaitley.

All of this is true. No doubt, Dhankhar was a senior advocate, is a legal wizard and performed impressively as a minister in the last government. But sadly, these descriptions fail to capture the essence of the man.

To every newspaper reader in India; Dhankhar is something more than this.

Simply put, he is the man who always cranes his neck into the frame in every picture of Devi Lal.

Does the name now ring a bell? Has the face suddenly begun to seem familiar? Remember when the Tau first threatened to resign over Meham? Who do you suppose it was who appeared in every photo standing loyally beside the towering frame of his leader?

Or the time Arun Nehru and party resigned over Chautala's reinduction and the deputy prime minister came under terrible pressure? Who was it who loyally sent in his resignation on Tauji's behalf and then grinned into the camera each time Devi Lal glowered at assembled photographers?

Now, Dhankhar has found a new role. Check out recent pictures of Chandra Shekhar. There, in the corner, pushing his way across the throng of supporters is a familiar figure dressed in white. Could it be...?

You've guessed it.

It's Dhankhar again.

TO BE fair, Dhankhar is not some pushy groupie who gets his jollies being photographed with the famous and the mighty. The reason he always turns up in pictures of Devi Lal is that the Tau depends on him to an extraordinary degree.

What makes Dhankhar so indispensable to the Tau? The simple explanation is that he is the only sophisticated, English-speaking member of that camp. Whereas the rest of Devi Lal's supporters are sons of the soil who are happier stuffing ballot boxes than making speeches in Parliament, Dhankhar's legal background makes him the Henry Kissinger of the Tau's group.

Thus, each time Devi Lal wants to know how the media will react to his latest outrage, it is Dhankhar he sends for. If there are statements to be drafted, letters to be rendered from Haryanvi to English (or even Hindi), the call goes out for Dhankhar. (But Dhankhar did not write the famous letter that got Devi Lal fired from the Cabinet. The Tau did that pretty much on his own with a little help from a friend in the media.)

Moreover, Dhankhar's accommodating personality makes him the ideal go-between. Whereas Devi Lal is likely to insult those he wishes to win over (and Chautala is liable to assault them to ensure that they see things his way), Dhankhar knows how to put his case across.

It helps too that he is on good terms with most political leaders. He is friendly with Chandra Shekhar and has cordial relations with Ajit Singh.

But his most interesting friendship is with Rajiv Gandhi. Most members of Dhankhar's family are staunch Congressmen: his older brother Randeep is a senior leader of the Rajasthan Congress. Consequently, Jagdeep has never regarded Rajiv as an enemy or a political untouchable.

A few months ago, Dhankhar met Gandhi in Parliament's Central Hall and they sat and chatted amiably for three quarters of an hour. The Raja, who was passing by, noticed this tête-à-tête and grew quite alarmed.

The next day, some of V.P. Singh's close associates approached Dhankhar. Why, they demanded, was he consorting with the enemy? Why not? he responded. Besides, he did not see Opposition politicians as enemies. And moreover, surely it was his job as deputy minister of parliamentary affairs to keep in touch with MPs from all parties?

The Raja let the matter drop.

THOUGH NOBODY has noticed this, Dhankhar was the real success story of the V.P. Singh government. He only joined politics a year and a half ago and contested the elections for the first time in 1989. To everyone's surprise, he was elected to the Lok Sabha from Jhunjhunu after securing the highest number of votes cast in Rajasthan during the polls.

The Tau was so impressed by Dhankhar during the first few months of the government that he insisted that V.P. Singh include him in the ministry. And so, despite being a first-term MP and political novice, Dhankhar became a deputy minister.

Then, he was fortunate that as the deputy prime minister fought his battles, he came to rely more and more on Dhankhar, giving the former lawyer a ringside view of politics at the highest level.

While the Tau is notoriously fickle about his favourites, Dhankhar does appear to have it made. He is a Jat, comes from a rural background and understands the concerns of his natural constituency. Add to this his legal acumen and sophistication and you get an unusual combination—one that should stand Dhankhar in good stead in the years to come.

Perhaps one day, he will be the centre of attention for photographers and others will crane their necks to get into the same frame as him . ●

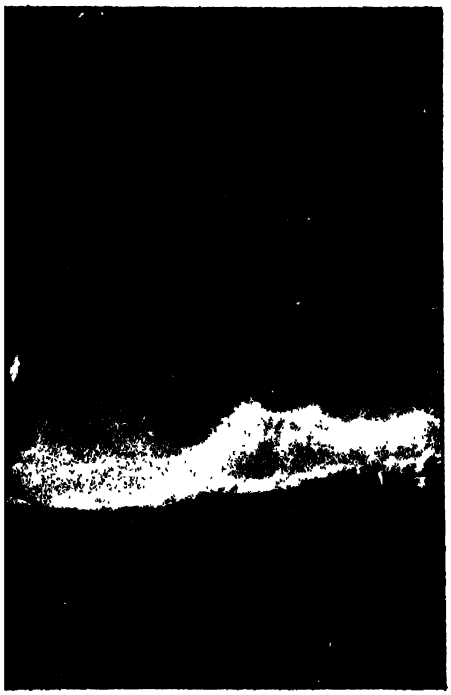
In deep waters



The Indian Navy could be in for a shock in the event of an Indo-Pak conflict

In the December 1971 war, just four tiny Indian patrol craft had succeeded in blockading virtually the entire Pakistani Navy in Karachi harbour. The Indian boats armed with Soviet-made Styx missiles had surreptitiously crept into Pakistani waters, sank two ships—one destroyer and a merchantman—and set the Karachi oil terminal ablaze. The Pakistani Navy had no idea of what had hit them and for the remaining period of the war did not even venture out of port.

Nineteen years later a lot has changed. The Pakistanis have acquired modern ships and weapons system, while the Indian Navy, in quantitative terms, has grown into one of the most powerful sea forces of the region. India today possesses a formidable fleet of 140-odd vessels including two aircraft carriers, 17 submarines (including a nuclear-powered SSKN) and two dozen sophisticated frigates. The country also operates a mix of 168 aircraft which include Sea Harriers, shore-based Jaguars and helicopters fitted with anti-ship missiles. The Pakistani Navy, in contrast, has just 76 vessels and 30-odd aircraft, including a squadron of shore-based Mirage-5PAs.

This remarkable growth of the two sea power is, however, not significant in itself. The really astounding part is that the Indian Navy, despite its growing size, has lost its one-time edge over its Pakistani counterpart. In the event of war, the Indian Navy is unlikely to come anywhere near Karachi, let alone blockade it. And if it does attempt to control the seas around the Pakistani coast, it could prove to be a highly expensive exercise. The Pakistani Navy, on the other hand, might lack an offensive capability but it is extremely capable of keeping the powerful Indian fleet at bay. In naval parlance, while Pakistan is incapable of controlling the adjoining seas, it is nonetheless quite capable of denying use of the sea to the Indian Navy.

The emergence of this remarkable naval scenario is directly related to technological developments and the choices made by Pakistani naval planners. The Pakistanis had long realised that they cold not compete with India in the race for acquiring expensive, modern warships. India not only had more money but it also had the added advantage of having built up an indigenous naval industry. To counter this, the Pakistanis appear to have opted for a small but highly effective navy, equipped with accurate and highly sophisticated weapons systems. The aim of such a modern, compact sea force would be to prevent the blockade of its only major port, Karachi, by inflicting unacceptable losses on an intruding enemy naval force. International naval analysts, while publicly decrying India's attempts to create a Blue Water Navy, privately admit that the Indian Navy cannot bludgeon its Pakistani counterpart to submission without paying an inordinately high price for such an attempt.

Pakistan's naval planners have been able to accomplish their aims chiefly because of the availability of two modern missile systems: the American Harpoon and the French Excocet. Both missiles have been proven in combat and are unique in their class. The Excocets with the Pakistanis are air launched versions capable of striking targets up to a range of about 50 km. The 150-km range Harpoons can be launched from surface ships, submarines and even from aircraft. Both missiles are highly accurate and Indian Navy ships have no weapons systems capable of intercepting them once they have been launched. Anti-ship missiles like the Harpoon and the Excocet can only be stopped by a very fast reaction anti-missile missile (AMM) or by close-in-weapons-systems (CIWS) like the American Phalanx fitted on Pakistani frigates. Indian Navy planners, strangely enough, have not inducted any anti-missile systems for their warships.

The most effective use of Excocets is likely to be made by the Pakistani Air Force Mirage-5PAs based in Karachi and used exclusively for maritime attack purposes. Each of the 12 Karachi-based Mirages is capable of carrying one Excocet missile (and one external fuel tank) upto 500 miles into the high seas. Skimming just above the waves, the Mirages can approach their targets without being detected by ship radar. Even high flying maritime surveillance aircraft would not be able to spot the low flying Pakistani planes without look-down radar. This means that an Indian naval force can approach within 500 miles of Karachi only at great peril. Moreover, it would be highly risky for the Indian Navy's principal warships, the medium carriers Vikrant and Viraat, to approach the Karachi waters till the point from where the short-range Sea Harriers could be deployed.

Equally dangerous to Indian Navy ships would be the six Pakistani submarines equipped to launch Harpoons from under the sea surface. The Harpoon is designed to fly along a complex course while on its way to the target and, consequently, even if the missile is spotted it is impossible to determine the direction or the place from where it was launched. Moreover, it is impossible to detect a quiet, electric-powered submarine more than a hundred kilometres away. On the other hand, Indian warships are likely to be spotted much more easily and would consequently be easy targets for the Harpoon-laden Pakistani subs.

On the flip side, it would be extremely difficult for Pakistani submarines to detect and monitor moving targets more than a 100 km away. In practice, these subs would require the support of maritime surveillance aircraft, surface ships or satellite data for target information. This might not be possible, but at a closer range a submarine waiting silently below the surface could easily pick up the sounds of passing surface ships, get a fix on its coordinates and launch the Harpoon. The operation of Pakistani attack subs could be thwarted by heavy underwater, surface and air surveillance. But the moot point is that the advantage would nevertheless lie with the Pakistanis.

The United States has also agreed to transfer three P-3C Orion Maritime aircraft to the Pakistani Navy during the current financial year. These state-of-the-art aircraft carry advanced radar that can scan the sea for miles in front of it and launch Harpoon missiles. The four long-range French Atlantiques with the Pakistani Navy can similarly detect enemy ships and launch Excocet missiles. These aircraft, submarines and the squadrons of Chinese-made fast attack craft equipped with Styx-type missiles, if used in conjunction would constitute a formidable defence against any Indian naval attack on Karachi.

Most Western defence analysts have tended to make too much of India's acquisition of the Soviet nuclear submarine, renamed INS Chakra. The analysts have claimed that the acquisition of this submarine gives an unfair advantage to the Indian Navy. Nothing could be further from the truth. For, reports suggesting that the submarine is equipped with the 64-km range SS-N-7 Soviet missiles are incorrect. As a matter of fact, the lease agreement between the Indian and the Soviet government clearly stipulates that the nuclear-powered submarine is meant solely for training purposes and is not to be used in the event of hostilities. Moreover, the Soviets have not supplied any missiles with it.

In fact, none of the Indian Navy's 17 submarines are equipped with missile systems. They do, however, have a variety of advanced torpedoes. But the average effective range of torpedoes is about 15 km, which means that Indian subs will have to come very close to Karachi harbour to sink ships and render the port ineffective. Till very recently, the biggest chink in the Pakistani Navy's armour was the absence of sufficient numbers of anti-submarine frigates. The only ones the Pakistanis had were 6 obsolete Gearing class frigates constructed in the 1940s and equipped with 1960s electronics. Every attempt to acquire more frigates came up against one constraint: funds.

The British offered the Pakistani Navy three of their latest Type 23 frigates with a 1.5 billion dollar price tag. Turkey offered their frigates, so did the West Germans and the Chinese. But the ships were either too expensive or they were unsuitable. The Pakistani Navy got its big break when the US secretary of the Navy decided to abandon the grand American plan for a 600-ship navy and decided to get rid of all its Brooke and Garcia class frigates. By end 1989, all the eight frigates the Pakistanis wanted had been transferred And the Pakistanis got the ships dirt cheap—only US $7 million a year for their annual lease payments The accompanying weapons systems were, of course, more expensive. It was a bargain nevertheless. For, the frigates were excellent anti-submarine warfare ships, equipped with sonars, anti-submarine rockets, guns and long-range standard anti-aircraft missiles. These ships are also capable of carrying Sea King helicopters armed with homing torpedoes.

Pakistani Mirages with Excocet missiles: adding to the Navy's power

With the induction of the new frigates, the Pakistani Navy has strengthened its defence against Indian submarine attacks. In short, Pakistani naval planners have succeeded in building up a credible deterrence to India's Blue Water capabilities. The Indian Navy does not consider its aircraft carriers and other major surface ships expendable in a war with Pakistan. The bigger Indian goal seems to be the creation of a large fleet, which over the years will deter any foreign navy, superpowers included, from flexing their muscles in the Indian Ocean. While the Indian Navy cannot risk exposing its carriers and major surface ships like the Kashin class destroyers, the Pakistani Navy can afford to send an odd submarine to Bombay High and set a few oil rigs on fire. Fortunately, Pakistan just cannot afford to buy large numbers of Harpoons (costing US $1.5 million apiece). But what it could demonstrate in the event of a short war is a psychological victory that would cast a permanent shadow over the Indian Navy's Blue Water ambitions.

THE MAKING OF THE

How Chandra Shekhar did it. The full story

In the end, the noes had it. And with the Lok Sabha voting overwhelmingly against the confidence motion moved by the Dal government (346 in favour and 142 against), the V.P. Singh regime fell on 7 November, a fortnight after the BJP had pulled the plug on it by withdrawing support. But even as the Opposition rejoiced at the fall of the Raja, it was far from clear how the situation would develop. Would President R. Venkataraman dissolve the House and announce mid-term polls, despite his alleged distaste for this option? Or would he invite the leader of the Opposition to form an alternative government? Would Rajiv Gandhi accept the invitation or would he offer to support a Chandra Shekhar-led minority government from the outside?

As it turned out, Chandra Shekhar got the nod. But not before the country was put through two days of agonising uncertainty.

It was, once again, the Raja who further complicated a far from clear situation. Soon after the Chandra Shekhar-Devi Lal combine held its parallel meeting on the lawns of the Chaudhary's Willingdon Crescent bungalow, claiming the support of 68 MPs and announcing the formation of the Janata Dal (Socialist), V.P. Singh retaliated by expelling 30 of its supporters (25 Lok Sabha MPs, including Chandra Shekhar, among them).

It was a masterstroke. By this one move, the Raja reduced the strength of the dissident camp to below 47, the magical figure required to affect a split in the party. The Speaker of the Lok Sabha was brought on to do his bit and Rabi Ray obliged by declaring the 25 expelled members 'unattached'. The rump would, however, be regarded as members of the Janata Dal and risk disqualification if they voted against the party whip.

For the moment, at least, V.P. Singh appeared to have stolen the initiative.

But the rebels weren't going to give up so easily. As claims and counter-claims about the strengths of the respective camps made the rounds, Shekhar met Ray to persuade him to reverse his decision. The Speaker remained adamant.

Apprehensive that all their efforts would come to nought, the rebels decided that Ray had to go. It was planned that the moment the House convened, a no-confidence motion would be brought against the Speaker. In accordance with parliamentary procedure, he would then step down with his deputy Shivraj Patil taking over. Once that happened, all their troubles would be over.

Rajiv Gandhi, however, disapproved of this plan. Opening a dialogue with Ray and getting him to see reason was the more attractive option, the Congress president felt. So, on 7 November, before the session commenced, Gandhi accompanied by Shekhar, Devi Lal, Mulayam Singh Yadav and Chimanbhai Patel went to meet the Speaker, who finally relented and agreed to review his decision.

Things finally seemed to be going right for the rebels.

With the BJP, the Congress and the dissidents ranged against the government, the result of the vote of confidence was a foregone conclusion. Nonetheless, there was a record turnout in Parliament, forcing some Rajya Sabha MPs—who'd arrived a little late—to stand in the corridors outside and listen to the proceedings over the sound system.

After the Speaker had gone through the condolence messages, the Prime Minister got up to speak in defence of his government. Only, he didn't so much defend his regime as attack his bête noire Chandra Shekhar, who had the temerity to dream of forming a government with only 24 MPs on his side. Resorting to metaphor, the Raja declared that such an arrangement could be likened to a jeep which had a trolley leading it. As long as the jeep went in reverse gear it was okay, said VP fleshing out the story, but what happened if it ran over the trolley?

Shekhar, whose turn came next, had his answer ready. Never mind how the trolley was positioned, he retorted, the Raja should remember that the jeep also had a driver. In a style reminiscent of V.P. Singh, Chandra Shekhar lapsed into poetry to defend himself: "Phoolon ko pani dete hue/Jhad gayi honge kuch patiyan mujhse/Par jinhone ronda hain kaliyon ko/Woh baat karte hain chaman ko bachane ki? (While I watered the flowers some petals may have fallen off. But how can those who have destroyed the buds talk of safeguarding the garden?)."

Rajiv Gandhi launched a frontal attack on the PM, turning to VP as he levelled each allegation and beginning his sentences with a fiery, "You, Mr Prime Minister..." Ridiculing the Raja's claim of being secular, Gandhi pointed out that less than a month ago, he was allied with the BJP.

But it was left to L K. Advani to demolish the Raja's secular plank. Revealing that V.P. Singh had reached an understanding with him, in accordance with which he would be allowed to proceed to Ayodhya, the BJP president alleged that the PM had promised to participate in the kar seva. The furore in the House only increased as charges that the Raja had tried to engineer defections flew thick and fast.

In his final summation, V.P. Singh seemed to accept that it was all over for him, maintaining bravely that he was going out of government with his head held high.

Sure enough, the vote went overwhelmingly against him. And the Raja's became the first government to fall on the floor of the House.

The voting concluded at 10.40, but by then the President had already retired for the night. So, V.P. Singh sent his resignation letter to P. Murari, secretary to the President. At 11 o'clock the following morning, the Raja finally met Venkataraman. But most of the 20-minute meeting was devoted not to apprising the President of the latest political developments, but persuading him not to invite an 'unattached' MP to form the government. Venkataraman remained non-committal. So, VP went further and insisted that Chandra Shekhar not be approached. But the President had had enough by then and he, reportedly, told the Raja that he shouldn't mention any names. Suitably chastened, the former Prime Minister left soon after, telling the mediamen assembled outside that an alternative arrangement would soon be made.

An hour later, the leader of the Opposition arrived at Rashtrapati Bhavan to meet the President. The meeting lasted 45 minutes and Venkataraman asked Rajiv Gandhi, the leader of the largest single party in the House, if he was interested in forming the government. Gandhi declined the offer, but told Venkataraman that his party was willing to support a Chandra Shekhar-led minority government from outside.

Venkataraman wasn't completely assured and handed Gandhi a list of questions to satisfy himself that the new government would be a stable one and that the Congress wouldn't pull the rug from under the new Prime Minister's feet whenever the fancy took it. A meeting of the Congress Parliamentary Party was held, where the leaders formulated suitable answers and despatched them to Rashtrapati Bhavan.

The answers, obviously, satisfied the President, for his office phoned

Voting VP out

What happened at the special Lok Sabha session on 7 November

Minutes before the special session to test the Dal government's majority got under way, Congress MP Ram Nehor Rakesh plonked himself in the Prime Minister's seat with considerable aplomb. He sat there, busily scribbling on a piece of paper, while his partymen egged him on with raucous laughter. After a few minutes, having penned what he called the PM's resignation letter, he left to occupy his own seat. This farcical episode best summed up the spirit that pervaded the parliamentary proceedings on 7 November.

The outcome of the session was a foregone conclusion: the Raja was bound to be voted out of power. But that didn't deter spectators—VIPs, diplomats, mediapersons and others—from turning up in record numbers to witness the downfall of the Dal regime. A record 6,000 passes were issued that day and such was the rush that Rani Sita Devi, the PM's wife, had to station herself in the diplomats' gallery, where she sat facing not her husband, but the leader of the Opposition, Rajiv Gandhi.

Sonia Gandhi was in attendance as well, in a maroon salwar kameez, with a cream shawl draped over one shoulder, while Rajiv Gandhi made do with an angavastra in the colours of the Indian flag. Priyanka, in saffron despite the Congress' aversion to the BJP, sat beside her mother, chatting and smiling throughout the proceedings. They seemed especially amused by George Fernandes' statement that Rajiv was the man who had suddenly changed from jeans, T-shirt and T-cap to become Prime Minister.

The BJP contingent was present in full force, resplendent in saffron and yelling "Jai Siya Ram" with due vigour. Uma Bharti, her head shorn after the Ayodhya misadventure and clad in her usual sanyasin's robes, was the centre of attention. Though Vasundhara Raje Scindia, with her hair loose, provided stiff competition. While the BJP ladies followed the proceedings with rapt attention, Maneka Gandhi sat behind. Nilamani Routray and made her disinterest clear by concentrating on the Evening News crossword puzzle.

V.P. Singh was the day's first speaker, but by the Raja's usual standards, his speech was pretty tepid stuff. There was the spiel about upholding secular traditions and safeguarding the unity and integrity of the country, but it semed as if the PM's heart was not in it this time. The continuous heckling from the Congress benches didn't improve matters either. Nor did the fact that the Raja had to put up with a self-righteous Chandra Shekhar that same evening to inform him that he would be called to form the new government the next day, 9 November.

The Raja wasn't through as yet, though. And sent a delegation to Venkataraman to plead that Shekhar not be invited. The President listened patiently, but didn't commit himself either way.

The attempts at spreading disinformation continued. The VP camp put it about that Devi Lal had called Inder Kumar Gujral to negotiate a deal by which he would become Prime Minister, not Chandra Shekhar. Another version had it that Rajiv Gandhi had decided that he would take over as PM instead of propping up Shekhar.

Shekhar was determined to get rid of V.P. Singh at any cost—even if it meant sacrificing his own political credibility in the process

But none of that worked. And a jubilant Chandra Shekhar emerged from his meeting with Venkataraman to disclose that he'd been invited to form the government. Security personnel already seemed to be granting him prime ministerial treatment, putting assembled newsmen through the metal detector test before they were allowed into hailing distance of the Prime Minister designate.

Shekhar announced that the swearing-in ceremony would take place in the courtyard of Rashtrapati Bhavan at 11 am on the following day, 10 November.

The Ballia leader's ambitions were finally being realised and he was hard put to contain his glee.

V.P. SINGH

RAJESH KUMAR

DEVI LAL

Rajiv Gandhi hurling charges at him on such issues as Punjab, Kashmir, Ram Janmabhoomi and the price rise.

When his turn came, Rajiv tore into VP, accusing him of having divided the country on caste lines and creating such chaos that over 5,000 people lost their lives in less than a year of Janata Dal rule. "You joined hands with Pakistan on Kashmir!" alleged the Opposition leader, looking straight at the discomfited Prime Minister.

It was left to railway minister George Fernandes to come to the Raja's rescue. Had Rajiv Gandhi forgotten that over 5,000 people had died in the first week after his swearing-in alone, asked Fernandes in an impassioned speech. Quoting from The Economist, the minister said it remained to be seen whether the Indian electorate chose the stability promised by the Rajiv Gandhi mafia or preferred to be ruled by petty, small-time crooks.

Shot back Congress MP M.J. Akbar, "Thank you for pointing out that you are petty, small-time thieves."

Chandra Shekhar, sitting next to BJP president L.K. Advani, railed against his arch-rival VP and concluded by saying : "I want you to step down or the House will be forced to discharge its national duty."

Advani, for his part, embarrassed the Prime Minister by disclosing that he'd offered to perform kar seva in Ayodhya, while BJP MP Baburao Paranjpe charged that the Raja had called him in Bombay to ask him to defect. V.P. Singh could only splutter in reply.

Arun Nehru and camp follower Arif Mohammad Khan chose to stay away until the evening, when Khan finally took the floor to lecture members on his kind of secularism, his speech peppered with Sanskrit shlokas.

Then it was over to VP for the final summation and the usual noises about quitting office not being the end of politics. For by then, it was all over bar the anointing of Chandra Shekhar.

Shirin Shikre/New Delhi

The demise of the V.P. Singh government had an almost immediate fall-out at the state level. While the rebels, now in government, set out to destabilise Laloo Prasad Yadav in Bihar, the Raja expelled Mulayam Singh Yadav from the Uttar Pradesh unit of the party. In Gujarat, the Chimanbhai Patel government hung on with Congress(I) support and Bhairon Singh Shekhawat remained in power in Rajasthan because of Janata Dal(S) backing . Only Biju Patnaik in Orissa remained inviolate.

Laloo Prasad, because of his equation with Sharad Yadav, stood by the Raja and expelled rebel leader Raghunath Jha from the party for siding with Shekhar. Jha, for his part, mounted an offensive against Yadav, persuading Ram Sundar Das—the Harijan leader who lost the contest for the chief ministership by eight votes—to lead a revolt against Laloo.

In Uttar Pradesh, Mulayam Singh Yadav was thrown out of the party and Kailash Nath Yadav made the president of the state Janata Dal. Five UP ministers, Reoti Raman Singh, Mukhtar Anees, Diwakar Vikram Singh, Sachidanand Vajpayee and Mohammad Aslam Khan, resigned from office, while both groups claimed to be the real Janata Dal.

The VP camp hopes that with the help of Ajit Singh loyalists, who number around 70, it will be able to destabilise if not topple the Mulayam Singh government. The chief minister, on the other hand, is relying on

The price of an MP

Money power played an important role in the recent political crisis

At first, the going price was Rs 25 lakhs. But as the political crisis in the capital escalated and the survival of the V.P. Singh government seemed increasingly doubtful, it mounted to an astounding Rs 1 crore.

That was what a Janata Dal MP was worth, if the stories floating around Delhi were to be believed.

There may well have been an element of exaggeration in these stories, but there can be no doubt that money power played an important role both in the attempts to prop up the Raja and install Chandra Shekhar.

K.K. BIRLA

The power-brokers, leading industrialists of the country among them, descended on New Delhi as soon as the BJP withdrew support to the government. They stationed themselves at five-star hotels and the residences of important political leaders and lobbied feverishly in favour of their candidates for the prime ministership. While nobody was willing to corroborate the rumours about the price quoted, several MPs maintained that they had been offered monetary inducement to change sides.

LALIT THAPAR

While the leader of the erstwhile Jan Morcha, Ram Dhan, claimed that he'd received threats to his life, Mrinal Gore of the Maharashtra unit of the Janata Dal alleged: "It is the Ambanis and the Birlas who are actually behind V.P. Singh's ouster."

Communist leader Somnath Chatterjee reiterated the charge on the floor of the House while the debate on the no-confidence motion was in progress. "I hear the footsteps of the Ambanis and the Birlas," the veteran CPI(M) leader told the assembled MPs.

Though unproven, the charges made some sense. Dhirubhai Ambani's antipathy to the Raja is well-known. Contrary to popular expectation, V.P. Singh had not mounted a concerted campaign against the Reliance chief on coming to power, being far too preoccupied on various other fronts. But Ambani still regarded the Raja with extreme suspicion and didn't mind spending a few crores to ensure VP's exit from the government.

Others who are believed to have made a financial contribution to the install-Chandra Shekhar campaign include K.K. Birla and Abhey Oswal. Birla has been a Congress camp follower for long and invited Rajiv Gandhi for dinner around the time the Janata Dal split. The presence of his daughter, Shobhana Bhartiya, in Parliament to witness the downfall of the Raja was interpreted by some to indicate that the Birlas are behind Shekhar.

Oswal, on the other hand, was opposed to V.P. Singh on more specific grounds. The government gave him a tough time on his proposed fertiliser project, as well as the HBJ pipeline.

The Raja had his supporters as well. Lalit Thapar, for one, whose Rs 200-crore worth nylon fibre unit in Goa was sanctioned due to the efforts of industry minister Ajit Singh. The sugar barons of western Uttar Pradesh, stopped for many years by the Kalpi regime, also benefited from former premier's Ajit Singh's [illegible] gratitude for [illegible] Raja's cause.

But in the end, it wasn't enough power for the Raja [illegible] from [illegible]

Congress support to bail him out. But that may well be unforthcoming, for a section of the party, led by Balaram Singh Yadav, considers Mulayam Singh, with his anti-Hindu rhetoric, to be a lia' ility. But Yadav can take cheer from the fact that N.D. Tiwari is in his favour.

But with the strength of both camps being nearly equal, in the end, it will depend on who thinks up the superior strategy.

It was on strategy that the Raja failed. In retrospect, it seems obvious that V.P. Singh blundered—and played right into Chandra Shekhar's hands—when he refused to step down immediately after the BJP withdrew support. Had the Raja resigned at that point, he could have succeeded in keeping his arch-enemy Shekhar out of the running. For Shekhar only had around 10-12 supporters and was ill-prepared to stake a claim to form the government. By hanging on until 7 November, VP gave him the time to get his act together and throw the Raja off centre-stage.

What made matters easier for Chandra Shekhar was V.P. Singh's avowed preference for a mid-term poll. While the Raja believed that he would come back with a comfortable majority with backward and Muslim support, most of his party members didn't share his conviction. By their reckoning, they were bound to lose their seats in the next poll and, therefore, the last thing they wanted was to go back to the people.

Shekhar understood their fear and capitalised on it, reiterating time and again that he was against a mid-term poll. He was in favour of an alternative arrangement as the situation in the country was far too volatile to permit elections. The Raja cottoned on in time and clarified that if he lost the vote of confidence in the House, he would sit in the Opposition, instead of recommending dissolution of Parliament. But by then, it was too late.

The fortnight's grace gave Shekhar the opportunity to approach the Congress for support. And Rajiv, wishing to get rid of VP at any cost, agreed that if Shekhar won over around 70 MPs he would back his attempt to form a new government. From then on, it was only a matter of time before VP made way for Shekhar.

But why did Chandra Shekhar set himself up as another Charan Singh-like figure? Staying in power with Congress support meant that Gandhi

And now, to the people

What V.P. Singh will do next

For V.P. Singh, it's on to the final court of appeal: the people of India. Now that it's all over for his government despite the defensive stratagems, the former Prime Minister has decided to go on the offensive. And the stragglers who turn up at his 1 Teen Murti residence are treated to glimpses of the new, aggressive Raja. Explaining his stand on such issues as Mandal and the mandir, VP uses all his rhetorical skill to portray himself as a martyr.

This, insist insiders, is only for starters. The Raja will soon embark on a tour of India, primarily the northern parts, to put his case before the masses, proving, in the process, that he is only a hapless victim of political chicanery. However, this ambitious, if rather optimistic, venture will have to wait until passions, both casteist and communal, have cooled. For, party leaders fear that with public feelings running high on both issues, the former PM may well be lynched before he is half-way through the programme.

Therefore, for the present, VP is content to devote his Machiavellian skills to keeping his faction of the Dal together. With Chandra Shekhar having formed the government and acquired the right to distribute largesse, the danger of Dal fence-sitters going over is only too real. And the Raja knows that if the strength of the Shekhar group approaches 70, the new PM could well take over the entire party. So, further defections have to be stopped at all costs; though VP isn't yet decided on how best he can achieve this goal.

After the split, the party organisation, right down to the district level, is in shambles. And, unless put right on a priority basis, could cost the Raja the next election, which, according to some, is only a year or so away. But if he wants to amend matters, V.P. Singh will have to rise above his casteist coterie (Sharad Yadav, Ram Vilas Paswan and the like) and learn to see things from a pre-Mandal perspective.

A drastic revision of his script will also be called for, especially on the Bofors question. The electorate is hardly likely to have forgotten the Raja's promise of revealing the names of the Bofors recipients a fortnight after assuming office. It will be looking for answers and VP will have to get his explanations ready.

For, his next journey through the country is, for all practical purposes, going to assume the character of a pre-election tour. And the outcome of the next poll will decide the Raja's fate in Indian politics.

Seema Goswami/New Delhi

could topple him at will. So, why did Shekhar get into such an untenable position?

Simple. He meant to get rid of VP—even if it meant sacrificing his own political credibility in the process. Also, Shekhar had been nursing prime ministerial ambitions for a long time and knew that this was his best chance to realise them. If the Raja's actions led to another general election, either he or Rajiv Gandhi would win a majority. And Shekhar would be left out in the cold, yet again.

Even before Shekhar had been sworn in, along with Devi Lal, who became deputy prime minister once again, the trappings of power were much in evidence at his 3 South Avenue Lane bungalow. The Special Protection Group (SPG) moved in and took charge of the PM designate's security. Metal detectors were set up and visitors frisked before they were let in. The contrast to the laid-back air that usually prevailed at the house couldn't have been more marked. It was clear that things had changed.

On 10 November, Shekhar and the Chaudhary arrived at the courtyard of Rashtrapati Bhavan to be sworn in before a motley crowd of former ministers, politicians, diplomats and supporters from Haryana and Ballia. In a departure from tradition, the

The woman behind Chandra Shekhar

A profile of the new Mrs Prime Minister, Dijya Devi

No man, the saying goes, is ever a hero to his wife. But those who swear by this axiom haven't met Mrs Dijya Devi, wife of the newly-appointed Prime Minister, Chandra Shekhar. Of a shy and retiring disposition, the lady speaks very rarely. But when she does, it is always to quote her husband: "Mere Netaji kahte hain... Agar Netaji kahenge to... (My Netaji says...If Netaji says so...)."

However the world rated Shekhar's chances of becoming the PM, Dijya Devi has always been confident that fate had great things in store for her better half: "I knew that my Netaji would be Prime Minister one day."

Small wonder then that the honour, when it finally came, left Dijya Devi unmoved. While Shekhar's supporters, delirious with joy, beat drums and performed excited jigs on the lawns of his 3 South Avenue Lane bungalow, the lady of the house stayed indoors, doing pooja oblivious of the drama outside. And of the political intrigues that led to her husband grabbing the hot seat. Says Devi: "I know nothing about Rajiv Gandhi or V.P. Singh, so do not ask me about them. I never ask Netaji anything. He tells me what he has to."

Combined with this respect is absolute faith in her husband's ability to lead the nation. Dijya Devi insists that only Chandra Shekhar can improve the lot of the deprived. "Now that Netaji has come into power," she says with quiet confidence, "I am sure the prices will come down. He has done a great deal for the poor people of Ballia. Now he will work for all the poor in the country."

So low profile has the Shekhar family been that, until recently, it was believed by most people that the leader was a die-hard bachelor. On the contrary, the new Prime Minister married Dijya Devi, then ceremony wasn't held in Ashoka Hall and the loud cheers of "Chandra Shekhar zindabad" resulted in a distinct lowering of tone. But Shekhar wasn't complaining, though appearances suggested that he didn't enjoy being mobbed by the crowd after the event.

The mandatory visit to Rajghat over, the new Prime Minister called on his predecessor V.P. Singh to hug him in a rare show of bonhomie.

around "ten years or so" (she's not sure what her age is), while still in high school.

Both families were resident of Ballia district and since Dijya Devi's mother had passed away, her father was eager to get her married at an early age. "At that time I didn't know the real meaning of marriage," recalls Mrs Shekhar, "I went to live in Netaji's house, but he was still in school. He would come to the village one or two times in a year."

In 1962, Chandra Shekhar became a Rajya Sabha MP and shifted to New Delhi. His wife accompanied him and stayed on. "I only go back to Ballia if there are any weddings," she confides. In Delhi, she manages the household affairs at 3 South Avenue Lane and admits: "I only make Bhojpuri food, but that's when Netaji is at home. Otherwise, the servants take care of the work."

The Shekhars live with their two sons, Pankaj and Neeraj. The elder, who is married to Rashmi, daughter of former home minister Om Mehta, runs a printing press in the capital. The younger, Neeraj, has just completed college. But it is Rashmi who keeps her mother-in-law abreast of the latest political developments.

As Mrs Prime Minister, however, Dijya Devi promises to be an entirely different commodity from the elegant and sophisticated Sonia Gandhi or the fiercely political Rani Sita Devi. Always clad simply in a seedha pallav sari, she spends most of her time in the kitchen or the pooja room, and in Bhondsi when her husband is out of town. And, by her own admission, never reads the newspapers.

What her husband chooses to tell her is good enough for her.

Then, it was on to Maharashtra Bhavan for lunch. Around 4.30 in the evening, Shekhar arrived at his South Block office to hold meetings with home secretary Naresh Chandra, foreign secretary Muchkund Dubey and cabinet secretary Vinod Pande. The PM asked the home secretary to scale down his security, but was told that Chandra had to follow the Blue Book. "But I am the Prime Minister," countered Shekhar, "and I am overruling the Blue Book."

Next, the new Prime Minister had to deal with the hijacked plane, which had been forced to land at Calcutta airport. Shekhar gave the appropriate advice and left for dinner at Jagdeep Dhankhar's place.

On the 11th, the PM went to his Bhondsi farmhouse, along with such supporters as Yashwant Sinha, Subodh Kant Sahay, Raj Mangal Pandey and Digvijay Singh, to finalise his ministerial team. The evening was devoted to meetings with BJP leaders Advani and Vijayaraje Scindia and VHP general secretary Ashok Singhal, with a view to affecting some sort of compromise on the Ayodhya issue. The day after, Shekhar flew in an Indian Air Force aircraft to Bombay to seek the blessings of his mentor and former Prime Minister Morarji Desai.

And to celebrate the fact that power had finally come to rest with the 'legitimate Opposition'. Never mind if it was with Congress support. ●

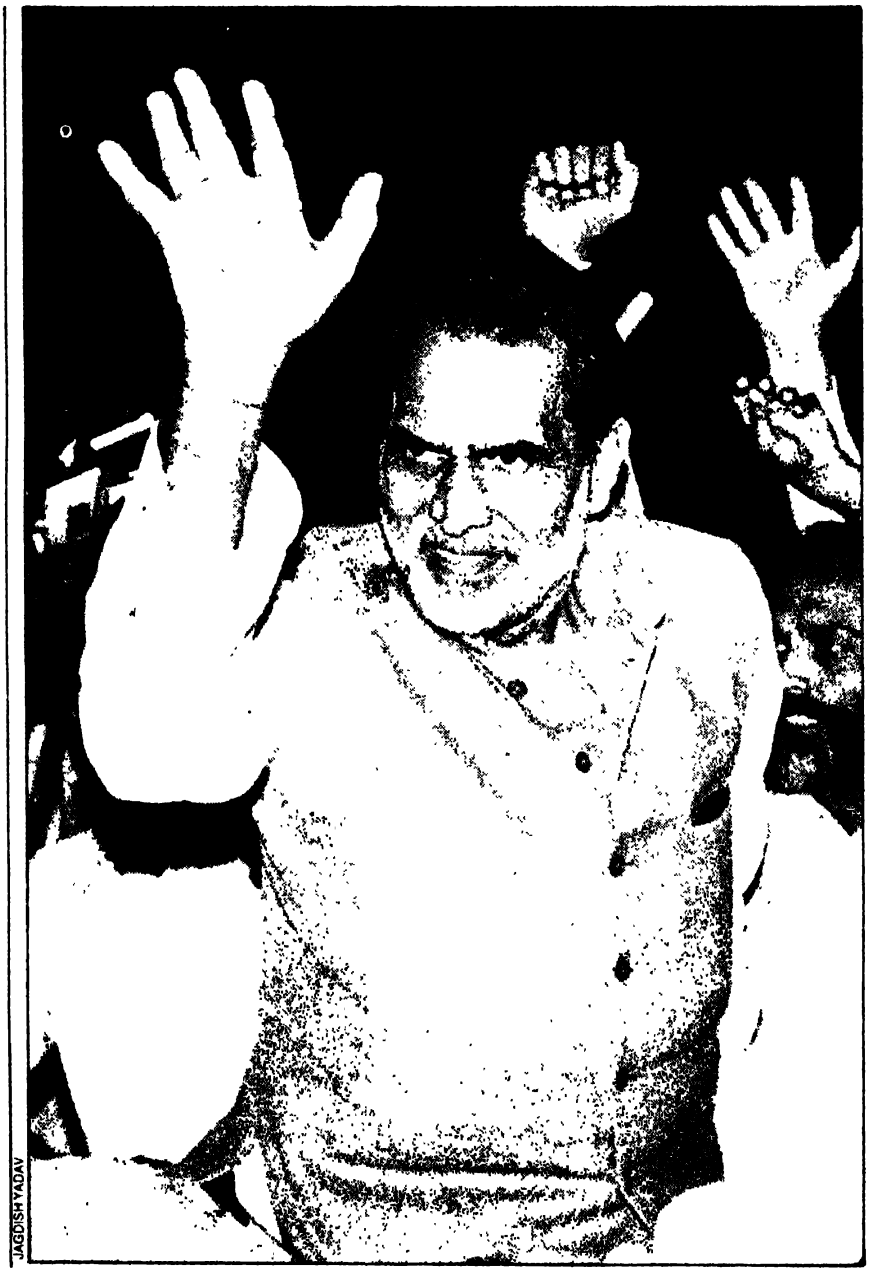
The man behind the myth

What kind of Prime Minister will Chandra Shekhar make?

After his 30 high-profile years in politics, it sometimes seems that there is very little left to be said about Chandra Shekhar. Certainly, the media have made up their minds about him and his erstwhile colleagues in the Janata Dal have missed no opportunity to declare that he is the Charan Singh of his generation.



In fact, as Chandra Shekhar likes to point out, much of what is said about him is far from the truth. Take the small matter of his birthday. According to the news agencies and the official Press Information Bureau biographies, he was born on 1 July. In reality, his birthday is on 17 April. Somewhere along the line, an error was made in the records and it has never been corrected.

Then there is the slightly more significant matter of his background. Shortly after he was sworn in as Prime Minister, the media had it that he was the son of a middle class Thakur, a description that made him sound rather like Vishwanath Pratap Singh with a full head of hair.

The way Shekhar says it, there was nothing middle class about his background. "My family had 12 acres of land among four brothers. Can that be called middle class? My father was a poor farmer and I had a tough childhood. I had to walk miles every day to go to school."

Does it really matter how poor anybody's father was? In today's politics, perhaps not. Rajiv is proud of his aristocratic lineage; V.P. Singh urges followers to refer to him as "Rajasaab"; and the most efficient minister of the 1980s was a former maharaja: Madhavrao Scindia.

It is in that sense that Shekhar is a misfit in the current political environment: to him, it matters very much whether you come from a rich or poor family.

JAGDISH YADAV

As he says, "Nobody who has not been poor himself can understand poverty. Name one great leader who has done a lot for the poor who has come from a rich family?"

He argues the point with great vehemence, finally conceding that yes, Mahatma Gandhi was an exception and perhaps there were a few others. But the general rule, he insists, is still valid.

To remain this obsessive about poverty in the 1990s suggests to many people an unhealthy preoccupation with the ideas of a bygone era. Consequently, Shekhar's reputation as the Rip Van Winkle of Indian politics has taken firm root. His critics believe that he clings to the rhetoric of the socialist 1950s: a distrust of multinationals, a hatred of consumer goods, a misunderstanding of the role of market forces and a childish faith in the value of the public sector. As SUNDAY itself has put it, he seems to have travelled from 1950 to 1990 without learning any economics. At a time when the socialist world is busy reconstructing itself, such an attitude seems hopelessly out of tune with the times.

Shekhar bristles when the subject is raised. He rejects entirely the notion of himself as the last Brezhnevite. To him, that is simply another misconception.

And like the false date for his birthday and the misrepresentation about his background, it needs to be corrected.

First of all, he is not impressed by those who point to General Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev's restructuring of the Russian economy. "They are going from a system in which they had no market forces to one in which they are combining central planning and the market," he explains. "That is the system that we have had since Independence. What is so new in it? We are not some communist country that we need to liberalise. Even now, we are more liberal than Russia."

The way he tells it, his economic views are not very different from those of somebody like Rajiv Gandhi, though there are some important differences. He is not a great advocate of the public sector and believes that it must be made efficient. He concedes that it served a historical purpose, but is not for further nationalisation. Nor does he object to increasing the role of market forces. All he says is that in a less-developed economy like ours, too much reliance on the market will lead to scarce resources being diverted to non-productive sectors. Hence the need for planning and some regulation of the market. But he accepts that this must be done without excessive red-tape and an over-reliance on the bureaucracy.

He differs with the Rajiv Gandhi-kind of politician in two areas. The first is poverty. He believes that any government that wins the approval of the middle class by stepping up the production of consumer goods has its priorities wrong: it should concentrate instead on helping the poorest members of society.

The second area of difference is self-reliance. Shekhar prefers a South Korean or Japanese model in which the doors are not thrown wide open to foreign investors, but in which the government directs the investment into areas it regards as crucial.

"Is that very old-fashioned?" he concludes.

What kind of Prime Minister will Chandra Shekhar make? There are genuine grounds for concern. Firstly, he is dependent on the support of the Congress(I), which sees him as a caretaker PM who will hold office till Rajiv Gandhi decides that the time is right for an election. Secondly, he has few MPs on his side who will make good ministers. The big question in the Shekhar camp last week was: who will run the home and finance ministries? By common consent, Yashwant Sinha was a perfect home minister.

JUBILANT: The new PM's supporters at his 3 South Avenue Lane residence

If Shekhar fails as a Prime Minister, he will be an honest failure: a man who went down because of what he believed in and not because he hoped to play caste and communal cards to win votes

But wouldn't it make more sense to give him finance because of the economic crisis? Then, who would be home minister? There were no obvious candidates.

And finally, there is a question mark over Shekhar's own abilities. He has been at the forefront of Indian politics since the 1969 Congress split. But incredibly, he has never held ministerial office—not even as a deputy minister in a state government. Was such a man up to the job? Rajiv Gandhi responded to these doubts by pointing out that he too had become Prime Minister without any experience. Considering the mess Rajiv made of his mandate, this was not a

"There is no parallel with Charan Singh"

The Prime Minister speaks his mind on V.P. Singh, Ambani and his dealings with the Congress(I)

On Monday, 12 November, a mere 48 hours after he was sworn in, Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar gave SUNDAY one of the first formal press interviews of his term. Initially, the Prime Minister was reluctant to go on the record arguing—with some justification—that it was too soon to say anything very different from the stand he had taken in his now celebrated SUNDAY interview in August, when he had first come out openly against V.P. Singh.

But on a rushed trip to Bombay—his first official visit as the Prime Minister—he relented and, as the special Indian Air Force Boeing 737 flew from Jaipur to the Maharashtra capital, offered this brief insight into his thinking.

SUNDAY: How does it feel to be Prime Minister?
Chandra Shekhar: Frankly, having seen the files, I am deeply concerned. My oath of secrecy prevents me from saying more, but we are in a worse situation than anybody realised. We knew that the economic situation was bad, but it was this bad was not told to anybody.

Q: Are you suggesting that the last government kept the truth from the country?
A: It is not my intention to cast aspersions on anybody, but having seen that the reality is different from what we were told, I have no explanation for why this should be so.

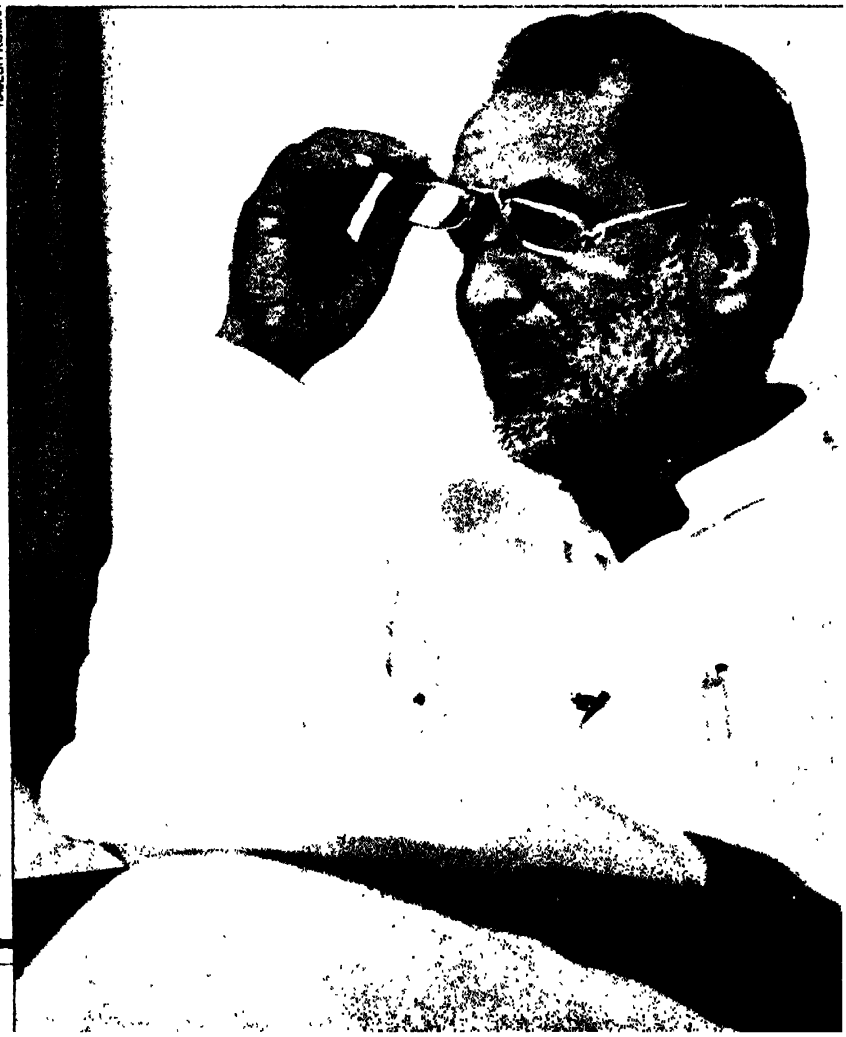
Q: Let me ask you the question that is on everyone's lips: are you the Charan Singh of the 1990s?
A: I don't know why people indulge in this kind of talk. Where is the parallel?

In 1979, Charan Singh split the party and brought the government down. I have not destroyed the government. Whatever happened to Mr V.P. Singh's government took place as a result of his own actions.

I may have been unhappy with the way things were going, but I never said anything or did anything to bring down the government. Mr V.P. Singh lost his majority after the BJP withdrew support and that was not the consequence of my actions.

So where is the parallel?

Q: I think what people mean is that, like Charan Singh, you went to the Congress(I) for support.
A: What was the alternative? After Mr V.P. Singh's government lost support, who was in a position to form a government?



We were agreed that nobody wanted elections immediately. The country could ill-afford them in the present crisis. When a state is in that situation (for example, Punjab), then we have President's Rule. But that is not possible at the Centre.

So, what could be done? V.P. Singh could not command a majority. Rajiv Gandhi said he did not want to form a government. And in any case, he could not have got a majority without Janata Dal support.

So any government formed during this crisis—because of realities—had to have Janata Dal and Congress support.

Q: What about the argument that, the mandate of the last election was against the Congress(I)?

RAJESH KUMAR

A: If that was so, then only a Janata Dal government supported by the left parties and the BJP would have commanded a majority and fulfilled that mandate. We had such a government and it fell not because of any of my actions.

If anybody failed to respect any anti-Congress(I) mandate, then it is those people who were unable to keep such a government going.

Q: Do you think that the two Janata Dal factions can reunite?
A: Why not? We had never wanted to split the party. We would have preferred unity.

Q: In that case, will you readmit V.P. Singh into your Janata Dal?
A: It is not a question of personalities. I do not bear any ill-will to any persons. I would be happy to support any move to readmit him. The question is: in what capacity will he be readmitted? That will have to be seen.

Q: Many people are concerned about your economic views. We've said in SUNDAY that you sometimes give the impression that you've travelled from 1950 to 1990 without learning any economics along the way.
A: And have the problems of India changed drastically from 1950 to 1990?

I am not one of those who changes his views according to the prevailing fashion. I think that we have two basic problems in India: scarcity of resources and great poverty. Of course, they are interrelated and we have to find a means of tackling them.

That was our problem in 1950. That is our problem in 1990. But people keep on writing all kinds of things about my economic views that are not true. I have never said that I believe in inefficiency in the public sector. I have never stated that I do not believe in market forces. I am not for the bureaucratisation of the economy.

What I have said is that if you depend only on market forces, then there is a danger that you will squander scarce resources in the production of luxury, consumer goods. This may please a small section of society in the short run, but in the long term, it will be in nobody's interests.

Q: So what do you suggest?
A: I think we must have some centralised planning to allocate resources. And within that framework, we should encourage market forces.

This is not some old-fashioned view. You look at Gorbachev. What is he doing in the Soviet Union? It amounts to the same thing.

You cannot run an efficient economy if you ignore the market. But you cannot leave resource allocation to market forces either.

Q: How do you respond to the familiar allegation that you are an Ambani man?
A: I do not know why all my friends in the press are so obsessed by Dhirubhai Ambani. Is he that important? Last time you interviewed me, the same question was asked.

I hold no brief for any individual industrialist, either for or against. It is you people who keep thinking about Ambani.

Q: When can we expect your Cabinet?
A: Wait till the 16th. I will announce it by then.

Interviewed by Vir Sanghvi/On board the PM's plane terribly reassuring explanation.

Despite such genuine fears, there is little doubt that Shekhar has a lot going for him. He is one of the most humane of Indian politicians, a man with an almost infinite tolerance and a remarkable capacity for forgiveness. While V.P. Singh tried to divide to rule, Shekhar will seek to heal and unify. And even his worst critics concede that he is startlingly straightforward. Not for him any management of contradictions or any dissembling: he speaks his mind. After 11 months, India will have a Prime Minister who can look his people in the eye.

None of this suggests that he will necessarily be a success as Prime Minister. But if he fails, he will be an honest failure: a man who went down because of what he believed in and not because he hoped to play caste and communal cards to win votes.

Already, the bureaucracy has had a taste of his style. Shortly after he was sworn in, he ordered that the PM's motorcade be cut by half and his personal security apparatus (600 SPG men work round the clock to guard the Prime Minister) be scaled down.

The civil servants were polite but firm.

"We can't do that sir," they chorused in unison. "We have to go according to the book."

"Show me the book," said Shekhar.

It was brought to him.

"There you are," he said and as horrified bureaucrats watched goggle-eyed, proceeded to draw a line through those sections that specified excessive security.

"Now it doesn't say that in the Blue Book," he stated with grim finality.

If only running India were as easy as rewriting the Blue Book!●

UNLIKELY ALLIES: How long will the Chandra Shekhar-Rajiv Gandhi partnership last?

Once is not enough

L.K. Advani decides to go on a second yatra to step up the BJP's political offensive

The organisation that seems least affected by the present political uncertainty in the country is the Bharatiya Janata Party. Having served as a catalyst in the collapse of the National Front government which it propped up for 11 months, the party is all set to launch a nationwide pre-election offensive, as it is convinced that mid-term polls are round the corner.

BJP leaders have assured party workers that their withdrawal from the political chessboard was only temporary. At a two-day meeting of the BJP's national executive held in the capital on 9 and 10 November, the party concluded that the present political arrangement could at best postpone elections, but would not be able to solve the existing deadlock. Party president L.K. Advani pointed out that the new government lacked a popular mandate, as it was propped up by the Congress(I), which was voted out in the last elections.

Formally endorsing the leadership's decision to sit in the Opposition, the BJP parliamentary party stated that it would now concentrate on fulfilling the needs of the common man. Expressing relief over the ouster of the V.P. Singh government, a statement issued by the party said: "The BJP, now freed from the responsibility of supporting and defending a government whose record has been dismal, would discharge its responsibilities as a vigorous and effective Opposition party, zealously guarding the interests of the people." The idea of forming a national government as a solution to the current crisis was also discussed. The suggestion was made by Atal Behari Vajpayee but the national executive resolved that nothing would come of it at this point.

The BJP's prime concern in the coming months will be to ensure that the Ayodhya issue is kept alive. The party has decided that Advani, its star campaigner, will embark upon an intensive all-India tour in the third week of November for about a month and a half. "We will continue to press for the Ram temple in Ayodhya," declares party vice-president Sunder Singh Bhandari. "Mr Advani's mass campaign will focus on this. We will also explain to the people why we were forced to withdraw our support to the National Front government."

During this sequel to his rath yatra, giant rallies will be organised at nearly 600 places, the details of which are being finalised at the party headquarters on Delhi's Ashoka Road. The tour, commencing in Kerala (Advani would not use his rath this time), will cover territories that remained untouched by the rath yatra. Uttar Pradesh and Bihar figure prominently on Advani's agenda, but the date of his arrival in Ayodhya is yet to be finalised.

BJP leaders were evasive when asked if they intended discussing the temple issue with the new Prime Minister, Chandra Shekar. "We are for a dialogue between Hindus and Muslims," stated party general secretary, Murli Manohar Joshi, without mentioning Shekhar. But not taking any chances, Chandra Shekhar has held out the olive branch to the BJP, declaring that he wanted to seek their cooperation, as well as that of the left parties. There were certain vital matters in which the cooperation of the BJP was essential, said the Prime Minister. And certainly, Ayodhya was one of them.

On what was only his second day in office, the Prime Minister called on both Advani and Vajpayee and discussed the mandir dispute and other political issues. Apparently, a preliminary attempt at "building bridges" was made between Chandra Shekhar and the senior BJP leaders, but it was premature to divulge details yet, said party sources. However, Vajpayee later said that the new Prime Minister gave a "fresh mind to the subject", and seemed "keen to take an initiative on the Ayodhya issue." Corroborated Advani: "Chandra Shekhar is endorsing our stand, he is not trying to corner us into any position."

However, the BJP leaders clarified that the Uttar Pradesh chief minister, Mulayam Singh Yadav was "very much a contributing factor" to the present dispensation at the Centre, and that the BJP held Yadav and V.P. Singh "equally responsible" for the events in Ayodhya last month. "Unless there is a marked change in attitude, it is likely that the stalemate will continue," said a senior party official, reiterating the rath yatra slogan: "Hum mandir wahin banayenge (the temple will be built there—the Babri Masjid-Ram Janmabhoomi site—and nowhere else)."

Will the BJP's strident revivalist campaign translate into votes? The rath yatra, which was clearly a knee-jerk reaction to V.P. Singh's decision to implement the Mandal Commission recommendations, served to instigate

NITIN RAI

Hindu chauvinism. But will the electorate opt for a party that mixed religion with politics to serve its own ends? While Advani himself often exhorted party workers not to mistake the huge turnouts at most places during his yatra as an indication of support to the party, other leaders are convinced that the party will do better than ever before in the next elections. "The Congress is in a dilemma, the Janata Dal is in a quandary," says general secretary Dr Murli Manohar Joshi, who is tipped to become the party's next president. "Only the BJP is marching ahead with its message that the country comes first, that nationalism comes first, and everything else is last."

According to Advani, the next elections would be fought on issues and negative votes will not determine the outcome. "In all elections until now, anti-Congressism has been an important factor," says the soft-spoken hardliner. "The verdict thus had invariably been influenced by a negative vote. In the forthcoming elections, it is very likely that the electorate may be influenced by the positive attributes and policies of the competing parties. If this happens, it would be a distinct gain for the health of the political system."

And a distinct gain for the BJP, feel leaders. Corroborates Joshi: "We don't have anything negative in our ideology," he says. "We will go to the people and tell them that we want to give the country prosperity, a decentralised economy, and, above all, secularism. We want to build a strong, modern India, deeply and firmly rooted in its glorious traditions."

The party has decided to contest as many seats as possible and, in most places, go it alone. The present juncture, it feels, is too premature to discuss seat adjustments. That would be considered, if at all, at a later stage.

The BJP is all set to launch a nationwide pre-election offensive, as it is convinced that mid-term polls are round the corner

But some of the factors that would influence the BJP's performance are beyond its control. Much will depend on the performance of the new government, on whether the Ram Janmabhoomi movement intensifies, and, of course, on the timing of the next election.

Observations that the BJP reached its zenith in 1989 and was set on a declining course thereafter do not worry the party leaders. They are not ready to compromise on the Ram Janmabhoomi issue. "Let others call us communal. This country is secular, democratic and socialist because it is Hindu," insists Joshi. Party ideologues point out that winning or losing elections is not the raison d'être of the BJP. "The other parties may not be able to comprehend it, but we can never be as political as they are. We owe our being to a school of thought, not to wresting power for ourselves," explains one.

For the moment, however, the party is busy gearing up for another bout of populist campaign. But it remains to be seen if its efforts to grow into a political force to reckon with are seen as part of some divine design or as mere exigencies of political survival. ●

A matter of principle

The left parties decide to oppose Chandra Shekhar's government

After the last general elections, every Opposition party that had managed to put up a good showing at the hustings agreed on one point: that the people's mandate was against Rajiv Gandhi and the Congress(I). They argued, quite high-mindedly at the time, that the Opposition's sacred duty was to form a non-Congress(I) government. Anything else would amount to a betrayal of the popular mandate. A year later, most Opposition parties and leaders seem to have forgotten all that. But not the communists.

When Chandra Shekhar was appointed Prime Minister, the left parties unanimously cried foul. When the Janata Dal split and Vishwanath Pratap Singh lost the confidence motion in Parliament, all the major left parties—the Communist Party of India (Marxist), the Communist Party (CPI), the Revolutionary Socialist Party (RSP) and the Forward Bloc (FB)—issued a joint statement condemning the action of Chandra Shekhar and his group of dissident Janata Dal MPs. "If this group, having neither a popular mandate nor any policy platform, is installed in power, it would amount to violation of all accepted norms of political propriety," the statement read.

The most vociferous in criticising Chandra Shekhar's coup was West Bengal's Marxist chief minister, Jyoti Basu. On returning to Calcutta, Basu declared at a public meeting that Chandra Shekhar was completely bereft of any notions of principles or political ethics. "I cannot work with these people who have no principles," he said. "During my stay in the capital, I almost fell ill after seeing what was happening. I feel much better to be back with you."

In today's confused politics, the left believes that principles, apart from imparting credibility, is the only means to remain afloat and survive. Its trenchant criticism of Chandra Shekhar stems from the belief that by breaking up the Janata Dal and joining hands with the Congress(I) to form a government, the MP from Ballia has forfeited his political future. The left also believes that the break-up of the Janata Party in 1979 and that of the Janata Dal in 1990 is not a mere instance of history repeating itself.

Jyoti Basu (right) with V.P. Singh: extending support

As the grand old man of the CPI(M) Politburo, E.M.S. Namboodiripad, pointed out: "The difference is that Charan Singh with all his factional and group clashes with Morarji Desai, had a policy question on which he broke and that was the dual membership issue. Chandra Shekhar does not have any policy issue."

The left, for the moment, is not presenting any well-defined strategy. What it is making clear right now is that it has nothing to do with Chandra Shekhar, the Congress(I) or the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP). In fact, the CPI(M) does not consider Chandra Shekhar to be a legitimate leader of a legitimate faction of the Janata Dal. Shekhar's camp has consistently been termed as a mere 'splinter group'. The defeat of V.P. Singh is viewed not so much as a victory of the Dal dissident chiefs, Shekhar and Devi Lal, but of the Congress(I) president Rajiv Gandhi.

In other words, the CPI(M) feels that three main political forces are emerging in the national scene: the Congress(I)-Chandra Shekhar combine, the BJP and the secular, democratic forces represented by V.P. Singh's Janata Dal and the left parties. Any individual or party which do not clearly identify with one or the other of the three forces are likely to be wiped out. The BJP, for instance, could not continue to equivocate and had to adopt a clear pro-Hindu stance. The BJP today, for all its utterances, is not viewed as being particularly secular and is counting on polarising the electorate into two antagonistic camps along communal lines.

The Congress(I), on the other hand, believes that no other party can provide a stable government. Rajiv Gandhi seems to feel that his party's main task is to prove to the electorate that no Opposition party can provide a viable government. In this respect, Chandra Shekhar is bound to lose out sooner or later.

V.P. Singh's Janata Dal, in contrast, has clearly taken a middle position in Indian politics. While Singh cannot hope for an early electoral victory, the left knows that social and historical conditions prevailing in the country favour a mainstream, democratic and secular party. Only such a mainstream force is capable of remaining in the running in the long term. The left consequently feels that it is best to align with V.P. Singh. ●

THE FINAL DAYS

JAGDISH YADAV

How Rajiv's first prime ministership ended. An extract from a new biography

On 17 October it was announced that the 1989 elections would take place on 22, 24 and 26 November. Four days earlier, constitutional amendments designed to give effect to Rajiv's much-vaunted programme of 'power to the people' were defeated in the Upper House. The Panchayati Raj and Nagarpalika Bills failed by just three votes to win the requisite two-thirds majority in this latest parliamentary challenge to Rajiv. Needless to say, he had no trouble getting the legislation through the Lower House; Congress's massive majority combined with the fact that almost all Opposition MPs had resigned in August, after the Comptroller and Auditor General's report had criticised the Bofors howitzer contract, ensured the Bills an easy passage.

Rajiv's decision to call the election seven weeks before he had to—most observers were expecting the poll in early January—was based on a number of factors. There was undoubtedly concern amongst his advisors that there would be more embarrassing disclosures in the Bofors affair. Five days before the polls were announced, the associate editor of The Hindu newspaper had accused the government of bringing economic pressure to bear on his paper in an effort to prevent further disclosures. Another fear was that prices would rise sharply over the next few weeks—despite a favourable monsoon, which was expected to result in a record grain crop, prices of some other staples had rocketed. The price of sugar in particular had shot up. After a poor crop, the government had been slow to arrange for supplies to be imported to meet the shortfall. By the time the election was called, sugar (one of the most widely used foodstuffs in India) was fetching Rs 12 a kilogram, double its price when Rajiv came to power five years earlier.

Rajiv also had worries about a resurgence of communalism with the threat by militant Hindus to march to the disputed shrine at Ayodhya to build a temple on the site of the Babri mosque. The way in which religious passions had been aroused was highlighted when severe communal rioting broke out at Bhagalpur in eastern Bihar within days of the announcement of the elections. Many hundred Muslims died in more than two weeks of communal blood-letting. Though not directly connected, there was a feeling that the politicisation of the Ayodhya issue and resulting communal polarisation had played their part in unleashing communal forces at Bhagalpur.

However, it was Congress's assessment of the extent to which Opposition parties could maintain their fragile unity that was the major factor in the decision to go for early polls. The

"A minister admitted that Rajiv was "a negative factor"

Rajiv Gandhi kept a punishing schedule during the four-week campaign, addressing 170 meetings in as many constituencies. Only someone with Rajiv's stamina could have kept it up Panchayati Raj and Nagarpalika Bills had been narrowly defeated in the Upper House by a coalition of Opposition interests which, beside the middle-of-the-road National Front alliance—dominated by the Janata Dal—included the Communists and the Hindu nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party, or BJP. Despite their shared objective of ousting Congress from power, it was becoming abundantly clear that the Communists and the BJP would not cooperate in an election. Furthermore, the Communists were saying that if the Janata Dal formed an electoral alliance with the BJP they would not support it. Since the Opposition's hopes of throwing Congress out rested on their degree of unity—the extent to which they did not contest against each other at the hustings but fielded common candidates—this represented the best hope Congress had of retaining power.

Indeed, differences between the parties which comprised the Opposition were not the only weakness on which Congress hoped to play. Bickering was continuing within the National Front itself, especially within the electorally important state of Uttar Pradesh, over who should hand out the election 'tickets'. The announcement that elections to state Assemblies would take place at the same time as the Lok Sabha polls in five states, including Uttar Pradesh, for the first time since 1967, was further evidence of an attempt by Congress to catch the Opposition off their guard. It noped, with good reason, that the simultaneous polls would bring the National Front leadership bickering to the fore, and would test the state level organisation of the newly formed alliance against the Congress party organisation.

In fact, by the time nominations had closed and the time for withdrawal of nominations had passed, the Opposition parties had achieved a high degree of unity. This was mainly the result of agreements between the two dominant Opposition forces, the Janata Dal-led National Front and the BJP, not to contest against each other in around 85 per cent of the seats where the two would otherwise have fielded candidates. The National Front also reached a smaller number of seat-sharing agreements with one or other of the Communist parties.

Before the campaign commenced, Congress suffered another setback. Defence minister K.C. Pant learned on the final day for filing nominations that he was not being allowed to contest from the Nainital constituency in Uttar Pradesh that he regarded as his family seat. He declined two other constituencies offered him and declared he would not contest the election. At a press conference, he complained that the party apparatus had fallen victim to 'state bossism', a return to the days when party leaders in the state rather than in Delhi handed out electoral 'tickets'. He also complained of the role of 'inexperienced and unelected coteries' whom he accused of interfering in political decision making. Mr Pant was criticising, and in a very public manner, the small group of political aides on whom Rajiv depended, people like R.K. Dhawan, Mani Shankar Aiyar and Satish Sharma, who had come to play a key role in political decision-making. This criticism from one of Rajiv's longest-serving ministers, who had been moved from the steel and mines ministry to defence when V.P. Singh was forced to resign, was the most public indication that morale in the Congress party was low. Another senior minister admitted off the record that Rajiv was 'a negative factor' in the Congress campaign, adding: "We should have got rid of him, but it's too late now."

By the time the campaign opened on 5 November, observers who had been predicting a narrow Congress victory—perhaps the largest party in Parliament without necessarily gaining an overall majority, they said—were giving the two sides even chances of victory. Everything would depend on the campaign itself. What was evident from the beginning was that there was no 'electoral wave', like the sympathy wave that had swept Rajiv to power five years earlier, shortly after his mother's assassination, or the anti-Emergency wave that had swept his mother out of power 12 years earlier. There were few national issues, though the sharp rises in prices was the main one. The Opposition tried hard to make Bofors and corruption in public life an electoral issue, with pic-

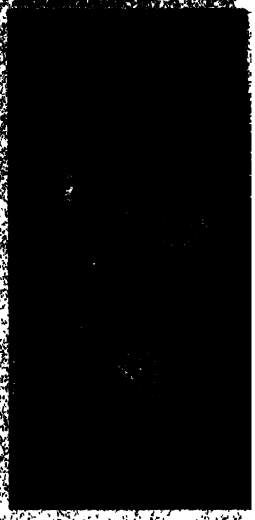
To an extent the bid to make corruption a key election issue succeeded. Much of V.P. Singh's own following were derived from his campaign against corruption and a belief that he really would try to clean up public life, in the way that he had started to as Rajiv's finance minister. His campaign against black money, which he described at election meetings as 'robbing the poor', earned him much respect, rather as Rajiv's father, Feroze, had won widespread support and respect for his own parliamentary drive against corruption in the 1950s.

This was also the election in which the Nehruvian concept of secularism was on trial. The BJP, in particular, made it a central part of its campaign, asking "Why should we not be proud of our Hindu heritage and why should we pander to Muslims and other minorities?" Anyone who doubts the effectiveness of this argument has only to look at how the BJP, in alliance with another Hindu fundamentalist party, the Shiv Sena, increased its parliamentary seats at this elections from two to 88. At any rate, Congress seem to have lost the Muslim vote from an early stage; probably due to the feeling that the party was backing the fundamentalist Hindu line over Ayodhya. However, the failure of the Congress government to protect Muslims from being killed at Bhagalpur, whilst the election campaign was underway, was also a factor in bringing about the Muslim alienation from Congress.

It was at the insistence of the Uttar Pradesh chief minister, N D. Tiwari, that Rajiv went to seek the blessing of the Hindu holy man, Deoraha Baba, three days before the foundation stone of the Hindu temple was to be laid at Ayodhya. Rajiv says Deoraha Baba "sent me a message asking me to come to see him, indicating that he had convinced the various groups not to precipitate the Ayodhya issue". He says he called on the holy man in an effort to defuse the Ayodhya dispute, and prevent it leading to violence.

Deoraha Baba, who died in June 1990, used to speak of India being a home for followers of all religions, but he was undeniably a Hindu holy man, living as he did on the banks of the river Jamuna,close to the birthplace of another Hindu god, Krishna. He would not reveal what passed between him and Rajiv at their hastily arranged meeting, but said people came to seek his guidance for the well-being of the country. If there was a message of peace and reconciliation over Ayodhya, Rajiv did not share it. He made no effort to ban the laying of the foundation stone of the Hindu temple at a ceremony in which thousands of bricks brought from all over India were blessed. Nor did he condemn the action, which was bound to cause concern to all India's Muslims that Hindu nationalism was on the march again.

Indeed, about the only positive thing that can be said about Rajiv's role in the Ayodhya dispute is that he turned down a suggestion that he himself lay the temple's foundation stone, a suggestion that reportedly emanated from his own home minister, Buta Singh. Buta Singh had several meetings with the Vishwa Hindu Parishad in the period leading up to the foundation stone ceremony on 9 November. That may have been a legitimate role for a home minister, but it strengthened the belief that Congress were quietly supporting this provocative enterprise. Was Rajiv really putting into effect a Congress decision to exploit the dispute at Ayodhya for political advantage, a decision which, according to Arun Nehru, had been taken nearly four years earlier? The suspicions grew ever stronger.



Launching his election campaign at Ayodhya's district capital of Faizabad, Rajiv claimed that only Congress could restore 'Ram Rajya'. Mahatma Gandhi had first coined this concept of India's Golden Age. He had in mind a land in which minorities of all sorts were protected by the existence of perfect justice, tolerance, equality and freedom But, in an age where religious fundamentalism was on the verge of becoming religious bigotry, the notion of 'Ram Rajya' was all too easily misinterpreted to mean the rule of the god Ram, in other words, Hindu rule. It was a dangerous appeal to introduce into the election campaign, and one which risked further alienating Muslims who had already been alienated by the Bhagalpur communal massacre. Congress has always regarded the Muslim vote as a 'vote bank' on which it could depend, though the beliefs that Muslims vote en bloc for one party, or that Congress deserved to be regarded as the main protector of Muslims and other minorities, are both open to question.

If Congress was 'playing the Hindu card', it seems to have backfired. The foundation stone ceremony on 9 November passed off peacefully thanks to a heavy police presence. But this dangerous appeal to Hindu sentiment did not appear to win Congress any support, and may indeed have helped lose Congress the election. The Janata Dal picked up the mantle of secularism, and with it the votes of the minorities. Voters who were of a Hindu fundamentalist persuasion rejected Congress in large numbers in favour of the BJP.

Rajiv himself kept a punishing schedule during the four-week campaign, addressing 170 meetings in as many constituencies. The choice of constituency visits was made on the strength of a computer assessment of the challenge to Congress. Rajiv would leave Delhi well before dawn on the Air Force Boeing which, for reasons of security, the Election Commissioners had allowed him to use, though the costs of operating the Boeing and the fleet of helicopters, which took him to locations without air strips, were charged to Congress. The Prime Minister took light meals only en route, and availed himself of shower facilities on board the Boeing allowing him to arrive at meetings even late in the day still looking fresh and relaxed. He also kept pretty closely to the timetable. A typical day took him to three or four states, addressing two or three meetings in each. Two fleets, each of three Soviet-built helicopters, had gone ahead, practising their landings in sometimes difficult locations on the previous day. His last meeting of the day would be well after dark, and after midnight he would take off by Boeing for the first port of call of the following day, catching a few short hours' sleep on the aircraft, or else in the circuit house on arrival. Only someone with Rajiv's stamina could have kept it up.

Towards the end of the campaign, some of Rajiv's scheduled meetings were cancelled. This was because of indications that large crowds could not be guaranteed to turn up—something which was already being exploited by the anti-Congress press—rather than because Rajiv was flagging. Opposition leaders had criticised the ruling that only Rajiv could use government aircraft, especially since they found their own movements by air were limited by the effects of a strike by Indian Airlines' engineers. Nor did it necessarily enhance Rajiv's image in the eyes of the people. As one of his political opponents asked: "How can he know what's happening on the ground while he's moving around in the sky?"

As Rajiv travelled the length and breadth of the country, accompanied on at least one tour by his son, Rahul, Sonia and daughter Priyanka campaigned in his constituency, Amethi. It is a prospering constituency of 1½ million people, clearly showing the benefit of having the Prime Minister as its MP. Most roads are metalled and most villages have both drinking water and electricity. There had also been a mini industrial boom with many small factories setting up there. Sonia was the main attraction for curious villagers, anxious to see this foreigner who always wears a sari, and speaks good Hindi. She preferred to enter homes and talk to people at the roadside rather than address public meetings. She handed out Rajiv stickers and badges, and, to the ladies, caste marks to stick on the forehead in the shape of the Congress election symbol, the hand. Sonia's message was to point out how the situation in the villages of the constituency had improved since Rajiv became Amethi's MP eight and a half years earlier, and to appeal in Hindi: "Brothers and sisters, if you want our work to continue, vote for my husband." She moved quickly between villages, earning herself the title 'the whirlwind of Amethi'. Explaining away her foreignness, Sonia told the electorate: "I may be a daughter of Italy, but I am the daughter-in-law of Amethi."

Rajiv made several fleeting visits to Amethi, campaigning as much for the Congress candidates in the state Assembly elections, which were taking place in Uttar Pradesh simultaneously with the parliamentary poll. Though he was confidently expecting to be re-elected, the Janata Dal had chosen as its candidate the grandson of Mahatma Gandhi, Rajmohan Gandhi, which introduced both a rival dynastic appeal and a confusion of names into the electoral battle. Rajiv had entrusted the organisation of his campaign in Amethi to his pilot friend, Satish Sharma, who is sure that religion was an important factor in the constituency. He believes the BJP took advantage of the heightened Hindu awareness, promoted by the Ramayan and Mahabharat on television, whilst Congress lost the Muslim vote because Muslims were 'confused' about the party's position over Ayodhya and as a result of the Bhagalpur massacre which was, he says, 'a big factor'.

Cassettes and videos were widely used to help candidates put their message across. The major parties had special election songs composed and had them recorded by well known singers and movie stars. Candidates had themselves filmed meeting important people, and then showed the videos from the backs of campaign vehicles to enhance their appeal to an electorate that is addicted to films and television. Loudspeakers also blared forth political messages at street corners. Walls were bedecked with colourful posters displaying the party symbols—a hand for the Congress party and a wheel for the Janata Dal—which appear on the ballot paper to help illiterate people cast their votes. Posters of Rajiv, his mother and grandfather demonstrated that Congress considered the dynastic factor to be a plus point in their favour. They took advantage of the fact that the centenary of Nehru's birth and the 72nd anniversary of Indira's birth both fell during the campaign period. One of Rajiv's campaign slogans was Mera Bharat Mahaan or 'My India is Great'. Both the slogan and Congress's use of Nehru and Indira Gandhi as campaign symbols were criticised by the Opposition, who resented the implicit suggestions that India belonged to Congress, or that Congress had a monopoly on patriotism.

V.P. Singh's face was noticeably absent from Janata Dal and National Front posters, probably because neither the party nor the alliance had been able to agree for sure that V.P. Singh was their candidate for Prime Minister. Had they done so, it might have improved their electoral prospects. Opinion polls suggested that an overwhelming majority of those planning to vote for the National Front wanted V.P. Singh to become Prime Minister, rather than any other National Front leader. In many respects, the election was a personality contest between Rajiv Gandhi and V.P. Singh.

All large parties are entitled to television airtime for election broadcasts. However, there was a row when Doordarshan, the television service, refused to allow a broadcast which mentioned Bofors. Opposition parties argued that Doordarshan had no legal right to censor or edit campaign broadcasts, and most of them decided to boycott television. In its own election coverage, Doordarshan showed a remarkable degree of balance, considering how unbalanced it had been over the previous few months. It was now subject to additional rules on impartiality imposed by the Election Code. Significantly, all major parties, including Congress, were making much of their plans to reduce government controls over radio and television by granting the broadcasters greater autonomy. Inevitably, Opposition parties wanted to know why, if Congress believed in autonomy now, it had not already loosened the government's control over the electronic media.

(Anticlockwise from left) K.C. Pant publicly criticised the role of Satish Sharma, R.K. Dhawan and Mani Shankar Aiyar. It was an indication that morale in the Congress party was low titled to cast their votes. This included about 35 million who had newly gained the franchise with the lowering of the voting age from 21 to 18. Three and a half million officials were deployed to staff 5,89,449 polling booths in the largest exercise of democracy anywhere in the world. It was an awe-inspiring thought that the entire process took place on three days, with two rest days in between. The Election Commission, which is entrusted with organising elections, estimated the total bill was around Rs 1600 million (£ 66 million), not including what the political parties spent on their campaigns. In the circumstances it was more surprising that voting passed off peacefully at the vast majority of booths than that repolling was ordered at around 1200. It was, in fact, the most violent election India has ever had, with over 100 people killed in poll-related violence. There were many examples of 'booth capturing', especially in Bihar and Andhra Pradesh, with thugs employed by one party literally to capture polling booths and either mark all the ballot papers in favour of their candidate, or only allow known sympathisers to cast their votes.

What shocked many people was the extent of the violence in the Prime Minister's own constituency of Amethi, from where there was little doubt that Rajiv would be re-elected. It caused V.P. Singh to remark that the last action of the ruling party was to kill democracy. A prominent member of the Janata Dal and relative of V.P. Sanjay Singh, who was contesting for a state Assembly seat from Amethi, was shot and badly injured in the stomach. Rajiv's Janata Dal-rival for the Amethi Lok Sabha seat, Rajmohan Gandhi, refused to accept the election result, pointing out that both the returning officer and the superintendent of police were implicated in attempts to rig the polls, and were transferred before the repolling took place. He brought an election petition which, if successful, would result in the Amethi result being declared null and void, and repolling ordered. This had happened to Indira Gandhi in 1975, prompting her to declare the Emergency rather than bow to the court ruling. The rigging and violence in the Prime Minister's constituency left a stain on the 1989 electoral process. According to Rajiv's campaign manager, Satish Sharma, it was unnecessary anyway since Rajiv had a clear lead over his nearest rival and namesake.

It was apparent to those reporting the campaign that many people were planning to cast their vote for negative rather than positive reasons. Many were rejecting Congress rather than endorsing the National Front alternative. This was especially true in traditional Congress territory like Bihar, where the party's almost universal renomination of its sitting MPs backfired. Voters showed their dissatisfaction with the sitting MPs' performances by voting them out. In south India, where Congress did well in a reverse of the trend in the north, the biggest single factor seemed to be that people were casting their votes against the ruling state governments. There, it was not so much a pro-Rajiv or anti-V.P. Singh vote but rather it was a vote against the ruling DMK government of Tamil Nadu, or ruling Telegu Desam government of Andhra Pradesh, that allowed Congress to retain a majority of southern seats at the same time as it was losing most seats in the north.

It was clear as soon as counting started that no party would gain an overall majority of the 525 seats being contested. Indeed, the opinion polls were predicting that for the first time ever India would have a hung Parliament. What was less easy to anticipate was which party would be best placed to form either a minority or a coalition government. There was much discussion about the obligations of the President. Constitutional authorities agreed that he was not bound to call on the leader of the largest party if no party had an overall majority, but was obliged only to call on whoever he thought could command majority support in the Lok Sabha. Some authorities pointed to the precedent set in Britain in 1923 when King George V called on Ramsay MacDonald, the Labour leader, to form a government, even though Labour had won fewer seats than the Conservatives. The King had correctly anticipated that Stanley Baldwin's Conservative government would be defeated on the floor of the House by the combined votes of Labour and Liberals. The precedent could well have been held to apply to India since British precedents prevailing at the time of Independence have been held to apply to India.

The President's decision became easier when Congress made it clear that, despite having the most seats (193), they would not attempt to form a government. They accepted the fact that the Janata Dal (141), supported by the Bharatiya Janata Party (88) and the Communists and other leftists (51), had a better chance of forming a government, given the fact that these three groups had already enjoyed a loose alliance by their agreement not to contest against each other in many constituencies. Congress made no attempt to seek the support of any other party to help them form a government, but decided instead to accept defeat gracefully and to go into Opposition. The decision was Rajiv's, though obviously he had the endorsement of senior Congress leaders.

The widely expected horse-trading, to induce elected members to change parties after being elected, did not take place, despite the fact that two well-known industrialists were sitting in Delhi hotels with cheque books at the ready, willing, it was said, to purchase support for Congress. The fact that this did not happen was due to Rajiv's Anti-Defection Act which had effectively outlawed this practice by providing that any member changing his party would forfeit his seat, unless more than a third of elected party members changed sides. No newly elected MP would risk losing his seat in this way. So Rajiv offered his resignation, and broadcast to the nation: "The people have given their verdict. In all humility, we respect their verdict."

It was as if he had looked back at the address his mother had given twelve years earlier on the only previous occasion that Congress had been defeated in a general election. Wanting to demonstrate that she continued to abide by the rules of democracy, even after the Emergency, she had said: "My colleagues and I accept the verdict unreservedly, and in a spirit of humility." Indira Gandhi in 1977 went on to offer her "good wishes to the new government that will be formed". So too did Rajiv in 1989. He said: "A new government will be formed. We extend to them our good wishes, and offer them our constructive cooperation." Rajiv pledged that Congress would re-dedicate itself to "the cause of India's greatness", and expressed the hope that "the basic pillars of our nationhood—democracy, socialism, secularism and nonalignment—would be maintained".

Once Congress had accepted defeat, the focus of interest turned to the National Front to see if they could put together a government. Ideological differences ruled out the possibility of the Communists and the Bharatiya Janata Party serving together in government, but both groups agreed to provide support from outside government to a minority National Front administration. The final hurdle was for the National Front to agree its leaders and candidate for Prime Minister. There was a challenge to V.P. Singh from at least one veteran politician, Mr Chandra Shekhar, who, as one columnist wrote, had spent more years being Prime Minister-in-waiting than most others had in politics. His candidacy was thwarted, though, after some nifty manoeuvring behind the scenes and V.P. Singh was appointed firstly by the Janata Dal and then by the National Front as leader. His decision to revive the post of deputy prime minister and to offer it to the Haryana chief minister, Devi Lal, owed more to the need for a balance of factions within the Front than anything else.

The swearing in of V.P. Singh was as graceful a transition of power as one could hope to witness. It took place under the glittering chandeliers and painted ceiling of the Ashoka Hall in the presidential palace, Rashtrapati Bhawan. Journalists outnumbered politicians, many of whom could not find seats. Rajiv Gandhi took his seat in the front row. When the Prime Minister-designate walked in, he made a bee-line for Rajiv, exchanging the clasped hands namastaye greeting with him. After President Venkataraman had administered the oaths of office to V.P. Singh and his appointed deputy, Devi Lal, in a ten-minute ceremony, Rajiv Gandhi was the first to offer the new leader his congratulations. It was as if he were saying 'no hard feelings' to this former friend and Cabinet colleague, who had so strongly attacked Rajiv since being forced out of the government and out of the Congress party two and a half years earlier.

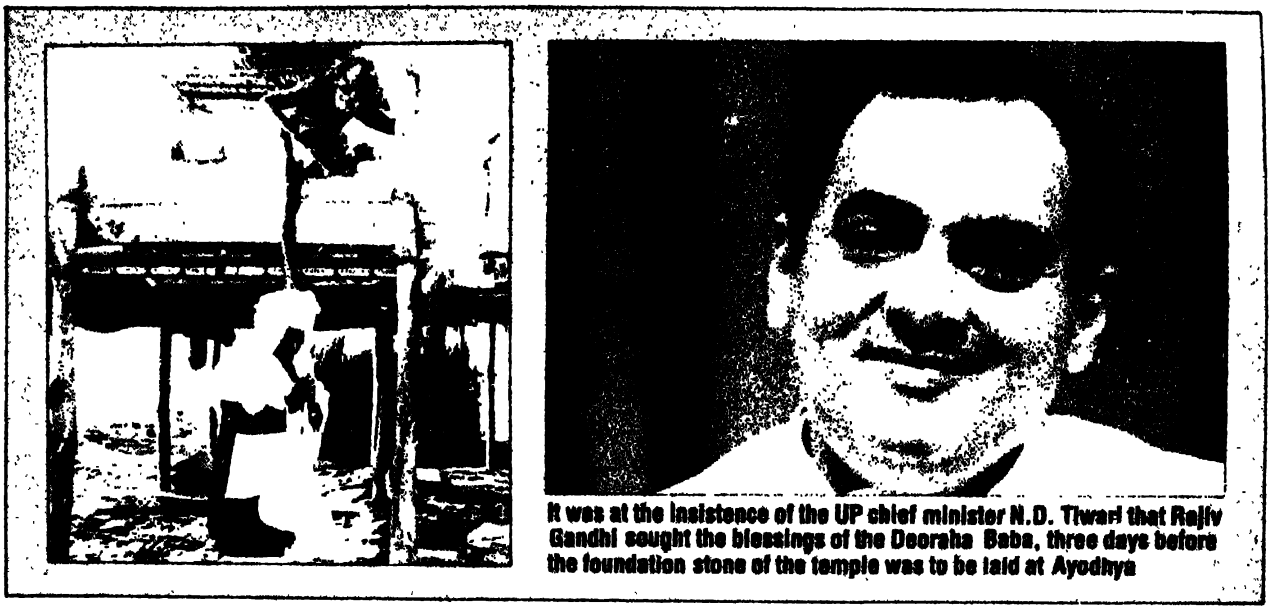
The glamour of the occasion, with invited guests wearing their best apparel and the elegant presidential guard in turbans and red tunics, was a far cry from the sombre occasion five years one month and two days earlier when, in a hastily arranged ceremony, Rajiv Gandhi had been sworn in as Prime Minister a matter of hours after his mother's death. It marked the end of a politically-charged week which had seen the defeat of the Congress party for only the second time in 42 independent years. Speaking to journalists after the swearing in, an unrepentant Rajiv said he thought India had never had the sort of development and progress of the previous five years. This was one of the rare occasions on which representatives of the media had been able to speak to Rajiv since the Comptroller and Auditor General's report on the Bofors deal had appeared some months earlier. He had been cocooned by his aides throughout the election campaign. One journalist asked the former Prime Minister: "Who got the Bofors money?" Noticing the editor of The Hindu in the circle of journalists, Rajiv replied: "Why don't you ask N. Ram, he knows better than me?"



The new Prime Minister, V.P. Singh, scion of the small princely family of Manda in eastern Uttar Pradesh, is a very different man from Rajiv Gandhi. Despite his princely origins and university education, he has a better claim than Rajiv to be considered as a man of the people. He had cut his teeth in Uttar Pradesh state politics, rising to become chief minister, only to resign two years later after failing in his pledge to end banditry in the state. His strong principles, manifested in his determination as Rajiv's finance minister to crack down on corruption, bribery and other sorts of malpractice in public life, had both forced him out of Congress and won him popular support. This had also set him against Rajiv, and in Uttar Pradesh, from where both men draw their electoral support, the election was portrayed as a contest between Rajiv and 'the Raja', as V.P. Singh is known.

Curiously Rajiv and V.P. Singh have at least two things in common. Both received their secondary education in Dehra Dun; Rajiv attending the well known Doon School and V.P. Singh—Rajiv's senior by 13 years—going to Colonel Brown's School. V.P. Singh still owns property in Dehra Dun, where he is regarded as a model landlord. Both Rajiv and V.P. Singh also regard the Uttar Pradesh city of Allahabad as their home town. All but one of India's seven Prime Ministers have come from Uttar Pradesh, but then three of the seven have come from the same family.

The day after resigning as Prime Minister, Rajiv was re-elected unopposed to lead the Congress party. There were many who believed Congress would dump him after the defeat. He owes his survival as party leader in the face of electoral defeat to two factors. First, the party's impressive showing in the four southern states, from where it won 103 of the 130 seats (more than half its total seats). It also recaptured control of the southern states of Andhra Pradesh and Karnataka in the simultaneous state Assembly polls, some consolation for losing Uttar Pradesh. Congress was certainly not the losing party in south India, and the Congress MPs elected from there had reason to be grateful to Rajiv for the part he had played in their campaign. Unlike V.P. Singh, who confined his campaign to the north, Rajiv had campaigned extensively throughout the country.

The second factor that worked to Rajiv's advantage was the fact that all potential rivals for the Congress party leadership—men like N.D. Tiwari of Uttar Pradesh, Jagannath Mishra of Bihar and Arjun Singh of Madhya Pradesh—found their power bases severely eroded by the election result. There were no clear contenders for leadership from the states where Congress remained strong, such as Maharashtra, Karnataka or Andhra Pradesh. Despite rumours that Rajiv already had a flight booked to Italy in the event of defeat, he made it clear he would contine to lead Congress, and repeated his pledge to bring democracy to the party. Sonia was said to have been strongly in favour of his remaining in politics.

Three months later, Rajiv suffered further setbacks when Congress fared badly at elections to eight more state Assemblies. Only in Maharashtra and Arunachal Pradesh was Congress able to form governments. Rajiv had once again campaigned extensively, piloting himself in a light aircraft for much of the tour. He had greatly enjoyed the return to flying, but as far as the elections were concerned the results were, he said, "very much as we had expected". In other words, after losing the Lok Sabha elections, Congress had considerably reduced it's expectations at the Assembly polls.

By this time, Rajiv seemed to be enjoying Opposition, or at least had adjusted to his new role. In Parliament, Congress had not opposed some early measures by the V.P. Singh government, including the repeal of the notorious 59th Amendment, which had provided for special emergency powers in Punjab. It also supported the constitutional Amendment to extend President's Rule in Punjab. Rajiv had adjusted to a reduced level of security, which remained reasonably tight, had moved home a short distance to Janpath, one of New Delhi's elegant avenues, and had surrendered his much loved Mercedes and Range Rover to the government. They were the 'perks' of office that he had to leave behind. He also had to get used to travelling by public transport—scheduled flights and trains—except when Congress chartered the aircraft for his election tour. Till the state Assembly polls were over, he was hardly less busy than he had been as Prime Minister, but was looking forward to spending more time with his family.

Shortly before the Lok Sabha elections, a music-loving friend from outside the political arena had put it to Rajiv: "Suppose you lose the elections?" He replied: "That would be peace for me. I shall just sit and listen to music with the children." He was also hoping to take up old hobbies again; apart from the flying, he wanted to resume his interest in amateur radio. But remaining as Congress president, he also faced the tough task he had set himself four years earlier in Bombay of reforming the party, a task he said was still determined to carry out and which he thought would be easier to accomplish in Opposition. •

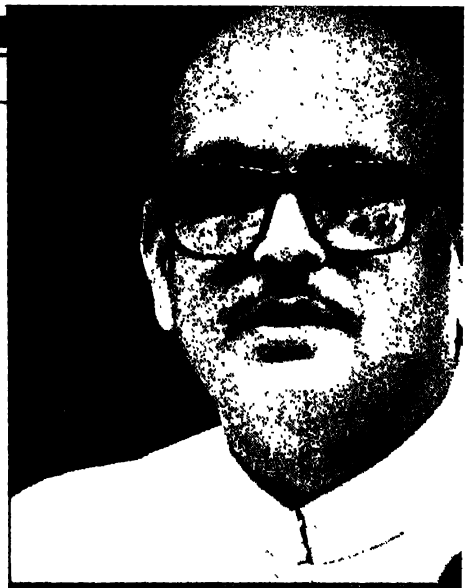
All the men who nobody will remember



As he exited from Parliament after the vote that brought down the V.P. Singh government, waiting newshounds asked Chandra Shekhar for a comment and—so say the papers—he replied that the vote signalled "the end of a Chapter". Now that, to my slightly startled surprise, I find myself on the same side as Chandra Shekharji (not to mention the Tau, with whom, henceforth, we are as two peas in a pod!), may I, as usual, set off on the wrong foot by immediately disagreeing with our new Prime Minister?

No, the fall of the National Front government was not "the end of a chapter"—it was but the closing of a footnote! Within weeks, perhaps days, the characters who have filled our lives these last 11 months with so much fun and excitement will have receded into the remoter recesses of our memory. Who, we will say to each other in faint perplexity, was Sharad Yadav? The thin one with the beard? Or the festooned one who came in the economy pack?

Well, since parting, as Romeo told Juliet (or was it the other way round?) is such sweet sorrow, before we reach the stage where we have to ask a JNU Professor of Ancient History (or, alternatively, Menaka Gandhi nee Maneka Gandhi) whether Nilamony Routray was an animal, mineral or vegetable, this column would wish to put on record a Who's Who of Who They Were.

First, the glycerine Prime Minister, Vishwanath Pratap Singh. An outstanding deputy minister of commerce, he will be much missed in the ministry of commerce where, aeons ago (can it be but 15 years? How time flies!) he blinked his way past the babus lounging in the corridors (taking time off from mulcting itinerant garment exporters) in that friendly, informal way of his that endeared him to all and sundry—missed because former PMs, however short-lived, can never really qualify again for reappointment to what they are best at—be it no more than a humble niche in an undisturbed corner of Udyog Bhavan. So, farewell, dear heart (or however many pieces are left of it!).

Next, the home minister, Mufti Mohammad Sayeed, whose ministrations truly began at home as, within days of his being pitchforked into North Block (to the astonishment of even his best friends and squeals of delight from the Hizb-ul-Muslimeen), he converted his high office into an internal combustion engine. Ah, the ifs of history: if VP had not decided that a token Muslim was what Home needed, no one would have kidnapped Rubaiya. If no one had kidnapped the home minister's daughter, no one would have released a bunch of thugs. If no one had released a bunch of thugs, Jagmohan would not have gone to Srinagar. If Jagmohan had not gone to Srinagar, Farooq and his Assembly would have remained where they were. If they had remained where they were, we would have gone back to Kashmir this summer for our holidays. And the apples would have grown red. And the honey golden... Truly, terrorism, like charity, begins at Home!

V.P. SINGH

Across the road to South Block, where the foreign service wipes its eyes at the departure of their resident billy-goat, the mild-mannered Inder Kumar Gujral. One of us, we thought. None of this ethnic fancy dress about him: kurta, pyjama, fatoi and what-not. Instead, a natty suit. Quiet tie. Trimmed goatee. A man among men. Who could, besides, actually read and write. Alas, chairing luncheon meetings at the India International Centre

P. UPENDRA

How will history remember him? A crusader for media freedom? As the Voltaire of Indian revolution? Or as the McLuhan of Indian broadcasting?

(IIC) turned out to be but little qualification for running reality. Quickly sizing him up for the small town Rotary Club president that he is, our neighbours, one by one, took the mickey out our clockwork EAM (IFA-ese for external affairs minister).

So, the Sri Lankans showed him how the tail can wag the dog. And the Nepalese, deeply embarrassed, pleaded with Gujral to please remove his foreign secretary from Kathmandu, where Gujral had sent the man in the very week that shook the Himalayan kingdom—with that expert sense of timing which makes the serving of lunch at the IIC such a delight—so that they could, please, get on with their Revolution! And Gujral's Pakistani counterpart, Sahibzada Yaqub Khan—the Imran Khan of subcontinental diplomacy—demonstrated with consummate skill how to bat against the feeble bowling of well-meaning but vaguely intentioned liberals: a six off every ball—and Gujral applauding in the pavilion, apparently not quite sure which side we were supposed to be on, his mind preoccupied either with the imminent prospect of lunch or the toast in Urdu to follow. In the mind's eye of history, the enduring image of foreign policy a la Gujral will always remain that of Saddam Hussain locking Gujral in a bearhug on TV, then looking up all the Indians, putting the keys away, and asking our EAM to ask the Prime Minister (of India, no less!) to 'phone' him when he wanted the Indians out.

Which, of course, VP could not do—because, as Gujral solemnly informed the House (in words that will ensure immortality for him in the annals of any parliamentary history), "we don't know what our policy is"! No, not goodbye, Gujralji—only au revoir. For we shall see you anon at lunch time—at the IIC.

Of Arun Nehru at Udyog Bhavan, what will history remember? A man who got on with his job—till the politics of intrigue intervened. For the first six months—right down till June—the wide-bodied Nehru put himself in a wide-bodied Boeing and took himself off—as commerce ministers must do—to all those unlikely nooks and crannies of the world where a hapless foreign buyer is waiting to snap up an Indian geegaw sold to him by the country's commerce minister (no less!) at bargain basement prices. Performance: oustanding. Exports: booming. Imports: under control. Then, a fatal interview to the editor of SUNDAY: the ace played by the Master Manipulator to trump the Artful Dodger. In weeks, he'd brought the whole National Front manzil crashing down. And with it—a minor detail in a minor footnote—the whole of our balance of payments as well.

At the other end of Udyog Bhavan sat Ajit Singh, disproving the conventional belief that a Jat can't be a computer boy. Years of modern education—and 21st century money-making in America—made Ajit Singh into one of the most competent ministers of industry we have ever seen. But history will recall him only in the words of a famous London tabloid headline reporting a mining accident:

"Sons of Toil Buried Under Tons of Soil!"

For, as he shuttled between Bagpat and Lucknow, Lucknow and Delhi, Delhi and other centres of the Jat heartland, now seeking out Tikait, now hiding from him, now proclaiming undying fealty to the Tau, now disclaiming the wretch and all his works, now confabulating with Chautala, now playing footsie with his brother Ranjit, now cozying up to Mulayam Singh, now egging on Reoti Raman, stretching, contracting, splitting, reforming, reproducing one cell into a myriad, then resuming the myriad into one, this Amoeba of Indian politics has entertained us these last 11 months to a carnival of combinations quite matching his Prime Minister's "carnival of principles". The carnival has ended. The roller-coaster ride is over. The swings are as silent as the roundabouts. The pickpockets have gone home. Good night, Ajit Singhji. Sleep well. And may your dreams be purple.

Across Rajpath, opposite Nirman Bhavan, stands the imposing Shastri Bhavan—home till but the other day of that Crusader for Media Freedom, P. Upendra, minister (and who does not know? Who can ever forget?) for information and broadcasting. How will history remember him? As the Voltaire of the Indian Revolution? As the Marshal McLuhan of Indian broadcasting? As the K.K. Tewari of the National Front? What hopes our innocents reposed in him—all those B.G. Vergheses and Khushwant Singhs, those Pran Chopras and Nikhil Chakravartys, those Shoba Des and Amita Maliks ("Dear VP, may we call you VP? For that is what all of us so affectionately call you when we are among ourselves"—sic! I swear, and a representative sample of the Mills and Boon school of Express television reviewing!) How they excoriated the Congress! How fondly they gawped at their Hero! And how splendidly he showed them in the end the Great Principle of Indian Politics: once a clapper-boy, always a clapper-boy. Upendra's vast experience of the small screen and the big screen, the lapel microphone and the NF megaphone will now stand NTR in final good stead as his once-upon-a-time chela, now turned Prodigal Son, returns to the Ramakrishna Studios in Hyderabad to give one last exquisite touch to the scene where Menaka dances to the Maharishi in the Telugu Desam update of that great Indian epic, Vishwamitra!

And as he packs his crumpled pyjamas into his decaying bags and prepares to depart from Rail Bhavan, George Fernandes, late minister for the railways (and sometime minister for Kashmir affairs and sometime NF minister for Tibet affairs and always NF minister for putting-foot-in-mouth) grouches, grumbles and growls. When once every decade George becomes a temporary minister, he suddenly assumes a benign aspect: gentle, considerate, balanced, courteous. Then comes the fall—as, inevitably, anything that contains George must come to. And George promptly reverts to type: mean, vicious, foul-mouthed, the garbage he spouted in his swan-song in the Lok Sabha signalling his return to vintage Fernandes. Ta-ta, George. See you again at the barricades.

Saddest of all, Chimanbhai Mehta, the minister for human resource development (HRD). For months, V.P. Singh kept this vast behemoth of a ministry without a head. Then he fought with the Tau—and thus discovered the virtues of education and culture. So, arch-defector Chimanbhai Mehta (not to be confused with our new-found friend in Ahmedabad, Chimanbhai Patel: i.e. our Chimanbhai—as against their Chimanbhai) was made the minister for HRD. Alas, however, at the precise moment that the National Front decided that the purpose of government was not governance but fraternal fisticuffs. And thus it came about that it was all over for poor Chimanbhai even before he had got started. So, how will history remember Chimanbhai Mehta? Doubtless as the Chimanbhai that history does not remember!

ARUN NEHRU

In weeks he brought the whole National Front crashing down. And with it, the whole of our balance of payments as well

But no history can forget the noble contribution of Ram Vilas Paswan and Sharad Yadav to the retrieval of India's destiny. But for these two, V.P. Singh might still have been Prime Minister! T.S. Eliot once said—and I may have quoted this before—that "history has many cunning passages". And one of the most cunning ever devised was the backward passage that Paswan and Yadav treaded with such devious cunning. They persuaded V.P. Singh that Mandal was the answer to all his woes. They held his hand as the Tau and the Jan Morcha deserted him. It was they who picked up the pieces as bits of the Prime Minister's heart kept breaking off. It was they who wiped VP's tears when he'd given the glycerine tube too sharp a squeeze. They it was who comforted him that millions, in the name of backwardness, would follow their new Messiah. They it was who carried him to his doom. They were the ultimate coterie (now known in its standard Hindi version as kothdi) who danced for him his final mujrah. If Paswan and Yadav had not been, V.P. Singh might have been. History, indeed, has many cunning passages.

And, in the end, the noble Arif. He it was who started it all—by walking out in a huff on Rajiv Gandhi. A political adolescent who has, mentally and emotionally, never got beyond being President of the Aligarh Muslim University Students' Union. A figure of tragedy, his goodness and naivety exploited by others more ruthless than him, more Janus-chinned (Janus—for the uninitiated—being the Greek god with two faces!). I cannot make up my mind: is Arif's end pathos? Or is it bathos? No matter. His speech in the Last Debate was as full of dharmic truths (culled from every religion of India) as it was innocent of any understanding of the politics of his mentors. So impressed was I by his knowledge of every scripture of our scripture-filled land that, if now he finds time hanging somewhat on his hands, I offer, as the farewell gift of this column to one whom it has always secretly admired, to resign in his favour my position as President of the Society for Secularism!

The American comic genius, Andy Warhol, once said that in the next century everyone would be famous for five minutes! It is the only sense in which VP & Co. have taken India into the 21st. century!

So, as the Captains and the Kings depart, each carrying in his personal urn the ashes of his hopes and the despair of his countrymen, this column clears the lump from its throat and (in words that hurt like hell when they were first pronounced last year on Rajiv Gandhi's departure from Race Course Road, and which the original author—my fellow-columnist, Vinod Mehta—must now rue) says to all those departing gently into the night: "Thank you—and goodbye!" ●

The views expressed in this column are those of the author and do not purport to constitute an official statement of the Congress party's position.

POST MORTEM

Where did V.P. Singh go so wrong?

Whatever he may say now, Vishwanath Pratap Singh came to power on a two-point programme. Firstly, he was the Great Conciliator. The way he told it, many of India's problems were the consequence of Rajiv Gandhi's confrontational style. He would change all that.

Secondly, he was The Clean Up Man. Not only was he incorruptible himself, but he was going to right the wrongs committed by the Rajiv. Gandhi regime. At one level, this related to Dhirubhai Ambani's apparent stranglehold on the government, to the 'kickbacks' on the purchase of the Airbus A320 and to the St Kitts forgeries. But at a more crucial level, it related to Bofors. The Raja appeared to believe that Rajiv Gandhi, his family and his friends had made money on the deal and that he, as the new Prime Minister, would expose the robbing of the nation's resources.

Now that V.P. Singh's disastrous prime ministership has finally come to an end, it is apparent that he did not deliver on the first point of that programme—never before has India been as divided as it is today.

But equally, there can be no denying that he started out seeking to reconcile and heal. His visit to the Golden Temple, the release of the Jodhpur detenus and other such measures only make sense if viewed in that perspective.

When he was asked about the obvious dissensions in his party, he argued that these were an integral part of democracy and represented a healthy, even desirable, phenomenon. Questioned about the apparent contradiction in trying to govern on the basis of policies that would have to earn the approval of both, the left parties and the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP), he responded with the familiar dictum that politics was the art of managing contradictions.

Today 'managing contradictions' is widely interpreted as a euphemism for lying. But perhaps V.P. Singh did mean what he said: that only through compromise could a diverse country like India be governed.

What is intriguing is not that he sought to play the Great Conciliator—given the nature of his support, he had no choice—but that by August 1990, he had abandoned that stance and recast himself as a man with a mission to transform society: as the Raja of Mandal and the Thakur Who Loves Backwards and Muslims.

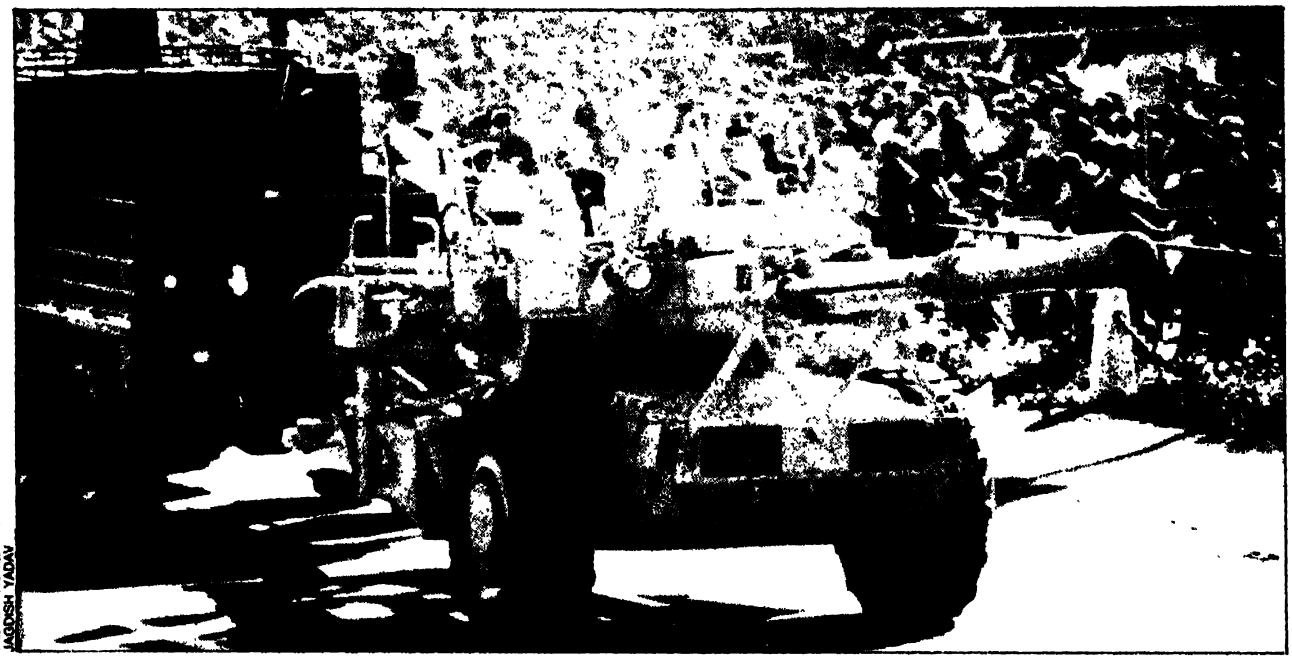
IT IS now also obvious that the second point of V.P. Singh's programme came to naught. Despite whispers about the allegedly shady role played by Bharat Business International, few will deny that Madhu Dandavate and Bimal Jalan ensured a degree of honesty in public life. But a clean government still seemed unable to clean up.

Shortly after the Raja took office, his men filed innumerable FIRs directed at uncovering the alleged misdeeds of the Rajiv regime. After a point, there were howls of "vindictiveness", but it is clear that initially, these FIRs were welcomed by the country. Nor was there any lack of support for moves to put the industrial barons of the Rajiv era (men like Dhirubhai Ambani) back in their places and to ensure that no special favours were accorded to them.

Yet, the fact remains that the FIRs amounted to nothing. We know nothing more about the HDW deal than we did last year. The same is true of St Kitts. Nobody was convicted of anything and no new evidence surfaced. The sole legacy of the FIR raj was the crippling of Indian Airlines because of the decision to ground the Airbus A320.

And even the attempt to cut Dhirubhai Ambani down to size amounted to nothing. True, he stepped down as chairman of Larsen & Toubro, but this was, at best, a temporary setback. Given the size of his shareholding, it is inevitable that he will seize control of the company again by next year.

Meanwhile, Reliance's share price boomed in the second half of V.P. Singh's term and the extravagant claims made by the Raja's groupies about reviving the Wadia-Babaria case proved to be lies.



The greatest failure, however, was on Bofors. After promising dramatic revelations that would seal Rajiv's fate forever, V.P. Singh watched helplessly as the case first became a national joke (as the deadlines for revealing the names came and went and the Letter Rogatory was thrown out by a Swiss judge) and then, a national disgrace as his investigators were shown up as inept liars who planted stories against Indian citizens in foreign publications.

WHAT WENT so wrong? How could a government that started out with so much goodwill mess up every single thing it touched? At SUNDAY, we never believed that V.P. Singh was a noble, otherworldly figure. But we believed that he was, at least, shrewd and calculating. How could such a man self-destruct so completely?

To answer these questions, SUNDAY begins a series of in-depth articles that will examine the Raja's failures on both parts of his programme. Some will look at the collapse of the Great Conciliator: the Ram Janmabhoomi issue, the Kashmir problem, etc. And others will focus on the cleaning-up.

This week, in the first of the series, we look at the Bofors fiasco. ●

The curse of Bofors

Nearly everyone who has been touched by the howitzer scandal has been damaged by it

Last winter, Vishwanath Pratap Singh told the people of India that Bofors was more than a gun: it was a symbol of corruption. This winter, he probably believes that it is even more than a gun or a symbol: it is a curse.

Nearly everyone who has been touched by the Bofors affair has been damaged by it. In Sweden, former Bofors chief executive Martin Ardbo lost his job, his successors are still fighting to keep the company from going under and the late Prime Minister Olaf Palme's reputation now lies in tatters.

The same is true in India. Win Chadha and the Hindujas who were to profit from the deal have spent two years fighting to retain their good name. Rajiv Gandhi lost the last election because of Bofors. General K. Sundarji will always be remembered as the man who suddenly changed his recommendation from Sofma to Bofors and still hasn't been able to really explain why. Former defence secretary S.K. Bhatnagar ended up being accused, after his retirement, of having behaved improperly and perhaps having even profited from the deal.

And now, the curse of Bofors has done in the other side as well. Vishwanath Pratap Singh won an election chanting a Bofors mantra and then had to drop the issue when he could not substantiate his innuendo. N. Ram earned himself a Padma Bhushan and a short-lived reputation as a crusader for truth, but ended up being marginalised in The Hindu and found his behaviour being questioned by those leery of his ethical standards. Chitra Subramaniam uncovered the Bofors scandal. But she got no awards, no Padma Bhushans and was abused and pilloried by the very men who hoped to base their political careers on her work. And the Raja's so-called 'crack investigative team saw its image crumble as the media likened its performance to the Keystone Cops.

The failure of the V.P. Singh government to make any substantial headway on Bofors caused the Raja to abandon the Mr Clean image he had so assiduously cultivated since 1985 and to recast his prime ministership in a more populist mode with such measures as the Mandal Commission.

But in early January, shortly after the National Front government took office, it all seemed very different. Those were the days when the Congress party fretted that evidence that would incriminate Rajiv was on the verge of being discovered and the regime's investigators (or the hit team, as they were soon called) boasted that they would have the names of the holders of the five Bofors accounts in a few weeks. Stories were leaked to the press to suggest that the legal geniuses of the hit team had uncovered a sixth account which contained not just the Bofors kickbacks, but also commissions from the HDW deal. Additional solicitor-general Arun Jaitley told journalists that he had a cast-iron case against Ajitabh Bachchan and CBI sources suggested that the Bofors codenames Mont Blanc and Tulip applied to Sonia Gandhi's relatives.

RAJIV GANDHI He reacted hysterically to the Swedish Radio broadcast and lost the last poll because of Bofors

All of this, it would later be established, was untrue.

So why did the investigators pass it off as fact?

There are two views of the path of the Bofors investigation. The first is the uncharitable one, favoured by many of the hit team's victims. They believe that the investigators told lies and fabricated stories to smear reputations and advance their own political careers. The Congress(I) inclines to this view. So perhaps do the Janata Dal dissidents. Consequently, it may well become the accepted wisdom on the case.

At SUNDAY, we incline to a second view. The investigators were more buffoons than villains; their stories owed more to cock-ups than conspiracies; and their failures stemmed from simple ineptitude. More than anything else, they committed one cardinal sin: they suspended the rules of logic and evidence and believed their own propaganda.

To understand the mess the hit team made of the Bofors case, you need to recall the background of the scandal.

It all began in 1987 when Swedish Radio alleged that Bofors had channelled bribes to Indian politicians to swing a crucial howitzer deal. By then, Rajiv's honeymoon was ending. He had fired Arun Nehru. V.P. Singh was at the centre of the Fairfax controversy and had been shifted from finance to defence, a move he clearly resented. At the same time Singh was playing his own games; leaking stories that the shift in portfolios had come about at the behest of Amitabh Bachchan, then an MP and Rajiv's best friend. Bachchan's motivation: V.P. Singh was investigating his accounts abroad.

At around the same time, the Indian Express had finally given up on Rajiv Gandhi because of what it regarded as his unwillingness to prosecute Dhirubhai Ambani. As finance minister, the Raja had backed the Express: now the two sulked together and made common cause.

All these were straws in the wind. They needed something to bind them together.

That something was Bofors.

A mature Prime Minister would have responded to the Swedish Radio broadcast by denying that bribes were paid and challenging anyone who believed otherwise to provide proof. Instead, Rajiv's government reacted hysterically. The Prime Minister denied that any agents had been used in the deal and asserted that no commissions had been paid. Moreover, his regime suggested, the broadcast was part of a nasty Western plot to destabilise India.

It was an absurd reaction. By changing the issue from bribes to commissions, Rajiv suddenly made himself more vulnerable. Now, all his detractors had to do was prove that Bofors paid agents—and he would be shown up as a liar. It was not even necessary to demonstrate that these agents had shared the loot with ministers or officials to swing the deal. Moreover, the over-reaction and the sudden concoction of the destabilisation theory suggested panic.

Rajiv's detractors now smelled blood. As far as they were concerned, the only explanation for the curious response was guilt. Rajiv had taken the bribes; perhaps Ajitabh had collected the money for him along with Sonia's Italian relatives; and when V.P. Singh had tried to probe into the Bachchan family's affairs, a panic-stricken Prime Minister had shifted him. As for Ambani, it was easy to fit him into this scenario. He was a friend of the Bachchans and so, was being protected by the regime.

Suddenly, it all added up. And Bofors was the glue that bound seemingly unrelated events together.

All of this may have had a certain superficial plausibility, but evidence was hard to come by. No matter. The Indian Express and its friends—especially Ram Jethmalani—found ways of linking Rajiv to corruption.

The Bachchans and some Italians owned a drug company called Macny Adol Brothers in Switzerland, said Jethmalani. Swedish Radio had reported that some of the payments went into an account code-named Lotus. Well, Jethmalani found a company in Switzerland called Lotus. Moreover, the Bachchans own an investment company in Bombay called Lotus. Therefore, they owned the Swiss company which, in turn, owned the code-named account.

The Express got in on the act. It printed a list of companies which it claimed had received the Bofors money. One of them was called Gerard Finance and belonged to the Shivdasanis, a wealthy Lagos and Geneve-based family of non-resident Indians. One of the Shivdasanis' executives was married to a woman whose sister was married to Ajitabh. That was the Rajiv/Bachchan connection.

And so on.

All the allegations were unsubstantiated. And all were wrong. Jethmalani stopped talking about Macny Adol after a few weeks. (There is no evidence that any such company exists.) The Lotus payments had nothing to do with the Lotus company that Jethmalani found in Switzerland. The Express' list of companies was false. It now accepts that Gerard Finance received no money and ate humble pie after the Shivdasanis sued.

None of this stopped the Express. The paper had some luck when it found a document suggesting that Ajitabh Bachchan owned a flat in Switzerland. The Bachchans claimed that Ajitabh did not own the flat, but the Express dismissed this denial. Assuming that the Bachchans were lying, there was a simple enough explanation: Amitabh had been a top star for over a decade and like all other actors, he probably had black money stashed away somewhere. Perhaps this black money had paid for the flat.

Such a hypothesis was damaging enough to Bachchan—and by extension to Rajiv—but Jethmalani decided to go for broke. No, he said, the money for the flat did not come from Amitabh's film earnings. It came from the Bofors kickbacks. The proof? Well, said Jethmalani, he bought the flat a little after the Bofors deal was signed and this conclusively established that Ajitabh had received the bribes.

SHOURIE AND RAM

Apparently, V.P. Singh their forces. But, in effec the investigators

It was all pretty hysterical—if not nonsensical—stuff and had Rajiv not been so thin-skinned, he would not have let the irresponsibility of the Express lobby worry him. Even if he had taken the money, judging by Jethmalani's antics, he was never going to be found out.

Unfortunately for Rajiv Gandhi, he had not counted on Chitra Subramaniam and The Hindu. Subramaniam, a stringer for the venerable Madras paper, filed general interest stories from Geneve till she got interested in Bofors. But approaching the case with an open mind—unlike the Express lobby—she won the confidence of Swedish officials.

The Swedes, according to Subramaniam, "were morally outraged" by the activities of Bofors and by the attitude of the Indian government. Their response was to leak a veritable treasure trove of documents to her. These established:

- Commissions were paid, regardless of whatever Rajiv and Bofors claimed.
- These commissions went into five Swiss accounts identified only by code-names.
- Nobody at Bofors would say who the ultimate beneficiaries were or what they had done to deserve payments running into crores.
- Two of the agents were identified:

GEN. K. SUNDARJI

He still hasn't been able to explain why he suddenly changed his recommendation from Sofma to Bofors

S.K. BHATNAGAR

He ended up being accused, after his retirement, of having behaved improperly and perhaps having even profited from the deal

e The Hindu and the Express combine s the Express approach that guided Delhi's Win Chadha and the London-based Hinduja brothers.

• After Rajiv had told the press that no commissions had been paid, the Swedes had hastily forged contracts cancelling agency arrangements and terming them "winding-up charges".

• The diary of former Bofors chief executive Martin Ardbo suggested that a cover-up was masterminded by the Hindujas. He was told to protect 'G' (presumably, a reference to Rajiv) and wrote in his diary that Bob Wilson, frontman for one of the agents, had met with a "Gandhi trustee lawyer".

While the significance of the Ardbo diaries would be hotly contested by Gandhi's defenders, no objective person could deny that Subramaniam's documents established that Bofors and the agents had launched a cover-up. Rajiv Gandhi now had the option of coming to the same conclusions as everyone else, getting tough with Bofors and cracking down on those identified as agents.

Incredibly, he did nothing. Instead, his spokesman attempted to dismiss The Hindu documents as forgeries.

Faced with this response, many concluded that he had something to hide. Even his most charitable supporters could only conclude that if dishonesty was ruled out, then ineptitude was the only explanation left.

At SUNDAY, we took the line that while there was no solid evidence linking Rajiv to the payments, it was clear that he was covering up. That alone, we argued, was damaging enough. Richard Nixon resigned not because he bugged the Democratic National Committee's offices himself, but because he tried to shield the guilty.

Soon after the V.P. Singh government took office, having promised to get to the bottom of Bofors, it found that it had two options. It could follow The Hindu approach and slowly, painstakingly, go for the agents. Once it had got them, it would have proved that Rajiv's regime—which had the same opportunity—did nothing and then, perhaps some of the agents would have talked about the ultimate beneficiaries of the commissions.

Or, it could take the Express line, decide that Rajiv had taken the money and work backwards to prove this.

Officially, V.P. Singh chose neither approach, but for all practical purposes, he handed the investigation over to the Express lobby. The éminence grise of the enquiry was S. Gurumurthy, the paper's celebrated accountant-cum-investigative journalist. He was assisted by Arun Jaitley, a BJP member, who V.P. Singh had appointed additional solicitor-general. Jaitley had been one of the Express' lawyers during its battles with the Rajiv regime and was later credited by its then editor Arun Shourie (who calls him "my brother") with saving the paper. From the CBI, the team chose K. Madhavan, a deputy inspector general (DIG) who had once interrogated Gurumurthy, but had since won his approval. And the Raja's representative was Bhure Lal, his trusted joint secretary.

These men divided the work among themselves. Gurumurthy helped write the FIR (which did not name Rajiv, though Jethmalani thought it should have), Jaitley and Madhavan handled the meetings with foreign police forces and Bhure Lal kept a watch on the proceedings.

Then, the Raja personally intervened to co-opt The Hindu into the investigation. N. Ram, who had been sidelined in the paper by editor G Kasturi, agreed at once—he also accepted a Padma Bhushan from Singh for his role in editing Subramaniam's stories. Subramaniam was less willing, but after the Prime Minister asked her to assist the enquiries, went along with Ram, who, in turn, openly declared that he was cooperating with the CBI.

Apparently, V.P. Singh had made The Hindu and the Express combine their forces. But, in effect, it was the Express approach that would guide the investigators.

Soon after the FIR was filed, the hit team began telling journalists off

THE AGENTS Win Chadha and the Hindujas who sought to profit from the deal have spent two years fighting to retain their good name the record that it would be easy to get the Swiss to lift the veil of bank secrecy and once this was done, it would be revealed that Rajiv was the ultimate beneficiary of the accounts.

In fact, it is not easy to penetrate Switzerland's secrecy laws and nor was there any evidence that Rajiv's name was on any of the accounts. This did not deter the investigators who made much of the fact that the Swiss had agreed to freeze the five accounts, neglecting to mention that this was a routine procedure and did not necessarily mean that the names of the account-holders would also be revealed.

But what the team trumpeted as its biggest breakthrough came on its first visit to Switzerland. Jaitley, Madhavan, Bhure Lal and Subramaniam met Dr Pierre Schmid, the Swiss official in charge of processing requests from foreign countries. He agreed to freeze the five accounts—that much is certain. What happened next is a matter of some controversy.

According to the version offered to the press by the team after it returned to India, Schmid turned to the investigators and said, "But there are six accounts."

The team asked him to freeze the sixth account. "I can't do that," said Schmid. "It isn't in the names you gave me."

At this, the team hastily wrote out another list of names. Schmid looked at it, crossing out names till he came to Ajitabh Bachchan's.

"All right," he said significantly, "I can freeze the sixth account."

The investigators were delighted. They told everybody that they had not only found a sixth bank account, but that they had a direct link to Rajiv—the account was in Ajitabh's name.

This version appeared in the Indian press until the CBI contradicted it. Now, it denied that the team had 'stumbled' on the account or that Schmid had volunteered it. According to the new story, the team itself had found the sixth account as a result of its enquiries. That it was Ajitabh Bachchan's, however, was never denied and off the record, it was confirmed. Impressed journalists praised the acumen of Jaitley and/or Madhavan for having found the account.

The sixth account then became the centre-piece of the Bofors enquiry. The Statesman was told that it was a 'named' account. SUNDAY was briefed that it probably contained kickbacks from the HDW submarine deal as well. India Today reprinted the investigators' assertion that it was Ajitabh's account. The Indian Express went a step further and even named the bank, Pictet and Company (which it called "a little-known financial services company"), where the account was held. The Illustrated Weekly speculated that the reason why Ajitabh chose it was because Yves Pirenne, his lawyer, was married to Caroline Pictet, the daughter of the bank's founder. And a supremely confident Gurumurthy told an interviewer from The Illustrated Weekly that the sixth account was the key account, that the money for Ajitabh's flat and for his other clandestine purchases was transferred from there.

We know now that every single one of these assertions was false. And to be fair to Subramaniam, she refused to carry any of them, arguing that they were unsubstantiated. But that didn't make much difference, because the rest of the press—dependent on briefings from the hit team—was carrying them anyway. In effect, the entire media was accepting the word of men whose standards of verification were the Indian Express': the briefings were in direct descent from the grand tradition of Macny Adol and Lotus.

So were the investigators lying? Particularly as Schmid now says that the conversation on which the whole hypothesis was based never took place?

The cynical view is that the sixth account story was a fabrication created to ensure that V.P. Singh swept the Assembly elections. At that time, there was much speculation that the Congress would break because its members were terrified that Rajiv would be nabbed in the Bofors affair. The sixth account story, many people now believe, was invented to help split the Congress and to project Rajiv Gandhi as a crook who was on the verge of getting his just desserts.

At SUNDAY, we believe that the investigators probably thought that they were telling the truth: it was just that when it came to identifying the truth, they used the standards of verification that had resulted in embarrassment after embarrassment for the Indian Express in its Macny Adol/Lotus/Gerard Finance phase.

Whatever Schmid may say now, it is clear that some conversation did take

THE BACHCHANS The investigators were shown up as inept liars w action case against *Dagens Nyheter

ltabh and Ajitabh won the libel place between him and Madhavan and Jaitley, because shortly afterwards, Madhavan wrote him a letter referring to their discussions about the sixth account.

We know now (thanks to Chitra Subramaniam's investigations) what the sixth account really was. Apparently, one of the five accounts (Mont Blanc) was pledged against a loan taken by a company called Jubilee Finance. The bank took the line that it could not freeze Mont Blanc because it was owed the money against loans taken by Jubilee.

That was the backdrop to the conversation between Schmid and the hit team. Because of the stringency of Switzerland's secrecy laws, Schmid could not reveal the details of Jubilee and Mont Blanc. What he probably did say was that there was a problem which could only be resolved if Jubilee was also frozen. Except that neither Jubilee nor its owner, S.P. Hinduja, featured in the Indian FIR, which made it difficult for him to freeze the account. Could the Indians submit a more complete request?

Madhavan then sent in a list of 19 names which included S.P. Hinduja's and the account was duly frozen.

It was this simple—almost routine—exchange that gave rise to the mythology of the sixth account. Jaitley genuinely believes that Rajiv got the Bofors money and that Ajitabh was the conduit. When he heard that there was a sixth account, he jumped to the conclusion that it was Ajitabh's. When Schmid confirmed that it belonged to somebody on Madhavan's list, he treated it as confirmation that this was Ajitabh (whose name was also on the list) and regarded it as his big breakthrough.

The rest of the story consisted of guess-work, most of which was wrong. If the Bofors money had been transferred into a sixth account, which belonged to Rajiv's money manager, then obviously other kickbacks (such as HDW) had ended up in the same place. The Pictet connection was based on another guess. Pirenne is Ajitabh's lawyer and his wife is part of the Pictet family. Hence, the investigators concluded that the sixth account must be at Pictet and Company. They were wrong on all counts: Pictet is not "little-known", it is one of Switzerland's largest private banks; Ajitabh has no account there; the Jubilee account—the real sixth account—is at Credit Suisse.

Having made all these wrong guesses on the basis of a false premise, the hit team now included them in the Letter Rogatory(LR). Going far beyond the framework established by The Hindu documents, it added Ajitabh, his Swiss companies, Yves Pirenne and Pictet and Company in the Letter Rogatory.

It was a classic instance of the Macny Adol mentality overcoming the rules of logic and evidence.

ARUN JAITLEY He genuinely believes that Rajiv got the Bofors money and that Ajitabh was the conduit

Obviously, Chitra Subramaniam had begun to have her reservations about the investigators and their standards of verification. And they, in turn, regarded her as patronising and smug. Further, there were differences in style. The investigators were ill at ease in Geneve, saved on their daily foreign exchange allowances by subsisting on cartons of yoghurt and mispronounced Swiss names. Subramaniam was tall, svelte and sophisticated. American-educated, she was married to an Italian, spoke four languages, drank only good wine and had travelled widely. Obviously, there was a cultural gulf. Moreover, as a journalist, she believed in talking to everyone. The investigators had a them-and-us mentality. When Ajitabh and Amitabh Bachchan dropped into her Geneve apartment, to proclaim their innocence, she offered them a drink and heard them out. At first, the hit team was delighted. "This proves they are guilty," they declared. But when it became clear that Subramaniam did not share this view and remained in touch with the Bachchans, the investigators were appalled. First, they concluded that she was a 'mole' and then, they wondered aloud if she was having an affair with Ajitabh. ("Why Ajitabh? Why not Amitabh too?" she retorted flippantly—but clearly, she was deeply hurt.)

The Subramaniam-hit team clash came into the open when the Letter Rogatory leaked. Officially, the sleuths were still only investigating the people mentioned in the FIR. In reality, however, they had thrown 47 names into the LR. This list included, in addition to the Bachchans, two of Sonia Gandhi's brothers-in-law. As there was no prima facie evidence against them, their inclusion in the LR was kept a closely-guarded secret.

Unfortunately for the hit team, the names leaked to The Telegraph, and to SUNDAY (both are Ananda Bazar publications). At first, Jaitley told SUNDAY's Rajiv Shukla that the names of Sonia's relatives had been withdrawn. When The Telegraph quoted him (though not by name) as saying so, the CBI issued a denial. No names had been withdrawn, it said. But had 47 names been submitted in the first place? The CBI would not comment. The Telegraph retaliated by printing all the names. This time, there was no denial.

The investigators, caught on the wrong foot, turned on Subramaniam and accused her of leaking the LR. She was bemused: she didn't know that 47 names had been submitted either as the LR had been kept from her.

By then, it was clear to anybody who cared to look that the investigators were barking up the wrong tree. It was possible that Rajiv had been the ultimate beneficiary, but the way to prove it was by going step-by-step; by starting with the agents and building on The Hindu's impressively-documented case. Instead, the hit team had settled on the wrong account in the wrong bank and claimed a breakthrough!

It was as obvious that the investigators were out of their depth in Switzerland and that while the LR would have gladdened a metropolitan magistrate, it was regarded as a tedious, badly-written, ill-conceived document by the Swiss.

Unfortunately, few people in the Indian press reported these conclusions. Subramaniam, who could have, found her independence compromised by her involvement with the investigators. And others still depended on briefings from the hit team.

Then the Swiss rejected the Letter Rogatory.

This marked the first time in Swiss history that a small cantonal court had thrown out a document submitted by the government of a major country. It was a deep embarrassment, particularly as the Swiss raised the questions the hit team's critics had been asking: why was a piece of paper with 19 names stuck onto the LR? Where was the evidence of corruption by public officials? How could anybody be expected to read a document that was partly illegible, so badly drafted and overlong?

CHITRA SUBRAMANIAM She always had her reservations about the investigators. And the rejection of the LR brought the break into the open

The rejection brought the break between Subramaniam and the hit team into the open. In a series of articles, she pointed out the flaws in the LR, lambasted the investigators and suggested that with enemies like these, the Bofors agents did not need friends.

Suddenly, the rest of the media awoke to the realisation that something was going very wrong with the investigation.

That embarrassment was quickly followed by another: the Bachchan libel case.

While the most embellished version of the sixth account story (complete with references to Pictet and Company) had appeared in the Indian Express, the first time the story made it to the foreign media was when it turned up in Expressen, a Swedish paper which has often pooled information with the Express.

As Expressen has a reputation for sensationalism, the story would not have had much impact but for a coincidence.

Shortly after Jaitley and Madhavan had their famous meeting with Schmid, they told Chitra Subramaniam the first version of the sixth account story (in which Schmid volunteered the account and confirmed that it was Ajitabh's).

Subramaniam has, for many years, shared information with Bo Andersen of Dagens Nyheter (DN), Sweden's most respected paper. She told Andersen that she wasn't using the story because it was unsubstantiated and urged him to do the same.

A while later, she received a call from Stockholm. Expressen had used the story, Andersen told her. He now felt that he had to go ahead. Was she sure that the story had come from the hit team? Yes, said Subramaniam, the investigators had offered this account of events to several journalists.

Andersen printed the story and, because of Dagens' credibility, it was picked up by the news agencies and reproduced widely. The agency reports, however, did not mention that Andersen had sourced his story to those "close to the investigating team" and many Indian papers suggested that this was a new breakthrough that had emerged out of Swedish investigations into the affair.

The Bachchans protested their innocence and then sent legal notices to SUNDAY, India Today, Janmabhoomi and the Indian Express. But because nearly all Indian publications had treated the DN story as independent verification of the hit team's version, it was DN they sued for libel in London and Stockholm.

DN huddled together with members of the Express lobby and there was talk of flying Ram Jethmalani out to assist with the defence. Arun Jaitley was approached by DN's lawyers to appear in London, but pointed out that as a law officer of the Government of India, he could not do so even if he wanted to.

By the time the case came to trial in London, DN had realised that the sixth account story was false. Chitra Subramaniam had, in any case, found Jubilee Finance, the real sixth account, by then and there seemed no point in defending the libel action. At the start of the trial, DN's barrister got up and read out a prepared statement to the effect that because of information discovered in Geneve (the Jubilee account, presumably), DN was now convinced that it had been misled by the investigators and wished to pay damages to Bachchan.

Coming as it did, on the heels of the rejection of the LR, this was the second major setback for the hit team. Not only did DN admit that there was no truth in the sixth account story, but it also confessed that it had been led astray by members of the investigating team.

RAJESH KUMAR

N. RAM He earned himself a Padma Bhushan and a short-lived reputation as a crusader for truth, but ended up being marginalised in *The Hindu

The DN case, more or less, finished off the hit team's reputation with the public. Concerned by rumours that Bachchan would now sue Arun Jaitley for conspiracy (though, to date, Bachchan has never stated that Jaitley planted the story), the investigators scurried to shift the blame.

The public stance was that the libel case was a "private matter of no concern to the government," but behind the scenes, the hit team ran around denying that it had planted the story. Well, in that case, who had?

Why, Chitra Subramaniam, of course! Hadn't she told Andersen about the sixth account? An agitated Subramaniam pointed out that the sixth account story was the official position of the Government of India: it even appeared in the LR! Had she planted it there as well? And anyway, who planted it in the Indian press? Who 'discovered' Pictet? Who gave the story to Expressen? And so on.

The hit team was undeterred. Much was made of the fact that when she had finally traced Jubilee, she had sent Ajitabh a fax telling him so. Ah, said the investigators, we told you she was a Bachchan mole.

To Subramaniam, this made no sense. If she was on the side of the Bachchans, then why would she plant a story that libelled them and caused them so much damage?

As this unseemly squabble continued, one thing was clear: nobody was bothering to defend the sixth account story. Only a few months ago, it had been the great breakthrough: the smoking gun.

Now the same story was being dismissed as a figment of the imagination of Chitra Subramaniam—who was the one journalist who had never carried it!

It was downhill from then on. For about a year and a half, Subramaniam had in her possession documents suggesting that Arun Nehru had played a role in negotiating the Bofors deal. The documents did not suggest he had made any money, just that he had talked to Swedish diplomats about the purchase.

Nehru had a perfectly adequate explanation. He was then an important figure in Rajiv's government and had been entrusted with the job of blacklisting the Hindujas. He had heard that Bofors had hired the Hindujas to swing the deal and so, had called the Swedes to ensure that the agents were fired. (As it turned out, they were not.)

Subramaniam had sat on the story for months, first, because her editor at The Hindu, N. Ram, chose not to carry it and then, because she was too busy with the investigations. Now, with her involvement in the enquiry at an end, she filed the story for the Indian Express (to which she had shifted once Ram had been forced out of The Hindu).

The Express delayed the story for some weeks, offering a variety of explanations. Then, Subramaniam got a call from a friend. The story and the documents were floating around De-

NITIN RAI

RAM JETHMALANI He was determined to establish the Rajiv/Bachchan connection—and never mind that evidence was hard to come by lhi, she was told, and gossip had it that Nehru had persuaded the Express to kill the piece.

Surprised, she asked around and was astounded to discover that various people appeared to have read her copy. The last straw was when it came into the possession of The Independent, a Bombay newspaper which printed the documents and ran a story on the Express' reluctance to carry the piece. Subramaniam was quoted as being outraged by the delay and, as a result of the controversy, terminated her agreement with the Express.

This episode provoked another controversy and led to the inevitable allegations that the Express lobby was playing politics with the investigation: fabricating some stories and suppressing others. By then, Subramaniam's image had also been dented by the rows: many people thought it was too late to complain about politics and journalism being mixed up when she herself had offered to assist the official investigation.

However, one thing was clear: the Raja's attempts to combine the approaches of The Hindu and the Express had failed. Subramaniam, who represented The Hindu's way of doing things, had been driven out, while the irresponsibility and overenthusiasm of the sleuths had destroyed the investigation's credibility.

S. GURUMURTHY

The Letter Rogatory he helped to draw up was regarded as a tedious, badly-written and ill-conceived document by the Swiss

Or perhaps not: In an interview granted after he was fired from the Express, Arun Shourie denied that he had taken the documents to Arun Nehru. It was N. Ram, he said, who had done that.

So perhaps, there hadn't been that much difference between the two to begin with.

Shortly after he lost his vote of confidence, V.P. Singh told the press that he had written to President R. Venkataraman asking him to take custody of all Bofors-related papers. To journalists who pointed out that for all the big talk, we know no more about Bofors today than we did a year ago, the Raja fell back on that old stand-by: at least we got the accounts frozen, he said.

Now with Madhavan's career prospects dim, Bhure Lal on the verge of being transferred, Shourie fired, Jaitley out of the government and N. Ram an increasingly marginal figure at The Hindu, it seems clear that the curse of Bofors has struck again. And not all of V.P. Singh's attempts to revive interest in the case by invoking the President or bragging about freezing accounts will work.

The losers in all this are the people of India. As the Raja's hit squad stumbled from fabrication to fiasco what we lost sight of was this: why did Rajiv find it necessary to scupper the investigation during his time? Was he just inept? Or was he shielding somebody?

In the long run, a payment of Rs 64 crores is not of lasting significance. But that the system was subverted to obstruct justice is. Sadly, it now looks as though we will never get the answers. Because those who were entrusted with uncovering the truth subverted the system for their own irresponsible ends and let this opportunity slip away.

Perhaps, we will all pay for the curse of Bofors. ●

The 11-hour ordeal

Two Burmese youths hijack a Thai Airways flight to Calcutta

Initially, there was no sign of any trouble. A Thai Airways aircraft on a routine flight (TG 305) between Bangkok and Rangoon on 10 November sought permission from the air traffic control (ATC) at Calcutta's Dum Dum airport to land. The reason: refuelling. The ATC promptly cleared one of the runways and at exactly 3.54 pm the giant Airbus made a perfect landing. It turned towards the taxiway and came to a dead stop in one of the bays.

It was then that the ground support staff realised that something was wrong. The aircraft's communication with the tower failed miraculously. What's more, the pilot was seen making a signal to the ground staff, which indicated that the plane had been hijacked.

The security at Dum Dum airport was clearly caught unawares. For a while there was confusion and bewilderment, compounded by the fact that the hijackers had cut off the aircraft's communication with the ground control. There was no way for the cops to ascertain the identity or the demands of the hijackers. At around 5.30 pm, a full 90 minutes after the plane landed, communication was suddenly restored and the hijackers asked for assistance to repair the aircraft's air-conditioning unit. By then senior officials of the West Bengal government had reached the airport and the state home secretary, Manish Gupta, established contact with the hijackers. Even then, it was not known who the hijackers were and what they wanted. In fact, not many at the busy airport were even aware of the hijacking. And, all the flights landed and took off on schedule.

Then came the break. Between 6.25 and 7.15 pm, the hijackers released 11 out of the 204 passengers on board.

And the first among them, Ms Khin Mey Win, carried a note from the hijackers which revealed their identity and indicated their demands. Home secretary Manish Gupta called a press conference immediately after and said that the hijackers were two Burmese youths, Ye Marn (23) and Htin Kyaw (22), who belonged to an outfit called the Justice and Liberty Warriors which was carrying on a struggle against the ruling Burmese military government. Their demands were.

- The release of all political prisoners in Burma.
- The withdrawal of martial law in Burma.
- The cancellation of all military tribunals and all sentences passed by these courts.
- The reopening of the universities that were closed after the 1988 pro-democracy movement.
- And, the handing over of power to the democratically elected representatives.

The hijackers even sent a letter of apology regretting the "inconvenience" caused to the passengers and stated that they did not mean to harm anyone.

From then on, the two Burmese youths released passengers in batches. By 11 pm, as many as 113 hostages were freed. And finally at around midnight, Marn and Kyaw emerged from the aircraft and surrendered to the authorities.

Soon after, the two baby-faced youths faced the press, one of their pre-conditions for the surrender. "All we wanted is the world to listen carefully to Burma's cry for democracy," said a poised Marn, adding, "the Burmese mese people are tired of the oppressive military regime and the terrible human rights violations in that country."

But how did two youths manage to hoodwink so many people and hijack the aircraft. Very simple. "We fled the jungles of Burma, crossed the border with the help of friends. In Bangkok, we managed to get fake passports, bought two tickets on the Thai Airways flight to Rangoon and hijacked it midway with the help of a 'time-bomb', fashioned out of soap and wire." According to them, one of their friends Ye Yanaung, whose thumb impression is also given in the written demands, (see document) was also supposed to take part in the mission, but was left behind because they didn't have enough money to buy an additional ticket.

ASHOK CHAKRABARTI

The hijacked Thai aircraft; (inset) the hijackers' charter of demands: all for a cause

But why did the two Burmese youths choose India as their destination? "Because it's a democracy and we were sure we would be received sympathetically," said Marn. And their hopes were not belied. All throughout, the two Burmese youths were treated like heroes, never once like people who had committed a grave crime. Said Rajat Majumdar of the CID: "We were simply bowled over by their gentle and polite behaviour." Many of the passengers too testified that the hijackers did not misbehave with them. In fact, most of them looked relaxed and were far from being tense.

The midnight conference over, the two youths were transferred to the airport's rest room in police custody. By then the stranded passengers of the Thai flight too were shifted to the nearby Hotel Ashok. The next day, they were flown to their destination by a special flight.

But what about the fate of the hijackers? After all, they had committed a serious international offence. The police lodged a complaint under Sections 3 and 4 of the Anti-Hijacking Act and on Monday, 12 November, the two were produced at the Barrackpore court (the airport falls within its jurisdiction). Here, the police had a trying time keeping off the people, who had turned out in hundreds to greet the two youths. Many garlanded them amidst slogans of "Ye Htin zindabad. Hum tumhare saath hain." On his way to the courtroom Marn told SUNDAY that he "was overwhelmed by the response of the people." Several lawyers too pleaded for their unconditional bail, but the judge rejected them and remanded both the youths to police custody till 25 November. "But we are obviously not treating them as terrorists...they are political prisoners and they have been given better classification," informed H.A. Safwi, the deputy commissioner (detective department) of the Calcutta Police.

Will the two Burmese youths be deported or will they be granted political asylum in the country? Though the latter question will come up only if the two hijackers make such an appeal before the Indian government, one thing is clear: there is no question of handing over Marn and Kyaw to the Burmese authorities. "There is no extradition treaty between Burma and India," said a senior external affairs ministry official. "In all probability, they will be given political asylum in India," confided a police official in Calcutta. Marn and Kyaw also said that they will be appealing to the home ministry for asylum.

What was perhaps most perplexing during the hijack drama was the indifferent attitude of both the Thai and the Burmese authorities. A senior external affairs ministry official said that the Burmese government acted "strangely": all it said was that the hijackers were criminals and should be treated accordingly. And the Thai authorities were more keen to contact their Burmese counterparts than to negotiate with the hijackers.

There were other questions which remained unanswered. Firstly, why didn't the pilot inform the ground control that the aircraft had been hijacked? Even if the hijackers prevented the pilot from communicating the message verbally, he could have used the code for transmitting it. Moreover, how is it possible for two persons who had never been on flight before to keepoffa crew of 16 and 204 passengers? Could it be that the pilot helped out the hijackers in their mission? When reporters asked him this embarrassing question, the pilot simply evaded the issue. And, most important, why didn't the Thai authorities file an FIR, as is the normal practice?

These questions are the concern of the respective governments. The hijackers, however, were clearly motivated by a desire to draw the attention of the world to the plight of the Burmese people. Only time will tell whether they succeeded in their mission. For the moment, the two daredevil hijackers have turned heroes overnight. At least for the Calcuttans. ●

The Indipop boom

West and East meet in a new genre of pop music

Over two decades ago, George Harrison, then lead guitarist with the Beatles made the first breakthrough. He gathered Indian musicians at the Gramaphone Company of India's studios in Bombay and recorded a song with a distinctly Indian flavour. The Inner Light will not be remembered as one of the classic Beatles songs (it only made the B-side of a single and Paul, who overdubbed harmony vocals, was the only other Beatle involved) but it broke the mould.

Sadly, few followed Harrison's lead. The rock musicians who came to India studied classical music and gave contemporary pop a miss. And so, while the rhythms of Kingston, Soweto and Sao Paulo made the international charts, Indian pop and Western rock remained miles apart.

No longer.

Earlier this year, English pop star Boy George (O'Dowd) journeyed to Bombay to record with singer Asha Bhosle and her husband, film composer Rahul Dev Burman. George was here because he liked Indian pop and believed he could assimilate it with his own kind of music. But even before George's arrival—and the resultant media blitz—there were signs that the gulf between Indian and Western pop was being filled.

- Indian film music has moved closer to pop. Apart from the obvious plagiarism (Oye oye, the Maine Pyar Kiya soundtrack, etc.), the newer songs use Western rhythm and instruments. Says jazz maestro Louis Banks: "These days producers just want me to replicate the sounds from the Western pop charts."
- Whereas once, Western pop was the preserve of bands that played in restaurants and clubs in the big cities, Indian pop musicians now find it easy to get recording contracts—and to sell cassettes. Recent releases by 13 AD a hot rock group from south India and Bombay's Rock Machine have kept the cash registers ringing.
- The record companies now actively seek out new talent and try and promote Indian pop stars. Some recent examples: Mubina, Jasmine Barucha, etc.
- Most of today's pop stars take the line that it is the music that is important not the words. Thus, they sing in English and Hindi. Sharon Prabhakar, the queen bee of the pop scene peppers her live shows with Hindi numbers; Alisha Chinai, a Westernised rock singer, is now notorious for her Hindi Log mujhe Baby Doll kahte hain routine; and Goan singer Remo Fernandes, the author of such English hits as Pack That Smack has also composed Hindi film songs (for the film Jalwa) and sung in his native Konkani.

• As if this were not enough, the record companies are now busy encouraging Indian singers to record Hindi versions of Western pop hits. Some instances: Chariots of fire has become Tu mera janu, and the beat of Walk Like An Egyptian turns up in Your (sic) In Love.

GAUTAM PATOLE

Today's Hindi film music is littered with copies of Western pop hits. Viju Shah combined the Oye oye refrain from a Miami Sound Machine song with a more Indian melody to create the super-hit from Tridev

Sometimes the process is reversed. Hawa Hawa has two English versions Super Star and I am Dizzy. Aap jaisa koi has been reincarnated as My Feelings Inside.

The phenomenon has now taken such firm root that perhaps it deserves a name of its own: Indipop

The most notable aspect of the phenomenon is the willingness of the record companies to sign up pop stars. In the Sixties and Seventies, such talented groups as The Savages, Human Bondage, Atomic Forest, Savage Encounter and the Jets failed to get satisfactory record contracts. When the Savages did make an album (the Live album), a sale of 3,500 was considered extraordinary.

Contrast that with today. Says Mark Selwyn, guitar player with Rock Machine, one of today's top bands, "We played together for five years before we could cut an album because record companies were not interested. But our record Rock And Roll Renegade, which was released in November 1988 sold 22,000 copies. I think the real figure is even higher: at least 15,000 pirate copies of the album have also been sold." For Rock Machine's next album Second Coming, the record company is considering an initial run of 40,000.

Nor is Rock Machine the exception. The current music sensation is 13

An Indipop who's who

GAUTAM PATOLE

Joe Alvarez

Like Nandu Bhende, a relic of the original rock scene. Though Alvarez is lesser-known than his peers, many credit him with having one of the strongest voices in the Indipop.

In 1980 he dropped out of the rock scene (after stints with Atomic Forest, Sky and Savage Encounter) to join his father's business ("I hated it," he says now).

He returned to music in 1981 with a new band, Spirit, a new self-financed album called Alleigance India. The album sold only 3000 copies which failure he attributes to "the crossfire of a big management dispute at CBS".

More recently he has composed the lyrics for Mera Bharat Mahaan, sung at New Delhi's pre-Olympic games and recorded a new album for Venus records.

"I used to trip on hash and acid but those days are long gone. Today I do not drink or smoke. For today's scene, you need energy man, energy!"

GAUTAM PATOLE

Mubina

Part of the new generation. Very young and currently being promoted by her record company as a fresh new face.

Only one album has been released so far with mean, gutsy lyrics that fit into the Madonna groove. Sample "The girls who are over 20/old as they may be/they got no chance/standing next to me/I'm a mean machine."

She writes her own lyrics with collaborator Suresh Thomas, cannot read music and plays everything by ear. It is an indication of her youth that she lists among her 'early influences' such late Seventies successes as Boney M.

"People wonder how come a Muslim girl is into rock. They prefer to believe that I run around with a wild crowd who take dope and have sex on their minds. I'd like to tell them that my parents love what I'm doing."

Nandu Bhende

The Alexis Korner of the Indian rock scene, Bhende sprang to fame in the early Seventies as Judas in Alyque Padamsee's Jesus Christ Superstar. Since then, he has set the trend for Indian rock singers. As lead singer with Savage Encounter, he did successful covers of Doors songs (and less successful covers of Moody Blues classics like Nights in white satin).

The son of a noted Marathi stage artiste, Bhende tried briefly in the Seventies to make it in the commercial world before returning to pop. He now makes a reasonable living from AD, a band from Cochin that had no national exposure till Magnasound, the Bombay-based record company released Ground Zero in August, 1990. In the first 30 days of its release, the album sold 14,000 copies and now seems set to become a best-seller.

Says Bashir Sheikh, a former drummer with the Savages who once handled Western music for Music India and now functions as general manager of Magnasound: "We believe that some of the groups here are on par with international bands and one of them is certainly Rock Machine."

Agrees Pervin Tata, promotion manager of CBS Records and Tapes: "Rock music is beginning to find a market in India. Look at Remo Fernandes. He has managed to become a star and his music sells today."

Not everyone can make money out of rock records, though the music companies have high hopes for such new discoveries as singers Jasmine Bharucha and Mubina. Nevertheless, for many musicians, the thrill of being recorded is enough. Says CBS's Tata: "We keep getting demo tapes from all over India and many of these people are really talented. If their dedication matches their talents then they can be as successful as Remo or the others."

But those who want to make a living out of rock can do so even if record royalties aren't enough. Joe Alvarez,

GAUTAM PATOLE

Says Louis Banks: "I'd rather be playing jazz. But I am caught up in the Hindi music scene. The film producers do not want original music. That's how the game goes" one of the great voices of Indian rock has had bad luck with his records but says that he makes upto Rs 4 lakh a year on the basis of live shows.

Moreover, there are enough ancillary industries—jingles, soundtracks, etc.—to keep a musician going if he decides to make pop his life.

The real money, of course, is in Hindi pop. Nobody disputes that. "Hindi pop is the money-spinner," says Tata of CBS flatly. Adds Nandu jingles, Hindi pop, English rock and live shows.

"The future of pop music in India is Hindi pop. That's what sells. My next recording after* Get Organised, *which is an English album, will be a Hindi pop album."

Remo Fernandes

The mass market media-packaged pop phenomenon of the Eighties, Remo's latter-day success has come as a surprise to those who remember him as a shy folkie on the fringes of the Bombay pop/rock scene.

Aggressively promoted by R.V. Pandit of CBS records, Remo has composed film soundtracks, modelled for a fabric company, performed at the Festival of India in Russia, made hit records, played all the instruments on his last album, and transformed himself into a highly effective entertainer on stage.

Two years ago, on New Year's Day he played his own composition Hello Rajiv Gandhi to a capacity crowd at the Haystack resturant in Goa. Among the audience was Satish Sharma who summoned him after his performance, complimented him on the song and asked: "But how did you know that Rajiv's best friend was in the audience?

"I didn't" replied Remo. "Who are you?"

"Pack that smack and shove it up the dealer man's back. Pack that smack and come alive again."

From Pack That Smack—his biggest hit.

Sharon Prabhakar

Queen of the pop scene. A Delhi girl, she started out with folk, attempted unsuccessfully to make it abroad, returned to India and became its top night-club entertainer.

Her big break came when husband Alyque Padamsee cast her as Eva Peron in his production of Evita. Prabhakar showed that she could act as well as sing and though nothing came of a projected film career, she went on to make many successful records fusing Indian rhythms and lyrics with the techniques of Western pop.

Has avoided publicity in recent years, preferring to concentrate on building up a devoted following throughout the country through constant gigging. Her recent show, the Sharon Spectacular, rode the back of her new album Blow Your Mind and has sold out in seven Indian cities. Next stop: Australia.

"I am glad that the cutting of English songs has opened up here. But I will not restrict myself to cutting only English records. There will always be Hindi pop and theatre for me."

Bhende, one of Bombay's earliest rock singers: "I make English albums because I enjoy it. But commercially, all my success comes from Hindi pop." Agrees Sharon Prabhakar, queen of the Indipop scene: "You reach a wider audience if you sing in Hindi."

Within the record industry, there is some bemusement over the vernacular Indipop boom. In the early Eighties, music companies believed that the middle class had stopped listening to Hindi film songs because the sound had become too raucous and downmarket. This belief led to the short-lived ghazal boom and to the conclusion that the future of the music business lay in modern reworkings of such genres as the ghazal and the bhajan.

But while the record companies were pumping money into finding the Jagjit and Chitra of the 1990s or the next Anup Jalota, they missed an indication of things to come.

In the early Eighties, Biddu, the London-based Coorgi musician (who had been a member of the Bombay band The Trojans) had topped the charts with Aap jaisa koi, a Hindi reworking of a disco tune he had composed for Tina Charles, sung by newcomer Nazia Hassan. Biddu followed this up with another Nazia success, Disco Deewane. Both records used Western style backing tracks with Hindi vocals, thus setting a new trend. When Star, the soundtrack to a Biddu-produced Hindi film starring Kumar Gaurav failed to replicate the success of Disco Deewane, the music companies believed that the earlier hits had been flashes in the pan and turned their back on Indipop.

They were mistaken. While the record industry turned to ghazal, such film composers as Bappi Lahiri and Viju Shah began to explore the possibilities of merging Hindi lyrics with Western pop. Because the existing playback singers and musicians were uneasy with the music, a new breed sprang up.

Among them was the talented Nepalese jazz pianist, Louis Banks. Banks shifted to Bombay and made a good living as a keyboardist for the jingle industry and became a constantly in-demand musician for film orchestras.

Not all of it has been particularly rewarding, he concedes. "I'd rather be playing jazz," he says, "but I am caught up in the Hindi music scene. I admit that we copy Western music but what happens is that when Hindi film producers go abroad (which they do every other week), they come back with tapes and say, 'We want this just like it is.' The Hindi film producers do not want original music. That's how the game goes."

The point is that the plagiarism pays. Today's Hindi film music scene is littered with copies of Western pop hits: the Maine Pyar Kiya soundtrack, for instance. But even there, a certain kind of talent is required. Viju Shah combined the Oye oye refrain from a Miami Sound Machine song (Rhythm's Gonna Get You) with a more Indian melody to create the super-hit from Tridev. More recently, both Bappi Lahiri and Lakshmikant-Pyarelal ripped off the same tune (Tama) by African singer Mory Kante but, while Lahiri did a straight lift (called Tama tama loge), Lakshmikant-Pyarelal's version (Jumma chumma de de) stole only the instrumental intro. And the six-note chorus became a mega-hit because it was blended with Indian rhythms.

Indipop stars—outside of the film industry—have seen the merits of hybridisation. Remo and Sharon Prabhakar set the trend with the Jalwa soundtrack (on which Remo sang the title track while Sharon performed something called Hot, hot, hot on which orgasmic moans were later overdubbed) before moving on to perform non-filmi Hindi material.

Alisha Chinai, a Westernised product of Bombay theatre started recording Madonna-like vocals in Hindi and even Nandu Bhende, one of Bombay's original heavy rockers was soon making best-selling Hindi albums.

As the trend has caught on, record companies have become more ambitious. For instance, Ashley and Beverly, a couple of musicians from the pop group Nightbirds were given an unusual assignment by Tips, one of the smaller record companies.

What Tips had in mind was an English record based on Hindi film hits. Says Ashley: "They would take the original instrumental backing tracks and ask us to lay down English vocals over them." The results were not to everyone's liking. Ek do teen, for instance, came out as:

Sing, sing, sing
Sing me a song of love
La la la, hm, hm, hm,
Wishing, awaiting an answer from you
Now don't you tell me you have not a clue.

And Pappa kahte hain was rather literally rendered as Dad's always saying. Sample lyric:

One can never say
What's gonna come my way
Tomorrow's another day
What will be, will be.

Despite the sniggers such lyrics might evoke, the record (called Love Me) has been a runaway success. It has outsold Michael Jackson's Thriller in India and spawned several imitators.

Other record companies are trying to get singers to lay down Hindi vocals to English pop songs. And some are using a mixture of Hindi and English in the same lyric. For instance, in Super Star (on Venus cassettes), a reincarnation of Hawa Hawa, Brian Tellis sings:

I can do double role
Jo kuchh bhi mujhe bol
Comedy or fighting
I'm expert in acting

While all the lyrics appear to be written by semi-literate school children, what is significant is that the barriers between Western and Indian rhythms have collapsed. Regardless of the language of the lyrics, (Hindi or English) the backing tracks seem equally appropriate.

Is Indipop here to stay? The current view within the music business is that this is the wave of the future. Record company executives offer the following reasons:

- The cassette revolution of the last ten years has led to a massive expansion of the music market and there is a dearth of product. The output of the film industry alone is not enough.
- A generational change in the profile of music buyers. The new generation is more Westernised and therefore is more interested in Western rhythms.
- The growth of the middle class. Whereas earlier, the upper middle buyer was content to listen to English and American artistes, the Indian middle class is now large enough to have an identity of its own and support indigenous artistes.
- The growing Westernisation of the film industry. Just as the movies have got slicker and more Westernised in recent years (perhaps because of the availability of American videos), the soundtracks have also kept pace. Consequently, there is more scope for Western music.

All of this suggests that Indipop is going to be around for a long time. And perhaps, as the genre matures, it will take on a creativity of its own like reggae or ska in Jamaica. •

POEMS IN COLOUR

It was Pritish Nandy's show at the Sophia Duchesene Art Gallery in Bombay on 5 November. The celebrated editor's poems, as "interpreted" by Samir Mondal in water colours, were on display. And of the 15 exhibits on show, 13 carried Nandy's face, portrayed in brilliant colours, beside his hand-written verse. Said Nandy: "It seemed like a great idea to present poetry like this. The effect is fantastic and it seems to have worked."

At the exhibition: Pritish Nandy with star guest Amitabh Bachchan

The guest list, certainly, was impressive enough. Megastar Amitabh Bachchan arrived with wife Jaya, to sip champagne and exchange jokes about the V.P. regime with Nandy. Later arrivals included Suresh Oberoi, Anupam Kher, Mario Miranda and other Bombay socialites.

But the surprise guest of the evening was, without a doubt, Haji Mastaan, who made a beeline for Bachchan. While photographers made the best of this photo-opportunity, Nandy retreated into the background. Bachchan, who was quite the cynosure of attention in the crowded gallery, departed before dinner. But Mastaan hung around, distributing his visiting cards to all the beautiful people.

According to Ashish Nagpal, the organiser of the exhibition, all but two of the creations were sold before the evening was over.

Satyajit Ray: relating the script to his cast

BUSINESS AS USUAL

Nobody had thought that Satyajit Ray would make another film when he lay in hospital recovering from a heart ailment. The director took care of that one with Shakha Prashakha. And now, to put any lingering doubts at rest, he's announced yet another film, shooting for which will commence in the third week of November.

Titled Agantuk (The Stranger), the film has Utpal Dutt in the lead role. Other members of the cast include Mamata Shankar, Deepankar De, Robi Ghosh and Dhritiman Chatterjee.

Ray, who has done the screenplay, will have his son Sandip operating the camera at the Indrapuri Studios in Calcutta, followed by a week on location in Birbhum.

Say no to drugs.

Now, it's Ananda Shankar's turn to relay this message to the deluded youth of India. And Shankar, along with wife Tanushree, intends to take the help of the latest electronic equipment from Hong Kong and Singapore to do so, staging an extravaganza in Bombay, Calcutta and Delhi on the anti-drugs theme.

The show, sponsored by S.M. Shetty of S.Y. Dychem, will have a "strong message behind" it.

And, in the best traditions of the Ananda Shankar school of synthesis, it will comprise a judicious mix of Western music and what the artiste calls "Indian character".

ALL AT SEA

With Partylines, being at sea has acquired an entirely different meaning.

Founded by a former multinational executive, Aditya Singh, a year and a half ago, the outfit specialises in organising parties on a boat—or a barge—about ten minutes away from the Gateway of India.

Short of ringing up your guests, Partylines does everything: decides on decor, plants, food and drink. Says Singh: "Whether you want a Hawaiian ambience, ethnic one or a garden look, we do it all. We even arrange for a band if you feel like dancing to live music." The average cost comes to about Rs 200 per head and the concept has caught on, especially with corporate concerns such as Cadbury's,Glaxo, Hindustan Lever and Citibank, which recently hosted a party for its president on one of Aditya's boats.

Aditya Singh (inset): partying at sea

But the most unusual party Singh ever arranged was for a couple who he says, "were getting to know each other". Partylines created a romantic atmosphere, with soft music, muted lighting, plants, with the help staying discreetly in the background. The party lasted from 9 to 2.30 am, but adds a rueful Aditya, wasn't much of a success.

The couple split soon after.

SHOURIE IS BETTER THAN SINGH

The beleaguered former editor of the Indian Express, Arun Shourie, has found an unlikely ally: cine star Shatrughan Sinha.

In an interview to The Independent, Sinha has gone on record to say: "During my personal meeting with V.P. Singh in the first week of October, he told me what he has told Arun Shourie."

Standing up for Shourie, Sinha added: "The politicians who are making fun of Shourie should remember that he was responsible for the Janata Dal coming to power. Then he was a demi-god. Just because he criticised the government's faulty policies, now Shourie has become a villain in the eyes of VP's followers."

Arun Shourie: Shatrughan makes an unlikely ally

As Shatru saw it, the Raja was the villain of the piece. And if he wanted to get elected to the next Parliament, he'd have to ask Karunanidhi to find him a safe constituency in Tamil Nadu.

In Uttar Pradesh, he didn't stand half a chance.

AT HIS DRAMATIC BEST

Fiery Sixties communist-turned-mild television broadcaster, Tariq Ali, has now established himself as a successful playwright. Ali's latest play Moscow Gold, on the political situation in the Soviet Union, currently on view at the Barbican Centre, London, has drawn rave notices. As did his earlier effort, Iranian Nights, on the Rushdie affair.

Tariq Ali: you've got to take the good with the bad

Alas, the same isn't true of his fiction. The Pakistani radical's latest novel Redemption, a satire on revolutionaries, has horrified critics. Ali's obsessive use of sexual metaphor has come in for particular abuse, "a talking and ejaculating book" and "a novel bedecked with male genitals" being only some of the phrases used.

Tariq Ali, however, is unrepentent. "I knew I'd lose a lot of my friends after the book was published," he says.

But, perhaps, he hadn't bargained for the bad press. •

One thing you've got to say for Shantanu Sheorey. When it comes to protecting Kimi's interests he doesn't distinguish between friend and foe.

Ask Rakesh Roshan. Casting the female lead of his forthcoming release Jaahil, with Amitabh Bachchan (no less!) as hero, Roshan decided to make the first offer to Kimi.

A phone call to the Sheorey residence and Rakesh was soon set right. Retorted a furious Shantanu: "I thought you were a friend! We are planning a family and she is not doing any films."

Just when things seemed to be working out for Meenakshi Seshadri, the icy Iyengar had to go and spoil it all.

Or, Raj Kumar Santoshi had to go and spoil it for her. For, the director of Ghayal—the first hit Seshadri had had in years—fell hopelessly in love with his heroine. And once it was established that his film had done nothing but good to her career, went ahead and proposed to Meenakshi.

Amrita Singh's favourite topic of conversation is her influential family and moneyed background. So, how does the he-woman of the film industry react to all those stories about her mother, Rukhsana Sultana, defaulting on a payment to Diners, the credit card organisation?

According to the film glossy, Stardust, Sultana owes Diners Rs 8,000-odd. And the payment has been outstanding for over five years now. Everytime, the story goes, Rukhsana was asked to settle her dues, she'd say: "That small amount I'll clear in a day."

But five years later, that day hadn't come.

Diners, however, live in hope. ●

Paper chase

Bangalore witnesses a newspaper boom

Bangalore is no longer just a haven for pensioners. It is, today, a boom town where the yuppies from Bombay and Calcutta are migrating in search of jobs. And they have brought with them their double incomes, the nine to five work ethic, and newspaper reading habits. While the conservative Bangalorean is content to read the Deccan Herald or The Hindu with his early morning cup of coffee, the yuppie crowd is reaching out for the better laid-out Bangalore edition of The Times of India, The Economic Times, and now an array of Sunday papers that are available to him—the Bangalore edition of Sunday Mid-Day, the Madras edition of Sunday Mail and the Bombay edition of The Sunday Observer. With hoardings, neon signs, teaser ads and champagne parties there's a media war on in Bangalore.

Says Monu Nalapat, the resident editor of The Times of India, "Bangalore is the only other cosmopolitan city in India besides Bombay. Calcutta, Madras and Delhi are much too ethnic," he remarks. Agrees Prashun Dutt, media controller at Ogilvy and Mather: "The average Kannadiga may be conservative. He may be reluctant to try out a new product. But the cosmopolitan yuppie crowd which is moving to Bangalore with its disposable income is willing to try out a new product whether it is noodles or a newspaper."

Nevertheless, with the sudden influx of newspapers and Sunday papers into Bangalore, media watchers are wondering whether the city which has 8,56,000 potential readers of English newspapers is capable of sustaining so many publications.

The Deccan Herald with a circulation of one lakh copies in Bangalore, is clearly the market leader, followed by the Bangalore edition of the Indian Express with a circulation of 35,000, and The Hindu with a circulation of 20,000. The Economic Times has a circulation of 8,000 to 9,000 copies, while The Times of India despite the efforts of five resident editors, has not gone beyond 12,000 copies on weekdays, and 16,000 copies on Sundays.

Into this saturated newspaper market, enter the hard-hitting Sunday papers. Sunday Mid-Day made a quiet debut in early October. A few teaser ads and a champagne party for the who's who in Bangalore marked the second launch of the paper. An edition was started in 1981, circulated all over the south, and at the time of its closure in 1985 had a circulation of 23,000. "The management was in too much of a hurry. We were doing well, but they wanted a growth rate in Bangalore of what they had in Bombay," says V.N. Subba Rao, former editor of Sunday Mid-Day in Bangalore.

Bangalore city: a cosmopolitan population makes it a good test market

The Dalmia-owned Sunday Mail which launched three English and one Hindi editions in six months wanted to enter the Bangalore market before it did Madras. "A survey showed that Mail was likely to do better in Bangalore than Madras, but being a metro paper they wanted to link the four metros first, and instead, started the Madras edition," says I. S. Nayak, the branch manager of Sunday Mail in Bangalore.

The first two issues of Sunday Mid-Day are believed to have sold around 2,000 to 3,000 copies though the print order is around 6,000 to 7,000. The Sunday Observer is estimated to sell around 600 to 700 copies, while Sunday Mail sells 2,200 copies.

The Deccan Herald, is still a smug number one often missing out on interesting stories or burying an important story inside. The Indian Express and The Hindu have their loyal readers, while The Times of India is changing editors, lay-outs and journalists in an effort to get somewhere. "We are ranked fourth in circulation, but first, quality-wise," says Nalapat.

Interestingly, the market for most English magazines is shrinking, while that of daily papers and Sunday papers is growing. And the trend in most newspapers seems to be for opinion, analysis and commentary. "Newspapers themselves are becoming magazines," says Subba Rao. More and more newspapers are bringing out weekend supplements to compete with the Sunday papers.

"The need for information among the urbanites has gone up," says Dutt explaining the popularity of Sunday papers. "With political and economic upheavals, people like you and me are feeling insecure. They want to know what's going to happen. They want news analysis and in-depth commentary. Instant news is provided by television. What is needed is weekend reading on current subjects which the Sunday papers can provide," he says.

This clearly is the decade for Sunday papers. But no one knows who the winners and losers will be in Bangalore. •

Janata Dal dissidents help Shekhawat survive

RAJASTHAN

The tit-for-tat tactics did not work in the end. When the BJP withdrew its support to the V.P. Singh government at the Centre following the arrest of its president, L.K. Advani, the Janata Dal retaliated by withdrawing support to the Shekhawat regime in Rajasthan. The idea was to bring down the coalition government—in which the Janata Dal itself was a partner—and pay the BJP back in its own coin. But Bhairon Singh Shekhawat has turned out to be a survivor.

On 8 November, during a trial of strength in the Assembly, the BJP managed to cling on to power by a curious alignment of forces. While the breakaway Janata Dal faction led by Chandra Shekhar and Devi Lal teamed up with the Congress(I) to pull the rug from beneath V.P. Singh's feet on the plea that the former Prime Minister had pampered a communal party such as the BJP, the rebels in Rajasthan, owing allegiance to Shekhar had no qualms about going along with that organisation.

In the 200-member Rajasthan Assembly, the BJP-Janata combine had a strength of 140 members. The BJP had 85 legislators while the Janata Dal had 55. Besides, there are 50 Congress(I), one CPI(M) and nine Independent members. So, when the Janata Dal pulled out of the coalition, Shekhawat's fall seemed not only imminent but also inevitable. In the end, however, the chief minister survived, with 116 votes in favour and 80 against.

So what pulled the BJP back from the brink? Some of the credit goes to an unlikely quarter: the Congress(I). Ex-chief minister Harideo Joshi, a long-time friend of Shekhawat, came to his rescue in a devious way. As soon as the Dal announced its decision to quit the coalition, Joshi issued press statements offering his party's support to the Janata Dal in forming a non-BJP government. This gesture was at once rebuffed by the Dal high command which staunchly opposed the idea of the party having any truck with the Congress(I).

As the day of reckoning approached, Joshi issued another statement saying that the arrangement with the Janata Dal had been finalised. This led the Dal state chief Natthi Singh to issue a whip to party members asking them to vote against the Shekhawat government. Unnerved, the rebels, who feared that the end was near, formed a breakaway group, which was christened the Janata Vidhayak Dal. Initially, there were only 12 MLAs in this group, but its rank swelled to 23 at the time of voting. Obviously, the rebels, some of whom were in the ministry,were reluctant to lose their ministerial berths and face the electorate at this juncture, as the fall of the Shekhawat regime would have meant fresh polls.

Interestingly, despite Natthi Singh's forceful speech against communal violence,for which he blamed the BJP, three Muslim members sided with the chief minister. One of them, Ghulam Mustafa,tried to refute the allegation that the BJP was anti-Muslim. "If the BJP was communal and the riots in the state of Rajasthan were the outcome of its being in power in the state, what explanation could the Congress(I) and the Janata Dal offer to the riots in Gujarat, Karnataka, Andhra Pradesh, Bihar and UP?" he asked.

The contention of the rebels was that the people's verdict in the last elections was clearly in favour of BJP-Dal coalition and hence the government should not be allowed to fall. But idealism apart, the real reason may have been the fear to face the people again so soon. •

Laloo's last days?

The Bihar chief minister's fate hangs in the balance

BIHAR

For a long time, chief minister Laloo Prasad Yadav was sitting pretty in Patna, but the developments in Delhi have left him a deeply disturbed man. Laloo claimed that he valued principles more than anything else and lent unflinching support to former Prime Minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh, knowing full well that the National Front government at the Centre was heading for a great fall. He was not going to compromise on secularism, Laloo had declared stridently, and went on to back Singh, when the likes of Chandra Shekhar, Devi Lal and Mulayam Singh Yadav, the Janata Dal's other chieftains in the Hindi heartland, decided to forsake him. But for all that he did – including the arrest of BJP chief L.K. Advani at Singh's behest—Laloo now finds his own house tottering dangerously.

The Janata Dal in Bihar is clearly heading for a split between the Singh and the Shekhar factions, and Laloo, at the moment, is not sure of securing majority support. The chief minister will have to strain hard to even muster the support of half the 122 Dal MLAs in the 324-member House, if Chandra Shekhar's protege, Raghunath Jha, decides to press home the advantage he presently enjoys. In the event of a showdown, Laloo's only support bank would be the Jharkhand Mukti Morcha (JMM), and the two communist parties—CPI and CPI(M)—which together have 44 MLAs. And if the stand taken by the Indian People's Front (IPF) in the Lok Sabha, where its lone member voted in favour of V.P. Singh, is any indication of the posture the party would adopt in the state Assembly, Laloo can hope to have seven more members on his side. But the state IPF has accused the CM of shielding the killers of some of its activists, and the anger still seems to run high.

This crucial game of numbers has rendered the Janata Dal government in the state fragile. But Laloo's position was never entirely secure. In the Dal Legislature Party elections held soon after the February Assembly polls, when three contenders staked their claim to the chief ministership, Laloo scraped through by the skin of his teeth. He secured barely three votes more than his nearest rival Ramsundar Das. The veteran leader was outmanoeuvred because Raghunath Jha, a Chandra Shekhar lobbyist, joined the fray and split the votes.

Even before the party's vertical split in Delhi, there were serious rumblings of dissent in the state unit. Laloo managed to stave off a virtual revolt by 51 legislators in the initial round of the Shekhar-Lal manipulations. But those who opted for truce earlier are expected to resume their belligerence, now that the power matrix has changed completely at the Centre.

The Laloo regime was being propped up by a set of disparate forces: the BJP, the left parties and the JMM. But the 39 BJP members withdrew their support back in August when Laloo refused to arrest a CPI MLA accused of attacking BJP supporters. Since then, Laloo has banked heavily on the communists and JMM, the latter having thrown in its lot with the chief minister in order to counter the growing influence of the BJP in the tribal areas of south Bihar.

Another important segment in the Assembly—the Independents—is also wavering. Of the 30 Independent MLAs, 22 had extended their support to Laloo, but at present most would prefer a change of leadership. Muneshwar Singh, one of the fiery Independent MLAs, is going about saying that the chief minister has lost majority support and might force a mid-term poll on the state.

Others, however, rule out such possibilities. They argue that Laloo is a member of the Legislative Council and as such cannot recommend the dissolution of the Assembly. Besides, there is always the possibility of the Congress(I), which has 71 members in the House, extending support to a breakaway faction to avert fresh poll.

But whichever way the wind may blow, there is sure to be a lot of horse trading in the present circumstances and the price of each MLA is likely to soar. And if money power is really going to decide matters, it is the highest bidder who is going to win. Principles are sure to take a back seat in that case. ●

Laloo Prasad Yadav: help!

Biju remains unruffled despite the changes at the Centre

ORISSA

The upheaval at the Centre has left the Orissa Janata Dal strongman, Biju Patnaik, quite unruffled. Biju has not repeated history. During the crisis in the Janata Party in 1979, Biju had sided with Charan Singh and helped bring down the government of Morarji Desai. This time, he consistently backed former Prime Minister V.P. Singh and spurned all enticement from dissidents who have been propped up by the Congress(I). And in Orissa Biju and the official Janata Dal continue to hold their ground without any immediate signs of instability. Although five of the 16 Dal MPs have sided with Chandra Shekhar, they have too little support among the Dal MLAs to pose a challenge to Biju. Of them, the most influential seems to be Bhakta Charan Das, who has three MLAs supporting him, including his brother, Ajit Das. Anant Narayan Singh Deo, an old Chandra Shekhar faithful, would have a tough time stringing in anybody other than his wife, Shanti Devi. And Balgopal Mishra is unlikely to get any MLA at all to switch loyalties, not even Narasingha Mishra, his brother-in-law and law minister in Biju's Cabinet. "I cannot support Balgopal on this issue," he says with total conviction. "Even if Biju Patnaik had backed Chandra Shekhar, I could not have toed his line." The other two MPs who have joined Shekhar, Nakul Naik and Mangaraj Mallik, hardly have any hold over the party.

ASHOK VAHIE

Biju Patnaik: still going strong

V.P. Singh's party is the "mainstream of the Janata Dal", says state Dal president Ashok Das, and 123 Dal members in a House of 147 feel the same way. And there is little doubt at the moment that Biju would be the guiding spirit of the Dal in the next Assembly polls.

However, the developments at the Centre are bound to have their impact on the state. The various pressure groups in the party will make Biju's balancing acts even more difficult. And the MLAs denied ministerial berths might demand their pound of flesh. "Attempts to run a dictatorial administration will no longer be tolerated," says a gleeful Prafulla Ghadei, a senior anti-Biju MLA. "Many significant developments may take place if an alternative government is formed at the Centre."

This observation, however harsh, does not seem much out of place. A Biju-loyalist admitted in a sad sympathetic tone that "Bijubabu would have to pat everyone on the back to carry on the government" which was far from his usual style of functioning.

In the diametrically opposite camp, the Congress(I) leaders in the state, jubilant over the recent developments, have intensified their infighting in a desperate bid for the chief ministership, hoping that their days of political exile is nearing the end. While former CM J.B. Patnaik is gearing himself up for a comeback, a powerful lobby is working against him. This includes MP and PCC(I) chief Giridhar Gomango, CLP(I) leader Basant Biswal, ex-CM Hemananda Biswal, and Ramachandra Rath, former Union minister.

With all this activity and enmity inside the main parties, the future promises to be politically supercharged for Orissa. ●

Bureaucrats in Karnataka are unhappy with the Lokayukta raids

KARNATAKA

Chief minister Bangarappa is in a Catch-22 situation. He is under tremendous pressure to remove some "inconvenient elements" from the Karnataka Lokayukta. If he succumbs to the pressure, he will invite charges of the government protecting corrupt officers. If he does not, he will have quite a few angry members in his Cabinet and a sulking bureaucracy.

Government officials have been quite upset since A.J. Anandan was appointed inspector-general in the Lokayukta last December. Earlier, this people's court was satisfied with nabbing an occasional small government official. But of late the Lokayukta has caught some real big fish.

With two IAS, two IPS and one IFS (forest) officers being caught, the straying bureaucrats have gone scurrying for cover. "Why are they raising such objections about our raids?" asks a Lokayukta officer, requesting anonymity. "It is only when you have something to hide that you become so belligerent."

And some officers do have a lot to hide—as was proved by the recent raids. The biggest haul was J. Alexander, former excise commissioner. It took six painstaking months to unearth all that Alexander had acquired, including bungalows, estates and luxury cars. Subsequently, he was sacked from the post of chairman-cum-managing director of the Mangalore Chemicals and Fertilisers. His case is still pending before the central administrative tribunal.

Last month, the Lokayukta made another sensational hit: B.S. Patil, the industries and commerce secretary. But this blew the lid off the IAS-wallahs. Patil was a senior officer, that too of the powerful Lingayat community. That lent the IAS lobby the clout it had so far lacked.

With two ministers in Bangarappa's Cabinet taking up the cause of the IAS lobby, the liquor barons, too, joined the fray. They have not only demanded Anandan's sacking but also want the clipping of Lokayukta Justice A.D. Koshal's wings. Reportedly, the two senior ministers have forced the CM to restrain Anandan from raiding IAS officers.

"But I am just doing my job," says Anandan. "These raids were not conducted with any prejudice towards anyone. We based our raids on facts By doing my duty, some people think I am inconveniencing them." The Lokayukta officers point out that their actions are not mere allegations, but are based on evidence, including government documents. Despite this, the Lokayukta office has drawn much flak, and Justice Koshal has been termed a "Hegde-agent".

One point raised by the accusing lobbies was that the "pre-trial" public exposures of an officer's assets—as was being done by the Lokayukta—was bad for the morale of the bureaucracy's top brass. But "a crime is a crime," retorts a Lokayukta officer. "How can one accept the publication of crime reports based on FIRs but ignore the FIRs filed on IAS officers? What gives them the holier-than-thou status?"

It is well known that the CM is not very fond of either Justice Koshal or his institution. When Koshal was appointed by the former CM, Ramakrishna Hegde, Bangarappa had protested. More recently, Bangarappa was among those politicians who did not submit statements about their assets. "I had lost the statement I had filed last year," the CM explained. "I asked the Lokayukta's office for a copy to check what I had filed, but they have not sent it to me yet." However, Justice Koshal says that a copy had indeed been sent to the CM's office, but there has been no response.

The current drive against corrupt government officers was initiated by former CM Veerendra Patil. Soon after taking charge last year, the ex-CM had asked for details of all officers' assets and, after a scrutiny, had handed over a short-list to be checked out by the Lokayukta. But the present CM's attitude is not clear. Will he continue the fight against corruption with much opposition from his own men? Or will he wait till January, when Justice Koshal and his team's term comes to an end? •

The blast

An explosion at an IPCL plant leaves 23 dead

MAHARASHTRA

The explosion could be heard miles away. At 7.15 pm on 5 November, when the second shift at the Nagothane plant of the Indian Petrochemical Corporation Limited (IPCL) was in full swing, a devastating blast reduced the giant factory's chilling and storage unit to a mass of mangled metal. The explosion, caused by leaking gas, has so far claimed 23 lives and maimed 18 people.

P.S. Mehta, a senior IPCL manager says; "The investigations are on and it will be premature to blame anything on anyone till they are complete. As soon as the leak was detected, engineers in the control room shut down the rest of the plant and isolated the affected section."

But somehow, the preventive operation was not totally effective. Project manager B.N. Kaul and others had to rush to the risk zone and shut off the controls manually, knowing fully well that the vulnerable section could be blown sky high. And that is precisely what happened moments after the desynchronisation was complete.

The blast set the chilling and storage section ablaze, and eight Central Industrial Security Force (CISF) personnel died fighting the fire. Fire brigade reinforcements were rushed in from Roha and Bombay as well.

The injured were taken to the Sion and J.J. Hospital in Bombay. Sources at the two hospitals say that some of the victims have suffered over 50 to 100 per cent burns. "The death toll is certainly going to rise," says a doctor who does not want to be named.

Presently, investigations are on to find out what really happened and why. Experts from Stone and Webster, the consultants, have arrived, and they are preparing their own report on the accident. Meanwhile, in the hospitals, the victims of Nagothane fight for survival, and it is too early to tell how many of them will live to know who or what was responsible for the tragedy. •

IIT authorities suspend three students campaigning against ragging

WEST BENGAL

The Indian Institute of Technology (IIT), Kharagpur, of brilliant minds and brutal ragging fame, is making news lately. On 7 August 1990, the students' registration day, three senior students solemnly wound their way through the crowd of bright new faces, handing out a leaflet promising help and support against ragging. It was essential, the leaflet declared, for "all of us who love this institution, to root this out. Therefore, let us pledge to do our best to stop this immoral and unethical practice." About three months later, the three were suspended from the institute for "indiscipline".

INDIAN INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY
KHARAGPUR

OFFICE ORDER NO: III/ACD(UG)/ 313 /90 DATED: 29.10.1990

On the recommendation of the Standing Disciplinary Committee and keeping in mind the serious views expressed by the Senate, Director as the Chairman of the Senate has decided that the following punishments be awarded to the undermentioned students who were found guilty of committing indiscipline by (a) disturbing the Institute programme of registration of First Year Undergraduate students and (b) distributing materials in the leaf-let which caused great anxiety and pain to the parents of the freshers:

1. Nilabh Sanat, Roll No. 8825206
2. Sudeep Bhattacharyya, Roll No. 8615206
3. Manas Hira, Roll No. 8917310

Punishments:

1. They be suspended from the present semester (Autumn of 90-91).
2. They must clear all the dues and leave the Institute on or before 5.11.1990.
3. They may be allowed to register for the ... Spring Semester on the prescribed date and on retaining ... [illegible]

The suspension order: the root of controversy

The punishment would completely mess up the brilliant academic career of the trio. Manas Hira, an M. Tech. final-year student, would effectively lose an academic year and his scholarship. Nilabh Sanat, a final-year mathematics student and the topper of his department, and Sudeep Bhattacharya, M. Sc. (chemistry) final-year student, were supposed to take their exams on 28 November. "They could have avoided this (suspension) if only they had apologised," says R.K. Banerji, the deputy director officiating in place of director K.L. Chopra. Three other students, suspended for indulging in severe ragging, had publicly apologised and were let off. "But why would the anti-ragging students apologise?" asks a professor of the institute. "They did nothing wrong!"

Even a request from Russi Modi, chairman, board of governors of the IIT, to revoke the suspension order did not help. "I have no information about Mr Modi's request," says Mahinder Singh, dean of students' affairs, who heads the disciplinary committee (DC) that recommended the punishment. "These students were breaking rules."

The IIT-TA (teachers' association) protested vehemently against the action and declared in their bulletin (22 October) that the whole process was "nauseating and senseless", concluding that "the Dean and the Director...have really tarnished the image of the institute and not the students".

Ragging was banned eight years ago, but it still flourishes in this institute. Several freshers, unable to endure the torture, have left. A case was highlighted by the press last year. And Hitabrata Chowdhury, who tried to fight the cruel custom, was expelled. So, Ignatius Koilparampil, a research student, sent a protest note to director Chopra criticising him for not taking steps against the offenders while punishing those who tried to stop the practice. Wiser from Chowdhury's experience, Koilparampil sent copies of the letter to the chief minister, Chief Justice, Prime Minister and the President. And when the authorities tried to expel him, he got a stay order from the Calcutta High Court, in a public interest litigation case filed on the basis of his letter. That case is still on, and the IIT has pleaded for mercy.

But instead of trying to stop the custom, the authorities have tried to stop news of ragging from spreading. Manas, Nilabh and Sudeep were idealists, who went to nearby villages to teach kids, and to Baliapal to protest against Agni. They had tried to make dean Singh take action and had shown him how freshers were harassed. In the bargain, two other students opposed to ragging, got severely beaten up but the dean refused to do anything. The next day, a complaint was lodged with the police. No action was, however, taken against those named in the diary. "I don't know what you are talking about," says the dean. "If the police have not done anything, you can't blame me." And the concerned police officer-in-charge, (OC) admits that Singh requested him to drop the case.

The dean, it seems, makes those who protest against ragging drop the charges. So during the tenure of the two directors succeeding Ashok Mukherji—who was vehemently against ragging—no "ragger" was penalised. Till last month, when a fresher refused to take back his written complaint and the IIT-TA raised a stink about the anti-ragging students being punished. So the three "raggers" were suspended along with the three do-gooders.

"But how can you treat them equally?" fumes an IIT-TA spokesman. And the director has also been accused of shifting ground. From accusing the trio of tarnishing the IIT's image, he finally penalised them for disturbing the registration process and causing "great anxiety and pain" to the parents of freshers. "Not for a moment was the registration disturbed," says an IIT-TA official "Besides, if the parents knew that their children had friends in the institute who were ready to protect them from ragging, they would naturally be relieved. Why the pain and anxiety?"

Even with a large section of the students and practically all the teachers condemning the institute's decision to suspend the trio, there are no signs of reversing the decision. Probably Russi Modi's visit will help change matters. ●

What next?

How will this drama of deception and intrigue end?

The morning of Thursday 8 November. The previous night, a government had fallen. It was, of course, an anticipated event, yet there is something different in the air when it actually happens.

I have just enough time to glance through the headlines and editorials of half a dozen Bombay papers. Pro or anti-V.P. Singh, there is a distinct air of relief. In a front-page editorial Indian Express proclaims: "There will be few who will not recall with poignancy the hopes with which the National government was installed in office a bare 11 months ago." Memories, obviously, are short at the Express, with or without Arun Shourie. The bitter truth, as expounded by The Times of India and other papers seems to have eluded them. Says The Times editorial, "Mr V P. Singh was able to assume office on 2 December, 1989, thanks to last-minute intrigue and deception; the same factors were at work when he stepped down on Wednesday." Concludes The Daily, "The epitaph on the V.P. Singh government would proclaim that good intentions were not enough and that people can see through the hypocrisy of the rulers." A day earlier, The Times had its own epitaph on the former PM: "He diminished India in the eyes of the world, and, infinitely worse, he diminished us in our own eyes."

It is also clear that none of our political pundits have any clue to what is going to be the next act in this sordid political drama. The only ray of hope, according to The Times, is that "President R. Venkataraman, whose sense of impartiality and commitment to uphold the letter and spirit of the Constitution are acknowledged by one and all, can be trusted to act in the vital interests of the nation."

Quite suddenly, the Express has discovered the virtues of a 'national government', consisting of "men and women of unimpeachable credentials—of whom there should be no dearth, even in these unregenerate days—would be welcomed by all patriotic Indians". Obviously, Express has in mind some of our 'intellectuals'. Looking at their antics over the years, one shudders at the very thought of a government consisting of men like Rajni Kothari, L.C. Jain and Nikhil Chakravarty, selfish, self-centred, self-seeking and totally blind to the realities around them. That old conservative from Bombay, Minoo Masani, has already issued a call for the 'national government', minus all politicians. Does anyone want to jump into the fire from the frying pan?

THE TIMES OF INDIA

The Times editorial said: "V.P. Singh assumed office on 2 December, 1989, thanks to last minute intrigue and deception; the same factors were at work when he stepped down"

Too much publicity

Among Bombay's media-hungry public figures are two clowns, Mayor Chhagan Bhujbal and Sheriff Nana Chudasama. The 'Sheriff' is a purely ornamental post, though in the past, it had been held by distinguished men like Vijay Merchant, Dilip Kumar and Sunil Dutt. Chudasama is a failed politician (contested polls twice, losing deposits both times), a 'giant', a 'social worker' whose hunger for publicity can only be matched by that of Dr Rashmi Mayur, who calls himself a futorologist. Chudasama puts up hoardings with 'humorous' messages which are reprinted in Bombay's dailies. Most of these are plain silly.

Bhujbal is a Shiv Sena heavyweight who has tried to grab Belgaum from Karnataka by sneaking into the town incognito during agitations launched by the Samyukta Maharastra Samiti.

Recently, Chudasama announced an 'I love Bombay' gala show on Marine Drive featuring skits by film stars, a Kalyanji-Anandji nite, floats along the Drive and whatnot. The show, he claimed, would make Bombayites aware of their love for the city and lead to efforts to keep it clean. While inviting all and sundry for the show, Chudasama overlooked the First Citizen and other corporators. Bhujbal ridiculed the programme pointing out that all that Chudasama had done over the two terms as Sheriff was to whitewash some walls in his affluent Malabar Hill locality.

What was astonishing was the publicity received by the Mayor-Sheriff war. Morning papers, afternoon papers, magazines highlighted the mini-war. It surely provided comic relief to readers, but what about the oft-repeated complaints from the media about the high prices of newsprint? If they can devote so much space over the silly tiff between two clowns, the industry is awash with newsprint. ●

Testing times

The new Ananda Marg chief faces an uphill task

Can the Ananda Marg survive the Anandamurti? When Prabhat Ranjan Sarkar, popularly known as Anandamurti, the high-profile founder of the Ananda Marg, died on the evening of 21 October, that was the question on most lips. Taken aback by the sudden demise of their 'guru', the Margis soon reorganised themselves: they called an emergency meeting and elected Shraddhananda Avadhoot, the senior-most monk of the organisation, as the successor. But with Anandamurti and his charisma gone, the future of the socio-religious outfit suddenly seems uncertain.

Six years ago, when Anandamurti was asked by some devotees to write his autobiography, he had responded by saying: "I was a mystery, I am a mystery and I will ever remain one." Strangely true, considering that the Ananda Margis have always been at the centre of one controversy or the other. More so because a veil of secrecy surrounds the activities of the saffron-robed monks.

Speaking to SUNDAY about the void left by Anandamurti, Shraddhananda insists that it is a misconception. "He is within us and guides us, and he will be guiding us in our individual and social work." Initiated into the order in 1954 by his predecessor, Shraddhananda Avadhoot formally joined the organisation in 1964. Since 1981 he worked as head of the social security and communications department of the Marg. Now, faced with the responsibility of leading the worldwide organisation with "over four million followers", Shraddhananda believes that the Ananda Margis have a great role in promoting peace.

Who are the Ananda Margis? And why does the CPI(M), especially in West Bengal, insists on crushing them? Literally, the Ananda Margis are "travellers on the path of bliss." They insist they are opposed to violence and, that atma mokshartam jagat hitayacha (selfless service for self-liberation) is their only goal. But the West Bengal government has its doubts. However, the fact that CPI(M) cadres have never missed an opportunity to wipe them out speaks volumes for Anandamurti and his growing influence.

Founded in 1955, the Ananda Marg has grown over the years under P.R. Sarkar, who began his career as a small-time railway employee. The headquarters at Tiljala, on the outskirts of Calcutta, is the focal point of all Marg activities and houses many followers. But the fort as well as their bases in Purulia and North Bengal have been the target of repeated attacks by the CPI(M).

Why is the CPI(M) so hostile towards the Margis? According to Jagadishanda Avadhoot, law secretary and one of the 14 central committee members, the basic reason is "ideological difference". "There's is a matter centre, ours is a god centre," he insists and adds that "the CPI(M) sees us as a potential political force in the future." He dismisses any political connections and stresses that the Ananda Marg is strictly "socio-spiritual". "It has nothing to do with Amra Bangalee or the Vishwa Hindu Parishad," he adds.

But, the CPI(M) thinks otherwise. It feels that the saffron-clad sanyasis are up to no good. Apart from charges like subversion, conspiracy against the state and murder, which are pending decisions in courts of law or have been found baseless, the government also suspects a nexus between the Margis and drug mafias operating in the country's north-eastern borders. Added to that, the shift of headquarters from Purulia to Tiljala has been interpreted by the Marxists as a direct challenge. Marg offices in the state were repeatedly raided by the police. The cops even claimed to have seized arms and ammunition from the monks, something which is hotly contested by the Ananda Margis.

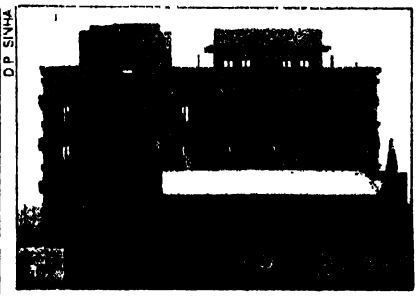
Replying to whether the Margis were against communism, Jagadisharananda observes that "Margis are anti-communist as well as anti-capitalist. Capitalism makes a man a beggar and communism makes a beggar a beast. We believe in a progressive socialism based on a balanced economy...and our education encourages Eastern spiritual values as well as Western scientific knowledge."

The Margis have done a lot of good work in the social field, claims Jagadisharananda. Two colleges, one under Bardhaman University and the other under Mysore University, are run by the organisation. "We have 1,500 schools and have done work in the social field. We have hospitals, ambulances, master units for small scale industries and conduct relief operations also", say the Margis. But, where does the money come from? Jagadisharananda replies: "The principal sources are 2 per cent of the income of each Margi, unconditional public donations ,sale profits of literatures, the profits from the 200-odd presses we have in India and also from our master units. We are law abiding people but the CPI(M) has already killed 35 of our followers. We do not want any confrontation."

Isn't the Ananda Marg then an intellectual and a predominantly urban organisation, and why does the country fail to recognise its worth? The Avadhoot smiles. "We are mostly working in the villages and we do not feel that we are pro-urban. Modernism is a curse. And about India not recognising us, well, its always difficult to be acclaimed on home soil, isn't it?"

According to statistics doled out by the Marg, the organisation has 180 bases covering most countries. Margis claim that their outfit is still going strong despite the fact that the CPI(M) is trying everything up its sleeve to cut them to size.

Take the instance of the controversy surrounding the tandava nritya. The West Bengal government had banned the performance of the dance in public on the grounds that it encouraged violence. And the Margis promptly went to court. Soon after taking over, the new chief of the Ananda Marg met with his first victory. On 8 November, a division bench of the Calcutta High Court held that the performance of the tandava dance in public was a part of religious rites under Article 26 of the Constitution. It meant that the controversial 'skull and knife' dance would continue.



But, wasn't the metaphor too violent for a peace loving organisation? Jagadisharananda Avadhoot stresses that most people fail to see its significance. The skull is a reminder that death is behind you and before you. It emphasises the fact that now is important. The knife is there to cut all fetters obstructing the path to salvation, while the dance brings in the essential trio towards optimism—dynamism, rhythm and hilarity. The fear, he insists, is of ignorance. He cites Rabindranath Tagore's Nataraj to show its presence in literature and argues that Nataraj In Art, Thought And Literature written by the director of National Library and forwarded by the then Prime Minister, Indira Gandhi, is ample proof of its acceptance as a cultural performance. But the people still have their doubts. It is the stories circulating about the avadhoots' fanaticism that have sparked such a violent reaction.

And the stories have not been favourable. Although the Margis claim that their organisation is only for the "good of mankind", they have earned a bad name in certain quarters. Who they really are and what they mean is something of a mystery still. •

■ Adventure has lured man ever since time immemorial. Some have crossed ragged mountains, others desolate deserts. But with Belur Bhavani, the adventurous spirit has reached a new high.

An accident at the age of 13 incapacitated him and his family ruled him an invalid. But Belur hit back. A year later he resorted to the use of artificial limbs, and now, at 22, is gearing up to conquer the skies. His medium—hang gliding.

He has already participated in two competitions and won "special awards", but that was only for starters. His confidence is commanding and he believes that he can out-do the rest. "I'm as good as anybody else with all his limbs intact," he says, and adds, "I don't think there's any feeling like being airborne, all on your own, when logically, you should be sitting on terra firma—pitying yourself."

Fruit for thought

■ The latest to hit the fashion scene is the pineapple-leaf skirt. No, not in the fig-leaf style; this is breakthrough yarn we are talking about. And the pioneer in the manufacture of yarn from pineapple -leaf fibre is none other than South India Textiles Research Association (SITRA).

The use of "unconventional fibres for manufacture of fabrics" did not stop at skirts. Carpets, furnishing materials, wall coverings and reinforced plastic sheets were other items made, to name just a few. The stage, thus, is all set for a pineapple revolution.

THIS INDIA

BOMBAY: Policemen in Bombay with paunches will shortly have to go on a strict diet. The offices of the state director general of police (DGP) and the police commissioner are not willing to stomach this any more. Plans are, therefore, afoot to make city policemen shed their extra weight. Over 3200 police officials and the 27000-strong constabulary will have to adhere to minimum prescribed standards of physical fitness. The chief minister, Mr Sharad Pawar, is said to have shown avid interest in the scheme. At a recent meeting of top police officials, Mr Pawar suggested that primary health facilities be made available at local police stations to help the men shape up their muscle. Some of our policemen are twice my size, Mr Pawar is learnt to have jocularly remarked at the meeting—The Sunday Times of India (R.P. Chaddah, Chandigarh)

JAMSHEDPUR: The deputy commissioner of Singbhum (east), Mr B.K. Haldar, has ordered an enquiry into reports that two doctors attached to the Chakula government hospital had been drawing their salaries for the last two years without attending the hospital. The doctors, Madan Mohan Thakur, and H.A. Ansari, had gone to the hospital twice or thrice a year to draw their salaries and allowances and to manipulate the attendance register—The Telegraph (B.N.
